ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Inn at Shrewsbury. CHARLES STANLEY and HARRY STUKELY at breakfast.

Har. Faith, Charles, I cannot think as you do on this subject.

Cha. I am sorry for it; but, when you have served two or three campaigns more, take my word for it, Harry, you will have the same opinion of the army that I entertain at this moment.

Har. 'Tis impossible; the army is the only profession where a great soul can be completely gratified. After a glorious and well-fought field, the approbation of my sovereign, with the acclamations of my brave countrymen, are rewards amply repaying whole years of service.

Cha. True; but the honours we gather very often adorn the head of a commander who has been only an ear-witness to this "well-fought field."

Har. Ay, but every individual has his share.

Cha. Of the danger, I grant you; and when a return is made of the killed, wounded, &c. you see in every newspaper a list of them in the following order: three captains, seven lieutenants, twelve ensigns, killed; so many wounded; then come, in order, the sergeant-majors, sergeants, drummers, &c. &c. &c. and as to the rank and file, they are given to you in the lump; one hundred, or one thousand, just as it happens.

Har. But their memories live forever in the hearts of their countrymen. How comes it, Charles, that with these sentiments you ever wore a cockade?

Cha. I'll tell you: whenever I receive the pay of my sovereign, and am honoured with the character of his trusty and well-beloved, I will faithfully, and I hope bravely, discharge the confidence he reposes in me. But, Harry, you have no serious objection to matrimony; if you have, we had better proceed no further: our project has a period.

Har. Not in the least, I assure you: I think myself capable of engaging in the fields both of love and war. I will marry, because it has its conveniences.

"—— But when light-wing'd toys
Of feather'd Cupid, foil with wanton dulness
My speculative and offic'd instruments,
Let all indign and base adversities
Make head against my estimation."

There's a touch of Othello for you, and, I think, à-propos.

Cha. Egad! Harry, that speech puts me in mind of a letter I received from Miss Kitty Sprightly, the fair ward of my uncle, Sir Gilbert Pumpkin. You must know, we are to have a play acted at the old family mansion for our entertainment, or rather for the entertainment of Miss Kitty; who is so mad after everything that has the appearance of a theatre, that I should not be surprised if she eloped with the first strolling company that visited this part of the country.

Har. Let us have the letter by all means.

Cha. (Reads.) "Miss Kitty Sprightly sends her compliments to Captain Charles, and as she is informed Sir Gilbert has invited him to Strawberry-hall, she thinks it necessary to acquaint Captain Charles, that he must shortly perfect himself in the character of Captain Macheath, as the ladies expect him to perform that character at the mansion-house."

If he has a good Filch in the circle of his acquaintance, she desires the Captain will not fail to bring him down."

Har. Why, what the devil! I'll lay my life, you have brought me down to play this curious character in this very curious family.

Cha. You are right, Harry; and if you can filch away the old sister, you will play the part to some advantage; you will have fifty thousand pounds to your benefit, my boy.

Har. You mean this as an introduction to the family. Oh! then have at you. But d—n it, I can't sing; I can act tolerably.

Cha. I'll warrant you. But come, we will repair to the mansion: we are only two miles from it. They expect us to dinner. William, desire the hostler to put the horses to. Waiter, a bill.

Enter Waiter.

Upon my word, waiter, your charges are intolerable. What! five shillings for a boiled fowl!

Wait. We know your honour isn't on half-pay. We always charge to the pockets of our customers, your honour.

Har. Well, but, good Mr. Waiter, take back your bill; and, in your charge, consider us on half-pay.

Wait. Lord bless your honour! you are in too good flesh for that. Why, your honour looks as fat and as well as myself.

Cha. Ha, ha, ha! (Both laugh.) There is half-a-crown above your bill, which you may dispose of as you please. Get you gone.

Wait. Your honours, I hope, will remember honest Will Snap, at the Antelope, when you come next to Shrewsbury. [Exit.]

Cha. Mr. Honesty, your servant. Travelling, Harry, is now become so chargeable, that few gentlemen of our cloth can afford to breathe the fresh air for a day.

Enter Hostler, &c.

But what's your business?

Host. The hostler, your honour. There is not such a pair of bays, your honour, in the country: they'll take you to Sir Gilbert's in ten minutes without turning a hair. I hope I shall drink your honour's health.

Har. Get out of my sight, this moment, ye set of scoundrels, or I will knock you down with this chair. (Takes up one.) Landlord! hallo! Why the devil don't you send in all the poor in the parish? This is highway robbery, without the credit of being robbed. Let us get away, Charles, while we have money to pay the turnpikes.

Cha. Allons!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Hall at the Mansion-house.

Enter DIGGERY, with a play-book in his hand: WAT, CYMON, and a Servant to the family, making a noise.

Dig. Hold your d—d tongues! How is it possible I can tell you how to act, when you all open like a kennel of hounds? Listen; but don't say a word. I am to be Alexander; and Wat, you are to be my friend Clintus; and—

Wat. Ah! Muster Diggery, you shall see what I'll say.

Dig. D—e! hold your tongue, I say once more. You'll say! What can you say? Say only what is in the book, and don't be cramming in your own nonsense. But listen, all of you, and mind. You must know, the man who wrote this play was mad.

Wat. Lord! I should like to play mad.

Dig. Will nobody stop this fellow's mouth? Why, you blockhead, you have not sense enough to be mad. You'd play the fool well enough; but how can you extort that d—d pudding face of your's to madness? Why, Wat, your features are as fixed as the man in the moon's.

All. Go on, Master Diggery; go on.

Dig. Well, let me see. (Turns over the leaves of the play.) You, Wat, I say, is to be Clintus; and I am to say, before all of you, that great Almon gave me birth: then, Wat, you are to say "you lie!"

Wat. Ah! but then you'll stick me.

Dig. Never mind that; button your waistcoat over one of our trenchers. Lord! I forgot to begin right. I am first to come out of a tim-whiskey, which you are to draw; and, when I come down, you are all to fall upon your marrow-bones. And as to you, Wat, if you even look at me, I'll come up and give you such a douse of the chaps, as you never had in your life.

Wat. Let us try. Now you shall see, Muster Diggery.

Dig. Then do as I bid you. Down, every mother's skin of you. (They all kneel down; Diggery draws back.) Don't stir none, if Miss Bridget was ringing every bell in the house. When I say, "Rise all, my friends!" then do you all get up.

Wat. Is that right, Muster Diggery?

Dig. Very well; now—(a bell rings)—zounds! here's Miss Bridget.

Enter MISS BRIDGET.

Miss B. Where, in the name of mischief, have you been, rascal? Your master has been looking for you this hour, and no tidings, high or low.

Dig. I'm going. [Exit, leaving the rest kneeling.]

Miss B. Mercy upon us! What's all this? Cy-mon! Wat! Are you all mad? Why don't you answer?

Cym. Hush, hush! Diggery is to play mad. I must not stir.

Miss B. Mercy upon me! these fellows may be struck mad, for aught I know. I'll raise the house. Brother, brother! Kitty Sprightly! Where are you all?

Enter SIR GILBERT.

Sir G. What the devil's the matter?

Miss B. Look at those fellows, brother! They are all out of their senses; they are all mad.

Sir G. Mad, are they? Why, then, run and bring me the short blunderbuss that's hanging in the hall, and I'll take a pop at the whole covey.

Enter DIGGERY.

Diggery, what's the matter with those fellows?

Dig. Nothing, sir.

Sir G. Nothing! Why, what the devil keeps them in that posture, then?

Dig. Lord, sir! I'll soon make them get upon their legs.

Sir G. Do then, I desire you; and send them all to the mad-house.

Dig. (Goes up to them.) Rise all, my friends! (They all rise.) Lord, sir! we were only acting a play.

Sir G. You son of a w—! get out of my sight this moment. (They all run away.) Was ever man so plagued with such a set of scoundrels? Morning, noon, and night, is this fellow, Diggery, taking these wretches from their labour; and making Cæsars, Alexanders, and Blackamoors, of them.

Miss B. Brother, brother! if you had routed that nest of vagabonds, who were mumming in our barn, about two months ago, none of this would have happened.

Sir G. True, true, sister Bridget. It was but a few days ago, I went to take a walk about my fields; when I came back, the first thing I saw, was a large sheet of paper pasted on the street-door, and on it were wrote, in large characters,

"This evening will be presented here,
THE GREAT ALEXANDER.

Alexander, by Mr. Diggery Ducklin;
Roxana, by Miss Tippet Busky;

And the part of Statira by a young Lady, (being her first appearance on any stage;)"

D—e, if I knew my own house!

Miss B. That's not all, brother; Diggery had nearly smothered that silly hussy, Tippet, in the oven, a few days ago.

Sir G. The oven! What the devil brought her there?

Miss B. Why, Diggery prevailed upon her to go in, and he said he would break open the door of it with the kitchen-poker, and that would be playing Romo.

Sir G. Romo! Romeo, you mean. Why, sister Bridget, you can't speak English. Surely, some demon has bewitched our family. (Aside.) But, pray, what became of Juliet in the oven?

Miss B. Hearing a noise, I went down stairs; and the moment he saw me, he dropped the poker, and ran away. But I had no sooner opened the door of the oven, than I saw her gasping for breath; and it was as much as I could do to drag her out, and save her from being suffocated.

Sir G. Why the devil did you not leave her there? She would have been a good example to the whole family. As to that fellow, Diggery, he will be hanged for the murder of some of these creatures, as sure as he is now alive. I overheard him, the other day, desiring Cymon to fall on the carving-knife, and he would then die like Cato!

Miss B. If they continue these pranks, we shall never be able to receive Captain Charles and his friend; they will certainly imagine we are all run mad in good earnest.

Sir G. How can it be otherwise? Miss Kitty Sprightly, forsooth, extorted a promise from me the other day, that when Charles and his friend came down, I would permit the Beggar's Opera to be got up, as she phrased it, in order to entertain them.

Miss B. Brother, that girl is worse than the whole gang of them.

Sir G. Leave me to manage her: I will endeavour to release myself from the promise I made her; and, instead of this play, a ball may answer the purpose. I hope, sister, you have prepared a good dinner for my nephew and his friend. He informs me in his letter, that the gentleman he brings down with him is a man of family, and a soldier that does honour to his profession.

Miss B. I must desire, brother, you will mind your ward, and leave the house to me. Let him be related to the first datchess in the land, he shall say, after he leaves Strawberry-hall, he never feasted until he came there.

Enter DIGGERY.

Dig. Lord, sir! Captain Macheath is just arrived.

Sir G. Captain Macheath! My nephew, rascal! Desire him to walk up immediately.

Dig. Yes, sir. Oh! sir, here he is.

Enter CHARLES and HARRY.

Sir G. Ah! nephew, I am glad to see you. How have you been these two years? I have not seen you since your last campaign.

Cha. In very good health, sir; and am sincerely happy to see you so. Permit me, sir, to introduce to your acquaintance, the companion of my dangers and my friendship.

Sir G. Sir, you are welcome to Strawberry-hall.

I love a soldier; and I am informed you support the character in all its relations.

Har. You do me great honour, Sir Gilbert: I shall study to deserve your good opinion.

Dig. He's a better figure than me; and better action, too. (Imitates him.)

Cha. I was in great hopes, my dear aunt, that when next I visited Strawberry-hall, I should have found you happy in the possession of your old lover, Parson Dosey. I hope you have not banished him?

Miss B. Don't talk of the wretch; you know he was always my aversion. (Diggery, at the side, is stabbing himself with a large key.)

Sir G. What are you about, Diggery?

Dig. Sir! (Puts the key into his pocket.)

Sir G. Come, come, I'll tell you the fact, and spare her blushes. Parson Dosey, you must know, some time ago, was playing a pool of quadrille with my sister and three of her elderly maiden acquaintances, who live in the neighbourhood, when, behold ye! to the astonishment of all the ladies, the parson's right eye dropped into the fish-tray! Egad! I was as much astonished as the rest; for none of us had ever discovered the defect, although he has been in the parish for so many years. But, in a twinkling, he whipt it into the socket; and when I looked him in the face, d—e! if I did not think there was as much meaning in it, as in any eye about the table.

Dig. Ha, ha, ha! (Sir G. interrupts him in the middle of his laugh.)

Sir G. For shame, Diggery! (Drives him off.) Bless me! I forgot. Give me leave, sir, to introduce you to my sister.

Har. (Kisses her, and bows very politely.) Upon my word, madam, such an imposition deserved a very severe chastisement. I hope, madam, you never permitted this made-up gentleman to indulge the eye he had left, with another view of your fair self?

Miss B. Dear sir, I hope you don't mind my brother; he is always upon his sagaries. He puts me to the blush a hundred times a day. Faith! a very pretty young fellow! I'll take a more particular view of him presently. (Aside.)

Sir G. No, no. My sister's observation was a just one: "That when a woman marries, she ought to have a man naturally complete."

Miss B. So, brother, you will go on with your vile conceptions.

Sir G. I have no vile conceptions. Why do you suppose them vile, sister Bridget?

Miss B. Gentlemen, I cannot stay in the room.

Har. Dear madam, I beg—pray, madam—(Takes her by the hand.)

Miss B. I must go, sir, I am in such a tremble. I shall certainly drop with confusion, if I stay any longer. [Exit.]

Har. Indeed, Sir Gilbert, this canonical gentleman, presuming to address a lady of Miss Pumpkin's qualifications—

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! Miss Pumpkin's qualifications! Stick to that, Captain, and you will soon have a regiment. I find the soldier has not spoiled the courtier.

Har. I really think what I say, sir. The deception was unpardonable.

Sir G. Not at all. The parson was very poor, and he knew she was very rich; and, if the fellow was blind with one eye, and squinted with the other, I could not blame him to marry her, if she was fool enough to consent to the union. Indeed, it was my business to prevent it; but the discovery of the glass eye did the business more effectually than I could do, had I the eloquence of a Cicero.

Cha. But, pray, uncle, where is your fair charge,

Miss Kitty Sprightly? She's grown, I suppose, a fine girl by this time.

Sir G. A fine girl, quotha! I do not like that warm inquiry. A red coat may spoil my project of marrying her myself. (Considers.) I have it! I'll tell him she's a little crack-brained. (Aside.) Nephew, a word in your ear—the poor girl has got a touch.

Cha. A touch! You don't say so.

Sir G. As sure as you are in your senses. She's always imagining herself to be either Helen, Cleopatra, Polly Peachum, or some other female of antiquity, that made a noise in the world.

Cha. Oh, ho! I smell a rat here! but I'll humour it. (Aside.) 'Tis a strange species of madness, uncle: she's, probably, play-mad.

Sir G. You have it; and the contagion has run through the house. There's Diggery, Wat, Cymon, Tippet, and the whole family, except my sister, have got the bite. Why, sometimes you would imagine, from the wooden sceptres, straw crowns, and such like trumpery, that Bedlam was transported to the spot you now stand upon. I give you this hint, that your friend may not be surprised: you will explain the unhappy situation of the poor girl to him. An excellent thought! it will keep her at a distance from him. (Aside.)

Cha. Harry, my uncle informs me (winking at him) that his fair ward, the young lady I mentioned to you, has lately had a touch.

Har. A touch! I am heartily sorry for it. How came the unlucky accident? I hope no faithless one-eyed lover in the case.

Sir G. Zounds! No, no, no! Why, nephew, you describe the girl's disorder abominably. She lately had a touch here, here, sir. (Points to his forehead.)

Har. Oh! is that all? I hope, sir, with a little attention, she will be soon restored.

Cha. I am very sorry to hear this account of my dear little Kitty. Let us visit her. Where is she, uncle?

Sir G. Dear little Kitty! Oh, ho! but I'll have all my senses about me. (Aside.) In her own chamber, I suppose: but, follow me, and you shall see her. She is quite another thing to what she was two years ago, when you saw her. But come, gentlemen, dinner will be shortly on the table, and I long to have a bumper with you. [Exit.]

Har. So, Charles, this is the fair lady you brought me down to run away with?

Cha. Even so.

Har. Why, what the devil would the world say of me for being such a scoundrel?

Cha. Marry the lady, Harry; and, when you have fifty thousand pounds in your pocket, the world will be very glad to shake hands and be friends with you.

Har. I would as soon marry Hecate—

Cha. As my aunt. Very polite, truly! But keep her out of my way, and you may do with her as you please. This girl, who my uncle says is mad, I believe I shall be able to restore in a short time; and it will go hard with me, if you will assist in the project, but I will put her into a post-chaise, and set out for London this very night.

Har. Command me, dear Charles, in anything that can be of service to you. Have you instructed William? He's a trusty, shrewd fellow.

Cha. He has got his lesson. He will soon get into Diggery's good graces, if he can only give him a speech out of a play; however, I hope William will be able to manage him. Oh! here is Diggery.

Enter DIGGERY, with a napkin in his hand.

Diggery, my honest fellow! I am glad to see you. Why, you are grown out of knowledge. It is some years since I was first favoured with your acquaintance, Diggery.

Dig. So it is, your honour. Let me see: (considers) you was first favoured with my acquaintance four years come next Lammas. But I knew nothing then; I was quite a thing, your honour.

Cha. You have improved, Diggery, since that time, I see, considerably.

Dig. How do you see that, your honour?

Cha. Why, your face shews it. There are the lines of good sense, wit, and humour in every feature; not that insipid face you used to have, no more expression in it than a toasted muffin.

Dig. I got all, your honour, by larning to read. You'll see me, when I play, look in a way that will frighten the whole family. No muffin faces! all mispression, your honour. (Harry hums a tune out of the Beggar's Opera, and acts; Diggery looks at him.) Master Charles, who is that gentleman? He's acting, isn't he? Has he a muffin face?

Cha. No, no, Diggery, don't disturb him. He is one of the first actors of the age, and has a face that would frighten the devil, when he pleases. He'll put us all to rights; I brought him down for the purpose.

Dig. Suppose your honour desires him to kill himself for a minute or two before dinner. I have tried a thousand times, and never could kill myself to my own satisfaction, in all my life. I'll lend him my key. (Bell rings.) Coming! Oh! Master Charles, I was desired to bid you and the gentleman come to dinner; but I quite forgot it. Run as hard as you can.

Cha. Come, Harry, the family waits dinner.

[Exit with Harry, singing.]

Dig. The family waits dinner. (Imitates him.) I can't do it like him. Lord! how he'll do Captain Macheath in the play. I am glad he's not to be hanged. (Sings.)

"Let us take the road—Hark!

I hear the sound of coaches, (Bell rings.)
The hour of attack approaches."

[Bell rings till Diggery is off.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Dining Parlour.

SIR GILBERT, MISS BRIDGET, MISS KITTY, CHARLES, and HARRY, at dinner: DIGGERY attending at the sideboard.

Sir G. I hope, gentlemen, you like your dinner. As to my wine, there is not better in the country, I'll lay a hogshead of claret.

Har. Your entertainment is so good, Sir Gilbert, that I shall beg leave to prolong my visit. What shall we do, Charles, when we reach London, that cursed seat of noise and bustle?

Cha. Endeavour to reconcile ourselves to it; a soldier must not always expect good quarters. Pray, Miss Kitty, how does your fair friend, Miss Sally Cockle?

Kit. Oh! she has been married a long time, and was lately brought to bed of two thumping boys.

Miss B. Child, you must not tell that.

Kit. What, mustn't I tell the truth? Why, then, I do say, she was brought to bed of two boys, not six months ago; but she will be at our play to-night.

Sir G. I told you how it was; but she's not mischievous. (Aside to Charles.)

Cha. She has not the appearance of it.

Sir G. Come, my young soldiers, let us have a bumper to his majesty: what say you, my boys?

Har. A hundred, Sir Gilbert; and I say done first.

Sir G. Why, that's rather too many; but while I can stand or sit, have at you. Come, Diggery, let us have three bumpers in a minute here. Diggery! What is that fellow about there? (Diggery is kneel- ing at the foot of the sideboard, as if lamenting the death of Statira; they all rise and look at him.) I say, Diggery! (Diggery turns his head about, but continues kneeling.)

Dig. Sir!

Sir G. What are you about? Acting again, I suppose?

Dig. Lord, sir, I was only striving to cry over Statira! (Rises.)

Sir G. To cry over Statira! and what have you to do with Statira? Let Statira go to the devil; and give us three bumpers to his majesty, and then you may go and follow Statira if you will.

Dig. Yes, sir. (Brings the wine.)

Sir G. Come, boys, here is his majesty's health, and a long, glorious, and happy reign to him.

Kit. Indeed, guardie, you frighten poor Diggery so, that he forgets his part almost as soon as he gets it.

Sir G. Kitty Sprightly, hold your tongue, I bid you. I have surely a right to correct my own servants; but rest satisfied, for after this night, if ever I hear the name of that sheep-stealing scoundrel, Willy, as you call him, I will—there now, that fellow's at the devil's trade again. (Diggery is fencing with a large carving-knife.) Call Cymon here, thou imp of the devil; we shall be able to do something with him. Oh, lord! oh, lord!

Dig. Cymon! Cymon! (The last very loud.)

Enter CYMON.

Cy. Here!

Sir G. Cymon, do you attend table; that fellow is among the incurables.

Cha. After we have performed this play to-night, I fancy, sir, the family will have quite enough of it.

Miss B. Then I wish it was over, with all my heart.

Cha. Miss Kitty, will you drink a glass of wine with me? Shall I have the honour to touch your glass?

Kit. If you please, sir.

Har. Suppose, Miss Pumpkin, we make it a quartetto.

Sir G. A quartetto? Why not a quintetto? Cymon, five glasses of wine; be quick. I suppose you are not engaged with Statira.

Cy. Yes—no, your honour. (Gives five glasses of wine.)

Sir G. We could not get any fish for you, although we sent far and near for some.

Cha. Give me good roast beef, uncle, the most proper diet for a Briton and a soldier. (Cymon fills a glass; Diggery takes it up, and gives it to him; he appears to instruct Cymon what to do with it; Cymon drinks it, throws the glass over his head, and sings.)

Cy. "And my comrades shall see that I die." (Diggery and Cymon run off. All rise.)

Sir G. I wish, with all my heart, the devil had the whole pack. Was ever man so plagued?

Har. Dear Sir Gilbert, do not be uneasy; they will be all tired of playing before to-morrow night, or I am very much mistaken.

Kit. Now, guardie, for my part, I think the best way will be, to let them have their belly-full of playing.

Miss B. For shame, Kitty; you must not say belly-full before company; that's naughty.

Kit. Well, I do say, that if guardie would only let us play as much as we please, it is very probable we should as soon be tired of it as he is.

Har. Egad! Miss Kitty, an excellent thought. (Aside to Charles.) Suppose, Sir Gilbert, we adopt it.

Cha. Do, uncle; my friend and I will engage, in one week, to make them hate the sight of a theatre.

Sir G. Do you say so? If I thought that could be done—

Miss B. Indeed, indeed, brother, it will make them all as mad as March hares.

Har. Believe me, madam, it will not. I know a gentleman, who, every night of his life was at one or other of the play-houses, until he purchased a share in each of them, and afterwards he no more troubled himself about the theatre, than you do about learning to ride in the great saddle.

Miss B. No! Well, that's amazing.

Sir G. Well, well, I leave the management of this matter to you both; do with them as you please. If we can provide a remedy for this disorder, let us spare no pains to find it out. Sister, shew your nephew and his friend the garden; and do you, Kitty, go too. You will find me in my study. Take care of that poor girl, Charles; she is very sensible at some moments. [Exit.]

Cha. "Fear not my government."

Kit. That's what the black man says in the play. This is to my own taste exactly.

Cha. "Oh! my Statira, thou relentless fair! Turn thine eyes on me; I would talk to them."

Kit. "Not the soft breezes of the genial spring, The fragrant violet, or opening rose, Are half so sweet as Alexander's breath. Then he will talk—good gods! how he will talk." [He leads her out, looking at each other languishingly.]

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter MISS BRIDGET and HARRY.

Har. These improvements, madam, are the very extreme of elegance. I take for granted, they were laid out agreeably to your design.

Miss B. Partly, sir. My brother wanted to have the garden crammed full of naked figures, in a most undecent way, but I said not; and if you observe, they are clothed from head to foot; you can't see the ancle of one of them.

Har. There, madam, you blended decency with elegance, which is little attended to in these days. Besides, the artist has the same opportunity to shew his skill on the drapery of a lady's petticoat, as in finishing a Venus de Medicis.

Miss B. And so I told my brother. Says I, the Venus de Med—med—but won't you please to sit down, sir? You have walked a great deal; I am afraid you are fatigued. Sit down, sir, and dispose yourself. (He brings two garden-chairs to the front of the stage; they look at each other languishingly.) And are you certain, sir, this kind of play business will not be attended with any bad consequences to the family?

Har. Indeed, I think not, madam. A play, certainly, is one of the most rational amusements we have. The Greek and Roman stages contributed very much to civilize those nations; and, in a great measure, rescued them from their original barbarity.

Miss B. So I told my brother. Says I, the Greeks, the Romans, the Irish, and a great number of other barbarous nations, had plays.

Har. True, madam.

Miss B. But he said they were all Jacobites.

Har. The justice of that remark, I confess, strikes me; but, madam, you—you—you—D—e if I know what to say to this old fool. Where is Charles? (Aside.)

Miss B. I have touched him with my observations. What a delicate insensibility he discovers. (Aside.) I find, sir, from your conversation, you have read a monstrous deal. You have taken a degree, I suppose, sir, at our principal adversity?

Har. There's no standing this. (Aside.) Oh! yes, madam; and it cost me many an uneasy moment before I could obtain it: the only thing that made my time pass away even tolerably, was, that during my probation, I sometimes had the honour of a visit from the muses.

Miss B. Pray, sir, is that the family which lives at Oxford?

Har. No, faith! madam, they very seldom even sojourn there; they are a very whimsical family; and although of the highest extraction, very often condescend to visit a cottage instead of a palace.

Miss B. I shall be very glad to see them at Strawberry-Hall, or any friend of your's, sir.

Har. Dear madam, your goodness overwhelms me. I'll try this old Tabby with a love scene; she grows amorous. (Aside.) I cannot but think, madam, of the unaccountable vanity of the parson, whom Sir Gilbert so humorously described to-day. From the enterprising genius of this spirited gentleman, and from his wanting an eye, one may, with great propriety, I think, give him the name of the canonical Hannibal.

Miss B. Ha, ha! a very good summily, indeed, sir: he was, indeed, quite a cannibal; and so I told my brother: but don't mention his name, sir, it affects me like the hydrophica.

Har. His presumption, madam, deserved death. Monstrous! to think of obtaining such a hand as this, (kisses it) without the requisites even to gaze upon it. Oh! it is intolerable. (She rises, and he kneels.)

Miss B. Dear, sir! Lord, sir! With what a warmth he kisses my hand! Oh! he's a dear deluder. (Aside.) Sir,—Captain What-do-you-call-um, if we are seen, I am undone.

Har. Be under no apprehensions, my angel. (Kisses her again.)

Miss B. My angel! there's a word for you. I shall certainly give way in a few moments. (Aside.)

Enter DIGGERY, peeping at the side-scene.

Dig. What are these two cajoling about? Acting, I suppose. I'll try if I can't act in the same way.

Har. Ah! Miss Pumpkin, Miss Pumpkin! (Kneels; takes out his handkerchief, and weeps.)

Dig. Ah! Miss Pumpkin, Miss Pumpkin! (Kneels by the side-scene, and pulls the napkin out of his pocket; part of it is seen when he enters.)

Enter SIR GILBERT.

Sir G. Where are you, sister? Zounds! what's the matter now? What, are you acting! Have you got the touch?

Har. Humour the thought, madam. (Aside.)

Sir G. If Diggery had not been one of the dramatic personæ, I should have imagined, sister Bridget, that a red coat and a handsome young fellow were things not very disagreeable to you.

Dig. Yes, sir, I'm here! I'm always your honour's personæ.

Sir G. Get out of my sight this moment, thou—
[Exit Diggery.]

Miss B. Indeed, brother, I do not think that acting is so foolish a thing as I thought for. The Captain, here, has repeated so many pretty speeches, that I could listen to them for an hour longer. However, I will go and prepare tea for you. Good b'ye. [Exit.]

Har. Miss Bridget has very kindly undertaken, sir, to perform the part of Mrs. Peachum, in this evening's entertainment; and as she takes the part at a short notice, we must indulge her with the book. I shall make a proper apology to the audience upon that occasion, before the opera begins.

Sir G. Mrs. Peachum! What, has my sister undertaken to play Mother Peachum?

Har. Most kindly, sir.

Sir G. She has! Then I shall not be surprised if I see my she-goat and all her family dancing the hayes to-morrow morning. In short, after that, I shall not be surprised at anything. But tell me, my dear Stukely, tell me truly, do you think that you will be able to give them enough of it? Do you think our plan will succeed?

Har. I'll be bound for it, sir. If there are any more plays acted in your house after this, I will consent to lose my head.

Sir G. Then give them as much of it to-night as you can: do not spare them Stukely. But, come, let us go in to tea. Diggery is hard at work, fixing the scenes in the hall, and the whole neighbourhood will be here by-and-by. Come along.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room in the house.

Enter KITTY, singing.

Kit. This Charles, notwithstanding my singing, now and then makes me melancholy. He is so lively, and so tragic, and so comic, and so humorous, and so everything like myself, that I am much happier with him than with anybody else. Heigh-ho! what makes me sigh so, when I choose singing?—"Tol, lol, lol, la!" But here he is.

Enter CHARLES.

Cha. Come to my arms, thou loveliest of thy sex!

Kit. Keep off, Charles, I bid you; you must not lay hold on me in such a monstrous way; that's just like Cymon.

Cha. What do I hear? Death to my hopes! Cymon! Does Cymon lay hold of my dear Kitty?

Kit. To be sure. When I have no other person to rehearse with, I do take Cymon; and he does not perform badly, when I instruct him.

Cha. But don't you think you had better take me? Don't you imagine that my performance would please you better than his?

Kit. How can I tell, until I try you both? If you will give me a specimen, I'll soon tell you. Try now.

Cha. What the devil shall I say? I do not immediately recollect a line of a play. No matter, the first thing that comes into my head. (Aside.) Come, then, Kitty, you must play with me. Now mind. Hear me, thou fairest of the fair! hear me, dear goddess! hear—

Kit. Stop, stop; I do not know where that is.

Cha. Nor I, upon my soul. (Aside.) What! do not you recollect where that is?

Kit. No. Can you repeat a speech out of Romeo, Crooked-back Richard, the Conscious Lovers, Scrub, the Journey to London, the Clandestine Marriage, the School for Wives—

Cha. Stop, stop; yes, yes, Kitty, I have the Journey to London, the Clandestine Marriage, and the School for Wives, strong at this moment in my recollection. I think I can do—

Kit. What, then, you only think! You're not certain! Lord, lord! I do not believe you can do anything. Why Cymon could say them all without missing a word. I only desired him, after supper, a few nights ago, to go into the barn, and get by heart, the speech where the blackamoor smothers his wife, and I had not been in bed ten minutes, when he came into the room, and repeated every word of it.

Cha. The devil he did!

Kit. Ay, and more than that.

Cha. What more, in the devil's name?

Kit. Why, to be sure he was as black as old Harry, that's certain. He had blacked all his face with soot and goose-dripping; and he did look so charmingly frightful. But, then, he did play so well: he laid down the candle, and came up to the bed-side, and said, "One kiss, and then."

Cha. What then?

Kit. Why, then, "Put out the light." Why,

Charles, you know no more how to act this scene, than Tippet.

Cha. And pray, my dear Kitty, what does Sir Gilbert say to all this?

Kit. Why, he'd never have known a word of it, if it was not that it discovered itself.

Cha. How came that? You tell me it was but a few nights ago, and I do not think it could discover itself so soon.

Kit. Why, you must know, that when Cymon kissed me in bed, he blacked my left cheek so abominably, that when I came down to breakfast in the morning, the family were all frightened out of their wits. Mrs. Bridget bid me go to the glass; and when I looked at myself, lord, lord! how I did laugh! I told them the whole story. And, do you know, that I am locked into my room every night since.

Cha. So much the better. This is simplicity without vice. (Aside.) Well, Kitty, you shall see this evening, how I'll play Captain Macheath. I am quite perfect in the captain.

Kit. And I have Polly, every morsel of her.—Lord! how all the country folks will stare! Miss Fanny Blubber, the rich farmer's daughter, in the next village, is to play Lucy; she will do it charmingly. Are you sure, now, that you will not be out?

Cha. You shall see now. Come, lean on my shoulder, look fond, quite languishing—that will do. What do you say, now? have you forgot?

Kit. That I haven't: "And are you as fond as ever, my dear?"

Cha. "Suspect my honour, my courage; suspect anything but my love. May my pistols want charging, and my mare slip her shoes"—no, I'm wrong: zounds!—oh! I have it: "May my pistols miss fire, and my mare slip her shoulder while I am pursued, if ever I forsake thee!"

Kit. Oh! thou charming, charming creature! (Kisses him.)

Cha. D—e, but this girl has given me the touch, I believe. She has set me all in a flame. (Aside.) But tell me, Kitty, have you thought upon what I said to you in the garden?

Kit. Egad! I have; but I don't know what's the matter with me; something comes across me, and frightens all my inclinations away.

Cha. Be resolute, my dear Kitty, and take to your arms the man who can only live when he's in your presence. Heavens! is it possible, that such a girl as you, a creature formed—

Kit. Lord! am I a creature?

Cha. Ay, and a lovely creature; formed for the delight of our sex, and the envy of your's. To be caged up in such a d—d old barn as this! seeing no company but Cymon, Wat, Diggery Ducklin, and such cannibals.

Kit. Oh! monstrous.

Cha. It's more than monstrous; it's shocking.

Kit. Is it, indeed?

Cha. To be sure.

Kit. Then I will do as you bid me from this moment.

Cha. Come to my arms, and let me hold thee to my heart for ever. (Embraces her.) "If I were now to die, 'twere now to be most happy; for I fear my soul hath her content so absolute, that not another comfort like this succeeds in unknown fate."

Enter SIR GILBERT.

Sir G. Hallo! What the devil! Are you two at it already? Why, Charles, are you not afraid she will bite you?

Cha. Not in the least, sir. If I don't make her out of humour with this kind of mumming, before she is twenty-four hours older, I will forfeit my commission.

Sir G. If you do, I promise you a better. What noise is that? (A board is heard sawing without.)

Kit. It is only Diggery sawing a trap-hole in the floor of the hall. You know we can't play tragedy without it.

Sir G. Zounds! we shall have the house about our ears presently. Mercy on us! Diggery, thou imp of the devil! give over. Charles, do you stop him. [Exit Charles.] Who could have thought of such an infernal scheme?

Re-enter CHARLES.

Oh! Charles, Charles, cure the family of this madness, and I will make your fortune for you.

Cha. He had only begun his work; there can be no mischief done, sir.

Sir G. Thank you, thank you, Charles. As for you, Miss Kitty, do you come with me; the folks will be all here presently. (Sir Gilbert puts her arm under his; she seizes Charles's hand, and imitates the scene in the Beggar's Opera, where Peachum drags his daughter from Macheath.)

Kit. "Do not tear him from me." Isn't that right, Charles?

Cha. Astonishing!

Sir G. What the devil's the matter, now?

Kit. (Sings.) "Oh, oh, ray! oh, Ambora! oh, ho!" [Exeunt Sir G. and Kitty.]

Cha. Well, certainly there does not exist such an anaccountable family as this. As to the girl, she is a composition of shrewdness and simplicity; and, if properly treated, would make an excellent wife. She has thirty thousand pounds to her fortune, and every shilling at her own disposal. What an old curmudgeon is my uncle, who might provide for his nephew, without pulling a shilling out of his own pocket, by bestowing this girl upon him; and never once to hint at such an union. No matter: I'll take this little charming girl to my arms, and make a coup-de-main of it. "Then, farewell the neighing steed, and the shrill trump; the spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife, the royal banner, and all quality, pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war!"

Enter HARRY.

Har. Bravo, bravo! Charles. The touch, I fancy, has gone round the whole family.

Cha. Egad! I believe so, too, Harry. I have got it, you find.

Har. I have been looking for you this half hour. Such a scene as I have had with old mouser.

Cha. Ay, but such a scene as I have had with the kitten! Egad! Harry, I have her, in spite of all her tricks. But who, do you think, popped upon us at the critical moment?

Har. Critical moment!

Cha. Just as I had the lovely girl in my arms, repeating to her the first speech that came into my head, in popped old Jowler, my uncle.

Har. Why, he caught me much in the same situation in the garden; I was kneeling, kissing Miss Bridget Pumpkin's old, withered fist, and swearing by all the goddesses, their friends, and relations, when plump he came upon us. No mischief ensued; for he thought I was giving her a specimen of my abilities in acting. She humoured the idea as completely as if she had but just come from a London boarding-school; and the good old knight desired me, to surfeit her, to give her a little more of it.

Cha. "This night makes me, or undoes me quite."

Har. Good again, Charles. D—e, but I think you would make a tolerable actor in good earnest.

Cha. I think I should; and you will shortly have a specimen of my abilities, in the character of a good husband.

Enter WILLIAM, with a letter.

Will. I received this letter, sir, from a hostler, who belongs to an inn in the next village: he waits for an answer, sir.

Cha. What can this mean? I know no person hereabouts, except my uncle's family. Let us see. (Reads.) "I this moment heard you was in the country, upon a visit at your uncle's; and, as I propose staying here to-night, (being heartily fatigued with my journey) will be much obliged if you will favour me with your company to supper. I am alone; but if the family cannot spare you, I must insist you will use no ceremony with your old and sincere friend, JOE TACKUM."—Angels catch the sounds!

Har. With all my heart. But what's the matter?

Cha. Who do you think is by accident arrived at the next village?

Har. Who? who? You put me in a fever.

Cha. Joe Tackum, my old fellow collegian, who took orders not a month ago; and who, I suppose, is now going to his father's. Fly, William, get me pen, ink, and paper: he must not stir from this place he is now at, to get a bishopric.

[Exeunt Charles and William.]

Har. Let me see now; can't I find some passage that would be à-propos. If Diggery were here, he would find twenty in a minute. Oh! I have it: "If it were done when 'tis done; then would it were done quickly:"—"Twere a consummation devoutly to be wished." No, no, no, I'm all wrong. D—e, if ever I attempt to spout again while I live. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The Hall, with seats to see the play.

SIR GILBERT, DIGGERY, &c. bustling to receive company.

Sir G. Welcome, my good friends; welcome, ladies and gentlemen. Diggery, don't be mumbling your nonsense, but seat the company. You are all most heartily welcome. The actors will be here shortly. Diggery, where's my nephew and his friend? Where's Kitty, too?

Dig. She is just stepped out with Charles.

Sir G. Ay, ay, to rehearse their parts together; so much the better. After this night, I shall take care they have no rehearsing of their tragedies, and comedies, and love dialogues: I'll put an end to this tinder-work business. But come, come; bustle about, Diggery, get yourself ready, and desire them all to begin; we have no time to lose. Now, neighbours, you shall see the Beggar's Opera in taste.

Dig. Here they are, here they are!

Enter CHARLES, KITTY, and HARRY.

Har. Are you sure none of the family know you are married?

Cha. Not a soul; but they shall all know it now. (Charles and Kitty go up to Sir Gilbert, and kneel.) Sir, this young lady, who is now my wife, joins with me in requesting your blessing and forgiveness.

Dig. No, no, no; you are all wrong. You are to confess the marriage at the end of the third act. We begin at the wrong end. (Charles and Kitty rise.)

Enter MISS BRIDGET, in a rage.

Miss B. Brother, brother! we are all undone. Oh! Kitty, you are a sad slut. The wench is married, brother!

Dig. Why, Mrs. Bridget, you are wrong, too; you are to say that by-and-by.

Sir G. You came in too soon, sister Bridget; you have forgot.

Miss B. I tell you, brother, the wench is married. Are you stupid?

Sir G. I tell you again, sister Bridget, you are too soon; that rage will do well enough presently. Diggery shall tell you when to come. This foolish woman spoils all. I have seen the Beggar's Opera a thousand times.

Miss B. Was ever anything to equal this? I'll raise the neighbourhood. Murder! robbery! ravishment! Bless me, how my head turns round. (They all rise, and assist Miss B., who faints.)

Dig. I never saw anything better acted in all my life.

Sir G. Very well, sister, indeed! bounce away. I did not think it was in you. Very well, indeed! Ha, ha, ha! (Bridget shews great agitation.)

Dig. It's very fine, indeed! I wish I may do my part half as well.

Miss B. I shall go mad! You crazy fool you, hold your tongue, or I will—(Runs at Diggery.) As for you, brother—

Sir G. No, no, now you are out.

Dig. You should not meddle with me.

Miss B. I tell you, dolt, fool, that your niece, there, that impudent baggage, is married to that more impudent fellow, your nephew.

Sir G. It can't be; it's all a lie. Parson Dosey would not have done such a thing for his other eye, and there's no other in the neighbourhood.

Har. It was not Parson Dosey that did the kind office, but honest Joe Tackum.

Sir G. And pray, who the devil is honest Joe Tackum?

Cha. A friend of mine, sir, who I detained for the purpose.

Kit. Dear guardie, forgive me this time, and I'll never do it again. (Kneeling.)

Miss B. Did you ever hear anything so profligate and destitute? Oh! you'll turn out finely, miss! to deceive us all. What, guilty of such an abomination, in so short a time, and at your age.

Kit. Pray, madam, excuse me; is it not quite as bad to do it in so short a time, and at your age?

Miss B. What do you mean, you impertinent slut?

Sir G. Ay, what do you mean, Miss Hot-upon't?

Kit. Ask this gentleman, pray.

Sir G. Why, what the devil, sister! (Bridget looks ashamed.)

Har. Since I am subpoenaed into court, I must speak the truth. That lady, in so short a time, and at her age, offered her hand for the same trip to matrimony; but I was not in a humour for travelling.

Miss B. You are all a parcel of knaves, fools, and impertinent hussies. I'll never see your faces again. [Exit.]

Sir G. Well, as my sister, who ought to be wiser, would have done the same, I will forgive the lesser offence. (Kisses Kitty.) Make her a good husband, Charles: and permit me to recommend one thing to you; let her never read a play, or go within the doors of a theatre; if you do, I would not underwrite her.

Cha. "My life upon her faith!" I am afraid, sir, you judge severely of the drama. It is the business of the stage to reflect the manners of the world; "to shew virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure."

We point just satire to correct the age,

And give to truth a beauty from the stage.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Freeman's house.

Enter FREEMAN and LOVEL.

Free. A country boy! Ha, ha, ha! How long has this scheme been in your head?

Lov. Some time; I am now convinced of what you have so often been hinting to me, that I am confoundedly cheated by my servants.

Free. Oh! are you satisfied at last, Mr. Lovel? I always told you, that there is not a worse set of servants in the parish of St. James, than in your kitchen.

Lov. It is with some difficulty I believe it now, Mr. Freeman; though, I must own, my expenses often make me stare: Philip, I am sure, is an honest fellow; and I will swear for my blacks. If there is a rogue among my folks, it is that surly dog, Tom.

Free. You are mistaken in every one. Philip is an hypocritical rascal; Tom has a good deal of surly honesty about him; and for your blacks, they are as bad as your whites.

Lov. Pray tell me; is not your Robert acquainted with my people? Perhaps he may give a little light into the thing.

Free. To tell you the truth, Mr. Lovel, your servants are so abandoned, that I have forbid him your house; however, if you have a mind to ask him any question, he shall be forthcoming.

Lov. Let us have him.

Free. You shall; but it is a hundred to one if you get anything out of him; for, though he is a very honest fellow, yet he is so much of a servant, that he'll never tell anything to the disadvantage of another. But what was it determined you upon this project at last?

Lov. This letter. It is an anonymous one, and so ought not to be regarded; but it has something honest in it, and puts me upon satisfying my curiosity. Read it. (Gives the letter.)

Free. I should know something of this hand. (Reads.)

To Peregrine Lovel, Esq.

Please your honour, I take the liberty to acquaint your honour, that you are sadly cheated by your servants. Your honour will find it as I say. I am not willing to be known, whereof, if I was, it may bring one into trouble.

So no more, from your honour's

Servant to command.

Odd and honest! Well, and now what are the steps you intend to take? (Returns the letter.)

Lov. My plan is this. I gave it out that I was going to my borough in Devonshire, and yesterday set out with a servant in great form, and lay at Basingstoke—

Free. Well?

Lov. I ordered the fellow to make the best of his way down into the country, and told him that I would follow him; instead of that, I turned back, and am just come to town: ecce signum! (Points to his boots.)

Free. How will you get in?

Lov. When I am properly habited, you shall get me introduced to Philip as one of your tenant's sons, who wants to be made a good servant of.

Free. They will certainly discover you.

Lov. Never fear; I will be so countryfied, that you shall not know me: as they are thoroughly persuaded I am many miles off, they'll be more easily imposed on. Ten to one but they begin to celebrate my departure with a drinking bout, if they are what you describe them; but you must contrive, some way or other, to get me introduced to Philip as one of your cottager's boys out of Essex.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! you'll make a fine figure.

Lov. They shall make a fine figure. It must be done this afternoon; walk with me across the park, and I'll tell you the whole; my name shall be Jemmy, and I am come to be a gentleman's servant, and will do my best, and hope to get a good character. (Mimicking.)

Free. But what will you do if you find them rascals?

Lov. Discover myself, and blow them all to the devil. Come along!

Free. Bravo!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Park.

Enter Duke's Servant.

Duke. What wretches are ordinary servants, that go on in the same vulgar track every day! Eating, working, and sleeping. But we, who have the honour to serve the nobility, are of another species. We are above the common forms, have servants to wait upon us, and are as lazy and luxurious as our masters. Ah! my dear Sir Harry—

Enter Sir Harry's Servant.

How have you done these thousand years?

Sir H. My Lord Duke! your grace's most obedient servant.

Duke. Well, baronet, and where have you been?

Sir H. At Newmarket, my lord: we have had devilish fine sport.

Duke. And a good appearance, I hear; plague take it, I should have been there; but our old duchess died, and we were obliged to keep house for the decency of the thing.

Sir H. I picked up fifteen pieces.

Duke. Psha! a trifle!

Sir H. The viscount's people have been d—y taken in this meeting.

Duke. Credit me, baronet, they knew nothing of the turf.

Sir H. I assure you, my lord, they lost every match; for Crab was beat hollow, Careless threw his rider, and Miss Slammerkin had the distemper.

Duke. Ha, ha, ha! I'm glad on't. Taste this snuff, Sir Harry. (Offers his box.)

Sir H. 'Tis good rappee.

Duke. Right Strasburgh, I assure you, and of my own importing.

Sir H. Ay!

Duke. The city people adulterate it so confoundedly, that I always import my own snuff. I wish my lord would do the same; but he is so indolent. When did you see the girls? I saw Lady Bab this morning; but, 'fore gad! whether it be love or reading, she looked as pale as a penitent.

Sir H. I have just had this card from Lovel's people. (Reads.)

"Philip and Mrs. Kitty present their compliments to Sir Harry, and desire the honour of his company this evening, to be of a smart party, and eat a bit of supper."

Duke. I have the same invitation; their master, it seems, is gone to his borough.

Sir H. You'll be with us, my lord? Philip's a blood.

Duke. A buck of the first head. I'll tell you a secret; he's going to be married.

Sir H. To whom?

Duke. To Kitty.

Sir H. No!

Duke. Yes he is; and I intend to cuckold him.

Sir H. Then we may depend upon your grace for certain. Ha, ha, ha!

Duke. If our house breaks up in tolerable time, I'll be with you: have you anything for us?

Sir H. Yes, a little bit of poetry; I must be at the Cocoa-tree myself, till eight.

Duke. Heigho! I am quite out of spirits; I had a d—d debauch last night, baronet. Lord Francis, Bob the bishop, and I, tipt off four bottles of Burgundy a-piece. Ha! there are two fine girls coming! Faith! Lady Bab; ay, and Lady Charlotte.

Sir H. We'll not join them.

Duke. Oh, yes! Bab is a fine wench, notwithstanding her complexion; though I should be glad if she would keep her teeth cleaner. Your English women are d—d negligent about their teeth. How is your Charlotte in that particular?

Sir H. My Charlotte!

Duke. Ay, the world says you are to have her.

Sir H. I own I did keep her company; but we are off, my lord.

Duke. How so?

Sir H. Between you and me she has a plaguy thick pair of legs.

Duke. Oh! d—n it, that's insufferable.

Sir H. Besides, she's a fool, and missed her opportunity with the old countess.

Duke. I am afraid, baronet, you love money. Rot it, I never save a shilling; indeed, I am sure of a place in the excise. Lady Charlotte is to be of the party to-night; how do you manage that?

Sir H. Why, we do meet at a third place, are very civil, and look queer, and laugh, and abuse one another, and all that.

Duke. A-la-mode, eh! here they are.

Sir H. Let us retire. (They retire.)

Enter Lady Bab's Maid, and Lady Charlotte's Maid.

Lady B. Oh! fie! Lady Charlotte, you are quite indelicate! I am sorry for your taste.

Lady C. Well, I say it again, I love Foxhall.

Lady B. Oh! my stars. Why there is nobody there but filthy citizens.

Lady C. We were in hopes the raising the price would have kept them out. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady B. Ha, ha, ha! Runelow for my money.

Lady C. Now you talk of Runelow, when did you see the colonel, Lady Bab?

Lady B. The colonel! I hate the fellow. He had the assurance to talk of a creature in Gloucestershire before my face.

Lady C. He is a pretty man for all that; soldiers, you know, have their mistresses everywhere.

Lady B. I despise him: how goes on your affair with the baronet?

Lady C. The baronet is a stupid wretch, and I shall have nothing to say to him. You are to be at Lovel's to-night, Lady Bab?

Lady B. Unless I alter my mind; I don't admire visiting these commoners, Lady Charlotte.

Lady C. Oh! but Mrs. Kitty has taste.

Lady B. She affects it.

Lady C. The Duke is fond of her, and he has judgment.

Lady B. The Duke might shew his judgment much better. (Holding up her head.)

Lady C. There he is, and the baronet too; take no notice of them; we'll rally them by-and-bye.

Lady B. Dull souls! Let us set up a loud laugh, and leave 'em.

Lady C. Ay; let us be gone; for the common people do so stare at us, we shall certainly be mobbed.

Both. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exeunt.]

Enter Duke's Servant and Sir Harry's Servant.

Duke. They certainly saw us, and are gone off laughing at us : I must follow.

Sir H. No, no.

Duke. I must. I must have a party of raillery with them ; a bon mot or so. Sir Harry, you'll excuse me. Adieu ! I'll be with you in the evening, if possible ; though, harkye ! there is a bill depending in our house, which the ministry make a point of our attending ; and so, you know, mum ! we must mind the stops of the great fiddle. Adieu !

[Exit.]

Sir H. What a coxcomb this is ! and the fellow can't read ! It was but the other day that he was a cow-boy in the country, then was bound 'prentice to a periwig-maker, got into my lord duke's family, and now sets up for a fine gentleman. O tempora, O Moses !

Re-enter Duke's Servant.

Duke. Sir Harry, pr'ythee, what are we to do at Lovel's when we come there ?

Sir H. We shall have the fiddles, I suppose.

Duke. The fiddles ! I have done with dancing ever since the last fit of the gout. I'll tell you what, my dear boy ! I positively cannot be with them, unless we have a little—(Makes a motion as if with the dice-box.)

Sir H. Fie ! my lord duke !

Duke. Lookye ! baronet, I insist on it. Who the devil, of any fashion, can possibly spend an evening without it ? But I shall lose the girls. How grave you look ! Ha, ha, ha ! Well, let there be fiddles.

Sir H. But, my dear lord ! I shall be quite miserable without you.

Duke. Well, I won't be particular, I'll do as the rest do. Tol, lol, lol ! [Exit, singing and dancing.]

Sir H. He had the assurance, last winter, to court a tradesman's daughter in the city, with two thousand pounds to her fortune, and got me to write his love-letters. He pretended to be an ensign in a marching regiment : so wheedled the old folks into consent, and would have carried the girl off, but was unluckily prevented by the washerwoman, who happened to be his first cousin.

Enter PHILIP.

Mr. Philip, your servant.

Phil. You are welcome to England, Sir Harry. I hope you received the card, and will do us the honour of your company. My master is gone into Devonshire ; we'll have a roaring night.

Sir H. I'll certainly wait on you.

Phil. The girls will be with us.

Sir H. Is this a wedding supper, Philip ?

Phil. What do you mean, Sir Harry ?

Sir H. The duke tells me so.

Phil. The duke's a fool !

Sir H. Take care what you say ; his grace is a bruiser.

Phil. I am a pupil of the same academy, and not afraid of him, I assure you ; Sir Harry, we'll have a noble batch ; I have such wine for you !

Sir H. I am your man, Phil.

Phil. Egad ! the cellar shall bleed ; I have some Burgundy that is fit for an emperor ; my master would have given his ears for some of it t'other day, to treat my Lord What-d'ye-call-him with ; but I told him it was all gone ; eh ! Charity begins at home ; eh ! Odso ! here is Mr. Freeman, my master's intimate friend : he's a dry one ! Don't let us be seen together, he'll suspect something.

Sir H. I am gone.

Phil. Away, away ! remember, Burgundy is the word.

Sir H. Right ! long corks ! eh, Phil ! (Mimics the drawing of a cork.) Your's ! [Exit.]

Phil. Now for a cast of my office ; a starch phiz, a canting phrase, and as many lies as necessary. Hem !

Enter FREEMAN.

Free. Oh ! Philip ; how do you do, Philip ? You have lost your master, I find.

Phil. It is a loss, indeed, sir. So good a gentleman ! He must be nearly got into Devonshire by this time. Sir, your servant. (Going.)

Free. Why in such a hurry, Philip ?

Phil. I shall leave the house as little as possible, now his honour is away.

Free. You are in the right, Philip.

Phil. Servants, at such times, are too apt to be negligent and extravagant, sir.

Free. True ; the master's absence is the time to try a good servant in.

Phil. It is so, sir : sir, your servant. (Going.)

Free. Oh ! Mr. Philip ! pray, stay ; you must do me a piece of service.

Phil. You command me, sir. (Bows.)

Free. I look upon you, Philip, as one of the best behaved, most sensible, completest—(Philip bows)—rascals in the world ! (Aside.)

Phil. Your honour is pleased to compliment.

Free. There is a tenant of mine in Essex, a very honest man ; poor fellow ! he has a great number of children ; and they have sent me one of them, a tall, gawky boy, to make a servant of ; but my folks say they can do nothing with him.

Phil. Let me have him, sir.

Free. In truth, he is an unlicked cub !

Phil. I will lick him into something, I warrant you, sir ; now my master is absent, I shall have a good deal of time upon my hands ; and I hate to be idle, sir ; in two months, I'll engage to finish him.

Free. I don't doubt it. (Aside.)

Phil. Sir, I have twenty pupils in the parish of St. James ; and, for a table, or a sideboard, or behind an equipage, or in the delivery of a message, or anything—

Free. What have you for entrance ?

Phil. I always leave it to gentlemen's generosity.

Free. Here is a guinea ; I beg he may be taken care of.

Phil. That he shall, I promise you. (Aside.) Your honour knows me.

Free. Thoroughly ! (Aside.)

Phil. When can I see him, sir ?

Free. Now, directly : call at my house, and take him in your hand.

Phil. Sir, I will be with you in a minute ; I will but step into the market to let the tradesmen know they must not trust any of our servants, now they are at board wages : humph !

Free. How happy is Mr. Lovel in so excellent a servant ! [Exit.]

Phil. Ha, ha, ha ! This is one of my master's prudent friends, who dines with him three times a week, and thinks he is mighty generous in giving me five guineas at Christmas. D—n all such sneaking scoundrels ! I say. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Servant's Hall in Lovel's house.

KINGSTON and Coachman, drunk and sleepy, discovered. Knocking at the door.

King. Somebody knocks. Coachy, go ! go to the door, coachy !

Coach. I'll not go, do you go, you black dog !

King. Devil shall fetch me, if I go ! (Knocking.)

Coach. Why, then, let them stay; I'll not go, d—e! Ay, knock the door down, and let yourselves in. (Knocking.)

King. Ay, ay! knock again, knock again!

Coach. Master is gone into Devonshire, so he can't be there; so I'll go to sleep.

King. So will I, I'll go to sleep, too.

Coach. You lie, devil! you shall not go to sleep, till I am asleep. I am king of the kitchen.

King. No, you are not king; but when you are drunk, you are sulky as a hell. Here is cooky coming; she is king and queen too.

Enter Cook.

Cook. Somebody has knocked at the door twenty times, and nobody hears. Why, coachman, Kingston, ye drunken bears! why don't one of you go to the door?

Coach. You go, cook; you go.

Cook. Hang me, if I go!

King. Yes, yes, cooky, go; Mollsy, Pollsy! go.

Cook. Out, you black toad! it is none of my business, and go I will not. (Sits down.)

Enter PHILIP, with LOVEL disguised.

Phil. I might have staid at the door all night, as the little man in the play says, if I had not had the key of the door in my pocket. What is come to you all?

Cook. There is John Coachman, and Kingston, as drunk as two bears.

Phil. Aha! my lads; what, finished already? These are the very best of servants. Poor fellows! I suppose, they have been drinking their master's good journey. Ha, ha, ha!

Lov. No doubt on't! (Aside.)

Phil. Yo ho! get to bed, you dogs! and sleep yourselves sober, that you may be able to get drunk again by-and-by. They are as fast as a church. Jemmy!

Lov. Anan?

Phil. Do you love drinking?

Lov. Yes, I loves ale.

Phil. You dog! you shall swim in Burgundy.

Lov. Burgrumdy! what's that?

Phil. Cook, wake these honest gentlemen, and send them to bed.

Cook. It is impossible to wake them.

Lov. I think I could wake them, sir, if I might, eh?

Phil. Do, Jemmy; wake them, Jemmy. Ha, ha, ha!

Lov. Hip! Mr. Coachman! (Gives him a slap on the face.)

Coach. Oh, oh! What! Zounds! Oh! d—n you!

Lov. What, blackey! blackey! (Pulls him by the nose.)

King. Oh, oh! What now? Curse you! Cot tam you!

Lov. Ha, ha, ha!

Phil. Ha, ha, ha! Well done, Jemmy. Cook, see these gentry to bed.

Cook. Marry come up! I say so, too; not I, indeed.

Coach. She sha'n't see us to bed, we'll see ourselves to bed.

King. We got drunk together, and we'll go to bed together. [Exit with coachman, reeling.]

Phil. You see how we live, boy.

Lov. Yes, I sees how you live.

Phil. Let the supper be elegant, cook.

Cook. Who pays for it?

Phil. My master, to be sure: who else? Ha, ha, ha! He is rich enough, I hope. Ha, ha, ha!

Lov. Humph! (Aside.)

Phil. Each of us must take a part, and sink it in our next weekly bills; that is the way.

Lov. So! (Aside.)

Cook. Pr'ythee, Philip, what boy is this?

Phil. A boy of Freeman's recommending.

Lov. Yes, I'm 'Squire Freeman's boy, eh?

Cook. Freeman is a stingy hound! and you may tell him I say so. He dines here three times a week, and I never saw the colour of his money yet.

Lov. Ha, ha, ha! That is good. Freeman shall have it. (Aside.)

Cook. I must step to the tallow-chandler's, to dispose of some of my perquisites; and then I'll set about supper.

Phil. Well said, cook! that is right! the perquisite is the thing, cook.

Cook. Cloe, Cloe! where are you, Cloe? (Calls.)

Enter CLOE.

Cloe. Yes, mistress!

Cook. Take that box and follow me. [Exit.]

Cloe. Yes, mistress! (Takes the box.) Who is this? (Seeing Lovel.) He, he, he! Oh! this is pretty boy! He, he, he! Oh! this is pretty red hair! He, he, he! You shall be in love with me by-and-by. He, he!

[Exit, chucking Lovel under the chin.]

Lov. A very pretty amour! (Aside.) Oh, la! what a fine room this is! Is this the dining-room, pray, sir?

Phil. No; our drinking-room.

Lov. La, la! what a fine lady here is! This is madam, I suppose.

Enter KITTY.

Phil. Where have you been, Kitty?

Kit. I have been disposing of some of his honour's shirts, and other linen, which it is a shame his honour should wear any longer. Mother Barter is above, and waits to know if you have any commands for her.

Phil. I shall dispose of my wardrobe to-morrow.

Kit. Who have we here? (Lovel bows.)

Phil. A boy of Freeman's; a poor silly fool!

Lov. Thank you! (Aside.)

Phil. I intend the entertainment this evening as a compliment to you, Kitty.

Kit. I am your humble, Mr. Philip.

Phil. But I beg I may see none of your airs, or hear any of your French gibberish with the duke.

Kit. Don't be jealous, Phil. (Fawningly.)

Phil. I intend, before our marriage, to settle something handsome upon you; and, with the five hundred pounds which I have already saved in this extravagant fellow's family—

Lov. A dog! (Aside.) Oh, la, la! What, have you got five hundred pounds?

Phil. Peace, blockhead!

Kit. I'll tell you what you shall do, Phil.

Phil. Ay, what shall I do?

Kit. You shall set up a chocolate-house, my dear!

Phil. Yes, and be cuckolded. (Aside.)

Kit. You know my education was a very genteel one; I was a half-boarder at Chelsea, and I speak French like a native. Comment vous porter vous, mounseer. (Aukwardly.)

Phil. Psha, psha!

Kit. One is nothing without French: I shall shine in the bar. Do you speak French, boy?

Lov. Anan!

Kit. Anan! Oh, the fool! Ha, ha, ha! Come here, do, and let me mould you a little; you must be a good boy, and wait upon the gentlefolks to-night. (She ties and powders his hair.)

Lov. Yes, an't please you, I'll do my best.

Kit. His best! Oh, the natural! This is a strange head of hair of thine, boy; it is so coarse, and so caroty.

Lov. All my brothers and sisters be red in the pole.

Phil. and Kit. Ha, ha, ha! (Loud laugh.)

Kit. There, now you are something like. Come, Philip, give the boy a lesson; and then I'll lecture him out of the Servants' Guide.

Phil. Come, sir; first, hold up your head. Very well! Turn out your toes, sir. Very well! Now call, Coach!

Lov. What is call coach?

Phil. Thus, sir: Coach, coach, coach! (Loud.)

Lov. Coach, coach, coach, coach! (Imitating.)

Phil. Admirable! the knave has a good ear. Now, sir, tell me a lie.

Lov. Oh, la! I never told a lie in all my life.

Phil. Then it is high time you should begin now; what is a servant good for that can't tell a lie?

Kit. And stand to it. Now I'll lecture him. (Takes out a book.) This is "The Servants' Guide to Wealth, by Timothy Shoulderknot, formerly Servant to several Noblemen, and now an Officer in the Customs: necessary for all Servants."

Phil. Mind, sir, what excellent rules the book contains; and remember them well. Come, Kitty, begin.

Kit. (Reads.) "Advice to the Footman."

"Let it for ever be your plan
To be the master, not the man;
And do as little as you can."

Lov. He, he, he! Yes, I'll do nothing at all; not I.

Kit. (Reads.) "To the Groom."

"Never allow your master able
To judge of matters in the stable.
If he should roughly speak his mind,
Or to dismiss you seem inclin'd,
Lame the best horse, or break his wind."

Lov. Oddines! that's good! He, he, he!

Kit. (Reads.) "To the Coachman."

"If your good master on you doats,
Ne'er leave his house to serve a stranger,
But pocket hay, and straw, and oats,
And let the horses eat the manger."

Lov. Eat the manger! He, he, he!

Kit. I won't give you too much at a time. Here, boy! take the book, and read it every night and morning, before you say your prayers.

Phil. Ha, ha, ha! very good! But now for business.

Kit. Right! I'll go and get one of the damask table-cloths, and some napkins; and, be sure, Phil. your sideboard is very smart. [Exit.]

Phil. That it shall. Come, Jemmy. [Exit.]

Lov. So, so! It works well! [Aside and exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Servants' Hall, with the supper and sideboard set out.

PHILIP, KITTY, and LOVEL discovered.

Kit. Well, Phil. what think you! Don't we look very smart? Now let them come as soon as they will, we shall be ready for them.

Phil. 'Tis all very well; but—

Kit. But what?

Phil. Why, I wish we could get that snarling cur, Tom. to make one.

Kit. What is the matter with him?

Phil. I don't know; he is a queer son of a—

Kit. Oh! I know him; he is one of your sneaking, half-bred fellows, that prefers his master's interest to his own.

Phil. Here he is.

Enter TOM.

And why won't you make one to-night, Tom? Here's cook, and coachman, and all of us.

Tom. I tell you again, I will not make one.

Phil. We shall have something that's good.

Tom. And make your master pay for it.

Phil. I warrant, now, you think yourself mighty honest! Ha, ha, ha!

Tom. A little honester than you, I hope, and not brag neither.

Kit. Harkye! Mr. Honesty! don't be saucy.

Tom. What, madam, you are afraid for your cully, are you?

Kit. Cully, sirrah, cully! Afraid, sirrah! afraid of what? (Goes up to Tom.)

Phil. Ay, sir, afraid of what? (Goes up on the other side.)

Lov. Ay, sir, afraid of what? (Goes up to Tom.)

Tom. I value none of you; I know your tricks.

Phil. What do you know, sirrah?

Kit. Ay, what do you know?

Lov. Ay, sir, what do you know?

Tom. I know that you two are in fee with every tradesman belonging to the house. And that you, Mr. Clodpole, are in a fair way to be hanged. (Strikes Lovel.)

Phil. What do you strike the boy for?

Lov. It is an honest blow! (Aside.)

Tom. I'll strike him again. 'Tis such as you that bring a scandal upon us all.

Kit. Come, none of your impudence, Tom.

Tom. Egad! madam, the gentry may well complain, when they get such servants as you in their houses. There's your good friend, Mother Barter, the old-clothes-woman, the greatest thief in town, just now gone out with her apron full of his honour's linen.

Kit. Well, sir, and did you never—eh?

Tom. No, never: I have lived with his honour four years, and never took the value of that. (Snapping his fingers.) His honour is a prince; gives noble wages, and keeps noble company; and yet you two are not contented, but cheat him wherever you can lay your fingers. Shame on you!

Lov. The fellow I thought a rogue, is the only honest servant in my house. (Aside.)

Kit. Out, you mealy-mouthed cur!

Phil. Well, go tell his honour, do. Ha, ha, ha!

Tom. I scorn that: d—n an informer! But yet, I hope his honour will find you two out, one day or other, that's all. [Exit.]

Kit. This fellow must be taken care of.

Phil. I'll do his business for him, when his honour comes to town.

Lov. You lie, you scoundrel! you will not. (Aside.) Oh, la! here is a fine gentleman.

Enter Duke's Servant.

Duke. Ah! ma cher mademselle! comment vous portez vous? (Salute.)

Kit. Fort bien, je vous remercier, monsieur.

Phil. Now we shall have nonsense by wholesale.

Duke. How do you do, Philip?

Phil. Your grace's humble servant.

Duke. But, my dear Kitty—(They talk apart.)

Phil. Jemmy!

Lov. Anan!

Phil. Come along with me, and I will make you free of the cellar.

Lov. Ees, I wull: but won't you ask he to drink?

Phil. No, no; he will have his share by-and-by; come along.

Lov. Ees.

[Exit with Philip.]

Kit. Indeed, I thought your grace an age in coming.

Duke. Upon honour, our house is but this moment up. You have a d—d vile collection of pictures, I observed above stairs, Kitty. Your squire has no taste.

Kit. No taste! that's impossible! for he has laid out a vast deal of money.

Duke. There is not an original picture in the whole collection. Where could he pick them up?

Kit. He employs three or four men to buy for him, and he always pays for originals.

Duke. Donnez moi votre eau-de-luce. My head aches confoundedly! (She gives a smelling-bottle.)

Kitty, my dear, I hear you are going to be married.

Kit. Pardonnez moi for that.

Duke. If you get a boy, I'll be godfather, faith!

Kit. How you rattle, duke! I am thinking, my lord, when I had the honour to see you first.

Duke. At the play, mademseille.

Kit. Your grace loves a play.

Duke. No; it is a dull, old-fashioned entertainment: I hate it.

Kit. Well, give me a good tragedy.

Duke. It must not be a modern one, then: you are devilish handsome, Kate! Kiss me. (Offers to kiss her.)

Enter Sir Harry's Servant.

Sir H. Oh, ho! Are you thereabouts, my lord duke? That may do very well by-and-by. However, you'll never find me behind-hand. (Offers to kiss her.)

Duke. Stand off! you are a commoner; nothing under nobility approaches Kitty.

Sir H. You are so devilish proud of your nobility. Now, I think, we have more true nobility than you. Let me tell you, sir, a knight of the shire—

Duke. A knight of the shire! Ha, ha, ha! A mighty honour, truly! to represent all the fools in the county.

Kit. Oh, lud! this is charming, to see two noblemen quarrel.

Sir H. Why, any fool may be born to a title, but only a wise man can make himself honourable.

Kit. Well said, Sir Harry; that is good morality.

Duke. I hope you make some difference between hereditary honours and the huzzas of a mob.

Kit. Very smart, my lord; now, Sir Harry.

Sir H. If you make use of your hereditary honours to screen you from debt—

Duke. Zounds! sir, what do you mean by that?

Kit. Hold, hold! I shall have some fine, old, noble blood spilt here. Have done, Sir Harry.

Sir H. Not I: why he is always valuing himself upon his upper house.

Duke. We have dignity. (Slow.)

Sir H. But what becomes of your dignity, if we refuse the supplies? (Quick.)

Kit. Peace, peace! here's Lady Bab.

Enter Lady Bab's Servant, in a chair.

Dear Lady Bab!

Lady Bab. Mrs. Kitty, your servant: I was afraid of taking cold, and so ordered the chair down stairs. Well, and how do you? My lord duke, your servant, and Sir Harry, too, your's.

Duke. Your ladyship's devoted.

Lady B. I am afraid I have trespassed in point of time. (Looks at her watch.) But I got into my favourite author.

Duke. Yes, I found her ladyship at her studies this morning; some wicked poem.

Lady B. Oh! you wretch! I never read but one book.

Kit. What is your ladyship so fond of?

Lady B. Shikspur. Did you never read Shikspur?

Kit. Shikspur, Shikspur! Who wrote it? No, I never read Shikspur.

Lady B. Then you have an immense pleasure to come.

Kit. Well, then, I'll read it over one afternoon or other. Here's Lady Charlotte.

Enter Lady Charlotte's Maid, in a chair.

Dear Lady Charlotte!

Lady C. Oh! Mr. Kitty, I thought I never should have reached your house. Such a fit of the cholic seized me. Oh! Lady Bab, how long has your ladyship been here? My chairmen were such drones. My lord duke! the pink of all good breeding!

Duke. Oh! madam. (Bowing.)

Lady C. And Sir Harry! Your servant, Sir Harry. (Formally.)

Sir H. Madam, your servant: I am sorry to hear your ladyship has been ill.

Lady C. You must give me leave to doubt the sincerity of that sorrow, sir. Remember the Park.

Sir H. The Park! I'll explain that affair, madam.

Lady C. I want none of your explanations. (Scornfully.)

Sir H. Dear Lady Charlotte!

Lady C. No, sir; I have observed your coolness of late, and despise you. A trumpery baronet!

Sir H. I see how it is; nothing will satisfy you but nobility. That sly dog, the marquis—

Lady C. None of your reflections, sir. The marquis is a person of honour, and above inquiring after a lady's fortune, as you meanly did.

Sir H. I—I, madam? I scorn such a thing! I assure you, madam, I never—that is to say—Egad! I am confounded! My lord duke, what shall I say to her? Pray, help me out. (Aside.)

Duke. Ask her to shew her legs. Ha, ha, ha! (Aside.)

Enter PHILIP and LOVEL, laden with bottles.

Phil. Here, my little peer, here is wine that will ennoble your blood. Both your ladyships' most humble servant.

Lov. (Affecting to be drunk.) Both your ladyships' most humble servant.

Kit. Why, Philip, you have made the boy drunk.

Phil. I have made him free of the cellar. Ha, ha, ha!

Lov. Yes, I am free, I am very free.

Phil. He has had a smack of every sort of wine, from humble port to imperial tokay.

Lov. Yes, I have been drinking kokay.

Kit. Go, get you some sleep, child, that you may wait on his lordship by-and-by.

Lov. Thank you, madam; I will certainly wait on their lordships, and their ladyships, too.

[Aside and exit.]

Phil. Well, ladies, what say you to a dance? and then, to supper.

Enter Cook, Coachman, KINGSTON, and CLOE.

Come here; where are all our people? I'll couple you. My lord duke will take Kitty; Lady Bab will do me the honour of her hand; Sir Harry and Lady Charlotte; coachman and cook; and the two devils will dance together. Ha, ha, ha!

Duke. With submission, the country-dances by-and-by.

Lady C. Ay, ay; French dances before supper, and country dances after. I beg the duke and Mrs. Kitty may give us a minuet.

Duke. Dear Lady Charlotte, consider my poor gout. Sir Harry will oblige us. (Sir Harry bows.)

All. Minuet, Sir Harry; minuet, Sir Harry.

Kit. Marshal Thingumbob's minuet. (A minuet by Sir Harry and Kitty; awkward and conceited.)

Lady C. Mrs. Kitty dances sweetly.

Phil. And Sir Harry delightfully.

Duke. Well enough for a commoner.

Phil. Come, now to supper. A gentleman and a lady. (They sit down.) Here is claret, burgundy, and champagne, and a bottle of tokay for the ladies. There are tickets on every bottle: if any gentleman chooses port—

Duke. Port! 'Tis only fit for a dram.

Kit. Lady Bab, what shall I send you? Lady Charlotte, pray be free; the more free the more welcome, as they say in my country. The gentlemen will be so good as to take care of themselves. (A pause.)

Duke. Lady Charlotte, "Hob or nob!"

Lady C. Done, my lord, in burgundy, if you please.

Duke. Here's your sweetheart and mine, and the friends of the company. (They drink. A pause.)

Phil. Come, ladies and gentlemen, a bumper all round; I have a health for you: Here is to the amendment of our masters and mistresses.

All. Ha, ha, ha! (Loud laugh. A pause.)

Kit. Ladies, pray, what is your opinion of a single gentleman's service?

Lady C. Do you mean an old single gentleman?

All. Ha, ha, ha! (Loud laugh.)

Phil. My lord duke, your toast?

Duke. Lady Betty!

Phil. Oh! no; a health and a sentiment.

Duke. Let us have a song. Sir Harry, your song.

Sir H. Would you have it? Well, then, Mrs. Kitty, we must call upon you: will you honour my muse?

All. A song, a song! ay, ay; Sir Harry's song, Sir Harry's song!

Duke. A song, to be sure; but, first, preludio. (Kisses Kitty.) Pray, gentlemen, put it about. (Kisses round. Kingston kisses Cloe heartily.)

Sir H. See how the devils kiss!

Kit. I am really hoarse; but, hem! I must clear up my pipes, hem! This is Sir Harry's song; being a new one, entitled and called the "Fellow Servant: or, All in a Livery."

SONG.—KITTY.

*Come here, fellow-servant, and listen to me,
I'll shew you how those of superior degree
Are only dependants, no better than we.*

*Chorus.—Both high and low in this do agree,
'Tis here fellow-servant,
And there fellow-servant,
And all in a livery.*

*See yonder fine spark, in embroidery drest,
Who bows to the great, and if they smile, is blest;
What is he, i'faith! but a servant at best?*

Chorus.—Both high, &c.

*The fat shining glutton looks up to the shelf,
The wrinkled lean miser bows down to his pelf,
And the curl-pated beau is a slave to himself.*

Chorus.—Both high, &c.

Phil. How do you like it, my lord duke?

Duke. It is a d—d vile composition!

Phil. How so?

Duke. Oh, very low! Very low, indeed!

Sir H. Can you make a better?

Duke. I hope so.

Sir H. That is very conceited.

Duke. What is conceited, you scoundrel?

Sir H. Scoundrel! You are a rascal! I'll pull you by the nose. (All rise.)

Duke. Lookye! friend; don't give yourself airs, and make a disturbance among the ladies. If you are a gentleman, name your weapons.

Sir H. Weapons! what you will; pistols.

Duke. Done! behind Montague House!

Sir H. Done! with seconds!

Duke. Done!

Phil. Oh! for shame, gentlemen! My lord duke! Sir Harry!—the ladies!—fie! (Duke and Sir Harry affect to sing. A violent knocking. Kitty faints.) What the devil can that be, Kitty?

Kit. Who can it possibly be?

Phil. Kingston, run up stairs and peep. [Exit Kingston.] It sounds like my master's rap: pray heaven it is not he!

Enter KINGSTON.

Well, Kingston, what is it?

King. It is master and Mr. Freeman; I peeped through the key-hole, and saw them by the lamp-light; Tom has just let them in.

Phil. The devil he has! What can have brought him back?

Kit. No matter what: away with the things!

Phil. Away with the wine! away with the plate! Here, coachman, cook, Cloe, Kingston, bear a hand. Out with the candles! Away, away! (They carry away the table, &c.)

Visitors. What shall we do? What shall we do? (They all run about in confusion.)

Kit. Run up stairs, ladies.

Phil. No, no, no! He'll see you, then.

Sir H. What the devil had I to do here?

Duke. Plague take it! face it out.

Sir H. Oh! no; these West Indians are very fiery.

Phil. I would not have him see any of you for the world.

Lov. (Without.) Philip! Where's Philip?

Phil. Oh, the devil! he's certainly coming down stairs; Sir Harry, run down into the cellar. My lord duke, get into the pantry. Away, away!

Kit. No, no; do you put their ladyships into the pantry, and I'll take his grace into the coal-hole.

Visitors. Anywhere, anywhere! Up the chimney, if you will.

Phil. There; in with you. (They all go into the pantry.)

Lov. (Without.) Philip, Philip!

Phil. Coming, sir. (Aloud.) Kitty, have you never a good book to be reading of?

Kit. Yes, here is one.

Phil. Egad! this is black Monday with us: sit down; seem to read your book. Here he is, as drunk as a piper. (They sit down.)

Enter LOVEL, with pistols, affecting to be drunk; FREEMAN following.

Lov. Philip, the son of Alexander the Great, where are all my myrmidons? What the devil makes you up so early this morning?

Phil. He is very drunk, indeed. (Aside.) Mrs. Kitty and I had got into a good book, your honour.

Free. Ay, ay; they have been well employed, I dare say. Ha, ha, ha!

Lov. Come, sit down, Freeman. Lie you there. (Lays his pistol down.) I come a little unexpectedly, perhaps, Philip.

Phil. A good servant is never afraid of being caught, sir.

Lov. I have some accounts that I must settle.

Phil. Accounts, sir! to-night?

Lov. Yes, to-night; I find myself perfectly clear; you shall see I'll settle them in a twinkling.

Phil. Your honour will go into the parlour?

Lov. No, I'll settle them all here.

Kit. Your honour must not sit here.

Lov. Why not?

Kit. You will certainly take cold, sir; the room has not been washed above an hour.

Lov. What a cursed lie that is! (Aside.)

Duke. Philip, Philip, Philip! (Peeping out.)

Phil. Plague take you! Hold your tongue! (Aside.)

Free. You have just nicked them in the very minute. (Aside to Lovel.)

Lov. I find I have. Mum! (Aside to Freeman.) Get some wine, Philip. [Exit Philip.] Though I must eat something before I drink. Kitty, what have you got in the pantry.

Kit. In the pantry? Lard! your honour, we are at board wages.

Free. I could eat a morsel of cold meat.

Lov. You shall have it. Here, (rises) open the pantry-door. I'll be about your board-wages! I have treated you often, now you shall treat your master.

Kit. If I may be believed, sir, there is not a scrap of anything in the world in the pantry. (Opposing him.)

Lov. Well, then, we must be contented, Freeman. Let us have a crust of bread and a bottle of wine. (Sits down again.)

Sir H. (Peeping.) Mrs. Kitty, Mrs. Kitty!

Kit. Peace, on your life! (Aside.)

Lov. Kitty, what voice is that?

Kit. Nobody's, sir. Hem! (Somebody in the pantry sneezes.)

Re-enter PHILIP, with wine.

We are undone! undone! (Aside.)

Phil. Oh! that is the duke's d—d rappee! (Aside.)

Lov. Didn't you hear a noise, Charles?

Free. Somebody sneezed, I thought.

Lov. D—n it! there are thieves in the house; I'll be among them. (Takes a pistol.)

Kit. Lack-a-day! sir, it was only the cat; they sometimes sneeze for all the world like a christian. Here! Jack, Jack! He has got a cold, sir. Puss, puss!

Lov. A cold! then, I'll cure him; here, Jack, Jack! puss, puss!

Kit. Your honour won't be so rash; pray, your honour, don't. (Opposing him.)

Lov. Stand off! Here, Freeman, here's a barrel for business, with a brace of slugs, and well primed, as you see. Freeman, I'll hold you five to four, nay, I'll hold you two to one, I hit the cat through the key-hole of that pantry-door.

Free. Try, try; but I think it impossible.

Lov. I am a d—d good marksman! (Cocks the pistol, and points it at the pantry-door.) Now for it! (A violent shriek, and all is discovered.) Who the devil are these? One, two, three, four!

Phil. These are particular friends of mine, sir: servants to some noblemen in the neighbourhood.

Lov. I told you there were thieves in the house.

Free. Ha, ha, ha!

Phil. I assure your honour they have been entertained at our own expense, upon my word.

Kit. Yes, indeed, your honour, if it was the last word I had to speak.

Lov. Take up that bottle. (Philip takes up a bottle with a ticket to it, and is going off.) Bring it back. Do you usually entertain your company with tokay, monsieur?

Phil. I, sir! treat with wine!

Lov. Oh! yes; from humble port to imperial tokay! Yes, I loves kokay. (Mimicking himself.)

Phil. How! Jemmy, my master! (Aside.)

Kit. Jemmy! the devil! (Aside.)

Phil. Your honour is, at present, in liquor, but in the morning, when your honour is recovered, I will set all to rights again.

Lov. (Changing his countenance.) We'll set all to rights now; there, I am sober, at your service; what have you to say, Philip? (Philip starts.) You may well start; go, get you out of my sight.

Duke. Sir, I have not the honour to be known to you, but I have the honour to serve his grace the Duke of—

Lov. And the impudent familiarity to assume his title. Your grace will give me leave to tell you, that is the door, and if you ever enter there again, I assure you, my lord duke, I will break every bone in your grace's skin. Begone! I beg their ladyships' pardon, perhaps they cannot go without chairs. Ha, ha, ha!

Free. Ha, ha, ha! (Sir Harry steals off.)

Duke. Low-bred fellows! [Exit.]

Lady C. I thought how this visit would turn out. [Exit.]

Lady B. They are downright hottenpots! [Exit.]

Phil. and Kit. I hope your honour will not take away our bread.

Lov. "Five hundred pounds will set you up in a chocolate-house; you'll shine in the bar, madam." I have been an eye-witness of your roguery, extravagance, and ingratitude.

Phil. and Kit. Oh, sir! good sir!

Lov. You, madam, may stay here till to-morrow morning. And there, madam, is the book you lent me, which I beg you'll read "night and morning before you say your prayers."

Kit. I am ruined and undone. [Exit.]

Lov. But you, sir, for your villany, and (what I hate worse) your hypocrisy, shall not stay a minute longer in this house; and here comes an honest honest man to shew you the way out. Your keys, sir. (Philip gives the keys.)

Enter TOM.

Tom, I respect and value you; you are an honest servant, and shall never want encouragement. Be so good, Tom, as to see that gentleman out of my house, (points to Philip) and then, take charge of the cellar and plate.

Tom. I thank your honour; but I would not rise on the ruin of a fellow-servant.

Lov. No remonstrances, Tom; it shall be as I say.

Phil. What a cursed fool have I been!

[Exit with Tom.]

Free. You have made Tom very happy.

Lov. And I intend to make your Robert so, too; every honest servant should be made happy.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in Colonel Oldboy's house:
COLONEL OLDBOY is discovered at breakfast, reading a newspaper; at a little distance from the tea-table, sits JENKINS; and on the opposite side, DIANA, who appears playing upon a harpsicord. A Girl attending.

TRIO.

*Ah! how delightful the morning,
How sweet are the prospects it yields;
Summer luxuriant adorning
The gardens, the groves, and the fields.*

*Be grateful to the season,
Its pleasures let's employ;
Kind nature gives, and reason
Permits us to enjoy.*

[Exit Maid.]

Col. Well said Dy, thank you Dy. This, master Jenkins, is the way I make my daughter entertain me every morning at breakfast. Come here and kiss me, you slut; come here and kiss me, you baggage.

Dia. Lord, papa, you call one such names—

Col. A fine girl, master Jenkins; a devilish fine girl! she has got my eye to a twinkle. There's fire for you—spirit!—I design to marry her to a duke: how much money do you think a duke would expect with such a wench?

Jenk. Why, Colonel, with submission, I think there is no occasion to go out of our own country here; we have never a duke in it, I believe, but we have many an honest gentleman, who, in my opinion, might deserve the young lady.

Col. So, you would have me marry Dy to a country 'squire, eh! How say you to this, Dy? would not you rather be married to a duke?

Dia. So my husband's a rake, papa, I don't care what he is.

Col. A rake! you d—d confounded little baggage; why you would not wish to marry a rake, wou'd you? So her husband is a rake, she does not care what he is! Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Dia. Well, but listen to me, papa: when you go out with your gun, do you take any pleasure in shooting the poor tame ducks and chickens in your yard? No, the partridge, the pheasant, the woodcock, are the game: there is some sport in bringing them down, because they are wild; and it is just the same with an husband or a lover. I would not waste powder and shot, to wound one of your sober, pretty behaved gentlemen; but to hit a libertine, extravagant, madcap fellow, to take him upon the wing—

Col. Do you hear her, master Jenkins? Ha, ha, ha!

Jenk. Well, but, good Colonel, what do you say to my worthy and honourable patron here, Sir John Flowerdale? He has an estate of eight thousand pounds a year, as well paid rents as any in the kingdom, and but one only daughter to enjoy it; and yet he is willing, you see, to give this daughter to your son.

Dia. Pray, Mr. Jenkins, how does Miss Clarissa and our university friend, Mr. Lionel? That is the only grave young man I ever liked, and the only handsome one I ever was acquainted with, that did not make love to me.

Col. Ay, master Jenkins, who is this Lionel? They say he is a d—d, witty, knowing fellow; and egad, I think him well enough for one brought up in a college.

Jenk. His father was a general officer, a particular friend of Sir John's; who, like many more brave men, that live and die in defending their country, left little else than honour behind him. Sir John sent this young man, at his own expense, to Oxford; during the vacation, he is come to pay us a visit, and Sir John intends that he shall shortly take orders for a very considerable benefice in the gift of the family, the present incumbent of which is an aged man.

Dia. The last time I was at your house, he was teaching Miss Clarissa mathematics and philosophy. Lord, what a strange brain I have! If I was to sit down to distract myself with such studies—

Col. Go, hussy, let some of your brother's rascals inform their master that he has been long enough at his toilet; here is a message from Sir John Flowerdale. You a brain for mathematics indeed! We shall have women wanting to head our regiments to-morrow or next day.

Dia. Well, papa, and suppose we did. I believe, in a battle of the sexes, you men would hardly get the better of us.

SONG.

*To rob them of strength, when wise nature thought fit
By women to still do her duty,
Instead of a sword she endu'd them with wit,
And gave them a shield in their beauty.*

*Sound, sound, then, the trumpet, both sexes to arms,
Our tyrants at once and protectors!
We quickly shall see, whether courage or charms,
Decide for the Helens or Hector.* [Exit.]

Col. Well, master Jenkins, don't you think now that a nobleman, a duke, an earl, or a marquis, might be content to share his title? I say, you understand me—with a sweetener of thirty or forty thousand pounds, to pay off mortgages? Besides, there is a prospect of my whole estate; for I dare swear, her brother will never have any children.

Jenk. I should be concerned at that, Colonel, when there are two such fortunes to descend to his heirs, as your's and Sir John Flowerdale's.

Col. Why look you, master Jenkins; Sir John Flowerdale is an honest gentleman; our families are nearly related; we have been neighbours time out of mind; and if he and I have an odd dispute now and then, it is not for want of a cordial esteem at bottom. He is going to marry his daughter to my son; she is a beautiful girl, an elegant girl, a sensible girl, a worthy girl; and—a word in your ear—d—n me if I an't very sorry for her.

Jenk. Sorry, Colonel!

Col. Ay—between ourselves, master Jenkins, my Jenk. How do you mean? [son won't do.]

Col. I tell you, master Jenkins, he won't do—he is not the thing—a prig. At sixteen years old, or thereabouts, he was a bold, sprightly boy, as you should see in a thousand; could drink his pint of port, or his bottle of claret—now he mixes all his wine with water.

Jenk. Oh! if that be his only fault, Colonel, he will ne'er make the worse husband, I'll answer for it.

Col. You know my wife is a woman of quality—I was prevailed upon to send him to be brought up by her brother, lord Jessamy, who had no children of his own, and promised to leave him an estate: he has got the estate indeed, but, the fellow has taken his lordship's name for it. Now, master Jenkins, I would be glad to know, how the name of Jessamy is better than that of Oldboy?

Jenk. Well! but, Colonel, it is allowed on all hands, that his lordship has given your son an excellent education.

Col. Psha! he sent him to the university, and to travel, forsooth; but what of that; I was abroad, and at the university myself, and never a rush the better for either. I quarrelled with his lordship about six years before his death, and so had not an opportunity of seeing how the youth went on; if I had, master Jenkins, I would no more have suffered him to be made such a monkey of. He has been in my house but three days, and it is all turned topsy-turvy by him and his rascally servants; then his chamber is like a perfumer's shop, with wash-balls, pastes, and pomatum; and, do you know, he had the impudence to tell me yesterday, at my own table, that I did not know how to behave myself?

Jenk. Pray, Colonel, how does my lady Mary?

Col. What my wife? in the old way, master Jenkins; always complaining; ever something the matter with her head, or her back, or her legs: but we have had the devil to pay lately—she and I did not speak to one another for three weeks.

Jen. How so, sir?

Col. A little affair of jealousy. You must know my game-keeper's daughter has had a child, and the plaguy baggage takes it into her head to lay it to me. Upon my soul, it is a fine fat, chubby infant as ever I set my eyes on: I have sent it to nurse; and, between you and me, I believe I shall leave it a fortune.

Jenk. Ah, Colonel, you will never give over.

Col. You know my lady has a pretty vein of poetry: she writ me an heroic epistle upon it, where she calls me her dear, false Damon; so I let her cry a little, promised to do so no more, and now we are as good friends as ever.

Jenk. Well, Colonel, I must take my leave; I have delivered my message, and Sir John may expect the pleasure of your company to dinner.

Col. Ay, ay, we'll come—plague o' ceremony among friends. But won't you stay to see my son; I have sent to him, and suppose he will be here as soon as his valet-de-chambre will give him leave.

Jenk. There is no occasion, good sir: present my humble respects, that's all.

Col. Well but, zounds! Jenkins, you must not go till you drink something; let you and I have a bottle of hock.

Jenk. Not for the world, Colonel; I never touch anything strong in the morning.

Col. Never touch anything strong! Why one bottle won't hurt you, man, this is old, and as mild as milk.

Jenk. Well, but, Colonel, pray excuse me.

SONG.

*To tell you the truth,
In the days of my youth,
As mirth and nature bid,
I lik'd a glass,
And I lov'd a lass,
And I did as youngers did.
But now I am old,
With grief be it told,
I must those freaks forbear
At sixty-three,
'Twixt you and me,
A man grows worse for wear.* [Exit.]

Enter MR. JESSAMY, LADY MARY OLDBOY and MAID.

Lady M. Shut the door; why don't you shut the door there? Have you a mind I should catch my death? This house is absolutely the cave of Æolus; one had as good live on the eddy-stone, or in a windmill.

Mr. Jes. I thought they told your ladyship that there was a messenger here from Sir John Flowerdale.

Col. Well, sir, and so there was; but he had not patience to wait upon your curling-irons. Mr. Jenkins was here, Sir John Flowerdale's steward, who has lived in the family these forty years.

Mr. Jes. And pray, sir, might not Sir John Flowerdale have come himself: if he had been acquainted with the rules of good breeding, he would have known that I ought to have been visited.

Lady M. Upon my word, Colonel, this is a solecism.

Col. 'Sblood, my lady, it's none. Sir John Flowerdale came but last night from his sister's seat in the west, and is a little out of order. But

I suppose he thinks he ought to appear before him with his daughter in one hand, and his rent-roll in the other, and cry, "Sir, pray do me the favour to accept them." [say—

Lady M. Nay, but, Mr. Oldboy, permit me to

Col. He need not give himself so many affected airs; I think it's very well if he gets such a girl for going for: she's one of the handsomest and richest in this country, and more than he deserves.

Mr. Jes. That's an exceeding fine china jar your ladyship has got in the next room; I saw the fellow of it the other day at Williams's, and will send to my agent to purchase it: it is the true matchless old blue and white. Lady Betty Barebones has a couple that she gave an hundred guineas for, on board an Indiaman; but she reckons them at a hundred and twenty-five, on account of half a dozen plates, four nankeen beakers, and a couple of shaking mandarins, that the custom-house officer took from under her petticoats.

Col. Did you ever hear the like of this? He's chattering about old china, while I am talking to him of a fine girl. I tell you what, Mr. Jessamy, since that's the name you choose to be called by, I have a good mind to knock you down.

Mr. Jes. Knock me down, Colonel! What do you mean? I must tell you, sir, this is a language to which I have not been accustomed; and, if you think proper to continue to repeat it, I shall be under the necessity of quitting your house.

Col. Quitting my house?

Mr. Jes. Yes, sir, incontinently.

Col. Why, sir, am not I your father, sir; and have I not a right to talk to you as I like? I will, sirrah. But, perhaps, I mayn't be your father, and I hope not.

Lady M. Heavens and earth, Mr. Oldboy!

Col. What's the matter, madam; I mean, madam, that he might have been changed at nurse, madam—and I believe he was.

Mr. Jes. Huh! huh! huh!

Col. Do you laugh at me, you saucy jackanapes!

Lady M. Who's there?—Somebody bring me a chair. Really, Mr. Oldboy, you throw my weakly frame into such repeated convulsions. But I see your aim; you want to lay me in my grave, and you will very soon have that satisfaction.

Col. I can't bear the sight of him.

Lady M. Open that window, give me air, or I shall faint.

Mr. Jes. Hold, hold, let me tie a handkerchief about my neck first. This cursed sharp north-wind—Antoine, bring down my muff.

Col. Ay, do, and his great coat.

Enter ANTOINE, with great coat and muff.

Lady M. Marg'ret, some hartshorn. [Exit Antoine.] My dear Mr. Oldboy, why will you fly out in this way, when you know how it shocks my tender nerves?

Col. 'Sblood, madam, it's enough to make a man

Lady M. Hartshorn! hartshorn!

Enter Maid.

Mr. Jes. Colonel!

Col. Do you hear the puppy? [question?

Mr. Jes. Will you give me leave to ask one

Col. I don't know whether I will or not.

Mr. Jes. I should be glad to know, that's all, what single circumstance in my conduct, carriage, or figure, you can possibly find fault with—perhaps I may be brought to reform. Pr'ythee let me hear from your own mouth; then, seriously, what it is you do like, and what it is you do not like.

Col. Hum!

Mr. Jes. Be ingenuous; speak, and spare not.

Col. You would know?

SONG.

*Zounds, sir! then I'll tell you without any jest,
The thing of all things, which I hate and detest;*

A coxcomb, a fop,

A dainty milk-sop,

*Who, essenc'd and dizen'd from bottom to top,
Looks just like a doll for a milliner's shop:*

A thing full of prate,

And pride and conceit;

All fashion, no weight;

Who shrugs and takes snuff,

And carries a muff;

A minikin,

Finicking,

French powder'd-puff:

And now, sir, I fancy, I've told you enough. [Exit.

Mr. Jes. What's the matter with the Colonel, madam; does your ladyship know?

Lady M. Heigho! don't be surprised, my dear; it was the same thing with my late dear brother, Lord Jessamy; they never could agree: that good-natured, friendly soul, knowing the delicacy of my constitution, has often said, "sister Mary, I pity you." Not but your father has good qualities, and I assure you I remember him a very fine gentleman himself. When he first paid his addresses to me, he was called agreeable Jack Oldboy, though I married him without the consent of your noble grandfather.

Mr. Jes. I think he ought to be proud of me; I believe there's many a duke, nay prince, who would esteem themselves happy in having such a son.

Lady M. Yes, my dear; but your sister was always your father's favourite: he intends to give her a prodigious fortune, and sets his heart upon seeing her a woman of quality.

Mr. Jes. He should wish to see her look a little like a gentlewoman first. When she was in London, last winter, I am told she was taken notice of by a few men; but she wants air, manner—

Lady M. And has not a bit of the genius of our family; and I never knew a woman of it but herself without. I have tried her; about three years ago I set her to translate a little French song; I found she had not even an idea of versification, and she put down love and joy for rhyme, so I gave her over.

Mr. Jes. Why, indeed, she appears to have more of the Thalestris than the Sappho about her.

Lady M. Well, my dear, I must go and dress myself; though, I protest, I am fitter for my bed than my coach. And condescend to the Colonel a little; do, my dear, if it be only to oblige your mamma. [Exit.

Mr. Jes. Let me consider; I am going to visit a country baronet here, who would fain prevail upon me to marry his daughter; the old gentleman has heard of my parts and understanding, miss of my figure and address. But, suppose I should not like her when I see her? Why, positively, then I will not have her; the treaty's at an end, and sans compliment, we break up the congress. But, won't that be cruel, after having suffered her to flatter herself with hopes, and shewing myself to her. She's a strange dowdy, I dare believe; however, she brings provision with her for a separate maintenance. Antoine, appretez la toilet. I am going to spend a cursed day; that I perceive already; I wish it was over, I dread it as much as a general election. [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Study in Sir John Flowerdule's house.

Enter CLARISSA.

SONG.

Immortal powers protect me,

Assist, support, direct me;

Relieve a heart oppress'd.

Ah! why this palpitation?

Cease busy perturbation,

And let me, let me rest.

Enter JENNY.

Jen. My dear lady, what ails you?

Cla. Nothing, Jenny, nothing.

Jen. Pardon me, madam, there is something ails you indeed. Lord, what signifies all the grandeur and riches in this world, if they can't procure one content. I am sure it vexes me to the heart, so it does, to see such a dear, sweet, worthy young lady, as you are, pining yourself to death.

Cla. Jenny, you are a good girl, and I am very much obliged to you for feeling so much on my account; but, in a little time, I hope I shall be easier.

Jen. Why, now, here to-day, madam, for sartain you ought to be merry to-day, when there's a fine gentleman coming to court you; but, if you like any one else better, I am sure I wish you had him, with all my soul.

Cla. Suppose, Jenny, I was so unfortunate as to like a man without my father's approbation, would you wish me married to him?

Jen. I wish you married to any one, madam, that could make you happy.

Cla. Heigho!

Jen. Madam, madam! yonder's Sir John and Mr. Lionel on the terrace; I believe they are coming up here. Poor, dear Mr. Lionel, he does not seem to be in over great spirits either. To be sure, madam, it's no business of mine; but, I believe, if the truth was known, there are those in the house who would give more than ever I shall be worth, or any the likes of me, to prevent the marriage of a sartain person that shall be nameless.

Cla. What do you mean? I don't understand you.

Jen. I hope you are not angry, madam?

Cla. Ah! Jenny—

Jen. Lauk, madam, do you think, when Mr. Lionel's a clergyman, he'll be obliged to cut off his hair? I'm sure, it will be a thousand pities; and your great pudding-sleeves! Lord! they'll quite spoil his shape, and the fall of his shoulders. Well, madam, if I was a lady of large fortune, I'll be hanged if Mr. Lionel should be a parson, if I could help it.

Cla. I'm going into my dressing-room. It seems, then, Mr. Lionel is a great favourite of your's; but pray, Jenny, have a care how you talk in this manner to any one else.

Jen. Me talk, madam! I thought you knew me better; and, my dear lady, keep up your spirits. I'm sure I have dressed you to-day as nice as hands and pins can make you.

SONG.

I'm but a poor servant, 'tis true, ma'am;

But was I a lady, like you, m' am,

In grief would I sit? the dicken's a bit;

No, faith, I would search the world thro, ma'am,

To find what my liking could hit.

Set in case a young man,

In my fancy there ran;

It might anger my friends and relations:

But, if I had regard,

It should go very hard,

Or I'd follow my own inclinations. [Exeunt.

Enter SIR JOHN FLOWERDALE and LIONEL.

Sir J. Indeed, Lionel, I will not hear of it. What! to run from us all of a sudden, this way; and at such a time too; the eve of my daughter's wedding, as I may call it; when your company must be doubly agreeable, as well as necessary to us? I am sure you have no studies at present that require your attendance at Oxford; I must, therefore, insist on your putting such thoughts out of your head.

Lio. Upon my word, sir, I have been so long from the university, that it is time for me to think of returning. It is true, I have no absolute studies; but really, sir, I shall be obliged to you, if you will give me leave to go.

Sir J. Come, come, my dear Lionel, I have for some time observed a more than ordinary gravity growing upon you, and I am not to learn the reason of it; I know, to minds serious, and well inclined, like your's, the sacred functions you are about to embrace—

Lio. Dear sir, your goodness to me, of every kind, is so unmerited. Your condescension, your friendly attentions; in short, sir, I want words to express my sense of obligations.

Sir J. Fie, fie! no more of them. By my last letters, I find that my old friend, the rector, still continues in good health, considering his advanced years. You may imagine I am far from desiring the death of so worthy and pious a man; yet, I must own, at this time, I could wish you were in orders, as you might then perform the ceremony of my daughter's marriage, which would give me a secret satisfaction.

Lio. No doubt, sir; any office in my power, that could be instrumental to the happiness of any in your family, I should perform with pleasure.

Sir J. Why, really, Lionel, from the character of her intended husband, I have no room to doubt, but this match will make Clarissa perfectly happy; to be sure, the alliance is the most eligible for both families.

Lio. If the gentleman is sensible of his happiness in the alliance, sir.

Sir J. The fondness of a father is always suspected of partiality; yet, I believe, I may venture to say, that few young women will be found more unexceptionable than my daughter: her person is agreeable, her temper sweet, her understanding good; and, with the obligations she has to your instructions—

Lio. You do my endeavours too much honour, sir. I have been able to add nothing to Miss Flowerdale's accomplishments, but a little knowledge in matters of small importance to a mind already so well improved.

Sir J. I don't think so; a little knowledge, even in those matters, is necessary for a woman, in whom, I am far from considering ignorance as a desirable characteristic: when intelligence is not attended with impertinent affectation, it teaches them to judge with precision, and gives them a degree of solidity necessary for the companion of a sensible man. [ing for you, sir.

Lio. Yonder's Mr. Jenkins; I fancy he's look-

Sir J. I see him; he's come back from Colonel Oldboy's: I have a few words to say to him; and will return to you again in a minute. [Exit.

Lio. To be a burthen to one's self, to wage continual war with one's own passions, forced to combat, unable to overcome! But see, she appears, whose presence turns all my sufferings into transport, and makes even misery itself delightful.

Enter CLARISSA.

Perhaps, madam, you are not at leisure now; otherwise, if you thought proper, we would resume the subject we were upon yesterday.

Cla. I am sure, sir, I give you a great deal of trouble.

Lio. Madam, you give me no trouble: I should think every hour of my life happily employed in your service; and as this is probably the last time I shall have the satisfaction of attending you upon the same occasion—

Cla. Upon my word, Mr. Lionel, I think myself extremely obliged to you; and shall ever consider the enjoyment of your friendship—

Lio. My friendship, madam, can be of little moment to you; but if the most perfect adoration, if the warmest wishes for your felicity, though I should never be witness of it; if these, madam can have any merit to continue in your remembrance, a man once honoured with a share of your esteem—

Cla. Hold, sir—I think I hear somebody.

Lio. If you please, madam, we will resume our studies. (They sit.) Have you looked at the book I left you yesterday?

Cla. Really, sir, I have been so much disturbed in my thoughts for these two or three days past, that I have not been able to look at anything.

Lio. I am sorry to hear that, madam; I hope there was nothing particular to disturb you. The care Sir John takes to dispose of your hand in a manner suitable to your birth and fortune?

Cla. I don't know, sir; I own I am disturbed; I own I am uneasy; there is something weighs upon my heart, which I would fain disclose.

Lio. Upon your heart, madam? did you say your

Cla. I did, sir—I— [heart?

Enter JENNY.

Jen. Madam! madam! here's a coach and six driving up the avenue: it's Colonel Oldboy's family; and, I believe, the gentleman is in it that's coming to court you. Lord, I must run and have a peep at him out of the window. [Exit.

Lio. Madam, I'll take my leave.

Cla. Why so, sir? Bless me, Mr. Lionel! what's the matter? You turn pale.

Lio. Madam!

Cla. Pray speak to me, sir; you tremble. Tell me the cause of this sudden change. How are you? Where's your disorder?

Lio. Oh, fortune! fortune!

SONG.

*You ask me in vain,
Of what ills I complain,
Where harbours the torment I find;
In my head, in my heart,
It invades ev'ry part,
And subdues both my body and mind.

Each effort I try,
Ev'ry med'cine apply,
The pangs of my soul to appease;
But doom'd to endure,
What I mean for a cure,
Turns poison, and feeds the disease.* [Exit.

Enter DIANA.

Dia. My dear Clarissa, I'm glad I have found you alone. For heaven's sake, don't let any one break in upon us; and give me leave to sit down with you a little. I am in such a tremour, such a panic—

Cla. Mercy on us, what has happened?

Dia. You may remember I told you, that when I was last winter in London, I was followed by an odious fellow, one Harman: I can't say but the wretch pleased me, though he is but a younger brother, and not worth sixpence; and, in short, when I was leaving town, I promised to correspond with him.

Cla. Do you think that was prudent?

Dia. Madness! But this is not the worst; for what do you think? the creature had the assurance to write to me about three weeks ago, desiring permission to come down and spend the summer

Cla. At your father's? [at my father's.

Dia. Ay, who never saw him, knows nothing of him, and would as soon consent to my marrying a horse-jockey. He told me a long story of some tale he intended to invent, to make my father receive him as an indifferent person; and some gentleman in London, he said, would procure him a letter that should give it a face; and he longed to see me so, he said he could not live without it; and if he could be permitted but to spend a week with me—

Cla. Well, and what answer did you make?

Dia. Oh! abused him, and refused to listen to any such thing; but—I vow I tremble while I tell it you—just before we left our house, the impudent monster arrived there, attended by a couple of servants, and is now actually coming here with my father.

Cla. Upon my word, this is a dreadful thing.

Dia. Dreadful, my dear! I happened to be at the window as he came into the court, and I declare I had like to have fainted away.

Cla. Well, Diana, with regard to your affair, I think you must find some method of immediately informing this gentleman, that you consider the outrage he has committed against you in the most heinous light, and insist upon his going away directly.

Dia. Why, I believe that will be the best way; but then he'll be begging my pardon, and asking to stay.

Cla. Why then you must tell him positively you won't consent to it; and if he persists in so extravagant a design, tell him you'll never see him again as long as you live.

Dia. Must I tell him so?

SONG.

*For my heart beats so pit-pat throbbing,
For my heart beats whene'er he's nigh;
Then when he sues,
Can I refuse
To hear him plead?—
Not I indeed,
For my heart, &c.*

*When he softly sighs,
And I meet his eyes,
So well their meaning's understood;
Cou'd I bid him go?
Ah! no, no, no,
I'm sure I could not if I would.
For my heart, &c.*

*How oft have I try'd,
With our sex's pride,
And scorn his love to treat;
But again and again,
I have found 'twas in vain,
He talks so when we meet.
Tho' my heart, &c.* [Exit.

Cla. How easy to direct the conduct of others; how hard to regulate our own. I can give my friend advice, while I am conscious of the same indiscretions in myself. Yet is it criminal to know the most worthy, most amiable man in the world, and not to be insensible to his merit? But my father, the kindest, best of fathers—will he approve the choice I have made? Nay, has he not made another choice for me? And, after all, how can I be sure that the man I love, loves me again? He never told me so; but his looks, his actions, his present anxiety, sufficiently declare what his delicacy, his generosity, will not suffer him to utter.

SONG.

*Ye gloomy thoughts, ye fears perverse,
Like sullen vapours all disperse,
And scatter in the wind,

Delusive phantoms, brood of night,
No more my sickly fancy fright,
No more my reason blind.*

*'Tis done; I feel my soul releas'd;
The visions fly, the mists are chas'd,
Nor leave a cloud behind.* [Exit.

SCENE III.—A side View of Sir John Flowerdale's house.

HARMAN enters with COLONEL OLDBOY.

Col. Well, and how does my old friend, Dick Rantum, do? I have not seen him these twelve years: he was an honest, worthy fellow as ever breathed; I remember he kept a girl in London, and was cursedly plagued by his wife's relations.

Har. Sir Richard was always a man of spirit, Colonel.

Col. But as to this business of your's, which he tells me of in his letter—I don't see much in it: an affair with a citizen's daughter—pinked her brother in a duel.—Is the fellow likely to die?

Har. Why, sir, we hope not; but as the matter is dubious, and will probably make some noise, I thought it was better to be for a little time out of the way; when hearing my case, Sir Richard Rantum mentioned you; he said, he was sure you would permit me to remain at your house for a few days, and offered me a recommendation.

Col. And there's likely to be a brat in the case; and the girl's friends are in business.—I'll tell you what will be the consequence, then, they will be for going to law with you for a maintenance; but no matter, I'll take the affair in hand for you; make me your solicitor; and, if you are obliged to pay for a single spoonful of pap, I'll be content to father all the children in the Foundling Hospital.

Har. You are very kind, sir.

Col. But hold;—hark you! you say there's money to be had; suppose you were to marry the wench?

Har. Do you think, sir, that would be so right after what has happened? Besides, there's a strong objection;—to tell you the truth, I am honourably in love in another place.

Col. Oh! you are.

Har. Yes, sir, but there are obstacles—a father: in short, sir, the mistress of my heart lives in this very county, which makes even my present situation a little irksome.

Col. In this county? Zounds! then I am sure I am acquainted with her, and the first letter of her name is—

Har. Excuse me, sir, I have some particular

Col. But look who comes yonder;—ha, ha, ha!

my son, picking his steps like a dancing-master. Pr'ythee, Harman, go into the house, and let my wife and daughter know we are come, while I go and have some sport with him; they will introduce you to Sir John Flowerdale.

Har. Then, sir, I'll take the liberty—

Col. But, d'ye hear, I must have a little more discourse with you about this girl; perhaps she's a neighbour of mine, and I may be of service to you.

Har. Well, remember, Colonel, I shall try your friendship.

SONG.

*Indulgent pow'rs, if ever
You mark'd a tender vow,
O bend in kind compassion,
And hear a lover now.*

*For titles, wealth, and honours,
While others crowd your shrine;
I ask this only blessing,
Let her I love be mine.* [Exit Har.]

Enter MR. JESSAMY and several Servants.

Col. Why, zounds! one would think you had never put your feet to the ground before; you make as much work about walking a quarter of a mile, as if you had gone a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

Mr. Jes. Colonel, you have used me extremely ill, to drag me through the dirty roads in this manner; you told me the way was all over a bowling-green; only see what a condition I am in.

Col. Why, how did I know the roads were dirty? Is that my fault? Besides, we mistook the way. Zounds! man, your legs will be never the worse when they are brushed a little.

Mr. Jes. Antoine! have you sent La Roque for the shoes and stockings? Give me the glass out of your pocket—not a dust of powder left in my hair, and the frissure as flat as the fore-top of an attorney's clerk: get your comb and pomatum; you must borrow some powder. I suppose there's such a thing as a dressing-room in the house?

Col. Ay, and a cellar too, I hope, for I want a glass of wine cursedly. But hold! hold! Frank, where are you going? Stay, and pay your devoirs here, if you please; I see there's somebody coming out to welcome us.

Enter LIONEL, DIANA, and CLARISSA.

Lio. Colonel, your most obedient. Sir John is walking with my lady in the garden, and has commissioned me to receive you.

Col. Mr. Lionel, I am heartily glad to see you; come here, Frank;—this is my son, sir.

Lio. Sir, I am exceedingly proud to—

Mr. Jes. Can't you get the powder, then?

Col. Miss Clary, my little Miss Clary, give me a kiss my dear—as handsome as an angel, by heavens. Frank, why don't you come here? this is Miss Flowerdale.

Dia. Oh heavens, Clarissa! just as I said, that impudent devil is come here with my father.

Mr. Jes. Hadn't we better go into the house?

QUINTETTO.

Mr. Jes. To be made in such a pickle!

Will you please to lead the way, sir?

Col. *No, but, if you please, you may sir,
For precedence none will stickle.*

Dia. *Brother, no politeness? bless me!
Will you not your hand bestow?
Lead the lady.*

Cla. *Don't distress me;
Dear Diana, let him go.*

Mr. Jes. Ma'am permit me.

Col. *Smoke the beau.
Cruel must I, can I bear;*

Lio. Oh adverse stars!

and Oh fate severe!

Cla. *Beset, tormented,
Each hope prevented.*

Col. *None but the brave deserve the fair.
Come ma'am let me lead you:
Now, sir, I precede you.*

All. *Lovers must ill usage bear,
Oh adverse stars! oh fate severe!
None but the brave deserve the fair.*

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall in Sir John Flowerdale's house, with the view of a grand stair-case, through an arch.

Enter LIONEL, followed by JENNY.

Jen. Well, but Mr. Lionel, consider; pray consider now; how can you be so prodigious indiscreet as you are, walking about the hall here, while the gentlefolks are within in the parlour. Don't you think they'll wonder at your getting up so soon after dinner, and before any of the rest of the company?

Lio. For heaven's sake, Jenny, don't speak to me: I neither know where I am, nor what I am doing; I am the most wretched and miserable of mankind.

Jen. Poor dear soul, I pity you. Yes, yes, I believe you are miserable enough, indeed; and I assure you, I have pitied you a great while, and spoke many a word in your favour, when you little thought you had such a friend in a corner.

Lio. But, good Jenny, since, by some accident or other, you have been able to discover what I would willingly hide from all the world, I conjure you, as you regard my interest, as you value your lady's peace and honour, never let the most distant hint of it escape you; for it is a secret of that importance—

Jen. And, perhaps, you think I can't keep a secret. Ah! Mr. Lionel, it must be hear, see, and say nothing in this world, or one has no business to live in it; besides, who would not be in love with my lady? There's never a man this day alive but might be proud of it; for she is the handsomest, sweetest temperdest, and I am sure one of the best mistresses, ever poor girl had.

Lio. Oh, Jenny, she's an angel!

Jen. And so she is, indeed. Do you know that she gave me her blue silk gown to-day, and it is every crum as good as new; and, go things as they will, don't you be fretting and vexing yourself, for I am mortally sartin she would liverer see a toad than this Jessamy. Though I must say, to my thinking, he's a very likely man; and, a finer pair of eye-brows, and a more delicate nose, I never saw on a face.

Lio. By heavens I shall run mad.

Jen. And why so? It is not beauty that always takes the fancy; moreover, to let you know, if it was, I don't think him any more to compare to you, than a thistle is to a carnation, and so's a sign; for, mark my words, my lady loves you, as much as she hates him.

Lio. What you tell me, Jenny, is a thing I neither merit nor expect. No, I am unhappy and let me continue so; my most presumptuous thoughts shall never carry me to a wish that may affect her quiet, or give her cause to repent.

Jen. That's very honourable of you, I must needs say; but for all that, liking's liking, and one can't help it; and if it should be my lady's case, it is no fault of your's. I am sure when she called me into her dressing-room, before she went down to dinner, there she stood with her eyes brim-full of tears; and so I fell a crying for company; and then she could not abide the chap in the parlour; and, at the same time, she bid me take an opportunity to speak to you, and desire you to meet her in the garden this evening, after tea, for she has something to say to you.

Lio. Jenny, I see you are my friend; for which I thank you, though I know it is impossible to do me any service: take this ring and wear it for my sake.

Jen. I am very much obliged to your honour; I am your friend indeed. But, I say, you won't forget to be in the garden now; and in the mean time, keep as little in the house as you can, for walls have eyes and ears; and I can tell you the servants take notice of your uneasiness, though I am always desiring them to mind their own business.

Lio. Pray have a care, Jenny; have a care my dear girl; a word may breed suspicion.

Jen. Psha! have a care yourself; it is you that breeds suspicion, sighing and pining about; you look for all the world like a ghost; and if you don't pluck up your spirits you will be a ghost soon; letting things get the better of you. Though to be sure, when I thinks with myself, being crossed in love is a terrible thing. There was a young man in the town where I was born, made away with himself upon the account of it.

Lio. Things shan't get the better of me, Jenny.

Jen. No more they don't ought. And once again I say fortune is thrown in your dish, and you are not to fling it out; my lady's estate will be better than three livings, if Sir John could give them to you: think of that Mr. Lionel, think of that.

Lio. Think of what?

SONG.

*Oh talk not to me of the wealth she possesses,
My hopes and my views to herself I confine;
The splendour of riches but slightly impresses
A heart that is fraught with a passion like mine.*

*By love, only love, should our souls be cemented;
No int'rest, no motive, but that would I own;
With her in a cottage be blest and contented;
And wretched without her, tho' plac'd on a throne.*

[Exit.]

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY.

Col. Very well, my lady; I'll come again to you, presently; I am only going into the garden for a mouthful of air. Aha! my little Abigail! Here Molly, Jenny, Betty! What's your name? Why don't you answer me, hussy, when I call you?

Jen. If you want anything, sir, I'll call one of the footmen.

Col. The footmen! the footmen! D—n me, I never knew one of them, in my life, that wouldn't prefer a rascal to a gentleman. Come here, you slut, put your hands about my neck and kiss me.

Jen. Who, I sir?

Col. Ay, here's money for you; what the devil are you afraid of? I'll take you into keeping; you shall go and live at one of my tenant's houses.

Jen. I wonder you a'n't ashamed, sir, to make an honest girl any such proposal; you that have a worthy gentlewoman, nay, a lady of your own.—To be sure she's a little stricken in years; but why shouldn't she grow elderly as well as yourself?

Col. Burn a lady, I love a pretty girl.

Jen. Well, then, you may go look for one, sir; I have no pretensions to the title. [me.]

Col. Why, you pert baggage! you don't know

Jen. What do you pinch my fingers for? yes, yes, I know you well enough, and your charekter's well known all over the country, running after poor young creatures as you do, to ruiate

Col. What, then people say— [them.]

Jen. Indeed, they talk very bad of you; and whatever you may think, sir, though I'm in a me-nial station, I'm come of people that wou'dn't see me put upon; there are those that wou'd take my part against the proudest he in the land, that should offer anything uncivil. [lady like my son?]

Col. Well, let me know, how does your young

Jen. You want to pump me, do you? I suppose you would know whether I can keep my tongue within my teeth?

Col. She does'nt like him, then?

Jen. I don't say so, sir. Isn't this a shame now. I suppose to-morrow or next day it will be re-ported that Jenny has been talking; Jenny said that, and t'other. But here, sir, I ax you, did I tell you any such thing?

Col. Why yes, you did.

Jen. I!—Lord bless me, how can you—

Col. Ad I'll mouzle you.

Jen. Ah! ah!

Col. What do you bawl for?

Jen. Ah! ah! ah!

SONG.

*Indeed, forsooth, a pretty youth,
To play the am'rous fool;
At such an age, methinks your rage
Might be a little cool.*

*Fie, let me go, sir,
Kiss me!—No, no, sir.
You pull me and shake me,
For what do you take me,
This figure to make me?
I'd have you to know*

*I'm not for your game, sir;
Nor will I be tame, sir;
Lord! have you no shame, sir,
To tumble one so?*

[Exit.]

Enter LADY MARY, DIANA, and HARMAN.

Lady M. Mr. Oldboy, won't you give me your hand to lead me up stairs, my dear? Sir, I am prodigiously obliged to you: I protest I have not been so well, I don't know when: I have had no return of my bilious complaint after dinner to-day; and eat so voraciously. Did you observe, miss? Doctor Arsenic will be quite astonished when he hears it; surely, his new invented medicine has done me a prodigious deal of service.

Col. Ah! you'll always be taking one slop or other, till you poison yourself. Give me a pinch of your ladyship's snuff.

Lady M. This is a mighty pretty sort of a man, Colonel; who is he? [to me.]

Col. A young fellow, my lady, recommended

Lady M. I protest he has the sweetest taste for poetry!—He has repeated to me two or three of his own things; and I have been telling him of the poem my late brother, Lord Jessamy, made on the mouse that was drowned.

Col. Ay, a fine subject for a poem; a mouse that was drowned in a—

Lady M. Hush, my dear Colonel; don't mention it; to be sure the circumstance was vastly indelicate; but for the number of lines, the poem was as charming a morsel—Pray, sir, was there any news when you left London; anything about the East Indies, the ministry, or politics of any kind? I am strangely fond of politics; but I hear nothing since my Lord Jessamy's death; he used to write to me all the affairs of the nation, for he was a very great politician himself. I have a manuscript speech of his in my cabinet; he never spoke it, but it is as fine a thing as ever came from man?

Col. What is that crawling on your ladyship's

Lady M. Where? Where? [petticoat?]

Col. Zounds! a spider with legs as long as my arm.

Lady M. Oh heavens! ah don't let me look at it; I shall faint, I shall faint! A spider! a spider! a spider! (Runs off; Har. attempts to follow her, the Col. prevents him.)

Col. Hold! zounds, let her go. I knew the spider would set her a galloping, with her d—'d fuss about her brother, my Lord Jessamy. Harman, come here. How do you like my daughter? Is the girl you are in love with as handsome as this?

Har. In my opinion, sir.

Col. What, as handsome as Dy!—I'll lay you twenty pounds she has not such a pair of eyes. He tells me he's in love, Dy; raging mad for love; and, by his talk, I begin to believe him.

Dia. Now, for my part, papa, I doubt it very much; though, by what I heard the gentleman say just now within, I find he imagines the lady has a violent partiality for him; and yet he may be mistaken there, too.

Col. For shame, Dy; what the mischief do you mean? How can you talk so tartly to a poor young fellow under misfortunes? Give him your hand, and ask his pardon. Don't mind her, sir: for all this, she is as good-natured a little devil as ever was born.

Har. You may remember, sir, I told you before dinner, that I had for some time carried on a private correspondence with my lovely girl; and that her father, whose consent we despair of obtaining, is the great obstacle to our happiness.

Col. Why don't you carry her off in spite of him, then? I ran away with my wife—ask my Lady Mary, she'll tell you the thing herself. Her old, conceited lord of a father thought I was not good enough; but I mounted a garden-wall, notwithstanding their chevaux-de-frize of broken glass bottles, took her out of a three-pair of stairs window, and brought her down a ladder in my arms—by the way, she would have squeezed through a cat-hole to get at me; and I would have taken her out of the tower of London, d—me, if it had been surrounded with the three regiments of guards.

SONG.

'Twas on a dismal night,
When scarce a star gave light,
And that hail came rattling down,
With peppering on my crown,
That I resolv'd upon a matter.
The matter was of love,
And I as fierce as Jove;
But my charmer was lock'd up,
At a castle's very top;
Yet I had fix'd to be at her.

*A whistle then was mine,
My fair one knew the sign—
And directly to my hopes,
Threw a ladder down of ropes;
When I mount without delay, sir:
And when I got on high,
And did my charmer spy,
I took her in my arm,
And descended without harm,
And carried off, oway, sir.*

Dia. But, surely, papa, you would not persuade the gentleman to such a proceeding as this is: consider the noise it will make in the country; and if you are known to be the adviser and abettor—

Col. Why, what do I care? I say, if he takes my advice he'll run away with her, and I'll give him all the assistance I can.

Har. I am sure, sir, you are very kind; and, to tell you the truth, I have more than once had the very scheme in my head, if I thought it was feasible, and knew how to go about it.

Col. Feasible, and knew how to go about it! The thing's feasible enough, if the girl's willing to go off with you, and you have spirit sufficient to undertake it.

Har. O, as for that, sir, I can answer.

Dia. What, sir, that the lady will be willing to go off with you?

Har. No, ma'am, that I have spirit enough to take her, if she is willing to go; and thus far I dare venture to promise, that between this and to-morrow morning, I will find out whether she is or not.

Col. So he may; she lives but in this county; and tell her, Harman, you have met with a friend, who is inclined to serve you. You shall have my post-chaise at a minute's warning; and if a hundred pieces will be of any use to you, you may command

Har. Are you really serious, sir? [them.]

Col. Serious, d—me if I a'n't. I have put twenty young fellows in the way of getting girls that they never would have thought of: and bring her to my house: whenever you come you shall have a supper and a bed; but you must marry her first, because my lady will be squeamish.

Dia. Well, but, my dear papa, upon my word you have a great deal to answer for: suppose it was your own case to have a daughter in such circumstances, would you be obliged to any one—

Col. Hold your tongue, hussy! who bid you put in your oar? However, Harman, I don't want to set you upon anything: 'tis no affair of mine, to be sure; I only give you advice, and tell you how I would act if I was in your place.

Har. I assure you, sir, I am quite charmed with the advice; and since you are ready to stand my friend, I am determined to follow it.

Col. You are—

Har. Positively.

Col. Say no more, then; here's my hand:—you understand me—no occasion to talk any further of it at present. When we are alone—Dy, take Mr. Harman into the drawing-room, and give him some tea. I say, Harman, mum.

Dia. You had better not give this advice.

Col. Hold your tongue, hussy,—Harman, if you don't carry her off, you dog, I'll never forgive you. [Exit.]

SONG.

O never doubt, my love, thy sorrows I'll banish,
And sweetly I'll sing while the night flies away,
And e'er the wild gloom o'er the mountain shall vanish,
Thou'lt sink on my pillow and sleep till the day.
O never doubt my love, &c.
O never doubt my love, its fondness shall bless thee,
'Twill soothe thee whene'er by this rude world
oppress'd; [thee,
And should the cold hand of misfortune e'er press
The angel of pity thou'lt find in my breast.
O never doubt my love, &c. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A handsome Dressing-room.Enter DIANA, followed by JESSAMY.

Dia. Come, brother, I undertake to be mistress of the ceremony upon this occasion, and introduce you to your first audience. Miss Flowerdale is not here, I perceive; but no matter.

Mr. Jes. Upon my word, a pretty, elegant dressing-room this; but confound our builders, or architects, as they call themselves, they are all errant stone-masons: not one of them know the situation of doors, windows, or chimnies; which are as essential to a room as eyes, nose, and mouth, to a countenance. Now, if the eyes are where the mouth should be, and the nose out of proportion and its place, quel horrible phisiognomie.

Dia. My dear brother, you are not come here as a virtuoso to admire the temple; but as a votary to address the deity to whom it belongs. Shew, I beseech you, a little more devotion, and tell me, how do you like Miss Flowerdale? Don't you think her very handsome?

Mr. Jes. Pale:—but that I am determined she shall remedy; for, as soon as we are married, I will make her put on rouge. Let me see: has she got any in her boxes here? Veritable toilet a la Anglaise. Nothing but a bottle of Hungary-water, two or three rows of pins, a paper of patches, and a little bole-armoniac by way of tooth-powder.

Dia. Brother, I would fain give you some advice upon this occasion, which may be of service to you. You are now going to entertain a young lady: let me prevail upon you to lay aside those airs, on account of which, some people are impertinent enough to call you a coxcomb; for, I am afraid, she may be apt to think you a coxcomb too, as I assure you she is very capable of distinguishing.

Mr. Jes. So much the worse for me. If she is capable of distinguishing, I shall meet with a terrible repulse. I don't believe she'll have me.

Dia. I don't believe she will, indeed.

Mr. Jes. Go on, sister. Ha, ha, ha!

Dia. I protest I am serious: though, I perceive, you have more faith in the counsellor before you there, the looking-glass. But give me leave to tell you, it is not a powdered head, a laced coat, a grimace, a shrug, a bow, or a few pert phrases, learned by rote, that constitute the power of pleasing all women.

Mr. Jes. You had better return to the gentleman, and give him his tea, my dear.

Dia. These qualifications we find in our parrots and monkies. I would undertake to teach Poll, in three weeks, the fashionable jargon of half the fine men about town; and I am sure it must be allowed, that pug, in a scarlet coat, is a gentleman as degagée and alluring as most of them.

SONG.

*Good folks would you know,
How to make up a beau,
Here's one ready made to your view,
His hair he must crop,
And to finish the fop,
Waistcoat, red, yellow, or blue.
To use an eye-glass, is a very good plan,
For it makes a beau almost as big as a man.
Then his opera hat,
Like this must be flat;
On me 'twould look well, I declare,
In martial attire
Who would not admire,
Diana dress'd en militaire? [scold;
Oh, then with the fiercest I'll strut and I'll Dear brother, forgive me; perhaps, I'm too bold. [Exit.*

Enter CLARISSA.

Cl. Sir, I took the liberty to desire a few moments' private conversation with you: I hope you will excuse it. (Jes. brings down chairs.) I am, really greatly embarrassed. But, in an affair of such immediate consequence to us both—

Mr. Jes. My dear creature, don't be embarrassed before me; I should be extremely sorry to strike you with any awe; but this is a species of mauvaise honte, which the company I shall introduce you to, will soon cure you of.

Cl. Upon my word, sir, I don't understand you.

Mr. Jes. Perhaps you may be under some uneasiness lest I should not be quite so warm in the prosecution of this affair as you could wish: it is true, with regard to quality, I might do better: and with regard to fortune full as well:—but you please me. Upon my soul, I have not met with anything more agreeable to me a great while.

Cl. Pray, sir, keep your seat.

Mr. Jes. Mauvaise honte again. My dear, there is nothing in these little familiarities between you and me. When we are married, I shall do everything to render your life happy.

Cl. Ah! sir, pardon me. The happiness of my life depends upon a circumstance—

Mr. Jes. Oh! I understand you. You have been told, I suppose, of the Italian opera girl. Rat people's tongues! However, 'tis true, I had an affair with her at Naples, and she is now here. But, be satisfied. I'll give her a thousand pounds, and send her about her business.

Cl. Me, sir! I protest, nobody told me. Lord! I never heard any such thing, or inquired about it.

Mr. Jes. Nor have they not been chattering to you of my affair at Pisa, with the Principessa del—

Cl. No, indeed, sir.

Mr. Jes. Well, I was afraid they might; because, in this rude country—but why silent on a sudden? Don't be afraid to speak.

Cl. No, sir, I will come to the subject on which I took the liberty to trouble you. Indeed, I have great reliance on your generosity.

Mr. Jes. You'll find me as generous as a prince, depend on't.

Cl. I am blessed, sir, with one of the best of fathers: I never yet disobeyed him; in which I have had little merit, for his commands hitherto have only been to secure my own felicity.

Mr. Jes. Après ma chère.

Cl. But now, sir, I am under the shocking necessity of disobeying him, or being wretched

Mr. Jes. Hem! [for ever.

Cl. Our union is impossible: therefore, sir, since I cannot be your wife, let me entreat permission to make you my friend. [Exit.

Mr. Jes. Who's there?

Enter JENKINS.

Jenk. Do you call, sir?

Mr. Jes. Hark you, old gentleman; who are you?

Jenk. Sir, my name is Jenkins.

Mr. Jes. Oh! you are Sir John Flowerdale's steward; a servant he puts confidence in.

Jenk. Sir, I have served Sir John Flowerdale many years.

Mr. Jes. Then, Mr. Jenkins, I shall condescend to speak to you. Does your master know who I am? Does he know, sir, that I am likely to be a peer of Great Britain; that I have ten thousand pounds a-year; that I have passed through all Europe with distinguished eclat; that I refused the daughter of Mynheer Van Slokenfolk, the great Dutch burgomaster; and that, if I had not had the misfortune of being bred a protestant, I might have married the niece of his present holiness the Pope, with a fortune of two hundred thousand piastres?

Jenk. I am sure, sir, my master has all the respect imaginable—

Mr. Jes. Then, sir, how comes he, after my shewing an inclination to be allied to his family; how comes he, I say, to bring me to his house to be affronted? I have let his daughter go; but, I think, I was in the wrong; for a woman that insults me, is no more safe than a man. I have brought a lady to reason before now, for giving me saucy language; and left her male friends to revenge it.

Jenk. Pray, good sir, what's the matter?

Mr. Jes. Why, sir, this is the matter, sir: your master's daughter, sir, has behaved to me with d—d insolence and impertinence; and you may tell Sir John Flowerdale, first with regard to her, that I think she is a silly, ignorant, awkward, ill-bred country puss.

Jenk. Oh! sir, for heaven's sake—

Mr. Jes. And that, with regard to himself, he is, in my opinion, an old doating, ridiculous, country 'squire; without the knowledge of either men or things; and that he is below my notice, if it were not to despise him.

Jenk. Good lord! good lord!

Mr. Jes. And advise him and his daughter to keep out of my way; for, by gad, I will affront them, in the first place I meet them. And if your master is for carrying things further; tell him, I fence better than any man in Europe.

SONG.

In Italy, Germany, France, have I been; [seen; Where princes I've liv'd with, where monarchs I've

The great have caress'd me,

The fair have address'd me,

Nay, smiles I have had from a queen.

And, now, shall a pert,

Insignificant flirt,

With insolence use me,

Presume to refuse me!

She fancies my pride will be hurt.

But tout au contraire,

I'm pleas'd I declare,

Quite happy to think I escape from the snare:

Serviteur, Mam'selle; my claim I withdraw.

Hey! where are my people? Fal, la, la, la, la. [Exit.

Jenk. I must go and inform Sir John of what has happened; but, I will not tell him of the outrageous behaviour of this young spark; for he is a man of spirit, and would resent it. Egad, my own fingers itched to be at him, once or twice; and, as stout as he is, I fancy these old fists would give him a bellyful. He complains of Miss Clarissa; but she is incapable of treating him in the manner he says. Perhaps she may have behaved with some coldness towards him; and yet that is a mystery to me too. [Exit.

SCENE III.—Sir John Flowerdale's Garden.

Enter LIONEL, leading CLARISSA.

Lio. Hist! methought I heard a noise: should we be surprised together, at a juncture so critical; what might be the consequence? I know not how it is; but, at this the happiest moment of my life, I feel a damp, a tremour at my heart—

Cla. Then, what should I do? If you tremble, I ought to be terrified indeed, who have discovered sentiments, which, perhaps, I should have hid, with a frankness, that, by a man less generous, less noble-minded than yourself, might be construed to my disadvantage.

Lio. Oh! wound me not with so cruel an expression. You love me, and have condescended to confess it. You have seen my torments, and been kind enough to pity them. The world, indeed, may blame you—

Cla. And, yet, was it proclaimed to the world, what could the most malicious suggest? They could but say, that truth and sincerity got the better of forms; that the tongue dared to speak the honest sensation of the mind; that while you aimed at improving my understanding, you engaged and conquered my heart.

Lio. And is it—is it possible?

Cla. Be calm, and listen to me: what I have done has not been lightly imagined, nor rashly undertaken: it is the work of reflection, or conviction; my love is not a sacrifice to my own fancy, but a tribute to your worth; did I think there was a more deserving man in the world—

Lio. If to doat on you more than life, be to deserve you, so far I have merit; if, to have no wish, no hope, no thought but you, can entitle me to the envied distinction of a moment's regard, so far I dare pretend.

Cla. That I have this day refused a man, with whom I could not be happy, I make no merit: born for quiet and simplicity, the crowds of the world, the noise attending pomp and distinction have no charms for me: I wish to pass my life in rational tranquillity, with a friend, whose virtues I can respect, whose talents I can admire; who will make my esteem the basis of my affection.

Lio. O charming creature! Yes, let me indulge the flattering idea; formed with the same sentiments, the same feelings, the same tender passion for each other; nature designed us to compose that sacred union, which nothing but death can annul.

Cla. One only thing remember. Secure in each other's affections, here we must rest; I would not give my father a moment's pain, to purchase the empire of the world.

Lio. Command, dispose of me as you please: angels take cognizance of the vows of innocence and virtue; and, I will believe that our's are already registered in heaven.

Cla. I will believe so too.

SONG.

Go, and on my truth relying,

Comfort to your cares applying,

Bid each doubt and sorrow flying,

Leave to peace, and love your breast.

Go, and may the Pow'rs that hear us,

Still, as kind protectors near us,

Through our troubles safely steer us,

To a port of joy and rest. [Exit.

Enter SIR JOHN FLOWERDALE.

Sir J. Who's there? Lionel?

Lio. Heavens! 'tis Sir John Flowerdale.

Sir J. Who's there?

Lio. 'Tis I, sir; I am here, Lionel.

Sir J. My dear lad, I have been searching for you this half-hour, and was at last told that you had come into the garden. I have a piece of news, which I dare swear will shock and surprise you; my daughter has refused Colonel Oldboy's son, who is this minute departed the house in violent resentment of her ill-treatment.

Lio. Perhaps, sir, the gentleman may have been too impetuous, and offended Miss Flowerdale's delicacy; certainly nothing else could occasion—

Sir J. Heaven only knows. I think, indeed, there can be no settled aversion; and surely her affections are not engaged elsewhere.

Lio. Engaged, sir! No, sir.

Sir J. I think not, Lionel.

Lio. You may be positive, sir. I'm sure—

Sir J. O worthy young man! whose integrity, openness, and every good quality have rendered dear to me as my own child; I see this affair troubles you as much as it does me.

Lio. It troubles me, indeed, sir.

Sir J. However, my particular disappointment ought not to be detrimental to you, nor shall it. I well know how irksome it is to a generous mind to live in a state of dependance, and have long had it in my thoughts to make you easy for life.

Lio. Sir John, the situation of my mind at present is a little disturbed. Spare me—I beseech you, spare me; why will you persist in a goodness that makes me ashamed of myself?

Sir J. There is an estate in this county which I purchased some years ago; by me it will never be missed, and who ever marries my daughter will have little reason to complain of my disposing of such a trifle for my own gratification. On the present marriage, I intended to perfect a deed of gift in your favour, which has been for some time prepared; my lawyer has this day completed it, and it is your's, my dear Lionel, with every good wish that the warmest friend can bestow.

Lio. Sir, if you presented a pistol with a design to shoot me, I would submit to it; but you must excuse me, I cannot lay myself under more obligations.

Sir J. Your delicacy carries you too far. In this I confer a favour on myself: however, we'll talk no more on the subject at present, let us walk towards the house, our friends will depart else without my bidding them adieu. [Exeunt.]

Enter DIANA and CLARISSA.

Dia. So, then, my dear Clarissa, you really give credit to the ravings of that French wretch, with regard to a plurality of worlds?

Cla. I don't make it an absolute article of belief; but I think it an ingenious conjecture with great probability on its side.

Dia. And we are a moon to the moon! Nay, child, I know something of astronomy; but that—that little shining thing there, which seems not much larger than a silver plate, should, perhaps, contain great cities like London; and who can tell but they may have kings there, and parliaments, and plays, and operas, and people of fashion! Lord, the people of fashion in the moon must be strange creatures.

Cla. Methinks Venus shines very bright in yonder corner.

Dia. Venus! O pray let me look at Venus; I suppose, if there are any inhabitants there, they must be all lovers.

Enter LIONEL.

Lio. Was ever such a wretch? I can't stay a moment in a place. Where is my repose? fled with my virtue. Was I then born for falsehood and dissimulation? I was, I was! and I live to be conscious of it; to impose upon my friend; to betray my benefactor, and lie, to hide my ingratitude; a monster in a moment. No, I may be the most unfortunate of men, but I will not be the most odious; while my heart is yet capable of dictating what is honest, I will obey its voice. (Aside.)

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY and HARMAN.

Col. Dy, where are you? What the mischief, is this a time to be walking in the garden? The coach has been ready this half hour, and your mama is waiting for you.

Dia. I am learning astronomy, sir. Do you know, papa, the moon is inhabited?

Col. Hussy, you are half a lunatic yourself: come here, things have gone just as I imagined they would; the girl has refused your brother; I knew he must disgust her.

Dia. Women will want taste now and then, sir.

Col. But I must talk to the young lady a little.

Har. (To Dia.) Well, I have had a long conference with your father about the elopement, and he continues firm in his opinion that I ought to attempt it: in short, all the necessary operations are settled between us, and I am to leave his house to-morrow evening, if I can but persuade the young lady—

Dia. Ay, but I hope the young lady will have more sense. Lord, how can you tease me with your nonsense. Come, sir, isn't it time for us to go in? Her ladyship will be impatient.

Col. Friend Lionel, good night to you. Miss Clarissa, my dear, though I am father to the puppy who has displeased you, give me a kiss; you served him right, and I thank you for it.

QUARTETTO.

Col. O what a night is here for love!
Cynthia brightly shining above;

*Among the trees,
To the sighing breeze,
Fountains tinkling,
Stars a twinkling:*

Dia. O what a night is here for love!
So may the morn propitious prove;

Har. And so it will, if right I guess;
For sometimes light,
As well as night,
A lover's hopes may bless.

Cla. } Farewell, my friend,
and } May gentle rest

Dia. } Calm each tumult in your breast,
Every pain and fear remove.

Lio. What have I done?
Where shall I run?
With grief and shame at once oppress,
How my own upbraiding shun,
Or meet my friend distress?

Cla. Hark to Philomel, how sweet,

Dia. From yonder elm.

Har. Tweet, tweet, tweet, tweet.

All. O what a night is here for love!
But vainly nature strives to move;
Nor nightingale among the trees,
Nor twinkling stars, nor sighing breeze,
Nor murmur'ring streams,
Nor Phæbe's beams,
Can charm unless the heart's at ease.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in Colonel Oldboy's house.

Enter HARMAN, with his hat, boots, and whip, followed by DIANA.

Dia. Pr'ythee, hear me.

Har. My dear, what would you say?

Dia. I am afraid of the step we are going to take; indeed, I am. 'Tis true, my father is the contriver of it; but, really, on consideration, I think I should appear less culpable if he was not so; I am at once criminal myself, and rendering him ridiculous.

Har. Do you love me?

Dia. Suppose I do, you give me a very ill proof of your love for me, when you would take advantage of my tenderness, to blind my reason: how can you have so little regard for my honour as to sacrifice it to a vain triumph? For it is in that light I see the rash action you are forcing me to commit; nay, methinks, my consenting to it should injure me in your own esteem. When a woman forgets what she owes herself, a lover should set little value upon anything she gives to him.

Har. Can you suppose, then, can you imagine, that my passion will ever make me forget the veneration; and, an elopement is nothing, when it is on the road to matrimony.

Dia. At best, I shall incur the censure of disobedience, and indiscretion; and, is it nothing to a young woman, what the world says of her? Ah! my good friend, be assured, such a disregard of the world is the first step towards deserving its reproaches.

Har. But, the necessity we are under. Mankind has too much good sense, too much good-nature—

Dia. Every one has good sense enough to see other people's faults, and good-nature enough to overlook their own. Besides, the most sacred things may be made an ill use of; and even marriage itself, if indecently and improperly—

Har. Come, get yourself ready: where is your band-box, hat, and cloak? Slip into the garden; be there at the iron-gate, which you shewed me just now; and, as the post-chaise comes round, I will step and take you in.

Dia. Dear Harman, let me beg of you to desist.

Har. Dear Diana, let me beg of you to go on.

Dia. I shall never have resolution to carry me through it.

Har. We shall have four horses, my dear, and they will assist us.

Dia. In short—I—cannot go with you.

Har. But before me! Into the garden. Won't

Dia. Ha! ha! ha! [you?

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY.

Col. Heyday! what's the meaning of this? Who is it went out of the room there? Have you and my daughter been in conference, Mr. Harman?

Har. Yes, faith, sir; she has been taking me to task here very severely, with regard to this affair; and she has said so much against it, and put it into such a strange light—

Col. A busy, impertinent baggage! Egad I wish I had caught her meddling, and after I ordered her not: but you have sent to the girl, and you say she is ready to go with you; you must not disappoint her now.

Har. No, no, Colonel; I always have politeness enough to hear a lady's reasons; but constancy enough to keep a will of my own.

Col. Very well; now let me ask you: don't you think it would be proper, upon this occasion, to have a letter ready writ for the father, to let him know who has got his daughter, and so forth?

Har. Certainly, sir; and I'll write it directly.

Col. You write it! you be d—d! I won't trust you with it. I tell you, Harman, you'll commit some cursed blunder, if you don't leave the management of this whole affair to me. I have writ the letter for you myself.

Har. Have you, sir?

Col. Ay; here, read it: I think it's the thing. However, you are welcome to make any alteration.

Har. "Sir, I have loved your daughter a great while, secretly; she assures me there is no hopes of your consenting to our marriage; I therefore take her without it. I am a gentleman who will use her well: and, when you consider the matter, I dare swear you will be willing to give her a fortune; if not, you shall find, I dare behave myself like a man. A word to the wise. You must expect to hear from me in another style."

Col. Now, sir, I will tell you what you must do with this letter. As soon as you have got off with the girl, sir, send your servant back to leave it at the house, with orders to have it delivered to the old gentleman.

Har. Upon my honour, I will, Colonel.

Col. But, upon my honour, I don't believe you'll get the girl. Come, Harman, I'll bet you a buck, and six dozen of Burgundy, that you won't have spirit enough to bring this affair to a crisis.

Har. And, I say done first, Colonel.

Col. Then look into the court there, sir; a chaise, with four of the prettiest bay geldings in England, with two boys in scarlet and silver jackets, that will whisk you along.

Har. Boys! Colonel? Little cupids, to transport me to the summit of my desires.

Col. Ay, but for all that, it mayn't be amiss for me to talk to them a little out of the window for you. Dick, come hither: you are to go with this gentleman, and do whatever he bids you; and take into the chaise whoever he pleases; and drive like devils, do you hear? but be kind to the dumb beasts.

Har. Leave that to me, sir. And so, my dear Colonel—

SONG.

To fear a stranger,
Behold the soldier arm;
He knows no danger,
When honour sounds the alarm;
But dauntless goes,
Among his foes.

In Cupid's militia,
So fearless I issue;
And, as you see,
Arm'd cap-a-pie,
Resolve on death or victory. [Exit.

Enter Lady MARY, and then JENNY.

Lady M. Mr. Oldboy, here is a note from Sir John Flowerdale, it is addressed to me, entreating my son to come over there again this morning. A maid brought it: she is in the ante-chamber. We had better speak to her. Child, child, why don't you come in?

Jen. I choose to stay where I am, if your ladyship pleases.

Lady M. Stay where you are! why so?

Jen. I am afraid of the old gentleman there.

Col. Afraid of me, hussy?

Lady M. Pray, Colonel, have patience. Afraid! Here is something at the bottom of this. What did you mean by that expression, child?

Jen. Why the Colonel knows very well, madam; he wanted to be rude with me yesterday.

Lady M. Oh, Mr. Oldboy!

Col. Lady Mary don't provoke me, but let me talk to the girl about her business. How come you to bring this note here?

Jen. Why, Sir John gave it to me, to deliver to my uncle Jenkins, and I took it down to his house; but while we were talking together, he remembered that he had some business with Sir John, so he desired me to bring it, because he said it was not proper to be sent by any of the common servants.

Lady M. Colonel, look in my face, and help blushing, if you can.

Col. What the plague's the matter, my lady? I have not been wronging you now, as you call it.

Jen. Indeed, madam, he offered to make me his kept madam. I am sure his usage of me put me into such a twitter, that I did not know what I was doing all the day after.

Lady M. I don't doubt it, though I so lately forgave him; but, as the poet says, his sex is all deceit. Read Pamela, child, and resist temptation.

Jen. Yes, madam, I will.

Col. Why, I tell you, my lady, it was all a joke.

Jen. No, sir, it was no joke; you made me a proffer of money, so you did, whereby I told you, you had a lady of your own, and that though she was old, you had no right to despise her.

Lady M. And how dare you, mistress, make use of my name? Is it for such trollops as you to talk of persons of distinction behind their backs?

Jen. Why, madam, I only said you was in years.

Lady M. Sir John Flowerdale shall be informed of your impertinence, and you shall be turned out of the family. I see you are a confident creature, and I believe you are no better than you should be.

Jen. I scorn your words, madam.

Lady M. Get out of the room: how dare you stay in this room to talk impudently to me?

Jen. Very well, madam, I shall let my lady know how you have used me; but I shan't be turned out of my place, madam, nor at a loss, if I am; and if you are angry with every one that won't say you are young, I believe there is very few you will keep friends with.

SONG.

I wonder, I'm sure, why this fuss should be made;
For my part I'm neither asham'd nor afraid
Of what I have done, nor of what I have said.
A servant, I hope, is no slave;
And tho', to their shames,
Some ladies call names,
I know better how to behave.
Times are not so bad,
If occasion I had,

*Nor my character such I need starve on't;
And for going away,
I don't want to stay,
And so I'm your ladyship's servant.* [Exit.

Enter MR. JESSAMY.

Mr. Jes. What is the matter here?

Lady M. I will have a separate maintenance; I will indeed. Only a new instance of your father's infidelity, my dear. Then with such low wretches, farmers' daughters, and servant wenches: but anything with a cap on, 'tis all the same to him.

Mr. Jes. Upon my word, sir, I am sorry to tell you, that those practices very ill suit the character which you ought to endeavour to support in the world.

Lady M. Is this a recompense for my love and regard; I, who have been tender and faithful as a turtle dove?

Mr. Jes. A man of your birth and distinction should, methinks, have views of a higher nature, than such low, such vulgar libertinism.

Lady M. Consider my birth and family too: Lady Mary Jessamy might have had the best matches in England.

Mr. Jes. Then, sir, your grey hairs.

Lady M. I, that have brought you so many lovely, sweet babes.

Mr. Jes. Nay, sir, it is a reflection on me.

Lady M. The heinous sin too—

Mr. Jes. Indeed, sir, I blush for you.

Col. S'death and fire, you little effeminate puppy! do you know who you talk to? And you, madam, do you know who I am? Get up to your chamber, or zounds I'll make such a—

Lady M. Ah! my dear come away from him. [Exit.

Enter a Servant.

Col. Am I to be tutored and called to account? How now, you scoundrel, what do you want?

Serv. A letter, sir.

Col. A letter, from whom, sirrah?

Serv. The gentleman's servant, an't please your honour, that left this just now in the post-chaise; the gentleman my young lady went away with.

Col. Your young lady, sirrah? Your young lady went away with no gentleman, you dog. What gentleman? What young lady, sirrah?

Mr. Jes. There is some mystery in this. With your leave, sir, I'll open the letter: I believe it contains no secrets.

Col. What are you going to do, you jackanapes? You sha'n't open a letter of mine. Dy—Diana. Somebody call my daughter to me there. To John Oldboy, Esq. Sir, I have loved your daughter a great while, secretly—consenting to our marriage—

Mr. Jes. So, so.

Col. You villain! you dog! what is it you have brought me here?

Serv. Please your honour, if you'll have patience, I'll tell your honour. As I told your honour before, the gentleman's servant that went off just now in the post-chaise, came to the gate, and left it after his master was gone. I saw my young lady go into the chaise with the gentleman.

Mr. Jes. Why this is your own hand.

Col. Call all the servants in the house, let horses be saddled directly; every one take a different road. [your own orders.

Serv. Why, your honour, Dick said it was by

Col. My orders! you rascal? I thought he was going to run away with another gentleman's daughter, Dy—Diana Oldboy. [Exit Servant.

Mr. Jes. Don't waste your lungs to no purpose, sir; your daughter is half a dozen miles off by this time.

Col. Sirrah, you have been bribed to further the scheme of a pickpocket here.

Mr. Jes. Besides, the matter is entirely of your own contriving, as well as the letter and spirit of this elegant epistle.

Col. You are a coxcomb, and I'll disinherit you; the letter is none of my writing, it was writ by the devil, and the devil contrived it. Diana, Margaret, my Lady Mary, William, John— [Exit.

Mr. Jes. I am very glad of this; prodigiously glad of it, upon my honour. He! he! he! It will be a jest this hundred years. (Bells ring violently, on both sides.) What's the matter now? O! her ladyship has heard of it, and is at her bell; and the Colonel answers her. A pretty duet; but a little too much upon the forte methinks: it would be a diverting thing now, to stand unseen at the old gentleman's elbow. [Exit.

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY, with one boot, a great-coat on his arm, &c. followed by several Servants.

Col. She's gone, by the lord! fairly stole away, with that poaching, coney-catching rascal! However, I won't follow her; no, d—e; take my whip, and my cap, and my coat, and order the groom to unsaddle the horses; I won't follow her the length of a spur-leather. Come here, you sir, and pull off my boot; (whistles) she has made a fool of me once, she sha'n't do it a second time. Not but I'll be revenged too, for I'll never give her sixpence; the disappointment will put the scoundrel out of temper, and he'll thrash her a dozen times a day: the thought pleases me, I hope he'll do it. What do you stand gaping and staring at, you impudent dogs? are you laughing at me? I'll teach you to be merry at my expense—

SONG.

*A rascal, a hussy; zounds! she that I counted
In temper so mild, so unpractis'd in evil:
I set her a horse-back, and no sooner mounted,
Than, crack, whip and spur, she rides post to the
But there let her run, [devil.
Be ruin'd undone;
If I go to catch her,
Or back again fetch her,
I'm worse than the son of a gun.
A mischief possess'd me to marry;
And further my folly to carry,
To be still more a sot,
Sons and daughter I got,
And pretty ones, by the lord Harry. [Exeunt.*

SCENE II.—Clarissa's Dressing-room.

Enter CLARA, melancholy, with a book in her hand, meeting JENNY.

Cla. Where have you been Jenny? I was inquiring for you; why will you go out without letting me know?

Jen. Dear madam, never anything happened so unlucky; I am sorry you wanted me. But I was sent to Colonel Oldboy's with a letter; where I have been so used. Lord have mercy upon me; quality indeed! I say quality! Pray, madam, do you think that I looks anyways like an immodest parson? To be sure I have a gay air, and I can't help it, and I loves to appear a little genteelish, that's what I do.

Cla. Jenny, take away this book.

Jen. Heaven preserve me, madam, you are

Cla. O my dear Jenny! [crying.

Jen. My dear mistress, what's the matter?

Cla. I am undone.

Jen. No, madam; no, lord forbid.

Cla. I am indeed. I have been rash enough to discover my weakness for a man who treats me with contempt.

Jen. Is Mr. Lionel ungrateful, then?

Cla. I have lost his esteem for ever, Jenny. Since last night, that I fatally confessed what I

Col. Ay; here, read it: I think it's the thing. However, you are welcome to make any alteration.

Har. "Sir, I have loved your daughter a great while, secretly; she assures me there is no hopes of your consenting to our marriage; I therefore take her without it. I am a gentleman who will use her well: and, when you consider the matter, I dare swear you will be willing to give her a fortune; if not, you shall find, I dare behave myself like a man. A word to the wise. You must expect to hear from me in another style."

Col. Now, sir, I will tell you what you must do with this letter. As soon as you have got off with the girl, sir, send your servant back to leave it at the house, with orders to have it delivered to the old gentleman.

Har. Upon my honour, I will, Colonel.

Col. But, upon my honour, I don't believe you'll get the girl. Come, Harman, I'll bet you a buck, and six dozen of Burgundy, that you won't have spirit enough to bring this affair to a crisis.

Har. And, I say done first, Colonel.

Col. Then look into the court there, sir; a chaise, with four of the prettiest bay geldings in England, with two boys in scarlet and silver jackets, that will whisk you along.

Har. Boys! Colonel? Little cupids, to transport me to the summit of my desires.

Col. Ay, but for all that, it mayn't be amiss for me to talk to them a little out of the window for you. Dick, come hither: you are to go with this gentleman, and do whatever he bids you; and take into the chaise whoever he pleases; and drive like devils, do you hear? but be kind to the dumb beasts.

Har. Leave that to me, sir. And so, my dear Colonel—

SONG.

To fear a stranger,
Behold the soldier arm;
He knows no danger,
When honour sounds the alarm;
But dauntless goes,
Among his foes.

*In Cupid's militia,
So fearless I issue;
And, as you see,
Arm'd cap-a-pie,
Resolve on death or victory.* [Exit.

Enter Lady MARY, and then JENNY.

Lady M. Mr. Oldboy, here is a note from Sir John Flowerdale, it is addressed to me, entreating my son to come over there again this morning. A maid brought it: she is in the ante-chamber. We had better speak to her. Child, child, why don't you come in?

Jen. I choose to stay where I am, if your ladyship pleases.

Lady M. Stay where you are! why so?

Jen. I am afraid of the old gentleman there.

Col. Afraid of me, hussy?

Lady M. Pray, Colonel, have patience. Afraid! Here is something at the bottom of this. What did you mean by that expression, child?

Jen. Why the Colonel knows very well, madam; he wanted to be rude with me yesterday.

Lady M. Oh, Mr. Oldboy!

Col. Lady Mary don't provoke me, but let me talk to the girl about her business. How come you to bring this note here?

Jen. Why, Sir John gave it to me, to deliver to my uncle Jenkins, and I took it down to his house; but while we were talking together, he remembered that he had some business with Sir John, so he desired me to bring it, because he said it was not proper to be sent by any of the common servants.

Lady M. Colonel, look in my face, and help blushing, if you can.

Col. What the plague's the matter, my lady? I have not been wronging you now, as you call it.

Jen. Indeed, madam, he offered to make me his kept madam. I am sure his usage of me put me into such a twitter, that I did not know what I was doing all the day after.

Lady M. I don't doubt it, though I so lately forgave him; but, as the poet says, his sex is all deceit. Read Pamela, child, and resist temptation.

Jen. Yes, madam, I will.

Col. Why, I tell you, my lady, it was all a joke.

Jen. No, sir, it was no joke; you made me a proffer of money, so you did, whereby I told you, you had a lady of your own, and that though she was old, you had no right to despise her.

Lady M. And how dare you, mistress, make use of my name? Is it for such trollops as you to talk of persons of distinction behind their backs?

Jen. Why, madam, I only said you was in years.

Lady M. Sir John Flowerdale shall be informed of your impertinence, and you shall be turned out of the family. I see you are a confident creature, and I believe you are no better than you should be.

Jen. I scorn your words, madam.

Lady M. Get out of the room: how dare you stay in this room to talk impudently to me?

Jen. Very well, madam, I shall let my lady know how you have used me; but I shan't be turned out of my place, madam, nor at a loss, if I am; and if you are angry with every one that won't say you are young, I believe there is very few you will keep friends with.

SONG.

I wonder, I'm sure, why this fuss should be made;
For my part I'm neither asham'd nor afraid
Of what I have done, nor of what I have said.
A servant, I hope, is no slave;
And tho', to their shames,
Some ladies call names,
I know better how to behave.
Times are not so bad,
If occasion I had,

*Nor my character such I need starve on't;
And for going away,
I don't want to stay,
And so I'm your ladyship's servant.* [Exit.

Enter MR. JESSAMY.

Mr. Jes. What is the matter here?

Lady M. I will have a separate maintenance; I will indeed. Only a new instance of your father's infidelity, my dear. Then with such low wretches, farmers' daughters, and servant wenches: but anything with a cap on, 'tis all the same to him.

Mr. Jes. Upon my word, sir, I am sorry to tell you, that those practices very ill suit the character which you ought to endeavour to support in the world.

Lady M. Is this a recompense for my love and regard; I, who have been tender and faithful as a turtle dove?

Mr. Jes. A man of your birth and distinction should, methinks, have views of a higher nature, than such low, such vulgar libertinism.

Lady M. Consider my birth and family too: Lady Mary Jessamy might have had the best matches in England.

Mr. Jes. Then, sir, your grey hairs.

Lady M. I, that have brought you so many lovely, sweet babes.

Mr. Jes. Nay, sir, it is a reflection on me.

Lady M. The heinous sin too—

Mr. Jes. Indeed, sir, I blush for you.

Col. S'death and fire, you little effeminate puppy! do you know who you talk to? And you, madam, do you know who I am? Get up to your chamber, or zounds I'll make such a—

Lady M. Ah! my dear come away from him. [Exit.

Enter a Servant.

Col. Am I to be tutored and called to account? How now, you scoundrel, what do you want?

Serv. A letter, sir.

Col. A letter, from whom, sirrah?

Serv. The gentleman's servant, an't please your honour, that left this just now in the post-chaise; the gentleman my young lady went away with.

Col. Your young lady, sirrah? Your young lady went away with no gentleman, you dog. What gentleman? What young lady, sirrah?

Mr. Jes. There is some mystery in this. With your leave, sir, I'll open the letter: I believe it contains no secrets.

Col. What are you going to do, you jackanapes? You sha'n't open a letter of mine. Dy—Diana. Somebody call my daughter to me there. To John Oldboy, Esq. Sir, I have loved your daughter a great while, secretly—consenting to our marriage—

Mr. Jes. So, so.

Col. You villain! you dog! what is it you have brought me here?

Serv. Please your honour, if you'll have patience, I'll tell your honour. As I told your honour before, the gentleman's servant that went off just now in the post-chaise, came to the gate, and left it after his master was gone. I saw my young lady go into the chaise with the gentleman.

Mr. Jes. Why this is your own hand.

Col. Call all the servants in the house, let horses be saddled directly; every one take a different road. [your own orders.

Serv. Why, your honour, Dick said it was by

Col. My orders! you rascal? I thought he was going to run away with another gentleman's daughter, Dy—Diana Oldboy. [Exit Servant.

Mr. Jes. Don't waste your lungs to no purpose, sir; your daughter is half a dozen miles off by this time.

Col. Sirrah, you have been bribed to further the scheme of a pickpocket here.

Mr. Jes. Besides, the matter is entirely of your own contriving, as well as the letter and spirit of this elegant epistle.

Col. You are a coxcomb, and I'll disinherit you; the letter is none of my writing, it was writ by the devil, and the devil contrived it. Diana, Margaret, my Lady Mary, William, John— [Exit.

Mr. Jes. I am very glad of this; prodigiously glad of it, upon my honour. He! he! he! It will be a jest this hundred years. (Bells ring violently, on both sides.) What's the matter now? O! her ladyship has heard of it, and is at her bell; and the Colonel answers her. A pretty duet; but a little too much upon the forte methinks: it would be a diverting thing now, to stand unseen at the old gentleman's elbow. [Exit.

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY, with one boot, a great-coat on his arm, &c. followed by several Servants.

Col. She's gone, by the lord! fairly stole away, with that poaching, coney-catching rascal! However, I won't follow her; no, d—e; take my whip, and my cap, and my coat, and order the groom to unsaddle the horses; I won't follow her the length of a spur-leather. Come here, you sir, and pull off my boot; (whistles) she has made a fool of me once, she sha'n't do it a second time. Not but I'll be revenged too, for I'll never give her sixpence; the disappointment will put the scoundrel out of temper, and he'll thrash her a dozen times a day: the thought pleases me, I hope he'll do it. What do you stand gaping and staring at, you impudent dogs? are you laughing at me? I'll teach you to be merry at my expense—

SONG.

*A rascal, a hussy; zounds! she that I counted
In temper so mild, so unpractis'd in evil:
I set her a horse-back, and no sooner mounted,
Than, crack, whip and spur, she rides post to the
But there let her run, [devil.
Be ruin'd undone;
If I go to catch her,
Or back again fetch her,
I'm worse than the son of a gun.
A mischief possess'd me to marry;
And further my folly to carry,
To be still more a sot,
Sons and daughter I got,
And pretty ones, by the lord Harry.
[Exeunt.*

SCENE II.—Clarissa's Dressing-room.

Enter CLARA, melancholy, with a book in her hand, meeting JENNY.

Cla. Where have you been Jenny? I was inquiring for you; why will you go out without letting me know?

Jen. Dear madam, never anything happened so unlucky; I am sorry you wanted me. But I was sent to Colonel Oldboy's with a letter; where I have been so used. Lord have mercy upon me; quality indeed! I say quality! Pray, madam, do you think that I looks anyways like an immodest parson? To be sure I have a gay air, and I can't help it, and I loves to appear a little genteelish, that's what I do.

Cla. Jenny, take away this book.

Jen. Heaven preserve me, madam, you are

Cla. O my dear Jenny! [crying.

Jen. My dear mistress, what's the matter?

Cla. I am undone.

Jen. No, madam; no, lord forbid.

Cla. I am indeed. I have been rash enough to discover my weakness for a man who treats me with contempt.

Jen. Is Mr. Lionel ungrateful, then?

Cla. I have lost his esteem for ever, Jenny. Since last night, that I fatally confessed what I should have kept a secret from all the world, he has scarce condescended to cast a look at me, nor give me an answer when I spoke to him, but with coldness and reserve.

Jen. Then he is a nasty, barbarous, inhuman brute.

Cla. Hold, Jenny, hold! it is all my fault.

Jen. Your fault, madam? I wish I was to hear such a word come out of his mouth: if he was a minister to-morrow, and to say such a thing from his pulpit, and I by, I'd tell him it was false upon the spot. (A knock.)

Cla. Somebody's at the door; see who it is.

Jen. You in fault indeed; that I know to be the most virtuous, nicest, most delicatest—(Goes to the door.)

Cla. How now?

Jen. Madam, it's a message from Mr. Lionel. If you are alone, and at leisure, he would be glad to wait upon you; I'll tell him, madam, that you

Cla. Where is he, Jenny? [are busy.]

Jen. In the study, the man says.

Cla. Then go to him, and tell him I should be glad to see him; but do not bring him up immediately, because I will stand in the balcony a few minutes for a little air.

Jen. Do so, dear madam; for your eyes are as red as ferrets; you are ready to faint too. Mercy on us, for what do you grieve and vex yourself? If I was as you. [Exit.]

Cla. Oh!

SONG.

*Why with sighs my heart is swelling,
Why with tears my eyes o'erflow;
Ask me not, 'tis past the telling,
Mute, involuntary woe.*

*Who to winds and waves a stranger,
Vent'rous tempts the inconstant seas,
In each billow fancies danger,
Shrinks at every rising breeze.* [Exit.]

Enter SIR JOHN FLOWERDALE and JENKINS.

Sir J. So, then, the mystery is discovered; but is it possible that my daughter's refusal of Colonel Oldboy's son, should proceed from a clandestine engagement, and that engagement with Lionel?

Jenk. Yes, sir; and it is my duty to tell you; else I would rather die than be the means of wounding the heart of my dear young lady; for if there is one upon earth of truly noble and delicate sentiments—

Sir J. I thought so once, Jenkins.

Jenk. And think so still: O good Sir John, now is the time for you to exert that character of worth and gentleness which the world so deservedly has given you. You have indeed cause to be offended; but consider, sir, your daughter is young, beautiful, and amiable; the poor youth unexperienced, sensible, and at a time of life when such temptations are hard to be resisted; their opportunities were many, their cast of thinking the same.

Sir J. Jenkins, I can allow for all these things; but the young hypocrites, there's the thing, Jenkins; their hypocrisy, their hypocrisy wounds me.

Jenk. Call it by a gentler name, sir; modesty on her part, apprehension on his.

Sir J. Then what opportunity have they had? They never were together but when my sister or myself made one of the company; besides, I had so firm a reliance on Lionel's honour and gratitude.

Jenk. Sir, I can never think that nature stamp'd that gracious countenance of his, to mask a corrupt heart.

Sir J. How! at the very time that he was conscious of being himself the cause of it, did he not shew more concern at this affair than I did? Nay, don't I tell you that last night, of his own accord, he offered to be a mediator in the affair, and desired my leave to speak to my daughter? I thought myself obliged to him, consented; and, in consequence of his assurance of success, wrote that letter to Colonel Oldboy, to desire the family would come here again to-day.

Jenk. Sir, as we were standing in the next room, I heard a message delivered from Mr. Lionel, desiring leave to wait upon your daughter. I dare swear they will be here presently; suppose we were to step into that closet, and overhear their conversation?

Sir J. What, Jenkins, after having lived so many years in confidence with my child, shall I become an eves-dropper to detect her?

Jenk. It is necessary at present. Come in, my dear master; let us only consider that we were once young like them; subject to the same passions, the same indiscretions; and it is the duty of every man to pardon errors incident to his kind. [Exeunt.]

Enter CLARISSA and LIONEL, meeting.

Cla. Sir, you desired to speak to me; I need not tell you the present situation of my heart; it is full. Whatever you have to say, I beg you will explain yourself; and, if possible, rid me of the anxiety under which I have laboured for some hours.

Lio. Madam, your anxiety cannot be greater than mine. I come, indeed to speak to you; and yet, I know not how; I came to advise you, shall I say as a friend? yes, as a friend to your glory, your felicity; dearer to me than life.

Cla. Go on, sir.

Lio. Sir John Flowerdale, madam, is such a father as few are blest with; his care, his prudence has provided for you a match; your refusal renders him inconsolable. Listen to no suggestions that would pervert you from your duty, but make the worthiest of men happy by submitting to his will.

Cla. How, sir, after what passed between us yesterday evening, can you advise me to marry Mr. Jessamy?

Lio. I would advise you to marry any one, madam, rather than a villain.

Cla. A villain, sir!

Lio. I should be the worst of villains, madam, was I to talk to you in any other strain; nay, am I not a villain, at once treacherous and ungrateful? Received into this house as an asylum, what have I done? Betrayed the confidence of the friend that trusted me; endeavoured to sacrifice his peace, and the honour of his family, to my own unwarrantable desires.

Cla. Say no more, sir; say no more; I see my error too late. I have parted from the rules prescribed to my sex; I have mistaken indecorum for a laudable sincerity; and it is just I should meet with the treatment my imprudence deserves.

Lio. 'Tis I, and only I, am to blame; while I took advantage of the father's security, I practised upon the tenderness and ingenuity of the daughter: my own imagination gone astray, I artfully laboured to lead your's after it; but here, madam, I give you back those vows which I insidiously extorted from you; keep them for some happier man, who may receive them without wounding his honour, or his peace.

Cla. For heaven's sake—

Lio. Oh! my Clarissa, my heart is broke; I am hateful to myself for loving you: yet, before I leave you for ever, I will once more touch that lovely hand—indulge my fondness with a last look—pray for your health and prosperity.

Cla. Can you forsake me? Have I then given my affections to a man who rejects and disregards them? Let me throw myself at my father's feet; he is generous and compassionate:—he knows your worth—

Lio. Mention it not; were you stript of fortune, reduced to the meanest station, and I monarch of the globe, I should glory in raising you to universal empire; but as it is,—farewell! farewell!

SONG.

*O dry those tears! like melted ore,
Fast dropping on my heart they fall:
Think, think, no more of me; no more
The mem'ry of past scenes recall.
On a wild sea of passion toss'd,
I split upon the fatal shelf,
Friendship and love at once are lost,
And now I wish to lose myself.* [Exit.

Enter JENNY.

Jen. O madam! I have betray'd you. I have gone and said something I should not have said to my uncle Jenkins; and, as sure as day, he has gone and told it all to Sir John.

Enter SIR JOHN and JENKINS.

Cla. My father!

Sir J. Go, Jenkins, and desire that young gentleman to come back—stay where you are. But what have I done to my child? How have I deserved that you should treat me like an enemy? Has there been any undesigned rigour in my conduct, or terror in my looks?

Cla. Oh sir!

Enter LIONEL.

Jenk. Here is Mr. Lionel.

Sir J. Come in.—When I tell you that I am instructed in all your proceedings, and that I have been ear-witness to your conversation in this place, you will, perhaps, imagine what my thoughts are of you, and the measures which justice prescribes me to follow.

Lio. Sir, I have nothing to say in my own defence; I stand before you self-convicted, self-condemned, and shall submit, without murmuring, to the sentence of my judge.

Sir J. As for you, Clarissa, since your earliest infancy, you have known no parent but me; I have been to you, at once, both father and mother; and that I might the better fulfil those united duties, though left a widower in the prime of my days, I would never enter into a second marriage.—I loved you for your likeness to your dear mother; but that mother never deceived me, and there the likeness fails; you have repaid my affection with dissimulation—Clarissa you should have trusted me. As for you, Mr. Lionel, what terms can I find strong enough to paint the excess of my friendship!—I loved, I esteemed, I honoured your father; he was a brave, a generous, and a sincere man; I thought you inherited his good qualities. You were left an orphan, I adopted you; put you upon the footing of my own son; educated you like a gentleman; and designed you for a profession, to which, I thought, your virtues would have been an ornament. What return you have made me, you seem to be acquainted with yourself; and, therefore, I shall not repeat it; yet, remember, as an aggravation of your guilt, that the last mark of my bounty was conferred upon you in the very instant, when you were undermining my designs. Now, sir, I have but one thing more to say to you: take my daughter, was she worth a million, she is at your service.

Lio. To me sir?—your daughter? do you give her to me? Without fortune, without friend—without—

Sir J. You have them all in your heart; him whom virtue raises, fortune cannot abase.

Cla. O, sir, let me on my knees kiss that dear hand, acknowledge my error, and entreat forgiveness and blessing.

Sir J. You have not erred, my dear daughter; you have distinguished. It is I should ask pardon, for this little trial of you; for I am happier in the son-in-law you have given me, than if you had married a prince.

Lio. My patron—my friend—my father; I would fain say something; but, as your goodness exceeds all bounds—

Sir J. I think I hear a coach drive into the court: it is Colonel Oldboy's family; I will go and receive them. Don't make yourself uneasy at this, we must endeavour to pacify them as well as we can. My dear Lionel, if I have made you happy, you have made me so; heaven bless you, my children, and make you deserving of one another. [Exeunt Sir John and Jenkins.

Enter CLARISSA, LIONEL, and JENNY.

Jen. O dear, madam, upon my knees, I humbly beg your forgiveness. Dear Mr. Lionel, forgive me; I did not design to discover it, indeed—and you won't turn me off, madam, will you? I'll serve you for nothing.

Cla. Get up, my good Jenny; I freely forgive you if there is anything to be forgiven: I know you love me; and, I am sure here is one who will join with me in rewarding your services.

Jen. Well, if I did not know, as sure as could be, that some good would happen, by my left eye itching this morning. [Exit.

DUETT.

Lio. O bliss unexpected! my joys overpower me!
*My love, my Clarissa, what words shall I find!
Remorse, desperation, no longer devour me—
He bless'd us, and peace is restor'd to my mind.*

Cla. He bless'd us! O rapture! Like one I recover, Whom death had appall'd without hope,
without aid;
A moment depriv'd me of father and lover;
A moment restores, and my pangs are repaid.

Lio. Forsaken, abandoned,
Cla. What folly! what blindness!

Lio. We fortune accus'd;

Cla. And the fates that decreed:

Both. But pain was inflicted by heaven, out of kindness,
To heighten the joys that were doom'd to
Our day was o'ercast; [succeed.
But brighter the scene is,
The sky more serene is,
And softer the calm for the hurricane past.

[Exeunt.

Enter LADY MARY OLDBOY, MR. JESSAMY, leading her; JENNY, and afterwards, SIR JOHN FLOWERDALE with COLONEL OLDBOY.

Lady M. 'Tis all in vain, my dear: set me down anywhere; I can't go a step further. I knew, when Mr. Oldboy insisted upon my coming, that I should be seized with a megrim by the way; and and it's well I did not die in the coach.

Mr. Jes. But, pr'ythee, why will you let yourself be affected with such trifles? Nothing more common than for young women of fashion to go off with low fellows.

Lady M. Only feel, my dear, how I tremble! Not a nerve but what is in agitation; and my blood runs cold! cold!

Mr. Jes. Well, but Lady Mary, don't let us expose ourselves to those people; I see there is not one of the rascals about us, that has not a grin upon his countenance.

Lady M. Expose ourselves, my dear! Your father will be as ridiculous as Hudibras, or Don Quixote.

Mr. Jes. Yes, he will be very ridiculous indeed.

Enter JENKINS.

Sir J. I give you my word, my good friend and neighbour, the joy I feel upon this occasion, is greatly allayed by the disappointment of an alliance with your family; but I have explained to you how things have happened. You see my situation; and, as you are kind enough to consider it yourself, I hope you will excuse it to your son.

Lady M. Sir John Flowerdale, how do you do? You see we have obey'd your summons; and I have the pleasure to assure you, that my son yielded to my entreaties with very little disagreement; in short, if I may speak metaphorically, he is content to stand candidate again, notwithstanding his late repulse, when he hopes for an unanimous election.

Col. Well, but, my lady, you may save your rhetoric; for the borough is disposed of to a worthier member.

Mr. Jes. What do you say, sir?

Enter LIONEL, CLARISSA, and JENNY.

Sir J. Here are my son and daughter.

Lady M. Is this pretty, Sir John?

Sir J. Believe me, madam, it is not for want of a just sense of Mr. Jessamy's merit, that this affair has gone off on any side: but the heart is a delicate thing; and after it has once felt, if the object is meritorious, the impression is not easily effaced; it would, therefore, have been an injury to him, to have given him in appearance what another in reality possessed.

Mr. Jes. Upon my honour, upon my soul, Sir John, I am not in the least offended at this contre temps.—Pray, Lady Mary, say no more about it.

Col. Tol, lol, lol, lol.

Sir J. But, my dear Colonel, I am afraid, after all, this affair is taken amiss by you: yes, I see you are angry on your son's account; but let me repeat it, I have a very high opinion of his merit.

Col. Ay, that's more than I have. Taken amiss! I don't take any thing amiss; I never was in better spirits, or more pleased in my life. [Lionel.]

Sir J. Come, you are uneasy at something, Co-

Col. Me! Gad I am not uneasy. Are you a justice of peace? Then you could give me a warrant, couldn't you? You must know, Sir John, a little accident has happen'd in my family since I saw you last, and you and I may shake hands.—Daughters, sir, daughters! Your's has snapt at a young fellow without your approbation; and how do you think mine has serv'd me this morning?—only run away with the scoundrel I brought to dinner here yesterday.

Sir J. I am excessively concerned.

Col. Now I'm not a bit concern'd. No, d—n me, I am glad it has happened; yet, thus far, I'll confess, I should be sorry that either of them would come in my way, because a man's temper may sometimes get the better of him; and I believe I should be tempted to break her neck, and blow his brains out.

Cla. But pray, sir, explain this affair.

Col. I can explain it no farther;—Dy, my daughter Dy, has run away from us.

Enter DIANA and HARMAN.

Dia. No, my dear papa, I am not run away; and, upon my knees, I entreat your pardon for the folly I have committed: but, let it be some alleviation, that duty and affection were too strong to suffer me to carry it to extremity; and, if you knew the agony I have been in, since I saw you

Lady M. How's this? [last—]

Har. Sir, I restore your daughter to you; whose fault, as far it goes, I must also take upon myself. We have been known to each other for some time; as lady Richly, your sister, in London, can acquaint you.

Col. Dy, come here. Now, you rascal, where's your sword; if you are a gentleman you shall fight me; if you are a scrub, I'll horse-whip you. Shut the door there, don't let him escape.

Har. Sir, don't imagine I want to escape; I am extremely sorry for what has happened, but am ready to give you any satisfaction you think proper.

Col. Follow me into the garden, then. Zounds! I have no sword about me. Sir John Flowerdale, lend us a case of pistols, or a couple of guns; and, come and see fair play.

Cla. My dear papa! [shall expire.]

Lady M. Mr. Oldboy, if you attempt to fight, I

Sir J. Pray, Colonel, let me speak a word to you in private.

Col. Slugs and a saw-pit.

Mr. Jes. What business are you of, friend?

Har. My chief trade, sir, is plain dealing; and as that is a commodity you have no reason to be very fond of, I would not advise you to purchase any of it by impertinence.

Col. And is this what you would advise me to?

Sir J. It is, indeed, my dear old friend; as things are situated, there is, in my opinion, no other prudent method of proceeding; and it is the method I would adopt myself, was I in your case.

Col. Why, I believe you are in the right of it; say what you will for me, then.

Sir J. Well, young people, I have been able to use a few arguments, which have softened my neighbour here; and, in some measure, pacified his resentment. I find, sir, you are a gentleman by your connections?

Har. Sir, till it is found that my character and family will bear the strictest scrutiny, I desire no favour; and for fortune—

Col. Oh! rot your fortune, I don't mind that; I know you are a gentleman, or Dick Rantum would not have recommended you. And so, Dy, kiss and friends.

Mr. Jes. What, sir, have you no more to say to the man who has used you so ill?

Col. Us'd me ill! That's as I take it; he has done a mettled thing; and, perhaps, I like him the better for it: it's long before you would have spirit enough to run away with a wench. Harman, give me your hand; let's hear no more of this now. Sir John Flowerdale, what say you? shall we spend the day together, and dedicate it to love and

Sir J. With all my heart. [harmony?]

Col. Then take off my great coat.

QUARTETTO.

Lio. Come then, all ye social pow'rs,
Shed your influence o'er us,
Crown with bliss the present hours,
And lighten those before us.
May the just, the generous, kind,
Still see that you regard 'em;
And Lionels for ever find,
Clarissas to reward 'em.

Cla. Love, thy godhead I adore,
Source of sacred passion;
But will never bow before
Those idols—wealth, or fashion.
May, like me, each maiden wife,
From the fop defend her;
Learning, sense, and virtue prize,
And scorn the vain pretender.

Har. Why the plague should men be sad,
While in time we moulder?
Grave, or gay, or vex'd or glad,
We ev'ry day grow older.
Bring the flask, the music bring,
Joy will quickly find us;
Drink, and laugh, and dance, and sing,
And cast our cares behind us.

Dia. How shall I escape—so naught,
On filial laws to trample;
I'll e'en curtsey, own my fault,
And plead papa's example.
Parents 'tis a hint to you,
Children oft are shameless;
Oft transgress—the thing's too true,
But are you always blameless?
One word more before we go;
Girls and boys have patience;
You to friends must something owe,
As well as to relations.
These kind gentlemen address—
What, though we forgave 'em,
Still they must be lost, unless
You lend a hand to save 'em. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Market-Place.—Drum beats the Grenadiers' March.

Enter SERGEANT KITE, followed by THOMAS APPLETREE, COSTAR PEARMAIN, and Mob.

Serg. K. If any gentlemen, soldiers, or others, have a mind to serve his majesty, and pull down the French king; if any 'prentices have severe masters, any children have undutiful parents; if any servants have too little wages; or any husband too much wife, let them repair to the noble Sergeant Kite, at the sign of the Raven, in this good town of Shrewsbury, and they shall receive present relief and entertainment. (Drums beat.) Gentlemen, I don't beat my drums here to insnare or inveigle any man; for you must know, gentlemen, that I am a man of honour: besides, I don't beat up for common soldiers; no, I list only grenadiers—grenadiers, gentlemen. Pray, gentlemen, observe this cap; this is the cap of honour! It dubs a man a gentleman in the drawing of a trigger; and he that has the good fortune to be born six feet high was born to be a great man.—Sir, will you give me leave to try this cap upon your head? (To Cost.)

Cost. Is there no harm in't? Won't the cap list me?

Serg. K. No, no; no more than I can. Come, let me see how it becomes you.

Cost. Are you sure there be no conjuration in it? no gunpowder plot upon me?

Serg. K. No, no, friend; don't fear, man.

Cost. My mind misgives me plaguily. Let me see it. (Going to put it on.) It smells woundily of sweat and brimstone. Smell, Tummas.

Tho. Ay, wauns! does it.

Cost. Pray, Sergeant, what writing is this upon the face of it?

Serg. K. The crown, or the bed of honour.

Cost. Pray now, what may be that same bed of honour?

Serg. K. Oh! a mighty large bed! bigger by half than the great bed at Ware; ten thousand people may lie in it together, and never feel one another.

Cost. My wife and I would do well to lie in't. But do folk sleep sound in this same bed of honour?

Serg. K. Sound! ay, so sound that they never wake. [there.

Cost. Wauns! I wish again that my wife lay

Serg. K. Say you so? Then I find, brother—

Cost. Brother! hold there, friend; I am no kindred to you that I know of yet. Lookye, Sergeant; no coaxing, no wheedling, d'ye see. If I have a mind to list, why so; if not, why 'tis not so: therefore, take your cap and your brothership back again, for I am not disposed at this present writing. No coaxing, no brothering me, faith!

Serg. K. I coax! I wheedle! I'm above it, sir: I have served twenty campaigns; but, sir, you talk well, and I must own that you are a man every inch of you; a pretty, young, sprightly fellow! I love a fellow with a spirit; but I scorn to coax; 'tis base! though I must say, that never in my life have I seen a man better built. How firm and strong he treads! he steps like a castle! but I scorn to wheedle any man. Come, honest lad! will you take share of a pot?

Cost. Nay, for that matter, I'll spend my penny with the best he that wears a head; that is, begging your pardon, sir, and in a fair way.

Serg. K. Give me your hand then; and now, gentlemen, I have no more to say than this; here's a purse of gold, and there is a tub of humming ale at my quarters; 'tis the king's money and the king's drink; he's a generous king, and loves his subjects. I hope, gentlemen, you won't refuse the king's

Mob. No, no, no. [health?

Serg. K. Huzza, then! huzza for the king and the honour of Shropshire.

Mob. Huzza!

Serg. K. Beat drum.

[Exeunt shouting; the drum beating the grenadiers' march.]

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME.

Capt. P. By the grenadiers' march that should be my drum, and by that shout it should beat with success. Let me see—four o'clock. (Looking on his watch.) At ten yesterday morning I left London; pretty smart riding, but nothing to the fatigue of recruiting.

Enter SERGEANT KITE.

Serg. K. Welcome to Shrewsbury, noble Captain; from the banks of the Danube to the Severn side, noble Captain, you're welcome.

Capt. P. A very elegant reception, indeed, Mr. Kite; I find you are fairly entered into your recruiting strain: pray what success?

Serg. K. I've been here a week, and I have recruited five.

Capt. P. Five! pray what are they?

Serg. K. I have listed the strong man of Kent, the king of the gipsies, a Scotch pedlar, a scoundrel attorney, and a Welsh parson.

Capt. P. An attorney! wert thou mad? list a lawyer! discharge him, discharge him, this minute.

Serg. K. Why, sir?

Capt. P. Because I will have nobody in my company that can write. I say this minute discharge him.

Serg. K. And what shall I do with the parson?

Capt. P. Can he write?

Serg. K. Hum! he plays rarely upon the fiddle.

Capt. P. Keep him by all means. But how stands the country affected? Were the people pleased with the news of my coming to town?

Serg. K. Sir, the mob are so pleased with your honour, and the justices and the better sort of people are so delighted with me, that we shall soon do your business. But, sir, you have got a recruit here that you little think of.

Capt. P. Who?

Serg. K. One that you beat up for the last time you were in the country. You remember your old friend Molly, at the Castle?

Capt. P. She's not breeding I hope.

Serg. K. She was brought to bed yesterday.

Capt. P. Kite, you must father the child.

Serg. K. And so her friends will oblige me to marry the mother.

Capt. P. If they should, we'll take her with us; she can wash, you know, and make a bed upon occasion. [already.]

Serg. K. But your honour knows I am married

Capt. P. To how many?

Serg. K. I can't tell readily. I have set them down here upon the back of the muster-roll. (Draws it out.) Let me see: imprimis—Mrs. Shely Snikereyes, she sells potatoes upon Ormond-key, in Dublin; Peggy Guzzle, the brandy-woman, at the Horse-guards, at Whitehall; Dolly Waggon, the carrier's daughter, at Hull; Ma'amselle Van Bottomflat, at the Buss; then Jenny Oakum, the ship-carpenter's widow at Portsmouth; but I don't reckon upon her, for she was married, at the same time, to two lieutenants of marines, and a man-of-war's boatswain.

Capt. P. A full company! You have named five; come, make half a dozen. Kite, is the child a boy

Serg. K. A chopping boy. [or a girl?

Capt. P. Then set the mother down in your list, and the boy in mine; and now go comfort the wench in the straw.

Serg. K. I shall, sir.

Capt. P. But hold; have you made any use of your German doctor's habit since you arrived?

Serg. K. Yes, yes, sir; and my fame's all about the country for the most faithful fortune-teller that ever told a lie. I was obliged to let my landlord into the secret, for the convenience of keeping it so; but he is an honest fellow, and will be faithful to any roguery that is trusted to him. This device, sir, will get you men, and me money; which I think is all we want at present. But yonder comes your friend, Mr. Worthy. Has your honour any further commands?

Capt. P. None at present. [Exit Serg. Kite.] 'Tis indeed the picture of Worthy, but the life's departed.

Enter WORTHY.

What! arms across, Worthy? methinks you should hold them open when a friend's so near. The man has got the vapours in his ears, I believe. I must expel this melancholy spirit.

Spleen, thou worst of fiends below,

Fly, I conjure thee, by this magic blow.

[Slaps Worthy on the shoulder.]

Wor. Plume! my dear Captain! returned; safe and sound, I hope.

Capt. P. You see I have lost neither leg nor arm; then for my inside, 'tis neither troubled with sympathies nor antipathies; and I have an excellent stomach for roast beef.

Wor. Thou art a happy fellow; once I was so.

Capt. P. What ails thee, man? no inundations or earthquakes in Wales, I hope? Has your father rose from the dead, and resumed his estate?

Wor. No.

Capt. P. Then you are married, surely?

Wor. No.

Capt. P. Then you are mad, or turning methodist?

Wor. Come, I must out with it. Your once gay, roving friend, is dwindled into an obsequious, thoughtful, romantic, constant coxcomb.

Capt. P. And pray what is all this for?

Wor. For a woman.

Capt. P. Shake hands, brother. If thou go to that, behold me as obsequious, as thoughtful, as constant a coxcomb as your worship.

Wor. For whom?

Capt. P. For a regiment. But for a woman! 'sdeath! I have been constant to fifteen at a time, but never melancholy for one. Pray who is this wonderful Helen?

Wor. A Helen indeed! not to be won under ten years' siege; as great a beauty, and as great a jilt.

Capt. P. But who is she? do I know her?

Wor. Very well.

Capt. P. That's impossible. I know no woman that will hold out a ten years' siege.

Wor. What think you of Melinda?

Capt. P. Melinda! you must not think to surmount her pride by humility. Would you bring her to better thoughts of you, she must be reduced to a meaner opinion of herself. Let me see; the very first thing that I would do, should be to make love to her chambermaid. Suppose we lampooned all the pretty women in town, and left her out; or, what if we made a ball, and forgot to invite her, with one or two of the ugliest?

Wor. These would be mortifications, I must confess; but we live in such a precise, dull place, that we can have no balls, no lampoons, no—

Capt. P. What! no young ones? and so many recruiting officers in town! I thought 'twas a maxim among them to leave as many recruits in the country as they carried out.

Wor. Nobody doubts your good will, noble Captain; witness our friend Molly at the Castle; there have been tears in town about that business, Captain.

Capt. P. I hope Sylvia has not heard of it.

Wor. Oh! sir, have you thought of her? I began to fancy you had forgot poor Sylvia.

Capt. P. Your affairs had quite put mine out of my head. 'Tis true, Sylvia and I had once agreed, could we have adjusted preliminaries; but I am resolved never to bind myself to a woman for my whole life, till I know whether I shall like her company for half an hour. If people would but try one another before they engaged, it would prevent all those elopements, divorces, and the devil knows what. [stick to say that.]

Wor. Nay, for that matter, the town did not

Capt. P. I hate country-towns for that reason. If your town has a dishonourable thought of Sylvia, it deserves to be burned to the ground. I love Sylvia, I admire her frank, generous disposition; in short, were I once a general, I would marry her.

Wor. Faith, you have reason; for were you but a corporal, she would marry you. But my Melinda coquettes it with every fellow she sees; I'll lay fifty pounds she makes love to you. [if she does.]

Capt. P. I'll lay you a hundred that I return it
Re-enter SERGEANT KITE.

Serg. K. Captain, Captain! a word in your ear.

Capt. P. You may speak out; here are none but friends.

Serg. K. You know, sir, that you sent me to comfort the good woman in the straw, Mrs. Molly; my wife, Mr. Worthy.

Wor. O, ho! very well. I wish you joy, Mr. Kite.

Serg. K. Your worship very well may; for I have got both a wife and child in half an hour. But, as I was saying, you sent me to comfort Mrs. Molly,—my wife, I mean; but what do you think, sir? she was better comforted before I came.

Capt. P. As how?

Serg. K. Why, sir, a footman in livery brought her ten guineas to buy her baby-clothes.

Capt. P. Who, in the name of wonder, could send them? [Sylvia.]

Serg. K. Nay, sir, I must whisper that; Mrs.

Capt. P. Sylvia! generous creature!

Wor. Sylvia! impossible!

Serg. K. Here are the guineas, sir: I took the gold as part of my wife's portion. Nay, further, sir; she sent word the child should be taken all imaginable care of, and that she intended to stand godmother. The same footman, as I was coming to you with the news, called after me, and told me his lady would speak with me: I went; and upon hearing that you were come to town, she gave me half-a-guinea for the news, and ordered me to tell you that Justice Balance, her father, who is just come out of the country, would be glad to see you.

Capt. P. There's a girl for you, Worthy. Is there anything of woman in this? No; 'tis noble, generous, manly friendship. The common jealousy of her sex, which is nothing but their avarice of pleasure, she despises; and can part with the lover, though she dies for the man. Come, Worthy, where's the best wine, for there I'll quarter?

Wor. Horton has a fresh pipe of choice Barcelona, which I would not let him pierce before, because I reserved it for your welcome to town.

Capt. P. Let's away, then: Mr. Kite, go to the lady, with my humble service, and tell her I shall only refresh a little, and wait upon her.

Wor. Hold, Kite! have you seen the other recruiting captain?

Serg. K. No, sir; I'd have you to know I don't keep such company. [Exit.]

Capt. P. Another! who is he?

Wor. My rival, in the first place, and the most unaccountable fellow—but I'll tell you more as we go. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment.

Enter MELINDA and SYLVIA.

Mel. Welcome to town, cousin Sylvia. (They salute.) I envied you your retreat in the country; for Shrewsbury, methinks, and all your heads of shires, are the most irregular places for living: here we have smoke, noise, scandal, affectation, and pretension; in short, every thing to give the spleen, and nothing to divert it; then the air is intolerable.

Syl. Oh, madam! I have heard the town commended for its air.

Mel. But you don't consider, Sylvia, how long I have lived in't; for I can assure you, that to a lady the least nice in her constitution, no air can be good above half a year. Change of air I take to be the most agreeable of any variety in life.

Syl. As you say, cousin Melinda, there are several sorts of airs.

Mel. Psha! I talk only of the air we breathe, or more properly of that we taste. Have not you, Sylvia, found a vast difference in the taste of airs?

Syl. Pray, cousin, are not vapours a sort of air? Taste air! you might as well tell me I may feed upon air! But, pr'ythee, my dear Melinda! don't put on such an air to me. Your education and mine were just the same; and I remember the time when we never troubled our heads about air, but when the sharp air from the Welsh mountains made our fingers ache in a cold morning, at the boarding-school.

Mel. Our education, cousin, was the same; but our temperaments had nothing alike; you have the constitution of a horse.

Syl. So far as to be troubled neither with spleen, cholic, nor vapours. I need no salts for my stomach, no hartshorn for my head, nor wash for my complexion; I can gallop all the morning after the hunting horn, and all the evening after a fiddle.

Mel. I am told your Captain is come to town.

Syl. Ay, Melinda, he is come; and I'll take care he sha'n't go without a companion.

Mel. You are certainly mad, cousin.

Syl. And there's a pleasure in being mad

Which none but madmen know.

Mel. Thou poor, romantic Quixote! hast thou the vanity to imagine that a young, sprightly officer, that rambles over half the globe in half a year, can confine his thoughts to the little daughter of a country justice, in an obscure part of the world?

Syl. Psha! what care I for his thoughts? I should not like a man with confined thoughts; it shews a narrowness of soul.

Mel. O my conscience, Sylvia, hadst thou been a man, thou hadst been the greatest rake in Christendom.

Syl. I should have endeavoured to know the world. But now I think on't, how stands your affair with Mr. Worthy?

Mel. He's my aversion.

Syl. Vapours!

Mel. What do you say, madam?

Syl. I say that you should not use that honest fellow so inhumanly; he's a gentleman of parts and fortune; and besides that, he's my Plume's friend! and by all that's sacred, if you don't use him better, I shall expect satisfaction.

Mel. Satisfaction! you begin to fancy yourself a man in good earnest. But to be plain with you, I like Worthy the worse for being so intimate with your Captain; for I take him to be a loose, idle, ill-mannerly coxcomb.

Syl. Oh, madam! you never saw him perhaps since you were mistress of twenty thousand pounds; you only knew him when you were capitulating with Worthy for a settlement, which perhaps might encourage him to be a little loose and unmannerly.

Mel. What do you mean, madam? [with you.]

Syl. My meaning needs no interpretation, madam.

Mel. Better it had, madam; for, methinks, you are too plain.

Syl. If you mean the plainness of my person, I think your ladyship's as plain as me to the full.

Mel. Were I sure of that, I would be glad to take up with a rakish officer as you do.

Syl. Again! lookye, madam, you are in your own house. [excused you.]

Mel. And if you had kept in your's I should have

Syl. Don't be troubled, madam; I sha'n't desire to have my visit returned. [this the better.]

Mel. The sooner, therefore, you make an end of

Syl. I am easily persuaded to follow my inclinations; and so, madam, your servant. [Exit.]

Mel. Saucy thing!

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. What's the matter, madam?

Mel. Did not you see the proud nothing, how she swelled upon the arrival of her fellow?

Lucy. I don't believe she has seen him yet.

Mel. Nor sha'n't, if I can help it. Let me see—I have it—bring me pen and ink: hold! I'll go write in my closet.

Lucy. An answer to this letter, I hope, madam. (Presents a letter.)

Mel. Who sent it?

Lucy. Your captain, madam.

Mel. He's a fool, and I'm tired of him: send it back unopened.

Lucy. The messenger's gone, madam.

Mel. Then how should I send an answer? Call him back immediately, while I go write. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.—An Apartment.

Enter JUSTICE BALANCE and CAPTAIN PLUME.

Just. B. Lookye, Captain; give us but blood for our money, and you sha'n't want men. Ads my life! Captain, get us but another marshal of France, and I'll go myself for a soldier. [daughter?]

Capt. P. Pray, Mr. Balance, how does your fair

Just. B. Ah, Captain! what is my daughter to a marshal of France? We're upon a nobler subject; I want to have a particular description of the last battle.

Capt. P. The battle, sir, was a very pretty battle as any one should desire to see; but we were all so intent upon victory, that we never minded the battle: all that I know of the matter is, our general commanded us to beat the enemy, and we did so; and, if he pleases but to say the word, we'll do it again. But pray, sir, how does Mrs. Sylvia?

Just. B. Still upon Sylvia! for shame, Captain! you are engaged already—wedded to the war; victory is your mistress, and 'tis below a soldier to think of any other. [Mr. Balance.]

Capt. P. As a mistress I confess, but as a friend,

Just. B. Come, come, Captain; never mince the matter; would not you deceive my daughter if you could? [ceived.]

Capt. P. How, sir? I hope she is not to be de-

Just. B. Faith, but she is, sir; and any woman in England of her age and complexion, by a man of your youth and person. Lookye, Captain; once I was young, and once an officer, as you are, and I can guess at your thoughts now by what mine were then; and I remember very well that I would have given one of my legs, to have deluded the daughter of an old country gentleman as like me as I was then like you.

Capt. P. But, sir, was that country gentleman your friend and benefactor?

Just. B. Not much of that. [yours, sir, that—]

Capt. B. There the comparison breaks: the fa-

Just. B. Pho, pho! I hate set speeches: if I have done you any service, Captain, it was to please myself. I love thee; and, if I could part with my girl, you should have her as soon as any young fellow I know; but I hope you have more honour than to quit the service, and she more prudence than to follow the camp: but she's at her own disposal; she has ten thousand pounds in her pocket, and so—Sylvia! Sylvia! (Calls.)

Enter SYLVIA.

Syl. There are some letters, sir, come by the post from London; I left them upon the table in your closet.

Just. B. And here is a gentleman from abroad. (Presents Capt. P.) Captain, you'll excuse me; I'll go and read my letters, and wait on you. [Exit.]

Syl. Sir, you are welcome to England.

Capt. P. You are indebted to me a welcome, madam; since the hopes of receiving it from this fair hand was the principal cause of my seeing England.

Syl. I have often heard that soldiers were sincere; shall I venture to believe public report?

Capt. P. You may, when 'tis backed by private assurance; for I swear, madam, by the honour of my profession, that whatever dangers I went upon, it was with the hope of making myself more worthy of your esteem; and, if ever I had thoughts of preserving my life, 'twas for the pleasure of dying at your feet.

Syl. Well, well; you shall die at my feet, or where you will; but you know, sir, there is a certain will and testament to be made beforehand.

Capt. P. My will, madam, is made already, and there it is; and if you please to open this paper, which was drawn the evening before our last battle, you will find whom I left my heir.

Syl. Mrs. Sylvia Balance. (Opens the will and reads.) Well, Captain, this is a handsome and a substantial compliment; but I can assure you I am much better pleased with the bare knowledge of your intention, than I should have been in the possession of your legacy: but, methinks, sir, you should have left something to your little boy at the Castle.

Capt. P. That's home. (Aside.) My little boy! lackaday, madam! that alone may convince you 'twas none of mine: why, the girl, madam, is my sergeant's wife; and so the poor creature gave out that I was the father, in hopes that my friends might support her in case of necessity—that was all, madam. My boy! no, no, no!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, my master has received some ill news from London, and desires to speak with you immediately; and he begs the Captain's pardon that he can't wait upon him as he promised. [Exit.]

Capt. P. Ill news! heaven avert it! nothing could touch me nearer than to see that generous worthy gentleman afflicted. I'll leave you to comfort him; and be assured that if my life and fortune can be any way serviceable to the father of my Sylvia, he shall freely command both. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment.

Enter JUSTICE BALANCE and SYLVIA.

Syl. Whilst there is life there is hope, sir: perhaps my brother may recover.

Just. B. We have but little reason to expect it; the doctor acquaints me here, that before this comes to my hands, he fears I shall have no son. Poor Owen! but the decree is just: I was pleased with the death of my father, because he left me an estate, and now I am punished with the loss of an heir to inherit mine. I must now look upon you as the only hopes of my family, and I expect that the augmentation of your fortune will give you fresh thoughts and new prospects.

Syl. My desire in being punctual in my obedience, requires that you would be plain in your commands, sir.

Just. B. The death of your brother makes you sole heiress to my estate, which you know is about two thousand pounds a year: this fortune gives you a fair claim to quality and a title: you must set a just value upon yourself; and, in plain terms, think no more of Captain Plume. [sir.]

Syl. You have often commended the gentleman,

Just. B. And I do so still: he's a very pretty fellow; but though I liked him well enough for a bare son-in-law, I don't approve of him for an heir to my estate and family: ten thousand pounds indeed I might trust in his hands, and it might do the young fellow a kindness; but, ods my life! two thousand pounds a year would ruin him, quite turn his brain. A captain of foot worth two thousand pounds a year! 'tis a prodigy in nature!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here's one with a letter below for your worship; but he will deliver it into no hands but your own.

Just. B. Come, shew me the messenger.

[Exit with Servant.]

Syl. Make the dispute between love and duty, and I am Prince Prettyman exactly. If my brother dies—ah, poor brother! if he lives—ah, poor sister! It is bad both ways. I'll try it again. Follow my own inclinations and break my father's heart, or obey his commands and break my own! Worse and worse. Suppose I take it thus: a moderate fortune, a pretty fellow, and a pad; or a fine estate, a coach and six, and an ass. That will never do neither.

Re-enter JUSTICE BALANCE.

Just. B. Put four horses to the coach. (To a Servant without.) Ho, Sylvia!

Syl. Sir. [died?

Just. B. How old were you when your mother

Syl. So young that I don't remember I ever had one; and you have been so careful, so indulgent to me since, that indeed I never wanted one.

Just. B. Have I ever denied you anything you

Syl. Never, that I remember. [asked of me?

Just. B. Then, Sylvia, I must beg that, once in your life, you will grant me a favour.

Syl. Why should you question it, sir?

Just. B. I don't; but I would rather counsel than command. I don't propose this with the authority of a parent, but as the advice of your friend, that you would take the coach this moment and go into the country.

Syl. Does this advice, sir, proceed from the contents of the letter you received just now?

Just. B. No matter; I will be with you in three or four days, and then give you my reasons. But before you go, I expect you will make me one so—

Syl. Propose the thing, sir. [lemn promise.

Just. B. That you will never dispose of yourself to any man without my consent.

Syl. I promise.

Just. B. Very well; and to be even with you, I promise I never will dispose of you without your own consent: and so, Sylvia, the coach is ready. Farewell. Now she's gone, I'll examine the contents of this letter a little nearer. (Reads.) "Sir, my intimacy with Mr. Worthy has drawn a secret from him, that he had from his friend, Captain Plume; and my friendship and relation to your family oblige me to give you timely notice of it. The Captain has dishonourable designs upon my cousin Sylvia. Evils of this nature are more easily prevented than amended; and that you would immediately send my cousin into the country, is the advice of, sir, your humble servant, MELINDA."—Why, the devil's in the young fellows of this age; they are ten times worse than they were in my time. Hang it! I can fetch down a woodcock or a snipe, and why not a hat and cockade? I have a case of good pistols, and have a good mind to try.

Enter WORTHY.

Worthy! your servant. [news.

Wor. I'm sorry, sir, to be the messenger of ill

Just. B. I apprehend it, sir; you have heard that my son Owen is past recovery.

Wor. My letters say he's dead, sir.

Just. B. He's happy, and I am satisfied: the stroke of heaven I can bear; but injuries from men, Mr. Worthy, are not so easily supported.

Wor. I hope, sir, you're under no apprehensions of wrong from anybody.

Just. B. You know I ought to be.

Wor. You wrong my honour in believing I could know anything to your prejudice, without resenting it as much as you should.

Just. B. This letter, sir, which I tear in pieces to conceal the person that sent it, informs me that Plume has a design upon Sylvia, and that you are privy to it.

Wor. Nay, then, sir, I must do myself justice, and endeavour to find out the author. (Takes up a piece.) Sir, I know the hand; and if you refuse to discover the contents, Melinda shall tell me. (Going)

Just. B. Hold, sir; the contents I have told you already, only with this circumstance, that her intimacy with Mr. Worthy had drawn the secret from him.

Wor. Her intimacy with me! Dear sir, let me pick up the pieces of this letter; 'twill give me such a power over her pride to have her own an intimacy under her hand. This was the luckiest accident. (Gathers up the letter.) The aspersion, sir, was nothing but malice; the effect of a little quarrel between her and Sylvia.

Just. B. Are you sure of that, sir?

Wor. Her maid gave me the history of part of the battle just now, as she overheard it. But I hope, sir, your daughter has suffered nothing upon the account?

Just. B. No, no, poor girl! she's so afflicted with the news of her brother's death, that to avoid company, she begged leave to go into the country.

Wor. And is she gone?

Just. B. I could not refuse her, she was so pressing; the coach went from the door the minute before you came.

Wor. So pressing to be gone, sir? I find her fortune will give her the same airs with Melinda; and then Plume and I may laugh at one another.

Just. B. Like enough; women are as subject to pride as men are; and why mayn't great women, as well as great men, forget their old acquaintance? But come, where's this young fellow? I love him so well, it would break the heart of me to think him a rascal. I am glad my daughter's fairly off, though. (Aside.) Where does the Captain quarter?

Wor. At Horton's: I am to meet him there two hours hence, and we should be glad of your company.

Just. B. Your pardon, dear Worthy. I must allow a day or two to the death of my son; afterwards, I'm your's over a bottle, or how you will.

Wor. Sir, I'm your humble servant. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter SERGEANT KITE, with COSTAR PEARMAIN in one hand, and THOMAS APPLETREE in the other, drunk.

Serg. K. (Sings.) Our 'prentice Tom, may now refuse

To wipe his scoundrel master's shoes,
For now he's free to sing and play,
Over the hills and far away.—Over, &c.

(The Mob sing the Chorus.)

We shall lead more happy lives,
By getting rid of brats and wives,
That scold and brawl both night and day,
Over the hills and far away.—Over, &c.

Hey, boys! thus we soldiers live! drink, sing, dance, play; we live, as one should say—we live—'tis impossible to tell how we live; we are all princes; why—why, you are a king—you are an emperor, and I'm a prince; now, a'n't we?

Tho. No, sergeant, I'll be no emperor.

Serg. K. No?

Tho. I'll be a justice of peace.

Serg. K. A justice of peace, man?

Tho. Ay, wauns, will I.

Serg. K. Done; you are a justice of peace, and you are a king. (To Cos.) And I am a duke, and a rum duke, a'n't I?

Cos. Ay, but I'll be no king.

Serg. K. What then?

Cos. I'll be a queen.

Serg. K. A queen?

[of 'em all.

Cos. Ay, of England; that's greater than any king

Serg. K. Bravely said, faith! huzza for the queen! (Huzza.) But harkye! you Mr. Justice and you Mr. Queen, did you ever see the king's picture?

Cos. Tho. No, no, no.

Serg. K. I wonder at that; I have two of 'em set in gold, and as like his majesty—bless the mark! see here, they are set in gold. (Takes two broad pieces out of his pocket, gives one to each.)

Tho. The wonderful works of nature!

Cos. What's this written about? here's a posy, I believe. Ca-ro-lus! what's that, Sergeant?

Serg. K. O! Carolus! why, Carolus is Latin for king George; that's all.

Cos. 'Tis a fine thing to be a scollard, Sergeant, will you part with this? I'll buy it on you, if it come within the compass of a crown.

Serg. K. A crown! never talk of buying; 'tis the same thing among friends, you know; I'll present them to ye both: you shall give me as good a thing. Put 'em up, and remember your old friend when I am over the hills and far away. (They sing.)

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME, singing.

*Over the hills, and over the main,
To Flanders, Portugal, or Spain;
The king commands, and we'll obey,
Over the hills and far away.*

Come on, my men of mirth, away with it; I'll make one among ye. Who are these hearty lads?

Serg. K. Off with your hats! 'ounds! off with your hats! This is the Captain, the Captain.

Tho. We have seen captains afore now, mun.

Cos. Ay, and lieutenant-captains too. 'Sflesh! I'll keep on my nab.

Tho. And I'se scarcely d'off mine for any captain in England. My veather's a freeholder.

Capt. P. Who are those jolly lads, Sergeant?

Serg. K. A couple of honest, brave fellows, that are willing to serve the king. I have entertained 'em just now as volunteers under your honour's command.

Capt. P. And good entertainment they shall have: volunteers are the men I want; those are the men fit to make soldiers, captains, generals.

Cos. Wauns, Tummas! what's this? Are you listed?

Tho. 'Sflesh! not I. Are you Costar?

Cos. Wauns! not I. [good jest, i'faith.

Serg. K. What! not listed? Ha, ha, ha! a very

Cos. Come, Tummas, we'll go home.

Tho. Ay, ay, come.

Serg. K. Home! for shame, gentlemen! behave yourselves better before your captain. Dear Tummas! honest Costar!

Tho. No, no, we'll be gone.

Serg. K. Nay, then, I command you to stay. I place you both sentinels in this place for two hours; to watch the motion of St. Mary's clock you, and you the motion of St. Chad's; and he that dares stir from his post till he be relieved, shall have my sword in his guts the next minute.

Capt. P. What's the matter, Sergeant? I am afraid you are too rough with these gentlemen.

Serg. K. I'm too mild, sir; they disobey command, sir; and one of 'em should be shot, for an example to the other.

Cos. Shot, Tummas!

Capt. P. Come, gentlemen, what's the matter?

Tho. We don't know; the noble Sergeant is pleas'd to be in a passion, sir; but—

Serg. K. They disobey command; they deny their being listed.

Tho. Nay, Sergeant, we don't downright deny it neither; that we dare not do for fear of being shot; but we humbly conceive, in a civil way, and begging your worship's pardon, that we may go home.

Capt. P. That's easily known. Have either of you received any of the king's money?

Cos. Not a brass farthing, sir.

Serg. K. They have each of them received one-and-twenty shillings, and 'tis now in their pockets.

Cos. Wauns! if I have a penny in my pocket but a bent sixpence, I'll be content to be listed, and shot into the bargain.

Tho. And I. Look ye here, sir.

Cos. Nothing but the king's picture, that the Sergeant gave me just now.

Serg. K. See there, a guinea, one-and-twenty shillings: t'other has the fellow on't.

Capt. P. The case is plain, gentlemen; the goods are found upon you; those pieces of gold are worth one-and-twenty shillings each.

Cos. So it seems that Carolus is one-and-twenty shillings in Latin. [listed.

Tho. 'Tis the same thing in Greek, for we are

Cos. 'Sflesh, but we a'n't, Tummas. I desire to be carried before the mayor, Captain. (Capt. P. and Serg. K. whisper.)

Capt. P. 'Twill never do, Kite; your d—tricks will ruin me at last. I won't lose the fellows though, if I can help it. (Apart.) Well, gentlemen, there must be some trick in this; my Sergeant offers to take his oath that you are fairly listed.

Tho. Why, Captain, we know that you soldiers have more liberty of conscience than other folks; but for me, or neighbour Costar here, to take such an oath, 'twould be downright perjury.

Capt. P. Lookye, rascal! you villain! if I find that you have imposed upon these two honest fellows, I'll trample you to death, you dog. Come, how was't?

Tho. Nay, then we'll speak. Your Sergeant, as you say, is a rogue, an't like your worship, begging your worship's pardon; and—

Cos. Nay, Tummas, let me speak; you know I can read. And so, sir, he gave us those two pieces of money, for pictures of the king, by way of a present.

Capt. P. How! by way of a present? the son of a —! I'll teach him to abuse honest fellows like you. Scoundrel! rogue! villain! (Beats off the Sergeant, and follows.)

Tho. Cos. O brave, noble Captain; huzza! A brave Captain, 'faith.

Cos. Now, Tummas, Carolus is Latin for a beating. This is the bravest captain I ever saw.—Wauns! I've a month's mind to go with him.

Re-enter CAPTAIN PLUME.

Capt. P. A dog, to abuse two such honest fellows as you! Lookye, gentlemen, I love a pretty fellow; I come among you as an officer to list soldiers, not as a kidnapper to steal slaves.

Cos. Mind that, Tummas.

Capt. P. I desire no man to go with me but as I went myself: I went a volunteer, as you or you may do; for a little time carried a musket, and now I command a company.

Tho. Mind that, Costar; a sweet gentleman!

Capt. P. 'Tis true, gentlemen, I might take advantage of you: the king's money was in your pockets; my sergeant was ready to take his oath you were listed; but I scorn to do a base thing: you are both of you at your liberty.

Cos. Thank you, noble Captain. Ecod! I can't find in my heart to leave him, he talks so finely.

Tho. Ay, Costar, would he always hold in this mind?

Capt. P. Come, my lads, one thing more I'll tell you: you're both young, tight fellows, and the army is the place to make you men for ever: every man has his lot, and you have yours; what think you now of a purse of French gold out of a monsieur's pocket, after you have dash'd out his brains with the butt end of your firelock, eh?

Cos. Wauns! I'll have it. Captain, give me a shilling; I'll follow you to the end of the world.

Tho. Nay, dear Costar! do'na: be advis'd.

Capt. P. Here, my hero, there are two guineas for thee, as earnest of what I'll do further for thee.

Tho. Do'na take it; do'na, dear Costar!

Cos. I wull—I wull. Wauns! my mind mis-gives me that I shall be a captain myself. I take your money, sir, and now I am a gentleman.

Capt. P. Give me thy hand; and now you and I will travel the world o'er, and command it wherever we tread. Bring your friend with you if you can. (Apart.)

Cos. Well, Tummas, must we part?

Tho. No, Costar, I cannot leave thee. Come, Captain, I'll e'en go along, too; and if you have two honest, simpler lads in your company than we two have been, I'll say no more.

Capt. P. Here, my lad. (Gives him money.) Now

Tho. Tummas Appletree, [your name?

Capt. P. And your's?

Cos. Costar Pearmain.

Capt. P. Well said, Costar! Born where?

Tho. Both in Herefordshire.

Capt. P. Very well. Courage, my lads. Now we'll (Sings.)

*Over the hills and far away,
Courage, boys, it is one to ten,
But we return all gentlemen;
While conq'ring colours we display,
Over the hills and far away.*

Re-enter SERGEANT KITE.

Kite, take care of 'em. [Exit.]

Serg. K. A'n't you a couple of pretty fellows now? Here you have complained to the Captain, I am to be turned out, and one of you will be sergeant. Which of you is to have my halberd?

Cos. Tho. I.

Serg. K. So you shall, in your guts. March, you sons of— [Exit, beating them off.]

ACT III.—SCENE I.—The Market-place.

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME and WORTHY.

Wor. I cannot forbear admiring the equality of our two fortunes: we love two ladies; they meet us half way; and just as we were upon the point of leaping into their arms, fortune drops into their laps, pride possesses their hearts, and away they run.

Capt. P. And leave us here to mourn upon the shore, a couple of poor, melancholy monsters.—What shall we do?

Wor. I have a trick for mine: the letter, you know, and the fortune-teller.

Capt. P. And I have a trick for mine.

Wor. What is't?

Capt. P. I'll never think of her again.

Wor. No!

Capt. P. No; I think myself above administering to the pride of any woman, were she worth twelve thousand a year; and I ha'n't the vanity to believe I shall ever gain a lady worth twelve hundred. The generous, good-natur'd Sylvia, when poor, I admire; but the haughty and scornful Sylvia, with her fortune, I despise. What! sneak out of town, and not so much as a word, a line, a compliment! 'Sdeath! how far off does she live? I'll go and break her windows.

Wor. Ha, ha, ha! ay, and the window-bars, too, to come at her. Come, come, friend, no more of your rough military airs.

Enter SERGEANT KITE.

Serg. K. Captain, Captain! sir, look yonder, she's a-coming this way. 'Tis the prettiest, cleanest, little tit—

Capt. P. Now, Worthy, to shew you how much I'm in love; here she comes. But, Kite, what is that great country fellow with her?

Serg. K. I can't tell, sir.

Enter ROSE, followed by her brother BULLOCK, with chickens in a basket on her arm.

Rose. Buy chickens, young and tender chickens, young and tender chickens.

Capt. P. Here! you chickens.

Rose. Who calls?

Capt. P. Come hither, pretty maid!

Rose. Will you please to buy, sir?

Wor. Yes, child, we'll both buy.

Capt. P. Nay, Worthy, that's not fair; market for yourself. Come child, I'll buy all your stock.

Rose. Then it's all at your service. (Curtsies.)

Wor. Then must I shift for myself I find. [Exit.]

Capt. P. Let me see; young and tender you say?

Rose. As ever you tasted in your life, sir.

Capt. P. Come, I must examine your basket, my dear. [as good as any in the market.]

Rose. Nay, for that matter, I warrant my ware is Capt. P. And I'll buy it all, child, were it ten

Rose. Sir, I can furnish you. [times more.]

Capt. P. Come, then, we won't quarrel about the price; they're fine birds. Pray what's your name, pretty creature?

Rose. Rose, sir. My father is a farmer within three short miles o'the town: we keep this market;

I sell chickens, eggs, and butter; and my brother Bullock, there, sells corn.

Bul. Come, sister, haste, we shall be late home. (Whistles about the stage.)

Capt. P. Kite! (Tips him the wink, he returns it.) Pretty Mrs. Rose, you have—let me see, how many?

Rose. A dozen, sir; and they are richly worth a crown.

Bul. Come, Rouse; I sold fifty strake of barley to-day in half this time; but you will higgie and higgie for a penny more than the commodity is worth.

Rose. What's that to you, oaf? (Kite and Bullock talk apart.) I can make as much out of a groat as you can out of fourpence, I'm sure. The gentleman bids fair; and when I meet with a chapman, I know how to make the best of him. And so, sir, I say for a crown-piece the bargain's your's.

Capt. P. Here's a guinea, my dear.

Rose. I can't change your money, sir.

Capt. P. Indeed, indeed, but you can. My lodging is hard by, chicken; and we'll make change there. [Exit, Rose follows him.]

Serg. K. So, sir, as I was telling you, I have seen one of these hussars eat up a ravelin for his breakfast, and afterwards picked his teeth with a palisado.

Bul. Ay, you soldiers see very strange things: but pray, sir, what is a rabelin?

Serg. K. Why, 'tis like a modern minced pie; but the crust is confounded hard, and the plums are somewhat hard of digestion.

Bul. Then your palisado, pray what may he be? Come, Rouse, pray ha' done.

Serg. K. Your palisado is a pretty sort of bodkin, about the thickness of my leg.

Bul. That's a fib, I believe. (Aside.) Eh! where's Rouse? Rouse, Rouse! 'Sflesh! where's Rouse?

Serg. K. She's gone with the Captain. [gone?]

Bul. The Captain! wauns! there's no pressing of Serg. K. But there is sure. [women sure?]

Bul. If the Captain should press Rouse, I should be ruined. Which way went she? Oh! the devil take your rabelins and palisadoes. [Exit.]

Serg. K. You shall be better acquainted with them, honest Bullock, or I shall miss of my aim.

Re-enter WORTHY.

Wor. Why thou art the most useful fellow in nature to your Captain; admirable in your way, I find. [will say it.]

Serg. K. Yes, sir, I understand my business, I

Wor. How came you so qualified?

Serg. K. You must know, sir, I was born a gipsy, and bred among that crew till I was ten years old; there I learned canting and lying: I was bought from my mother, Cleopatra, by a certain nobleman, for three pistoles; who, liking my beauty, made me his page; there I learned impudence and pimping: I was turned off for wearing my lord's linen, and drinking my lady's ratafia, and turned bailiff's follower; there I learned bullying and swearing: I at last got into the army; and there I learned wenching and drinking; so that if your worship pleases to cast up the whole sum, viz. canting, lying, impudence, pimping, bullying, swearing, drinking, and a halberd, you will find the sum total amount to a recruiting sergeant.

Wor. And pray what induc'd you to turn soldier?

Serg. K. Hunger and ambition. The fears of starving, and hopes of a truncheon, led me to a gentleman with a fair tongue, who loaded me with promises: but, 'gad, it was the lightest load that ever I felt in my life. He promised to advance me; and indeed he did so—to a garret in the Savoy. I asked him, "Why he put me in prison?" He call'd me, "Lying dog!" and said, "I was in a garrison;" and indeed 'tis a garrison that may hold out till doomsday before I should desire to take it again. But here comes Justice Balance.

Re-enter BULLOCK, with JUSTICE BALANCE.

Just. B. Here you, Sergeant! where's your Captain? here's a poor foolish fellow comes clamouring to me with a complaint that your Captain has press'd his sister. Do you know anything of this matter, Worthy?

Wor. I know his sister is gone with Plume to his lodgings, to sell him some chickens.

Just. B. Is that all? the fellow's a fool.

Bul. I know that, an't like your worship; but if your worship pleases to grant me a warrant to bring her before your worship, for fear of the worst. [enough.]

Just. B. Thou'rt mad, fellow; thy sister's safe.

Serg. K. I hope so too. (Aside.)

Wor. Hast thou no more sense, fellow, than to believe that the Captain can list women?

Bul. I know not whether they list them, or what they do with them; but I'm sure they carry as many women as men with them out of the country.

Just. B. But how came you not to go along with your sister?

Bul. Lord, sir! I thought no more of her going than I do of the day I shall die; but this gentleman here, not suspecting any hurt neither, I believe,—you thought no harm, friend, did you? (To Serg. Kite.)

Serg. K. Lackaday, sir, not I; only that I believe I shall marry her to-morrow.

Just. B. I begin to smell powder. (Aside.) Well, friend, but what did that gentleman do with you?

Bul. Why, sir, he entertain'd me with a fine story of a great sea fight between the Hungarians, I think it was, and the wild Irish.

Serg. K. And so, sir, while we were in the heat of the battle, the captain carried off the baggage.

Just. B. Sergeant, go along with this fellow to your Captain; give him my humble service, and desire him to discharge the wench, though he has listed her. [have another man in her place.]

Bul. Ay, and if she ben't free for that, he shall Serg. K. Come, honest friend, you shall go to my quarters instead of the Captain's. (Aside.)

[Exit with Bullock.]

Just. B. We must get this mad Captain his complement of men, and send him packing, else he'll overrun the country. [daughter's disdain.]

Wor. You see, sir, how little he values your

Just. B. I like him the better; I was just such another fellow at his age.—But how goes your affair with Melinda?

Wor. Very slowly. Cupid had formerly wings; but I think in this age he goes upon crutches; or, I fancy Venus had been dallying with her cripple, Vulcan, when my amour commenced, which has made it go on so lamely. My mistress has got a Captain, too; but such a Captain! As I live, yonder he comes. [him.]

Just. B. Who, that bluff fellow? I don't know

Wor. But I engage he knows you and every body at first sight; his impudence were a prodigy, were not his ignorance proportionable; he has the most universal acquaintance of any man living; for he won't be alone, and nobody will keep him company twice; then he's a Caesar among the women, veni, vidi, vici, that's all. If he has but talked with the maid, he swears he has lain with the mistress; but the most surprising part of his character is his memory, which is the most prodigious, and the most trifling in the world.

Just. B. I have known another acquire so much by travel, as to tell you the names of most places in Europe, with their distances of miles, leagues, or hours, as punctually as a postboy; but for anything else, as ignorant as the horse that carries the mail.

Wor. This is your man, sir: add but the traveller's privilege of lying, and even that he abuses. This is the picture,—behold the life.

[Enter CAPTAIN BRAZEN.]

Cap. B. Mr. Worthy, I'm your servant, and so forth.—Harkye, my dear!

Wor. Whispering, sir, before company is not manners; and when nobody's by 'tis foolish.

Capt. B. Company! mort de ma vie! I beg the gentleman's pardon—who is he?

Wor. Ask him.

Capt. B. So I will. My dear; I am your servant, and so forth. Your name, my dear? (To Just. B.)

Just. B. Very laconic, sir. [Just. B.]

Capt. B. Laconic! a very good name, truly. I have known several of the Laconics abroad. Poor Jack Laconic! he was killed at the battle—I remember that he had a blue riband in his hat that very day; and after he fell, we found a piece of neat's tongue in his pocket. [we them?]

Just. B. Pray, sir, did the French attack us, or

Capt. B. The French attack us! No, sir, we attack'd them on the—I have reason to remember the time, for I had two-and-twenty horses killed under me that day.

Wor. Then, sir, you must have rid mighty hard.

Just. B. Or perhaps, sir, you rid upon half a dozen horses at once.

Capt. B. What do you mean, gentlemen? I tell you they were killed; all torn to pieces by cannon-shot, except six I stak'd to death upon the enemy's chevaux-de frise. [name?]

Just. B. Noble Captain! May I crave your

Capt. B. Brazen, at your service.

Just. B. Oh, Brazen! a very good name. I have known several of the Brazens abroad.

Wor. Do you know one Captain Plume, sir? (To Capt. B.)

Capt. B. Is he anything related to Frank Plume in Northamptonshire? Honest Frank! many, many a dry bottle have we cracked hand to fist. You must have known his brother Charles, that was concerned in the India Company; he married the daughter of old Tonguepad, the Master in Chancery; a very pretty woman, only she squinted a little: she died in childbed of her first child; but the child survived; 'twas a daughter; but whether it was called Margaret or Margery, upon my soul, I cannot remember. (Looks at his watch.) But, gentlemen, I must meet a lady, a twenty thousand pounder, presently, upon the walk by the water. Worthy, your servant; Laconic, your's. [Exit.]

Just. B. If you can have so mean an opinion of Melinda as to be jealous of this fellow, I think she ought to give you cause to be so.

Wor. I don't think she encourages him so much for gaining herself a lover, as to set up a rival. Were there any credit to be given to his words, I should believe Melinda had made him this assignation; I must go see. Sir, you'll pardon me. [Exit.]

Just. B. Ay, ay, sir; you're a man of business.—But what have we got here?

[Enter ROSE, singing.]

Rose. And I shall be a lady, a Captain's lady, and ride single upon a white horse with a star, upon a velvet side-saddle; and I shall go to London and see the tombs and the lions, and the king and queen. Sir, an't please your worship, I have often seen your worship ride through our grounds a hunting, begging your worship's pardon. Pray what may this lace be worth a yard?

Just. B. Right Mechlin, by this light! Where did you get this lace, child?

Rose. No matter for that, sir; I came honestly

Just. B. I question it much. (Aside.) [by it.]

Rose. And see here, sir, a fine Turkey-shell snuff-box, and fine mangere. See here; (Takes snuff affectedly.) the Captain learned me how to take it with an air.

Just. B. Oh, ho! the Captain! now the murder's out. (Aside.) And so the Captain taught you to take it with an air?

Rose. Yes, and gave it with an air, too. Will your worship please to taste my snuff? (Offers it affectedly.)

Just. B. You are a very apt scholar, pretty maid,

And pray what did you give the Captain for these fine things?

Rose. He's to have my brother for a soldier, and two or three sweethearts I have in the country; they shall all go with the Captain. Oh! he's the finest man, and the humblest withal. Would you believe it, sir? he talked to me with as much familiarity as if I had been the best lady in the land. [can be.

Just. B. Oh! he's a mighty familiar gentleman as

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME, singing.

But it is not so

With those that go

Through frost and snow—

Most apropos,

My maid with the milking-pail.

How, the Justice! then I'm arraigned, condemned.

Just. B. Oh, my noble Captain! [and executed,

Rose. And my noble Captain, too, sir.

Capt. P. 'Sdeath, child! are you mad? (To Rose.)

Mr. Balance, I am so full of business about my recruits that I ha'n't a moment's time to—I have just now three or four people to—

Just. B. Nay, Captain, I must speak to you.

Rose. And so must I, too, Captain.

Capt. P. Any other time, sir—I cannot for my

Just. B. Pray, sir— [life, sir—

Capt. P. Twenty thousand things—I would—but—now, sir, pray—devil take me—I cannot—I must—(Breaks away.)

Just. B. Nay, I'll follow you. [Exit.

Rose. And I too. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Walk by the Severn-side.

Enter MELINDA and LUCY.

Mel. And pray was it a ring or buckle, or a new bonnet, or in what shape was that almighty gold transformed, that has bribed you so much in his favour?

Lucy. Indeed, madam, the last bribe I had from the Captain was only a small piece of Flanders lace for a cap.

Mel. Ay, Flanders lace is a constant present from officers to their women. They every year bring over a cargo of lace, to cheat the king of his duty, and his subjects of their honesty.

Lucy. They only barter one sort of prohibited goods for another, madam.

Mel. Has any of 'em been bartering with you, Mrs. Pert, that you talk so like a trader?

Lucy. One would imagine, madam, by your concern for Worthy's absence, that you should use him better when he's with you.

Mel. Who told you, pray, that I was concerned for his absence? I'm only vexed that I have had nothing said to me these two days; one may like the love, and despise the lover, I hope, as one may love the treason, and hate the traitor. Oh! here comes another captain, and a rogue that has the confidence to make love to me; but indeed I don't wonder at that, when he has the assurance to fancy himself a fine gentleman.

Lucy. If he should speak of the assignation, I should be ruined. (Aside.) [Exit.

Enter CAPTAIN BRAZEN.

Capt. B. True to the touch, faith! (Aside.) Madam, I am your humble servant, and all that, madam. A fine river this same Severn. Do you love fishing, madam? [lovers.

Mel. 'Tis a pretty, melancholy amusement for

Capt. B. I'll go buy hooks and lines presently; for you must know, madam, that I have served in Flanders against the French; in Hungary, against the Turks; and in Tangier, against the Moors; and I never was so much in love before; and split me, madam, in all the campaigns I ever made, I have not seen so fine a woman as your ladyship.

Mel. And from all the men I ever saw, I never had so fine a compliment: but you soldiers are the best bred men; that we must allow.

Capt. B. Some of us, madam; but there are brutes among us too, very sad brutes; for my own part, I have always had the good luck to prove agreeable. I have had very considerable offers, madam. I might have married a German princess worth fifty thousand crowns a year; but her stove disgusted me. The daughter of a Turkish bashaw fell in love with me, too, when I was a prisoner among the infidels; she offered to rob her father of his treasure, and make her escape with me; but I don't know how, my time was not come. Hanging and marriage, you know, go by destiny. Fate has reserved me for a Shropshire lady, worth twenty thousand pounds. Do you know any such person, madam?

Mel. Extravagant coxcomb! (Aside.) To be sure, a great many ladies of that fortune would be proud of the name of Mrs. Brazen.

Capt. B. Nay, for that matter, madam, there are women of very good quality of the name of Brazen.

Enter WORTHY.

Mel. Oh! are you there, gentleman? (Aside.) Come, Captain, we'll walk this way. Give me your hand.

Capt. B. My hand and heart are at your service.

Mr. Worthy, your servant, my dear. [Exit.

Wor. Death and fire! this is not to be borne.

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME.

Capt. P. No more it is, faith.

Wor. What?

Capt. P. The march beer at the Raven. I have been doubly serving the king, raising men and raising the excise. Recruiting and elections are rare friends to the excise.

Wor. You a'n't drunk?

Capt. P. No, no, whimsical only; I could be mighty foolish, and fancy myself mighty witty. Reason still keeps its throne; but it nods a little, that's all.

Wor. Then you're just fit for a frolic. (Pointing off.) There's your play then; recover me that vessel from that Tangerine. [manned?

Capt. P. She's well rigged, but how is she

Wor. By Captain Brazen, that I told you of to-day. She is called the Melinda; a first rate, I can assure you. She sheered off with him just now on purpose to affront me; but, according to your advice, I would take no notice, because I would seem to be above a concern for her behaviour.—But have a care of a quarrel.

Capt. P. No, no; I never quarrel with anything in my cups but an oyster-wench or a cookmaid; and if they ben't civil, I knock 'em down.

Wor. Here they come; I must leave you. [Exit.

Capt. P. So! now must I look as sober and demure as a w—e at a christening.

Re-enter CAPTAIN BRAZEN and MELINDA.

Capt. B. Who's that, madam?

Mel. A brother officer of your's, I suppose, sir.

Capt. B. Ay. My dear! (To Capt. P.)

Capt. P. My dear! (Embraces him.)

Capt. B. My dear boy! how'st? Your name, my dear. If I be not mistaken, I have seen your face.

Capt. P. I never saw your's in my life, my dear; but there's a face well known as the sun's, that shines on all, and is by all adored.

Capt. B. Have you any pretensions, sir?

Capt. P. Pretensions?

Capt. B. That is, have you ever served abroad?

Capt. P. I have served at home, sir; for ages served this cruel fair; and that will serve the turn, sir.

Mel. So between the fool and the rake, I shall bring a fine spot of work upon my hands? (Aside.)

Capt. B. Will you fight for the lady, sir? [ing.

Capt. P. No, sir; but I'll have her notwithstanding—Thou peerless princess of Salopian plains,

Envied by nymphs, and worshipp'd by the swains.—

Capt. B. Oons! sir, not fight for her?

Capt. P. Pr'ythee be quiet;—I shall be out:

Behold how humbly does the Severn glide,
To greet the princess of the Severn side.

Capt. B. Don't mind him, madam. If he were not so well dressed I should take him for a poet; but I'll show you the difference presently. Come, madam, we'll place you between us, and now the longest sword carries her. (Draws, Melinda shrieks.)

Re-enter WORTHY.

Mel. Oh, Mr. Worthy! save me from these madmen. [Exit with Worthy.]

Capt. P. Ha, ha, ha! why don't you follow, sir, and fight the bold ravisher?

Capt. B. No, sir, you are my man. [your man.]

Capt. P. I don't like the wages; I won't be Capt. B. Then you're not worth my sword.

Capt. P. No! pray what did it cost?

Capt. B. It cost me twenty pistoles in France, and my enemies thousands of lives in Flanders.

Capt. P. Then they had a dear bargain.

Enter SYLVIA, in man's apparel.

Syl. Save ye, save ye! gentlemen.

Capt. B. My dear! I'm your's.

Capt. P. Do you know the gentleman? [dear?]

Capt. B. No, but I will presently. Your name, my

Syl. Wilful, Jack Wilful, at your service.

Capt. B. What, the Kentish Wilfuls, or those of Staffordshire?

Syl. Both, sir, both: I'm related to all the Wilfuls in Europe; and I'm head of the family at present.

Capt. P. Do you live in the country, sir? [sent.]

Syl. Yes, sir, I live where I stand; I have neither home, house, nor habitation, beyond this

Capt. B. What are you, sir? [spot of ground.]

Syl. A rake.

Capt. P. In the army, I presume?

Syl. No; but I intend to list immediately.—Lookye, gentlemen, he that bids the fairest has me.

Capt. B. Sir, I'll prefer you; I'll make you a corporal this minute. [you shall eat with me.]

Capt. P. Corporal! I'll make you my companion;

Capt. B. You shall drink with me; you shall receive your pay, and no duty.

Syl. Then you must make me a field-officer.

Capt. P. Pho, pho, pho! I'll do more than all this, I'll make you a corporal, and give you a brevet for sergeant.

Capt. B. Can you read and write, sir?

Syl. Yes.

Capt. B. Then your business is done; I'll make you chaplain to the regiment.

Syl. Your promises are so equal, that I'm at a loss to choose. There is one Plume, that I hear much commended in town; pray which of you is Captain Plume?

Capt. P. I am Captain Plume.

Capt. B. No, no, I am Captain Plume.

Syl. Heyday! [dear!]

Capt. P. Captain Plume! I'm your servant, my

Capt. B. Captain Brazen! I'm your's. The fellow dares not fight. (Aside.)

Enter SERGEANT KITE.

Serg. K. Sir, if you please—(Whispers to Capt. P.)

Capt. P. No, no, there's your Captain.—Captain Plume, your sergeant has got so drunk, he mistakes me for you.

Capt. B. He's an incorrigible sot. Here, my Hector of Holborn, here's forty shillings for you. (To Sylvia.)

Capt. P. I forbid the bans. Lookye, friend! you shall list with Captain Brazen.

Syl. I will see Captain Brazen hanged first; I will list with Captain Plume. I am a freeborn Englishman, and will be a slave my own way. Lookye, sir! will you stand by me? (To Capt. B.)

Capt. B. I warrant you, my lad.

Syl. Then I will tell you, Captain Brazen, that you are an ignorant, pretending, impudent coxcomb. (To Capt. P.)

Capt. P. Ay, ay, a sad dog. [Captain Plume.]

Syl. A very sad dog. Give me the money, noble

Capt. P. Then you won't list with Captain Bra-

Syl. I won't! [zen!]

Capt. B. Never mind him, child; I'll end the dispute presently. Harkye, my dear! (Takes Capt. P. aside, and talks to him in dumb shew.)

Serg. K. Sir, he in the plain coat is Captain Plume; I am his Sergeant, and will take my oath

Syl. What! you are Sergeant Kite? [on't.]

Serg. K. At your service. [farthing.]

Syl. Then I would not take your oath for a

Serg. K. A very understanding youth of his age. (Aside.) Pray, sir, let me look you full in your face.

Syl. Well, sir, what have you to say to my face?

Serg. K. The very image of my brother; two bullets of the same caliber were never so like; sure it must be Charles.—Charles,—

Syl. What do you mean by Charles?

Serg. K. The voice too, only a little variation in E flat. My dear brother! for I must call you so, if you should have the fortune to enter into the most noble society of the sword, I bespeak you for a comrade. [body's.]

Syl. No, sir; I'll be the Captain's comrade, if any-

Serg. K. Ambition there again! 'tis a noble passion for a soldier; by that I gained this glorious halberd. Ambition! I see a commission in his face already. But I see a storm coming.

Syl. Now, Sergeant, I shall see who is your Captain by your knocking down the other.

Serg. K. My Captain scorns assistance, sir.

Capt. B. How dare you contend for anything, and not dare to draw your sword? But you are a young fellow, and have not been much abroad; I excuse that; but, pr'ythee, resign the man, pr'ythee do; you are a very honest fellow.

Capt. P. You lie. (Draws to Capt. B.)

Capt. B. Hold, hold! did not you refuse to fight for the lady? (Retiring.)

Capt. P. I always do; but for a man I'll fight knee deep; so you lie again.

[Capt. P. and Capt. B. fight a traverse or two about the stage; Sylvia draws, and is held by Kite, who sounds to arms with his mouth, takes Sylvia in his arms, and carries her off the stage.]

Capt. B. Hold! where's the man?

Capt. P. Gone. [let's embrace, my dear.]

Capt. B. Then what do we fight for? Now,

Capt. P. With all my heart, my dear! I suppose Kite has listed him by this time. (Embraces.)

Capt. B. You are a brave fellow: I always fight with a man before I make him my friend; and if once I find he will fight, I never quarrel with him afterwards. And now I'll tell you a secret, my dear friend!—that lady we frightened out of the walk just now, I found at home this morning, so beautiful, so inviting; I presently locked the door;—but I'm a man of honour; but I believe I shall marry her nevertheless; her twenty thousand pounds, you know, will be a pretty conveniency. I had an assignation with her here, but your coming spoil'd my sport. Curse you, my dear! but don't do so again.

Capt. P. No, no, my dear! men are my business at present. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—The same.

Enter ROSE and BULLOCK, meeting.

Rose. Where have you been, you great booby? You are always out of the way in the time of preferment.

Bul. Preferment! who should prefer me?

Rose. I would prefer you! who should prefer a man but a woman? Come, throw away that great club, and hold up your head.

Bul. Ah, Rouse, Rouse! here has been Cart-wheel, your sweetheart; what will become of him?

Rose. Lookye; I'm a great woman, and will provide for my relations. I told the Captain how finely he played on the tabor and pipe, so he set him down for drum-major.

Bul. Nay, sister, why did not you keep that place for me? you know I have always loved to be a drumming, if it were but on a table or on a quart pot. Enter SYLVIA.

Syl. Had I but a commission in my pocket, I fancy this dress would become me as well as any ranting fellow of 'em all; for I take a bold step, and an impudent air, to be the principal ingredients in the composition of a captain. What's here? Rose, my nurse's daughter? I'll go and practice. Come, child, kiss me at once. (Kisses Rose.) Honest Dungfork, do you know the difference between a horse and cart, and a cart-horse, eh?

Bul. I presume that your worship is a captain, by your clothes and your courage.

Syl. Suppose I were, would you be contented to list, friend?

Rose. No, no; though your worship be a handsome man, there be others as fine as you. My brother is engaged to Captain Plume.

Syl. Plume! do you know Captain Plume?

Rose. Yes, I do, and he knows me. I can assure you that I can do anything with the Captain.

Bul. That is in a modest way, sir. Have a care what you say, Rouse; don't shame your parentage.

Rose. Nay, for that matter, I am not so simple as to say that I can do anything with the Captain, but what I may do with anybody else.

Syl. So! And pray what do you expect from this Captain, child?

Rose. I expect, sir!—I expect—but he ordered me to tell nobody; but suppose that he should promise to marry me?

Syl. You should have a care, my dear; men will promise anything beforehand. [afterwards.]

Rose. I know that; but he promised to marry me

Bul. Wauns! Rouse, what have you said?

Syl. Afterwards! after what?

Rose. After I had sold my chickens: I hope there's no harm in that.

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME.

Capt. P. What, Mr. Wilful, so close with my market woman?

Syl. I'll try if he loves her. (Aside.) Close, sir; ay, and closer yet, sir. Come, my pretty maid; you and I will withdraw a little. [yet.]

Capt. P. No, no, friend; I ha'n't done with her

Syl. Nor have I begun with her; so I have as good a right as you have.

Capt. P. Thou'rt a very impudent fellow!

Syl. Sir, I would qualify myself for the service.

Capt. P. Hast thou really a mind to the service?

Syl. Yes, sir; so let her go.

Rose. Pray, gentlemen, don't be so violent.

Capt. P. Come, leave it to the girl's own choice. Will you belong to me, or to that gentleman?

Rose. Let me consider; you're both very handsome. [begins to work.]

Capt. P. Now the natural inconstancy of her sex

Rose. Pray, sir, what will you give me?

Bul. Dunna be angry, sir, that my sister should be mercenary, for she's but young.

Syl. Give thee, child? I'll set thee above scandal; you shall have a coach, with six before and six behind; an equipage to make vice fashionable, and put virtue out of countenance.

Capt. P. Pho! that's easily done: I'll do more for thee, child; I'll buy you a new gown, and give you a ticket to see a play. [let's see the show.]

Bul. A play! Wauns! Rouse, take the ticket, and

Syl. Lookye, Captain! if you won't resign, I'll go list with Captain Brazen this minute. [title?]

Capt. P. Will you list with me if I give up my

Syl. I will. [man at any time.]

Capt. P. Take her; I'll change a woman for a

Rose. I have heard before, indeed, that you captains used to sell your men. [Western Indies.]

Bul. Pray, Captain, do not send Rouse to the Capt. P. Ha, ha, ha! West Indies! No, no, my honest lad, give me thy hand; nor you nor she shall move a step further than I do. This gentleman is one of us, and will be kind to you, Mrs. Rose.

Rose. But will you be so kind to me, sir, as the Captain would?

Syl. I can't be altogether so kind to you; my circumstances are not so good as the Captain's; but I'll take care of you, upon my word.

Capt. P. Ay, ay, we'll all take care of her; she shall live like a princess, and her brother here shall be,—What would you be? [drum-major,—]

Bul. Oh! sir, if you had not promised the place of Capt. P. Ay, that is promised: but what think you of barrack-master? You are a person of understanding, and barrack-master you shall be. But what's become of this same Cartwheel, you told me of, my dear?

Rose. We'll go fetch him. Come, brother barrack-master. We shall find you at home, noble Captain? [Exit, with Bullock.]

Capt. P. Yes, yes; and now, sir, here are your forty shillings.

Syl. Captain Plume, I despise your listing money; if I do serve, 'tis purely for love—of that wench, I mean. But now let me beg of you to lay aside your recruiting airs, put on the man of honour, and tell me plainly what usage I must expect when I am under your command.

Capt. P. Your usage will chiefly depend upon your behaviour; only this you must expect, that if you commit a small fault I will excuse it, if a great one I'll discharge you; for something tells me I shall not be able to punish you.

Syl. And something tells me, that if you do discharge me, 'twill be the greatest punishment you can inflict; for were we this moment to go upon the greatest dangers in your profession, they would be less terrible to me than to stay behind you. And now your hand; this lists me; and now you are my Captain.

Capt. P. Your friend. 'Sdeath! there's something in this fellow that's very strange. (Aside.)

Syl. One favour I must beg: this affair will make some noise, and I have some friends that would censure my conduct, if I threw myself into the circumstance of a private sentinel of my own head: I must, therefore, take care to be impressed by the act of parliament; you shall leave that to me.

Capt. P. What you please as to that. Will you lodge at my quarters in the meantime?

Syl. No, no, Captain; you forget, Rose; she's to be my bedfellow, you know.

Capt. P. I had forgot: pray be kind to her.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MELINDA and LUCY.

Mel. 'Tis the greatest misfortune in nature for a woman to want a confidant: we are so weak that we can do nothing without assistance, and then a secret racks us worse than the cholic. I am at this minute sick of a secret, that I'm ready to faint away. Help me, Lucy!

Lucy. Bless me! madam, what's the matter?

Mel. Vapours only; I begin to recover. If Sylvia were in town I could heartily forgive her faults, for the ease of discovering my own.

Lucy. You are thoughtful, madam; am not I worthy to know the cause?

Mel. Oh, Lucy! I can hold my secret no longer. You must know, that, hearing of a famous fortune-teller in town, I went disguised to satisfy a curiosity which has cost me dear. The fellow is certainly the devil, or one of his bosom favourites: he has told me the most surprising things of my past life.

Lucy. Things past, madam, can hardly be reckoned surprising, because we know them already. Did he tell you anything surprising that was to come?

Mel. One thing very surprising; he said I should die a maid!

Lucy. Die a maid! come into the world for nothing! Dear madam! if you should believe him, it might come to pass; for the bare thought on't might kill one in four-and-twenty hours. And did you ask him any questions about me?

Mel. You! why, I passed for you.

Lucy. So; 'tis I that am to die a maid. But the devil was a liar from the beginning; he can't make me die a maid: I've put it out of his power already. (Aside.)

Mel. I do but jest. I would have passed for you, and called myself Lucy; but he presently told me my name, my quality, my fortune; and gave me the whole history of my life. He told me of a lover I had in this country, and described Worthy exactly; but in nothing so well as in his present indifference. I fled to him for refuge here to-day; he never so much as encouraged me in my fright, but coldly told me he was sorry for the accident, because it might give the town cause to censure my conduct; excused his not waiting on me home, made me a careless bow, and walked off. 'Sdeath! I could have stabbed him, or myself; 'twas the same thing. Yonder he comes: I will so use him!

Lucy. Don't exasperate him; consider what the fortune-teller told you. Men are scarce; and, as times goes, it is not impossible for a woman to die a maid. Enter WORTHY.

Mel. No matter.

Wor. I find she's warmed; I must strike while the iron is hot. (Aside.) You've a great deal of courage, madam, to venture where you were so lately frightened.

Mel. And you have a quantity of impudence, to appear before me, that you lately have so affronted!

Wor. I had no design to affront you, nor appear before you either, madam; and came hither, thinking to meet another person.

Mel. Since you find yourself disappointed, I hope you'll withdraw to another place.

Wor. The place is broad enough for us both. (They walk by one another, she fretting and tearing her fan.) Will you please to take snuff, madam? (She strikes the box out of his hand.)

Enter CAPTAIN BRAZEN.

Capt. B. What! here before me, my dear?

Mel. What means this insolence!

Lucy. Are you mad? don't you see Mr. Worthy? (To Brazen.)

Capt. B. No, no; I'm struck blind. Worthy! odso! well turned. My mistress has wit at her fingers' ends. Madam, I ask your pardon; 'tis our way abroad. Mr. Worthy, you're the happy man.

Wor. I don't envy your happiness very much, if the lady can afford no other sort of favours but what she has bestowed upon you.

Mel. I'm sorry the favour miscarried, for it was designed for you, Mr. Worthy; and, be assured, 'tis the last and only favour you must expect at my hands. Captain, I ask your pardon. [Exit with Lucy.]

Capt. B. I grant it. You see, Mr. Worthy, 'twas only a random shot; it might have taken off your head as well as mine. Courage, my dear! 'tis the fortune of war; but the enemy has thought fit to withdraw, I think. [by withdraw?]

Wor. Withdraw! Oons! sir, what do you mean

Capt. B. I'll shew you. [Exit.]

Wor. She's lost, irrecoverably lost; and Plume's advice has ruined me. 'Sdeath! why should I, that knew her haughty spirit, be ruled by a man that's a stranger to her pride? [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

KITE, disguised in a strange habit, discovered sitting at a table, with books and globes.

Serg. K. (Rises.) By the position of the heavens, gained from my observation upon these celestial globes, I find that Luna was a tidewaiter; Sol, a surveyor; Mercury, a thief; Venus, a w—; Saturn, an alderman; Jupiter, a rake; and Mars, a sergeant of grenadiers; and this is the system of Kite, the conjurer.

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME and WORTHY.

Capt. P. Well, what success?

Serg. K. I have sent away a shoemaker and a tailor already; one's to be a captain of marines, and the other a major of dragoons. I am to manage them at night. Have you seen the lady, Mr. Worthy?

Wor. Ay, but it won't do. Have you shewed her her name that I tore off from the bottom of the letter?

Serg. K. No, sir; I reserve that for the last stroke.

Capt. P. What letter?

Wor. One that I would not let you see, for fear that you should break windows in good earnest. Here, Captain, put it into your pocket-book, and have it ready upon occasion. (Knocking at the door.)

Serg. K. Officers, to your posts. Tycho, mind the door. [Exeunt Captain Plume and Worthy.]

Enter MELINDA and LUCY.

Serg. K. Tycho, chairs for the ladies. [tor,]

Mel. Don't trouble yourself; we sha'n't stay, doc-

Serg. K. Your ladyship is to stay much longer

Mel. For what? [than you imagine,]

Serg. K. For a husband. For your part, madam, you won't stay for a husband. (To Lucy.)

Lucy. Pray, doctor, do you converse with the stars, or the devil?

Serg. K. With both: when I have the destinies of men in search, I consult the stars; when the affairs of women come under my hands, I advise with my t'other friend. [count?]

Mel. And have you raised the devil upon my ac-

Serg. K. Yes, madam; and he's now under the table. [be gone.]

Lucy. Oh, heavens protect us! Dear madam, let's

Serg. K. If you be afraid of him, why do you come to consult him?

Mel. Don't fear, fool. Do you think, sir, that because I'm a woman, I'm to be fooled out of my reasons, or frightened out of my senses? Come, shew me this devil.

Serg. K. He's a little busy at present; but, when he has done, he shall wait on you.

Mel. What is he doing?

Serg. K. Writing your name in his pocket-book.

Mel. Ha, ha! my name! pray what have you or he to do with my name?

Serg. K. Lookye, fair lady! the devil is a very modest person; he seeks nobody unless they seek him first; he's chained up like a mastiff, and can't stir unless he be let loose. You come to me to have your fortune told: do you think, madam, that I can answer you of my own head? no, madam; the affairs of women are so irregular, that nothing less than the devil can give any account of them. Now, to convince you of your incredulity, I'll shew you a trial of my skill. Here, you Cacodemo del Plumo, exert your power; draw me this lady's name, the word Melinda, in proper letters and characters of her own hand writing; do it at three motions;—one,—two,—three,—'tis done. Now, madam, will you please to send your maid to fetch it?

Lucy. I fetch it! the devil fetch me if I do!

Mel. My name in my own hand-writing! that would be convincing indeed!

Serg. K. Seeing is believing. (Goes to the table and lifts up the carpet.) Here, Tre, Tre, poor Tre, give me the bone, sirrah. There's your name upon that square piece of paper; behold!

Mel. 'Tis wonderful! my very letters to a tittle!

Lucy. 'Tis like your hand, madam; but not so like your hand neither; and now I look nearer, 'tis not like your hand at all. [devil!]

Serg. K. Here's a chambermaid that will outlie the Lucy. Lookye, madam, they shan't impose upon us; people can't remember their hands, no more than they can their faces. Come, madam, let us be certain; write your name upon this paper, then we'll compare the two hands. (Takes out a paper.)

Serg. K. Anything for your satisfaction, madam. Here's pen and ink. (Mel. writes.)

Lucy. Let me see it, madam; 'tis the same, the very same. I'll secure one copy for my own affairs. (Aside.)

Mel. This is demonstration.

Serg. K. 'Tis so, madam; the word demonstration comes from demon, the father of lies.

Mel. Well, doctor, I am convinced: and now, pray, what account can you give of my future fortune?

Serg. K. Before the sun has made one course round this earthly globe, your fortune will be fixed for happiness or misery.

Mel. What! so near the crisis of my fate?

Serg. K. Let me see: about the hour of ten tomorrow morning, you will be saluted by a gentleman who will come to take his leave of you, being designed for travel; his intention of going abroad is sudden, and the occasion a woman. Your fortune and his are like the bullet and the barrel, one runs plump into the other. In short, if the gentleman travels, he will die abroad; and, if he does, you will die before he comes home.

Mel. What sort of a man is he?

Serg. K. Madam, he's a fine gentleman, and a lover; that is, a man of very good sense, and a very great fool.

Mel. How is that possible, doctor?

Serg. K. Because, madam,—because it is so. A woman's reason is the best for a man's being a fool.

Mel. Ten o'clock, you say?

Serg. K. Ten: about the hour of tea-drinking throughout the kingdom.

Mel. Here, Doctor. (Gives money.) Lucy, have you any questions to ask?

Lucy. Oh! madam, a thousand.

Serg. K. I must beg your patience till another time, for I expect more company this minute: besides, I must discharge the gentleman under the Lucy. O pray, sir, discharge us first! [table.]

Serg. K. Tycho, wait on the ladies down stairs.

[Exeunt Melinda and Lucy.]

Enter CAPTAIN BRAZEN.

Capt. B. Your servant, my dear.

Serg. K. Stand off! I have my familiar already.

Capt. B. Are you bewitched, my dear?

Serg. K. Yes, my dear; but mine is a peaceable spirit, and hates gunpowder. Thus I fortify myself; (draws a circle round himself) and now, Captain, have a care how you force my lines.

Capt. B. Lines! what dost talk of lines? You have something like a fishing-rod there, indeed; but I come to be acquainted with you, man. What's your name, my dear?

Serg. K. Conundrum.

Capt. B. Conundrum? rat me! I knew a famous doctor in London of your name. Where were you

Serg. K. I was born in Algebra. [born?]

Capt. B. Algebra! 'tis no country in Christendom, I'm sure; unless it be some place in the Highlands in Scotland.

Serg. K. Right; I told you I was betwitched.

Capt. B. So am I, my dear; I am going to be married. I have had two letters from a lady of fortune that loves me to madness, fits, cholic, spleen, and vapours. Shall I marry her in four-and-twenty hours, ay or no?

Serg. K. Certainly.

Capt. B. Gadso, ay.

Serg. K. Or no. But I must have the year and the day of the month when these letters were dated.

Capt. B. Why, you old boar! did you ever hear of love-letters dated with the year and day of the month? Do you think billet-doux are like bank-bills?

Serg. K. They are not so good, my dear; but if they bear no date, I must examine the contents.

Capt. B. Contents! that you shall, old boy! here they be both.

Serg. K. Only the last you received, if you please. (Takes the letter.) Now, sir, if you please to let me consult my books for a minute, I'll send this letter enclosed to you with the determination of the stars upon it, to your lodgings.

Capt. B. With all my heart. I must give him—(Puts his hands into his pockets.) Algebra! I fancy, doctor, 'tis hard to calculate the place of your nativity. Here. (Gives him money.) And, if I succeed, I'll build a watch-tower on the top of the highest mountain in Wales, for the study of astrology and the benefit of the Conundrums. [Exit.]

Re-enter CAPTAIN PLUME and WORTHY.

Wor. O doctor! that letter's worth a million. Let me see it; and now I have it, I'm afraid to open it.

Capt. P. Pho! let me see it. (Opens the letter.) If she be a jilt,—d—n her, she is one! there's her name at the bottom on't.

Wor. By all my hopes! 'tis Lucy's hand.

Capt. P. Lucy's?

Wor. Certainly. 'Tis no more like Melinda's character than black is to white.

Capt. P. Then 'tis certainly Lucy's contrivance to draw in Brazen for a husband. But are you sure 'tis not Melinda's hand?

Wor. You shall see. Where's the bit of paper I gave you just now, that the devil wrote Melinda

Serg. K. Here, sir. [upon?]

Capt. P. 'Tis plain they are not the same. And is this the malicious name that was subscribed to the letter which made Mr. Balance send his daughter into the country?

Wor. The very same. The other fragments I shewed you just now I once intended for another use; but I think I have now turned it to a better advantage.

Capt. P. But 'twas barbarous to conceal this so long, and to continue me so many hours in the pernicious heresy of believing that angelic creature could change. Poor Sylvia!

Wor. Rich Sylvia, you mean, and poor captain; ha, ha, ha! Come, come, friend, Melinda is true, and shall be mine; Sylvia is constant, and may be yours.

Capt. P. No, she's above my hopes: but for her sake I'll recant my opinion of her sex.

By some the sex is blam'd without design:

Light, harmless censure, such as yours and mine,

Sallies of wit, and vapours of our wine:

Others the justice of the sex condemn,

And wanting merit to create esteem,

Would hide their own defects by cens'ring them:

But they, secure in their all conq'ring charms,

Laugh at the vain efforts of false alarms,

He magnifies their conquests who complains,

For none would struggle, were they not in chains.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Justice Balance's House.

Enter JUSTICE BALANCE and JUSTICE SCALE.

Just. Scale. I say, 'tis not to be borne, Mr. Balance.

Just. B. Lookye, Mr. Scale, for my own part, I shall be very tender in what regards the officers of the army.

Enter SYLVIA, BULLOCK, ROSE, Prisoners, Constable, and Mob.

Const. May it please your worships, we took them in the very act, re infectâ, sir. The gentleman, indeed, behaved himself like a gentleman; for he drew his sword and swore, and afterwards laid it down and said nothing.

Just. B. Give the gentleman his sword again. Wait you without. [Exeunt Const. and Watch.] I'm sorry, sir, (to Sylvia,) to know a gentleman upon such terms, that the occasion of our meeting should prevent the satisfaction of an acquaintance.

Syl. Sir, you need make no apology for your warrant, no more than I shall do for my behaviour; my innocence is upon an equal foot with your authority.

Just. Scale. Innocence! Have you not seduced that young maid?

Syl. No, Mr. Goosecap; she seduced me.

Bul. So she did, I'll swear; for she proposed marriage first.

Just. B. What! then you are married, child? (To Rose.)

Rose. Yes, sir, to my sorrow.

Just. B. Who was witness?

Bul. That was I. I danced, threw the stocking, and spoke jokes by their bedside, I'm sure.

Just. B. Who was the minister?

Bul. Minister! we are soldiers, and want no minister. They were married by the articles of war.

Just. B. Hold thy prating, fool. Your appearance, sir, (to Sylvia) promises some understanding: pray what does this fellow mean?

Syl. He means marriage, I think; but that, you know, is so odd a thing, that hardly any two people under the sun agree in the ceremony; some make it a convenience, and others make it a jest; but among soldiers 'tis most sacred. Our sword, you know, is our honour; that we lay down; the hero jumps over it first, and the Amazon after; the drum beats a ruff, and so to bed: that's all. The ceremony is concise. [time and prodigality.]

Bul. And the prettiest ceremony; so full of pas-

Just. B. What, are you a soldier?

Bul. Ay, that I am. Will your worship lend me your cane, and I'll shew you how I can exercise?

Just. B. Take it. (Strikes him.) Pray, sir, what commission may you bear? (To Sylvia.)

Syl. I'm called Captain, sir, by all the coffee-men, drawers, and groom-porters in London; for I wear a red coat, a sword, a picquet in my head, and dice in my pocket.

Just. Scale. Your name, pray, sir?

Syl. Pinch. [Shropshire?

Just. B. And pray, sir, what brought you into

Syl. A pinch, sir. I know you country gentlemen want wit, and you know that we town gentlemen want money; and so— [ble!

Just. B. I understand you, sir. Here, constable—
Re-enter Constable.

Take this gentleman into custody till further orders.

Rose. Pray, your worship, don't be uncivil to him, for he did me no hurt; he's the most harmless man in the world, for all he talks so. [you.

Just. Scale. Come, come, child, I'll take care of Syl. What, gentlemen, rob me of my freedom and my wife at once? 'Tis the first time they ever went together.

Just. B. Harkye, constable! (Whispers him.)

Const. It shall be done, sir. Come along, sir.

[Exeunt Cons. Bul. Rose and Syl.

Just. B. Come, Mr. Scale, we'll manage the spark presently. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Melinda's Apartment.

Enter MELINDA and WORTHY.

Mel. So far the prediction is right; 'tis ten exactly. (Aside.) And pray, sir, how long have you been in this travelling humour?

Wor. 'Tis natural, madam, for us to avoid what disturbs our quiet.

Mel. Rather the love of change, which is more natural, may be the occasion of it.

Wor. To be sure, madam, there must be charms in variety; else neither you nor I should be so fond of it.

Mel. You mistake, Mr. Worthy: I am not so fond of variety as to travel for't; nor do I think it prudence in you to run yourself into a certain expense and danger, in hopes of precarious pleasures, which, at best, never answer expectation; as it is evident from the example of most travellers, that they long more to return to their own country than they did to go abroad.

Wor. What pleasures I may receive abroad are, indeed, uncertain; but this I am sure of, I shall meet with less cruelty among the most barbarous of nations than I have found at home.

Mel. Come, sir, you and I have been jangling a great while; I fancy if we made our accounts we should the sooner come to an agreement.

Wor. Sure, madam, you won't dispute your being in my debt. My fears, sighs, vows, promises, assiduities, anxieties, jealousies, have run on for a whole year without any payment.

Mel. A year! Oh, Mr. Worthy! what you owe to me is not to be paid under a seven years' servitude. How did you use me the year before? when, taking the advantage of my innocence and necessity, you would have made me your mistress, that is, your slave. Remember the wicked insinuations, artful baits, deceitful arguments, cunning pretences; then your impudent behaviour, loose expressions, familiar letters, rude visits; remember those, those, Mr. Worthy.

Wor. I do remember, and am sorry I made no better use of 'em. (Aside.) But you may remember, madam, that—

Mel. Sir, I'll remember nothing; 'tis your interest that I should forget. You have been barbarous to me, I have been cruel to you; put that and that together, and let one balance the other. Now, if you will begin upon a new score, lay aside your adventuring airs, and behave yourself handsomely till Lent be over, here's my hand, I'll use you as a gentleman should be.

Wor. And if I don't use you as a gentlewoman should be, may this be my poison. (Kisses her hand.)

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, the coach is at the door. [Exit.

Mel. I am going to Mr. Balance's country-house to see my cousin Sylvia; I've done her an injury, and can't be easy till I've asked her pardon.

Wor. I dare not hope for the honour of waiting on you.

Mel. My coach is full; but if you'll be so gallant as to mount your own horse, and follow us, we shall be glad to be overtaken; and if you bring Captain Plume with you we sha'n't have the worse reception.

Wor. I'll endeavour it. [Exit, leading Mel.

SCENE III.—A Court of Justice.

JUSTICE BALANCE, JUSTICE SCALE, and JUSTICE SCRUPLE discovered upon the Bench, with Constable, SERGEANT KITE, and Mob standing by. Sergeant Kite and Constable advance.

Serg. K. Pray who are those honourable gentlemen upon the bench?

Const. He in the middle is Justice Balance, he on the right is Justice Scale, and he on the left is Justice Scruple; and I am Mr. Constable: four very honest gentlemen. [servant.

Serg. K. O, dear sir! I am your most obedient
Enter CAPTAIN PLUME.

Just. B. Captain, you're welcome.

Capt. P. Gentlemen, I thank you.

Just. Scr. Come, honest Captain, sit by me. (Capt. P. ascends, and sits upon the bench.) Now produce your prisoners. Here, that fellow there; set him up, Mr. Constable, what have you to say against this man? [please you.

Const. I have nothing to say against him, an't

Just. B. No? What made you bring him hither?

Const. I don't know, an't please your worship.

Just. Scale. Did not the contents of your warrant direct you what sort of men to take up?

Const. I can't tell, an't please ye; I can't read.

Just. Scr. A very pretty constable, truly. I find we have no business here.

Serg. K. May it please the worshipful bench, I desire to be heard in this case, as being the counsel for the king.

Just. B. Come, Sergeant, you shall be heard, since nobody else will speak; we won't come here for nothing.

Serg. K. This man is but one man, the country may spare him, and the army wants him; besides he's cut out by nature for a grenadier: he's five feet ten inches high: he shall box, wrestle, or dance the Cheshire round with any man in the country; he gets drunk every Sabbath-day, and he beats his wife.

Wife. You lie, sirrah, you lie: an't please your worship, he's the best-natur'd pains-taking'st man in the parish; witness my five poor children.

Just. Scr. A wife and five children! You Constable, you rogue, how durst you impress a man that has a wife and five children?

Just. Scale. Discharge him, discharge him.

Just. B. Hold, gentlemen. Harkye, friend! how do you maintain your wife and five children?

Capt. P. They live upon wild-fowl and venison, sir; the husband keeps a gun, and kills all the hares and partridges within five miles round.

Just. B. A gun! nay, if he be so good at gunning, he shall have enough on't.

Serg. K. Ay, ay, I'll take care of him; if you please. (Takes him down.)

Just. Scale. Here, you Constable, the next. Set up that black-faced fellow; he has a gunpowder look; what can you say against this man, Constable?

Const. Nothing, but that he is a very honest man.

Capt. P. Pray, gentlemen, let me have one honest man in my company for the novelty's sake.

Just. B. What are you, friend?

Welch C. A collier; I work in the coal-pits.

Just. Scr. Lookye, gentlemen! this fellow has a trade, and the act of parliament here expresses that we are to impress no man that has any visible means of a livelihood.

Serg. K. May it please your worship, this man has no visible means of livelihood, for he works under-ground. [miners.]

Capt. P. Well said, Kite; besides, the army wants

Just. B. Right; and had we an order of government for't, we could raise you in this, and the neighbouring county of Stafford, five hundred colliers, that would run you under ground like moles, and do more service in a siege than all the miners in the army. [yourself?]

Just. Scr. Well, friend, what have you to say for Welch C. I'm married.

Serg. K. Lackaday! so am I.

Welch C. Here's my wife, poor woman.

Just. B. Are you married, good woman?

Woman. I'm married, in conscience.

Just. Scale. Who married you, mistress?

Woman. My husband. We agreed that I should call him husband, and that he should call me wife, to shun going for a soldier.

Just. Scr. A very pretty couple! Pray, Captain, will you take them both? [care of the woman?]

Capt. P. What say you, Mr. Kite? will you take

Serg. K. Yes, sir; she shall go with us to the sea-side; and there, if she has a mind to drown herself, we'll take care nobody shall hinder her.

Just. B. Here, Constable, bring in my man. [Exit Constable.] Now, Captain, I'll fit you with a man such as you never listed in your life.

Re-enter Constable, with SYLVIA.

Oh, my friend Pinch! I'm very glad to see you.

Syl. Well, sir, and what then? [the bench?]

Just. Scale. What then! is that your respect to

Syl. Sir, I don't care a farthing for you nor your bench either.

Just. Scr. Lookye, gentlemen, that's enough; he's a very impudent fellow, and fit for a soldier.

Just. Scale. A notorious rogue, I say, and very fit for a soldier.

Just. B. What think you, Captain?

Capt. P. I think he is a very pretty fellow, and therefore fit to serve.

Syl. Me for a soldier! send your own lazy lubberly sons at home; fellows that hazard their necks every day in the pursuit of a fox, yet dare not peep abroad to look an enemy in the face.

Just. B. Pray, Captain, read the articles of war; we'll see him listed immediately.

Capt. P. (Reads.) "Articles of war against mutiny and desertion."

Syl. Hold, sir! once more, gentlemen, have a care what you do, for you shall severely smart for any violence you offer to me; and you, Mr. Balance, I speak to you particularly, you shall heartily repent it.

Capt. P. Lookye; young spark, say but one word more, and I'll build a horse for you as high as the ceiling, and make you ride the most tiresome journey that ever you made in your life.

Syl. You have made a fine speech, good Captain Huffcap! but you had better be quiet; I shall find a way to cool your courage. [distracted.]

Capt. P. Pray, gentlemen, don't mind him; he's

Syl. 'Tis false; I am descended of as good a family as any in the county; my father is as good a man as any upon your bench; and I am heir to two thousand pounds a year. [the articles of war.]

Just. B. He's certainly mad. Pray, Captain, read

Syl. Hold! once more. Pray, Mr. Balance, to you I speak; suppose I were your child, would you use me at this rate?

Just. B. No, faith; were you mine I would send you to Bedlam first, and into the army afterwards.

Syl. But consider my father, sir; he's as good, as generous, as brave, as just a man as ever served his country; I'm his only child: perhaps the loss of me may break his heart.

Just. B. He's a very great fool if it does. Captain, if you don't list him this minute I'll leave the court. [to the men while I read.]

Capt. P. Kite, do you distribute the levy money

Serg. K. Ay, sir. Silence, gentlemen.

Capt. P. (Reads.) "Articles of war against mutiny and desertion. Any soldier who shall presume to quit his post without orders from his commanding officer, shall suffer death."

Welsh C. One death!

Capt. P. (Reads.) "Any soldier who shall presume to indulge in claret, Burgundy, and champagne, out of his private pay, shall suffer death."

Welsh C. Two deaths!

Capt. P. (Reads.) "Any soldier who shall presume to erect churches, hospitals, or other public buildings out of his private pay, shall suffer death."

Welsh C. Three deaths!

Just. B. Very well; now, Captain, let me beg the favour of you not to discharge this fellow upon any account whatsoever. Bring in the rest.

Const. There are no more, an't please your worship.

Just. B. No more? there were five two hours ago.

Syl. 'Tis true, sir; but this rogue of a constable let the rest escape for a bribe of eleven shillings a man; because he said the act allowed him but ten, so the odd shilling was clear gains.

All Just. How!

Syl. Gentlemen, he offered to let me go away for two guineas, but I had not so much about me: this is truth, and I'm ready to swear it.

Serg. K. And I'll swear it: give me the book; 'tis for the good of the service.

Welsh C. May it please your worship, I gave him half-a-crown to say that I was an honest man; but now, since that your worships have made me a rogue, I hope I shall have my money again.

Just. B. 'Tis my opinion that this Constable be put into the Captain's hands; and if his friends don't bring four good men for his ransom by to-morrow night, Captain, you shall carry him to Flanders.

Just. Scale, Just. Scr. Agreed, agreed. [tody.]

Capt. P. Mr. Kite, take the Constable into cus-

Serg. K. Ay, ay, sir. Will you please to have your office taken from you, or will you handsomely lay down your staff, as your betters have done before you? (To the Constable, who drops his staff.)

Just. B. Come, gentlemen, there needs no great ceremony in adjourning this court. Captain, you shall dine with me. [Exeunt Justices, Capt. P. & Syl.]

Serg. K. Come, Mr. Militia Sergeant, I shall silence you now now, I believe, without your taking the law of me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—A Room in Justice Balance's house.

Enter JUSTICE BALANCE and Steward.

Stew. We did not miss her till the evening, sir; and then, searching for her in the chamber that was my young master's, we found her clothes there;

but the suit that your son left in the press when he went to London was gone. [body?

Just. B. You ha'n't told that circumstance to any-Stew. To none but your worship.

Just. B. And be sure you don't. Go and tell Captain Plume that I beg to speak with him.

Stew. I shall. [Exit.

Just. B. Was ever man so imposed upon? I had her promise, indeed, that she would never dispose of herself without my consent. I have consented with a witness; given her away as my act and deed; and this, I warrant, the Captain thinks will pass. No, I shall never pardon him the villany; first of robbing me of my daughter, and then the mean opinion he must have of me to think that I could be so wretchedly imposed upon. Her extravagant passion might encourage her in the attempt, but the contrivance must be his. I'll know the truth presently.

Enter CAPTAIN PLUME.

Pray, Captain, what have you done with our young gentleman soldier?

Capt. P. He's at my quarters, I suppose, with the rest of my men. [soldiers?

Just. B. Does he keep company with the common

Capt. P. No, he's generally with me; but the young rogue fell in love with Rose, and has lain with her, I think, since she came to town.

Just. B. So that between you both, Rose has been finely managed. [from me.

Capt. P. Upon my honour, sir, she had no harm

Just. B. All's safe, I find. (Aside.) Now, Captain, you must know that the young fellow's impudence in court was well grounded: he said I should heartily repent his being listed; and so I do from Capt. P. Ay! for what reason? [my soul.

Just. B. Because he is no less than what he said he was; born of as good a family as any in the county; and he is heir to two thousand pounds a year.

Capt. P. I'm very glad to hear it; for I wanted but a man of that quality to make my company a perfect representative of the whole commons of Just. B. Won't you discharge him? [England.

Capt. P. Not under a hundred pounds sterling.

Just. B. You shall have it; for his father is my intimate friend.

Capt. P. Then you shall have him for nothing.

Just. B. Nay, sir, you shall have your price.

Capt. P. Not a penny, sir; I value an obligation to you much above a hundred pounds.

Just. B. Perhaps, sir, you sha'n't repent your generosity. Will you please to write his discharge in my pocket-book? (Gives his book.) In the meantime, we'll send for the gentleman. Who waits there?

Enter a Servant.

Go to the Captain's lodging, and inquire for Mr. Wilful; tell him his Captain wants him here immediately. [quiring for the Captain.

Serv. Sir, the gentleman's below at the door, in-

Capt. P. Bid him come up. [Exit Serv.] Here's the discharge, sir.

Just. B. Sir, I thank you. 'Tis plain he had no hand in't. (Aside.)

Enter SYLVIA.

Syl. I think, Captain, you might have used me better than to leave me yonder among your swearing, drunken crew; and you, Mr. Justice, might have been so civil as to have invited me to dinner; for I have eaten with as good a man as your worship.

Capt. P. Sir, you must charge our want of respect upon our ignorance of your quality. But now you are at liberty; I have discharged you.

Syl. Discharged me? [home to your father.

Just. B. Yes, sir; and you must once more go

Syl. My father! then I am discovered. Oh, sir! (kneels) I expect no pardon.

Just. B. Pardon! no, no, child; your crime shall be your punishment. Here, Captain, I deliver her over to the conjugal power for her chastisement. Since she will be a wife, be you a husband, a very husband. When she tells you of her love, upbraid her with her folly; be modishly ungrateful, because she has been unfashionably kind; and use her worse than you would anybody else, because you can't use her so well as she deserves.

Capt. P. And are you, Sylvia, in good earnest?

Syl. Earnest! I have gone too far to make it a jest, sir.

Capt. P. And do you give her to me in good earnest? (To Just. B.)

Just. B. If you please to take her, sir.

Capt. P. Why, then, I have saved my legs and arms, and lost my liberty. Secure from wounds, I am prepared for the gout. Farewell subsistence, and welcome taxes. Sir, my liberty and the hopes of being a general are much dearer to me than your two thousand pounds a year; but to your love, madam, I resign my freedom, and to your beauty my ambition; greater in obeying at your feet, than commanding at the head of an army.

Enter WORTHY.

Wor. I am sorry to hear, Mr. Balance, that your daughter is lost. [man has found her.

Just. B. So am not I, sir, since an honest gentle-

Enter MELINDA.

Mel. Pray, Mr. Balance, what's become of my cousin Sylvia? [with your cousin Plume.

Just. B. Your cousin Sylvia is talking yonder

Mel. And Worthy! How?

Syl. Do you think it strange, cousin, that a woman should change? But I hope you'll excuse a change that has proceeded from constancy. I altered my outside because I was the same within; and only laid by the woman to make sure of my man: that's my history.

Mel. Your history is a little romantic, cousin; but since success has crowned your adventures, you will have the world on your side; and I shall be willing to go with the tide, provided you'll pardon an injury I offered you in the letter to your father.

Capt. P. That injury, madam, was done to me; and the reparation I expect shall be made to my friend: make Mr. Worthy happy, and I shall be satisfied.

Mel. A good example, sir, will go a great way. When my cousin is pleased to surrender, 'tis probable I sha'n't hold out much longer.

Re-enter CAPTAIN BRAZEN.

Capt. B. Gentlemen, I am your's. Madam, I am not your's. (To Melinda.)

Mel. I'm glad on't, sir.

Capt. B. So am I. You have got a pretty house here, Mr. Laconic. [sir, is Balancee.

Just. B. 'Tis time to right all mistakes; my name,

Capt. B. Balance! Sir, I am your most obedient. I know your whole generation; had not you an uncle that was governor of the Leeward Islands

Just. B. Did you know him? [some years ago?

Capt. B. Intimately, sir. He played at billiards to a miracle. You had a brother, too, that was a captain of a fire-ship:—poor Dick! he had the most engaging way with him of making punch; and then his cabin was so neat; but his poor boy, Jack, was the most comical bastard: ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! a pickled dog; I shall never forget him.

Capt. P. Have you got your recruits, my dear?

Capt. B. Not a stick, my dear!

Capt. P. Probably I shall furnish you, my dear! instead of the twenty thousand pounds you talked of, you shall have the twenty brave recruits that I have raised at the rate they cost me. My commission I lay down, to be taken up by some braver fellow, that has more merit and less good fortune; whilst I endeavour, by the example of this worthy gentleman, to serve my king and country at home.

With some regret I quit the active field,

Where glory full reward for life does yield;

But the recruiting trade, with all its train

Of endless plague, fatigue, and endless pain,

I gladly quit, with my fair spouse to stay,

And raise recruits the matrimonial way. [Exeunt.

ACT I.—SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter BETTY and SAM.

Betty. The postman is at the gate, Sam; pray step and take in the letters. [Betty.]

Sam. John the gardener is gone for them, Mrs.

Betty. Bid John bring them to me, Sam: tell him I am here in the library.

Sam. I'll send him to your ladyship in a crack. [Exit.]

Enter NANNY.

Nanny. Miss Constantia desires to speak to you, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. How is she now?—any better, Nanny?

Nanny. Something; but very low-spirited still. I verily believe it is as you say.

Betty. O! I would take my book oath of it. I cannot be deceived in that point, Nanny.—Ay, ay, her business is done: she is certainly breeding, depend upon it.

Nanny. Why, so the housekeeper thinks too.

Betty. Nay, I know the father, the man that Nanny. The deuce you do! [ruined her.]

Betty. As sure as you are alive, Nanny; or I am greatly deceived; and yet—I can't be deceived neither. Was not that the cook that came galloping so hard over the common just now?

Nanny. The same: how very hard he galloped! he has been but three quarters of an hour, he says, coming from Hyde-Park Corner.

Betty. And what time will the family be down?

Nanny. He has orders to have dinner ready by five; there are to be lawyers, and a great deal of company here: he fancies there is to be a private wedding to-night, between our young Master Charles, and Lord Lumbercourt's daughter, the Scotch lady; who, he says, is just come post from Bath, in order to be married to him.

Betty. Ay, ay, Lady Rodolpha. Nay, like enough, for I know it has been talked of a good while: well, go tell Miss Constantia that I will be with her immediately.

Nanny. I shall, Mrs. Betty. [Exit.]

Betty. So!—I find they all believe the impertinent creature is breeding—that's pure! it will soon reach my lady's ears, I warrant.

Enter JOHN.

Well, John, ever a letter for me? [Constantia.]

John. No, Mrs. Betty; but here is one for Miss

Betty. Give it me.—Hum! my lady's hand.

John. And here is one, which the postman says is for my young master; but it's a strange direction. (Reads.) To Charles Egerton, Esq.

Betty. O! yes, yes; this is for Master Charles, John; for he has dropped his father's name of Macsycophant, and has taken up that of Egerton: the parliament has ordered it. [Betty?]

John. The parliament!—pr'ythee, why so, Mrs.

Betty. Why, you must know, John, that my lady, his mother, was an Egerton, by her father; she stole a match with our old master, for which all her family, on both sides, have hated Sir Pertinax, and the whole crew of the Macsycophants, ever since; and so, John, my lady's uncle, Sir Stanley Egerton, dying an old bachelor, and, as I said before, mortally hating our old master, and all the crew of the Macsycophants, left his whole estate to Master Charles, who was his godson; but on condition that he should drop his father's name of Macsycophant, and take up that of Egerton; and that is the reason, John, why the parliament has made him change his name.

John. I am glad that Master Charles has got the estate, however; for he is a sweet-tempered gentleman.

Betty. As ever lived. But come, John; as I know you love Miss Constantia, and are fond of being where she is, I will make you happy; you shall carry this letter to her.

John. Shall I, Mrs. Betty? I am very much obliged to you. Where is she?

Betty. In the housekeeper's-room, settling the dessert. Give me Mr. Egerton's letter, and I'll leave it on the table in his dressing-room: I see it is from his brother Sandy.—So; now go and deliver your letter to your sweetheart, John.

John. That I will; and I am much beholden to you for the favour of letting me carry it to her; for though she should never have me, yet I shall always love her, and wish to be near her, she is so sweet a creature.—Your servant, Mrs. Betty. [Exit.]

Betty. Your servant, John. Ha, ha, ha! poor fellow, he perfectly doats on her; and daily follows her about with nosegays and fruit, and the first of every thing in the season.—Ay, and my young master, Charles, too, is in as bad a way as the gardener:—in short, every body loves her, and that's one reason why I hate her. For my part, I wonder what the deuce the men see in her—a creature that was taken in for charity; I'm sure she's not so handsome. I wish she was out of the family once; if she was, I might then stand a chance of being my lady's favourite myself; ay, and perhaps of getting one of my young masters for a sweetheart, or at least the chaplain; but as to him, there would be no such great catch if I should get him. I will try for him, however; and my first step shall be to tell the doctor all I have discovered about Constantia's intrigues with her spark at Hadley.—Yes, that will do; for the doctor loves to talk with me—loves to hear me talk, too; and I verily believe—he, he, he! that he has a sneaking kindness for me; and this story will make him have a good opinion of my honesty, and that, I am sure, will be one step towards—O! bless me, here he comes, and my young master with him. I'll watch an opportunity to speak to him as soon as he is alone; for I will blow her up, I am resolved, as great a favourite, and as cunning as she is. [Exit.]

Enter EGERTON and SIDNEY.

Sid. Nay, dear Charles, but why are you so impetuous? Why do you break from me abruptly?

Eger. (With great warmth.) I have done, sir; you have refused. I have nothing more to say upon the subject. I am satisfied.

Sid. (With a glow of tender friendship.) Come, come, correct this warmth; it is the only weak ingredient in your nature, and you ought to watch it carefully. Because I will not abet an unwarrantable passion by an abuse of my sacred character, in marrying you beneath your rank, and in direct opposition to your father's hopes and happiness, you blame me, you angrily break from me, and call me unkind.

Eger. (With tenderness and conviction.) Dear Sidney, for my warmth I stand condemned; but, for my marriage with Constantia, I think I can justify it upon every principle of filial duty, honour, and worldly prudence.

Sid. Only make that appear, Charles, and you know you may command me.

Eger. (With great filial regret.) I am sensible how unseemly it appears in a son to descant on the unamiable passions of a parent; but, as we are alone, and friends, I cannot help observing, in my own defence, that when a father will not allow the use of reason to any of his family; when his pursuit of greatness makes him a slave abroad, only to be a tyrant at home; when a narrow partiality to Scotland, on every trivial occasion, provokes him to enmity even with his wife and children, only because they give a national preference where they think it most justly due; and when, merely to gratify his own ambition, he would marry his son into a family he detests; (great warmth) sure, Sidney, a son thus circumstanced, (from the dignity of human reason, and the feelings of a loving heart) has a right, not only to protest against the blindness of a parent, but to pursue those measures that virtue and happiness point out.

Sid. The violent temper of Sir Pertinax, I own, cannot be defended on many occasions; but still—your intended alliance with Lord Lumbercourt—

Eger. (With great impatience.) O! contemptible!—a trifling, quaint, haughty, voluptuous, servile tool! the mere lacquey of party and corruption; who, for the prostitution of nearly thirty years, and the ruin of a noble fortune, has had the despicable satisfaction, and the infamous honour, of being kicked up and kicked down, kicked in and kicked out, just as the insolence, compassion, or convenience of leaders predominated: and now, being forsaken by all parties, his whole political consequence amounts to the power of franking a letter, and the right honourable privilege of not paying a tradesman's bill.

Sid. Well, but dear Charles, you are not to wed my lord, but his daughter.

Eger. Who is as disagreeable to me for a companion, as her father for a friend or an ally.

Sid. What, her Scotch accent, I suppose, offends you.

Eger. No, upon my honour, not in the least; I think it entertaining in her: but, were it otherwise, in decency, and indeed in national affection, being a Scotchman myself, I can have no objection to her on that account:—besides, she is my near relation.

Sid. So I understand. But pray, Charles, how came Lady Rodolpha, who I find was born in England, to be bred in Scotland?

Eger. From the dotage of an old, formal, obstinate, stiff, rich, Scotch grandmother; who, upon a promise of leaving this grandchild all her fortune, would have the girl sent to her to Scotland, when she was but a year old; and there has she been ever since, bred up with this old lady, in all the vanity and unlimited indulgence that fondness and admiration could bestow on a spoiled child, a fancied beauty, and a pretended wit: (in a tone of friendly affection) and is this a woman fit to make my happiness? this the partner that Sidney would recommend to me for life? to you, who best know me, I appeal.

Sid. Why, Charles, it is a delicate point, unfit for me to determine; besides, your father has set his heart upon the match.

Eger. (Impatiently.) All that I know—but still I ask and insist upon your candid judgment—is she the kind of woman that you think could possibly contribute to my happiness? I beg you will give me an explicit answer.

Sid. The subject is disagreeable; but, since I must speak, I do not think she is.

Eger. (In a start of friendly rapture.) I know you do not; and I am sure you never will advise

Sid. I never will—I never will. [the match.]

Eger. (With a start of joy.) You make me happy; which, I assure you, I never could be with your judgment against me in this point.

Sid. But pray, Charles, suppose I had been so indiscreet as to have agreed to marry you to Constantia, would she have consented, think you?

Eger. That I cannot say positively; but I suppose so. [ject, then?]

Sid. Did you never speak to her upon that sub-

Eger. In general terms only; never directly requested her consent in form: (he starts into a warmth of amorous resolution) but I will this very moment, for I have no asylum from my father's arbitrary design, but my Constantia's arms. Pray do not stir from hence; I will return instantly. I know she will submit to your advice; and I am sure you will persuade her to my wish, as my life, my peace, my earthly happiness, depend on my Constantia. [Exit.]

Sid. Poor Charles! he little dreams that I love Constantia too; but to what degree I knew not myself, till he importuned me to join their hands. Yes, I love; but must not be a rival, for he is dear to me as fraternal affinity.

Enter BETTY.

Betty. (Running up to Sidney.) I beg pardon for my intrusion, sir. I hope, sir, I don't disturb your reverence.

Sid. Not in the least, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. I humbly beg you will excuse me, sir; but I wanted to break my mind to your honour, about a scruple that lies upon my conscience; and indeed I should not have presumed to trouble you, sir, but that I know you are my young master's friend, and my old master's friend, and, indeed, a friend to the whole family; (curtsying very low) for, to give you your due, sir, you are as good a preacher as ever went into a pulpit.

Sid. Ha, ha, ha! do you think so, Mrs. Betty?

Bet. Ay, in truth do I; and as good a gentleman, too, as ever came into a family, and one that never gives a servant a bad word, nor that does any one an ill turn, neither behind their back nor before their face.

Sid. Ha, ha, ha! why, you are a mighty well-spoken woman, Mrs. Betty; and I am mightily beholden to you for your good character of me.

Bet. Indeed, it is no more than you deserve, and what all the world and all the servants say of you.

Sid. I am much obliged to them, Mrs. Betty; but, pray, what are your commands with me?

Betty. Why, I'll tell you, sir;—to be sure, I am but a servant, as a body may say, and every tub should stand upon its own bottom; but—(she looks about cautiously) my young master is now in the china-room, in close conference with Miss Constantia. I know what they are about, but that is no business of mine; and, therefore, I made bold to listen a little; because, you know, sir, one would be sure, before one took away anybody's reputation.

Sid. Very true, Mrs. Betty; very true, indeed.

Betty. O! heavens forbid that I should take away any young woman's good name, unless I had a good reason for it; but, sir, (with great solemnity) if I am in this place alive, as I listened with my ear close to the door, I heard my young master ask Miss Constantia the plain marriage question; upon which I started and trembled, nay, my very conscience stirred within me so, that I could not help peeping through the key-hole.

Sid. Ha, ha, ha! and so your conscience made you peep through the key-hole, Mrs. Betty?

Betty. It did, indeed, sir; and there I saw my young master upon his knees—lord bless us! and what do you think he was doing?—kissing her hand as if he would eat it; and protesting and assuring her he knew that you, sir, would consent to the match; and then the tears ran down her cheeks.

Sid. Ay! [as fast—

Betty. They did indeed. I would not tell your reverence a lie for the world.

Sid. I believe it, Mrs. Betty; and what did Constantia say to all this?

Betty. Oh!—Oh! she is sly enough; she looks as if butter would not melt in her mouth; but all is not gold that glitters; smooth water, you know, sir, runs deepest. I am sorry my young master makes such a fool of himself; but, um—take my word for it, he is not the man; for, though she looks as modest as a maid at a christening,—(hesitating)—yet—ah!—when sweethearts meet, in the dusk of the evening, and stay together a whole hour, in the dark grove, and embrace, and kiss, and weep at parting—why, then, you know, sir, it is easy to guess all the rest. [manner?

Sid. Why did Constantia meet anybody in this

Betty. (Starting with surprise.) O! heavens! I beg, sir, you will not misapprehend me; for, I assure you, I do not believe they did any harm; that is, not in the grove; at least not when I was there; and she may be honestly married for aught I know. O! lud, sir, I would not say an ill thing of Miss Constantia for the world. I only say that they did meet in the dark walk; and all the servants observe that Miss Constantia wears her stays very loose, looks very pale, is sick in the morning and after dinner; and, as sure as my name is Betty Hint, something has happened that I won't name; but, nine months hence, a certain person in this family may ask me to stand godmother; for I think I know what's what, when I see it, as well as ano-

Sid. No doubt you do, Mrs. Betty. [ther.

Betty. (Going and returning.) I do, indeed, sir; and so, your servant, sir. But I hope your worship won't mention my name in this business; or that you had an item from me.

Sid. I shall not, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. For, indeed, sir, I am no busybody, no do I love fending nor proving; and I assure you sir, I hate all tittling and tattling, and gossiping, and backbiting, and taking away a person's good

Sid. I observe you do, Mrs. Betty. [name.

Betty. I do, indeed, sir. I am the farthest from it in the world.

Sid. I dare say you are. [servant.

Betty. I am indeed, sir; and so your humble

Sid. Your servant, Mrs. Betty.

Betty. (Aside, in great exultation.) So! I see he believes every word I say—that's charming. I'll do her business for her, I'm resolved. [Exit.

Sid. What can this ridiculous creature mean by her dark walk, her private spark, her kissing, and all her slanderous insinuations against Constantia, whose conduct is as unblameable as innocence itself? I see envy is as malignant in a paltry waiting wench, as in the vainest or most ambitious lady of the court. It is always an infallible mark of the basest nature; and merit in the lowest, as well as in the highest station, must feel the shaft of envy's constant agents—falsehood and slander. [Exit.

ACT II.—SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter CONSTANTIA and EGERTON.

Con. Mr. Sidney is not here, sir.

Eger. I assure you I left him, and begged he would stay till I returned.

Con. His prudence, you see, sir, has made him retire; therefore we had better defer the subject till he is present; in the meantime, sir, I hope you will permit me to mention an affair that has greatly alarmed and perplexed me: I suppose you guess

Eger. I do not upon my word. [what it is?

Con. That is a little strange. You know, sir, that you and Mr. Sidney did me the honour of breakfasting with me this morning in my little study.

Eger. We had that happiness, madam.

Con. Just after you left me, upon opening my book of accounts, which lay in the drawer of the reading-desk, to my great surprise, I there found this case of jewels, containing a most elegant pair of ear-rings, a necklace of great value, and two bank-bills in this pocket-book, the mystery of which, sir, I presume, you can explain?

Eger. I can.

Con. They were of your conveying, then?

Eger. They were, madam.

Con. I assure you, they startled and alarmed me.

Eger. I hope it was a kind of alarm, such as blushing virtue feels, when with her hand, she gives her heart and last consent.

Con. It was not, indeed, sir.

Eger. Do not say so, Constantia: come, be kind at once; my peace and worldly bliss depend upon this moment.

Con. What would you have me do?

Eger. What love and virtue dictate.

Con. O! sir, experience but too severely proves, that such unequal matches as ours, never produce aught but contempt and anger in parents, censure from the world, and a long train of sorrow and repentance in the wretched parties; which is but too often entailed upon their hapless issue.

Eger. But that, Constantia, cannot be our case: my fortune is independent and ample; equal to luxury and splendid folly. I have a right to choose the partner of my heart.

Con. But I have not, sir; I am a dependant on my lady—a poor, forsaken, helpless orphan: your benevolent mother found me, took me to her bosom, and there supplied my parental loss, with every tender care, indulgent dalliance, and with all the sweet persuasion that maternal fondness, religious precept, polished manners, and hourly example could administer—she fostered me: (weeps) and shall I now turn viper, and with black ingratitude sting the tender heart that thus hath cherished me? shall I seduce her house's heir, and kill her peace? No; though I loved to the mad extreme of female fondness; though every worldly bliss, that woman's vanity or man's ambition could desire, followed the indulgence of my love, and all the contempt and misery of this life, the denial of that indulgence, I would discharge my duty to my benefactress—my earthly guardian, my more than parent.

Eger. My dear Constantia, your prudence, your gratitude, and the cruel virtue of your self-denial, do but increase my love, my admiration, and my misery.

Con. Sir, I must beg you will give me leave to return these bills and jewels.

Eger. Pray do not mention them: sure my kindness and esteem may be indulged so far without suspicion or reproach: I beg you will accept of them; nay, I insist.

Con. I have done, sir; my station here is to obey. I know, sir, they are gifts of a virtuous mind; and mine shall convert them to the tenderest and most grateful use.

Eger. Hark! I hear a coach; it is my father. Dear girl, retire and compose yourself. I will send my lady and Sidney to you; and by their judgment we will be directed: will that satisfy you?

Con. I can have no will but my lady's. With your leave, I will retire; I would not see her in this confusion.

Eger. Dear girl, adieu! [Exit Constantia.
Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir Pertinax and my lady are come, sir; and my lady desires to speak with you in her own room.—Oh! here she is, sir. [Exit.

Enter LADY MACSYCOPHANT.

Lady M. (In great confusion and distress.) Dear child, I am glad to see you; why did not you come to town yesterday, to attend the levee? your father is incensed to the utmost at your not being there.

Eger. (With great warmth.) Madam, it is with extreme regret I tell you, that I can be no longer a slave to his temper, his politics, and his scheme of marrying me to this woman; therefore, you had better consent at once to my going out of the kingdom, and my taking Constantia with me; for without her I never can be happy.

Lady M. As you regard my peace, or your own character, I beg you will not be guilty of so rash a step. You promised me you never would marry her without my consent. I will open it to your father. Pray, dear Charles, be ruled: let me prevail.

Sir P. (Without, in great anger.) Sir, wull ye do as ye are bid, and haud your gab, you rascal! You are so full of gab, you scoundrel! Take the chesnut gelding, return to town directly, and see what is become of my Lord Lumbercourt.

Lady M. Here he comes. I will get out of his way; but, I beg, Charles, while he is in this ill-humour, that you will not oppose him, let him say what he will: when his passion is a little cool, I will return, and try to bring him to reason; but do not thwart him.

Eger. Madam, I will not. [Exit Lady M.

Sir P. (Without.) Here, you Tomlins, where is my son Egerton?

Tom. (Without.) In the library, sir.

Sir P. (Without.) As soon as the lawyers come, be sure bring me word.

Enter SIR PERTINAX.

Sir P. Weel, sir! vary weel! vary weel! are nat ye a fine spark? are ye nat a fine spark, I say?

Ah! you are a—So you wou'd not come up till the levee?

Eger. Sir, I beg your pardon; but I was not very well; besides, I did not think my presence there was necessary.

Sir P. (Snapping him up.) Sir, it was necessary; I tauld you it was necessary: and sir, I must now tell you that the whole tenor of your conduct is most offensive.

Eger. I am sorry you think so, sir; I am sure I do not mean to offend you.

Sir P. I care not what you intend. Sir, I tell you, you do offend. What is the meaning of this conduct, sir?—Neglect the levee!—'death, sir, you—what is your reason, I say, for thus neglecting the levee, and disobeying my commands?

Eger. (With a stifled, filial resentment.) Sir, I am not used to levees; nor do I know how to dispose of myself; nor what to say or do in such a situation.

Sir P. (With a proud, angry resentment.) Zounds! sir, do you nat see what others do? gentle and simple, temporal and spiritual, lords, members, judges, generals, and bishops; aw crowding, bustling, and pushing foremost intill the middle of the circle, and there waiting, watching, and striving to catch a look or a smile fra the great mon, which they meet wi' an amicable reesibility of aspect—a modest cadence of body, and a conciliating co-operation of the whole mon; which expresses an officious promptitude for his service, and indicates that they luock upon themselves as the suppliant appendages of his power, and the enlisted Swiss of his poleetical fortune; this, sir, is what you ought to do; and this, sir, is what I never once omitted for this five-and-thraty years, let who would be minister.

Eger. (Aside.) Contemptible!

Sir P. What is that you mutter, sir? [to you.

Eger. Only a slight reflection, sir, not relative

Sir P. Sir, your absenting yoursel fra the levee at this juncture is suspicious; it is looked upon as a kind of disaffection, and aw your countrymen are highly offended at your conduct. For this, sir, they do not look upon you as a friend or weel-wisher either to Scotland or Scotchmen.

Eger. (With a quick warmth.) Then, sir, they wrong me, I assure you; but, pray, sir, in what particular can I be charged, either with coldness or offence to my country?

Sir P. Why, sir, ever since your mother's uncle, Sir Stanley Egerton, left you his three thousand pounds a-year, and that you have, in compliance with his will, taken up the name of Egerton, they think you are grown proud; that you have estranged yourself fra the Macsycophants; have associated with your mother's family—with the opposection; and with those who do not wish well to Scotland: besides, sir, the other day, in a conversation, at dinner, at your cousin Campbell M'Kenzie's, before a whole table full of your ain relations, did you not publicly wish a total extinguishment to aw party, and of aw national distinctions whatever, relative to the three kingdoms? (With great anger.) And, you blockhead! was that a prudent wish before so many of your ain countrymen? or was it a filial language to hold before me?

Eger. Sir, with your pardon, I cannot think it unfilial or imprudent. (With a most patriotic warmth.) I own I do wish, most ardently wish, for a total extinction of all party; particularly, that those of English, Irish, and Scotch, might never more be brought into contest or competition; unless, like loving brothers, in generous emulation for one common cause.

Sir P. How, sir! do you persist? What! would you banish aw party, and aw distinction between English, Irish, and your ain countrymen? [sir.

Eger. (With great dignity of spirit.) I would,

Sir P. Then d—n you, sir; you are nae true Scot. Ay, sir, you may look as angry as you will, but again, I say, you are nae true Scot.

Eger. Your pardon, sir; I think he is the true Scot and the true citizen, who wishes equal justice to the merit and demerit of every subject of Great Britain; amongst whom I know but of two distinctions. [those?]

Sir P. Weel, sir, and what are those—what are Eger. The knave and the honest man.

Sir P. Psha! rideeculous!

Eger. And he who makes any other, let him be of the north, or of the south—of the east, or of the west—in place, or out of place, is an enemy to the whole, and to the virtues of humanity.

Sir P. Ay, sir, this is your brother's impudent doctrine; for the which I have banished him for ever fra my presence, my heart, and my fortune. Sir, I will have no son of mine, because truly he has been educated in an English seminary, presume, under the mask of candour, to speak against his native land, or against my principles. Scotchmen, sir, Scotchmen, wherever they meet throughout aw the globe, should unite, and stick together, as it were, in a political phalanx. However, nae mair of that now; I will talk at large to you about that anon. In the meanwhile, sir, notwithstanding your contempt of my advice, and your disobedience till my commands, I will convince you of my paternal attention till your welfare, by my management of this voluptuary, this Lord Lumbercourt, whose daughter you are to marry. You ken, sir, that the fellow has been my patron above these five-and-thraty

Eger. True, sir. [years.]

Sir P. Vary weel. And now, sir, you see, by his prodigality, he is become my dependant; and, accordingly, I have made my bargain with him: the devil a baubee he has in the world but what comes through these clutches; for his whole estate, which has three impleecit boroughs upon it—mark!—is now in my custody at nurse; the which estate, on my paying off his debts, and allowing him a life-rent of five thousand pounds per annum, is to be made over till me for my life, and at my death is to descend till ye and your issue. The peerage of Lumbercourt, you ken, will follow of course. So, sir, you see, there are three impleecit boroughs, the whole patrimony of Lumbercourt, and a peerage at one slap. Why, it is a stroke—a hit—a hit. Zounds! sir, a mon may live a century, and not make sic an hit again.

Eger. It is a very advantageous bargain indeed, sir; but what will my lord's family say to it.

Sir P. Why, mon, he cares not if his family were aw at the devil, so his luxury is but gratified: only let him have his race-horse to feed his vanity; his harridan to drink drams with him, scrat his face, and burn his periwig, when she is in her maudlin hysterics; and three or four discontented patriotic dependants, to abuse the ministry, and settle the affairs of the nation, when they are aw intoxicated; and then, sir, the fellow has aw his wishes, and aw his wants, in this world and the next.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Lady Rodolpha is come, sir.

Sir P. And my lord? [servants say.]

Tom. Not yet, sir; he is about a mile behind, the Sir P. Let me know the instant he arrives.

Tom. I shall, sir. [Exit.]

Sir P. Step you out, Charles, and receive Lady Rodolpha; and I desire you will treat her with as much respect and gallantry as possible; for my lord has hinted that you have been very remiss as a lover. Adzooks! Charles, you should administer a whole torrent of flattery till her; for a woman ne'er thinks a mon loves her, till he has made an idiot of her understanding by flattery: flattery is the prime bliss of the sex, the nectar and ambrosia of their charms, and you can ne'er gi' 'em o'er muckle on't; so, there's a guid lad, gang and mind your flattery. [Exit Egerton.] Ah! I must keep a devilish tight hand upon this fellow. Ah! I am frightened out of my wits, lest his mother's family should seduce him to desert to their party, which would totally ruin my whole scheme, and break my heart. A fine time of day for a blockhead to turn patriot—when the character is exploded, marked, proscribed! Why, the common people, the vary vulgar, have found out the jest, and laugh at a patriot now-a-days, just as they do at a conjurer, a magician, or any other impostor in society.

Enter TOMLINS and LORD LUMBERCOURT.

Tom. Lord Lumbercourt. [Exit.]

Lord L. Sir Pertinax, I kiss your hand.

Sir P. Your lordship's most devoted.

Lord L. Why, you stole a march upon me this morning; gave me the slip, Mac; though I never wanted your assistance more in my life. I thought you would have called upon me.

Sir P. My dear lord, I beg ten millions of pardons for leaving town before you; but ye ken that your lordship, at dinner yesterday, settled it that we should meet this morning at the levee.

Lord L. That I acknowledge, Mac; I did promise to be there, I own.

Sir P. You did, indeed; and accordingly I was at the levee, and waited there till every soul was gone; and seeing you did not come, I concluded that your lordship was gone before.

Lord L. Why, to confess the truth, my dear Mac, those old sinners, Lord Freakish, General Jolly, Sir Anthony Soaker, and two or three more of that set, laid hold of me last night at the opera; and, as the General says, "from the intelligence of my head this morning," I believe we drank pretty deep ere we parted; ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! nay, if you were with that party, my lord, I do not wonder at not seeing your lordship at the levee.

Lord L. The truth is, Sir Pertinax, my fellow let me sleep too long for the levee. But I wish I had seen you before you left town; I wanted you dreadfully.

Sir P. I am heartily sorry that I was not in the way; but on what account did you want me?

Lord L. Ha, ha, ha! a cursed awkward affair; and—ha, ha, ha!—yet, I can't help laughing at it, neither, though it vexed me confoundedly.

Sir P. Vexed you, my lord? Zounds! I wish I had been with you! But, for heaven's sake! my lord, what was it that could possibly vex your lordship?

Lord L. Why, that impudent, teasing, dunning, rascal, Mahogany, my uphosterer: you know the

Sir P. Perfectly, my lord. [fellow?]

Lord L. The impudent scoundrel has sued me up to some d—d kind of a—something or other in the law, that I think they call an execution.

Sir P. The rascal!

Lord L. Upon which, sir, the fellow, by way of asking pardon—ha, ha, ha!—had the modesty to wait on me two or three days ago, to inform my honour—ha, ha, ha!—as he was pleased to dignify me, that the execution was now ready to be put in force against my honour; but that, out of respect to my honour, as he had taken a great deal of my honour's money, he would not suffer his lawyer to serve it, till he had first informed my honour; because he was not willing to affront my honour—ha, ha, ha!—a son of a w—!

Sir P. I never heard of so impudent a dog.

Lord L. Now, my dear Mac—ha, ha, ha!—as the scoundrel's apology was so very satisfactory, and his information so very agreeable, I told him that, in honour, I thought that my honour could not do less than to order his honour to be paid immediately.

Sir P. Vary weel, vary weel! you were as complaisant to the scoundrel till the full, I think, my lord.

Lord L. You shall hear, you shall hear, Mac: so sir, with great composure, seeing a smart oaken cudgel that stood very handily in a corner of my dressing-room, I ordered two of my fellows to hold the rascal, and another to take the cudgel, and return the scoundrel's civility with a good drubbing, as long as the stick lasted.

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! admirable! as good a stroke of humour as ever I heard of. And, did they drub him, my lord?

Lord L. Most liberally, most liberally, sir; and there I thought the affair would have rested, till I should think proper to pay the scoundrel; but this morning, just as I was stepping into my chaise, my servants about me, a fellow called a tipstaff, stepped up, and begged the favour of my footman, who thrashed the upholsterer, and of the two that held him, to go along with him upon a little business to my Lord Chief Justice.

Sir P. The devil!

Lord L. And, at the same instant, I, in my turn, was accosted by two other very civil scoundrels; who, with a most insolent politeness, begged my pardon, and informed me that I must not go into my own chaise!

Sir P. How, my lord, not into your ain carriage?

Lord L. No, sir; for that they, by order of the sheriff, must seize it, at the suit of a gentleman—one Mr. Mahogany, an upholsterer.

Sir P. An impudent villain!

Lord L. It is all true, I assure you; so you see, my dear Mac, what a d—d country this is to live in, where noblemen are obliged to pay their debts just like merchants, cobblers, peasants, or mechanics: is not that a scandal, dear Mac, to this nation?

Sir P. My lord, it is not only a scandal, but a national grievance.

Lord L. Sir, there's not a nation in the world has such a grievance to complain of.

Sir P. Vary true, my lord, vary true; and it is monstrous that a mon of your lordship's condition is not entitled to run one of these mechanics through the body when he is impertinent about his money; but our laws shamefully, on these occasions, make no distinction of persons amongst us.

Lord L. A vile policy, indeed, Sir Pertinax. But, sir, the scoundrel has seized upon the house, too, that I furnished for the girl I took from the opera.

Sir P. I never heard of sic an a scoundrel!

Lord L. Ay, but what concerns me most, I am afraid, my dear Mac, that the villain will send down to Newmarket, and seize my string of horses.

Sir P. Your string of horses? Zounds! we must prevent that at all events, that would be sic a disgrace. I will despatch an express to town directly, to put a stop till the rascal's proceedings.

Lord L. Pr'ythee do, my dear Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. O! it shall be done, my lord.

Lord L. Thou art an honest fellow, Sir Pertinax, upon honour!

Sir P. O! my lord, is is my duty to oblige your lordship to the utmost stretch of my abeility.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Colonel Toper presents his compliments to you, sir; and having no family down with him in the country, he and Captain Hardbottle, if not inconvenient, will do themselves the honour of taking a family dinner with you.

Sir P. They are two of our militia-officers: does your lordship know them?

Lord L. By sight only. [our business.]

Sir P. I am afraid, my lord, they will interrupt

Lord L. Not at all: I should be glad to be acquainted with Toper; they say he's a jolly fellow.

Sir P. O! devilish jolly, devilish jolly; he and the Captain are the two hardest drinkers in the country.

Lord L. So I have heard: let us have them by all means, Mac; they will enliven the scene. How far are they from you?

Sir P. Just across the meadows; not half a mile, my lord; a step, a step.

Lord L. O! let's have the jolly dogs, by all means.

Sir P. My compliments, I shall be proud of their company. [Exit Tomlins.] Guif ye please, my lord, we will gang and chat a bit with the women; I have not seen Lady Rodolpha since she returned fra the Bath. I long to have a little news from her about the company there.

Lord L. O! she'll give you an account of them, I warrant you. (A very loud laugh without.)

Lady R. (Without.) Ha, ha, ha! weel, I vow, cousin Egerton, you have a vast deal of shrewd humour. But, Lady Macsycophant, which way is Sir Pertinax?

Lady M. (Without.) Straight forward, madam.

Lord L. Here the hairbrain comes: it must be her by the noise.

Lady R. (Without.) Allons, gude folks; fallow me—sans ceremonie.

Enter LADY RODOLPHA, LADY MACSYCOPHANT, EGERTON, and SIDNEY.

Lady R. (Running up to Sir P.) Sir Pertinax, your most devoted, must obsequious, most obedient vassal. (Curtsies very low.)

Sir P. (Bowing ridiculously low.) Lady Rodolpha, down till the ground, my congratulations and duty attend you; and I should rejoice to kiss your ladyship's footsteps.

Lady R. (Curtsying very low.) Oh! Sir Pertinax, your humeility is most sublimely complaisant; at present unanswerable; but I shall intensely study to return it fifty fold.

Sir P. Your ladyship does me singular honour. Weel, madam; ha! you look gaily; weel, and how, how is your ladyship after your jaunt till Bath?

Lady R. Never better, Sir Pertinax; as weel as youth, health, riotous spirits, and a careless, happy heart can make me.

Sir P. I am mightily glad till hear it, my lady.

Lord L. Ay, ay; Rodolpha is always in spirits, Sir Pertinax. Vive la bagatelle is the philosophy of our family: ha, Rodolpha, ha?

Lady R. Traith it is, my lord; and upon honour, I am determined it shall never be changed with my consent. Weel, I vow—ha, ha, ha! Vive la bagatelle would be a most brilliant motto for the chariot of a belle of fashion. What say you till my fancy, Lady Macsycophant? [commend it, madam.]

Lady M. It would have novelty, at least, to re-

Lady R. Which of aw charms is the most delightful that can accompany wit, taste, love, or friendship; for novelty I take to be the true je ne scai quoi of all worldly bliss. Cousin Egerton, should not you like to have a wife with vive la bagatelle upon her wedding chariot?

Eger. O! certainly, madam.

Lady R. Yes, I think it would be quite out of the common, and singularly ailegant.

Eger. Indisputably, madam; for, as a motto is a word to the wise, or rather a broad hint to the whole world of a person's taste and principles, vive la bagatelle would be most expressive, at first sight, of your ladyship's characteristic.

Lady R. (Curtsies.) Oh! Maister Egerton, you touch my very heart with your approbation: ha, ha, ha! that is the vary spirit of my intention, the instant I commence bride. Weel, I am immensely proud that my fancy has the approbation of so sound an understanding, and so polished a taste, as that of the all-accomplished (curtsies) Mr. Egerton.

Sir P. Weel, but, Lady Rodolpha, I wanted to ask your ladyship some questions about the company at the Bath; they say you had aw the world there.

Lady R. O, yes! there was a vary great mob there indeed, but vary little company. Aw canaille, except our ain party. The place was crowded with your little purse-proud mechanics; an odd kind of queer-looking animals, that have started intill fortune fra lottery-tickets, rich prizes at sea, gambling in 'Change-alley, and sic like caprices of fortune; and away they aw crowd to the Bath, to learn gentility, and the names, titles, intrigues, and bon-mots of us people of fashion—ha, ha, ha!

Lord L. Ha, ha, ha! I know them; I know the things you mean, my dear, extremely well. I have observed them a thousand times, and wondered where the devil they all came from—ha, ha, ha!

Lady M. Pray, Lady Rodolpha, what were your diversions at Bath?

Lady R. Guid traith, my lady, the company were my diversion; and better nae human follies ever afforded—ha, ha, ha! sic an a mixture, and sic oddities!—ha, ha, ha! a perfect gallimaufry. Lady Kunegunda M'Kenzie and I used to gang about till every part of this human chaos, on purpose to reconnoitre the monsters, and pick up their frivolities—ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! why that must have been a high entertainment till your ladyship.

Lady R. Superlative and inexhaustible, Sir Pertinax—ha, ha, ha! Madam, we had in one group, a peer and a sharper, a duchess and a pinmaker's wife; a boarding-school miss and her grandmother; a fat parson, a lean general, and a yellow admiral—ha, ha, ha! aw speaking together, and bawling and wrangling in fierce contention, as if the fame and fortune of aw the parties were to be the issue of the conflict. [object of their contention?

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! pray, madam, what was the Lady R. O! a vary important one, I assure you; of no less consequence, madam, than how an odd trick at whist was lost, or might have been saved.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady R. In another party, Sir Pertinax—ha, ha, ha! we had what was called the cabinet council, which was composed of a duke and a haberdasher, a red-hot patriot and a sneering courtier, a discarded statesman and his scribbling chaplain, with a busy, bawling, muckle-headed prerogative lawyer; all of whom were every minute ready to gang together by the luggs, about the in and the out meenistry—ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! weel, that is a droll motley cabinet, I vow. Vary whimsical, upon honour! But they are all great politicians at Bath, and settle a meenistry there with as much ease as they do the tune of a country dance.

Lady R. Then, Sir Pertinax, in a retired part of the room, in a by-corner, snug, we had a Jew and a bishop.

Sir P. A Jew and a bishop! ha, ha! a devilish guid connection that: and pray, my lady, what were they about?

Lady R. Why, sir, the bishop was striving to convert the Jew; while the Jew, by intervals, was slyly picking up intelligence fra the bishop, about the change in the meenistry, in hopes of making a stroke in the stocks.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! admirable! admirable! I honour the smouse! ha! it was devilish clever of him, my lord, devilish clever! The Jew distilling the bishop's brains.

Lord L. Yes, yes; the fellow kept a sharp look-out. I think it was a fair trial of skill on both sides, Mr. Egerton.

Eger. True, my lord; but the Jew seems to have been in the fairer way to succeed.

Lord L. O! all to nothing, sir—ha, ha, ha! Well, child, I like your Jew and your bishop much. It's devilish clever. Let us have the rest of the history, pray, my dear.

Lady R. Guid traith, my lord, the sum total is, that there we aw danced, and wrangled, and flattered, and slandered, and gambled, and cheated, and mingled, and jumbled together, even like the animal assembly in Noah's ark.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord L. Ha, ha, ha! Well, you are a droll girl, Rodolpha; and, upon my honour—ha, ha, ha! you have given us as whimsical a sketch as ever was hit off. What say you, Mr. Sidney?

Sid. Upon my word, my lord, the lady has made me see the whole assembly in distinct colours.

Lady R. O! Maister Sidney, your approbation makes me as vain as a reigning toast before her looking-glass.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Colonel Toper and Captain Hardbottle are come, sir.

Sir P. O! vary weel. Dinner directly.

Tom. It is ready, sir. [Exit.

Sir P. My lord, we attend your lordship.

Lord L. Lady Mac, your ladyship's hand if you please. [Exit with Lady M.

Sir P. And here, Lady Rodolpha, is an Arcadian swain that has a hand at your ladyship's devotion.

Lady R. (Giving her hand to Egerton.) And I, sir, have one at his. There, sir; as to hearts, ye ken, cousin, they are not brought into the account of human dealings now-a-days.

Eger. O! madam, they are mere temporary baubles, especially in courtship; and no more to be depended upon than the weather, or a lottery-ticket.

Lady R. Ha, ha, ha! twa excellent similies, I vow, Mr. Egerton. Excellent! for they illustrate the vagaries and inconstancy of my dissipated heart, as exactly as if you had meant to describe it.

[Exit with Egerton.

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! what a vast fund of spirits and guid humour she has, Maister Sidney!

Sid. A great fund, indeed, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Come, let us till dinner. Ah! by this time to-morrow, Maister Sidney, I hope we shall have every thing ready for you to put the last hand till the happiness of your friend and pupil; and then, sir, my cares will be over for this life; for as to my other son, I expect nae guid of him, nor should I grieve, were I to see him in his coffin: but this match—O! it will make me the happiest of aw human beings. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter SIR PERTINAX and EGERTON.

Sir P. (In warm resentment.) Zounds! sir, I will not hear a word about it: I insist upon it you are wrong; you should have paid your court till my lord, and not have scrupled swallowing a bumper or twa, or twenty till oblige him.

Eger. Sir, I did drink his toast in a bumper.

Sir P. Yes, you did; but how, how? just as a bairn takes physic; with aversions and wry faces, which my lord observed: then, to mend the matter, the moment that he and the Colonel got intill a drunken dispute about religion, you slyly slunged away.

Eger. I thought, sir, it was time to go, when my lord insisted upon half-pint bumpers.

Sir P. Sir, that was not levelled at you, but at the Colonel, in order to try his bottom; but they aw agreed that you and I should drink out of sma' glasses. [to drink any more.

Eger. But, sir, I beg pardon: I did not choose

Sir P. But, zoons! sir, I tell you there was a necessity for your drinking more.

Eger. A necessity! in what respect, pray, sir?

Sir P. Why, sir, I have a certain point to carry, independent of the lawyers, with my lord, in this agreement of your marriage; about which I am afraid we shall have a warm squabble; and therefore I wanted your assistance in it.

Eger. But how, sir, could my drinking contribute to assist you in your squabble?

Sir P. Yes, sir, it would have contributed—and greatly have contributed to assist me.

Eger. How so, sir?

Sir P. Nay, sir, it might have prevented the squabble entirely; for as my lord is proud of you for a son-in-law, and is fond of your little French songs, your stories, and your bon-mots, when you are in the humour; and guin you had but staid, and been a little jolly, and drank half a score bumpers with him, till he had got a little tipsy, I am sure, when we had him in that mood, we might have settled the point as I could wish it among ourselves, before the lawyers came: but now, sir, I do not ken what will be the consequence.

Eger. But when a man is intoxicated, would that have been a seasonable time to settle business, sir?

Sir P. The most seasonable, sir: for sir, when my lord is in his cups, his suspicion is asleep, and his heart is aw jollity, fun, and guid fellowship; and, sir, can there be a happier moment than that for a bargain, or to settle a dispute with a friend? What is it you shrug up your shoulders at, sir?

Eger. At my own ignorance, sir: for I understand neither the philosophy, nor the morality of your doctrine.

Sir P. I know you do not, sir: and, what is worse, you never wull understand it, as you proceed: in one word, Charles, I have often told you, and now again I tell you, once for aw, that the manœuvres of pliability are as necessary to rise in the world, as wrangling and logical subtlety are to rise at the bar: why you see, sir, I have acquired a noble fortune, a princely fortune; and how do you think I raised it?

Eger. Doubtless, sir, by your abilities.

Sir P. Doubtless, sir, you are a blockhead: nae, sir, I'll tell you how I raised it: sir, I raised it—by boeing, (bows ridiculously low) by boeing: sir, I never could stand straight in the presence of a great mon, but always booed, and booed, and booed—as it were by instinct.

Eger. How do you mean by instinct, sir?

Sir P. How do I mean by instinct! Why, sir, I mean by—by—by the instinct of interest, sir, which is the universal instinct of mankind. Sir, it is wonderful to think what a cordial, what an amicable—nay, what an infallible influence boeing has upon the pride and vanity of human nature. Charles, answer me sincerely, have you a mind to be convinced of the force of my doctrine by example

Eger. Certainly, sir. [and demonstration?]

Sir P. Then, sir, as the greatest favour I can confer upon you, I'll give you a short sketch of the stages of my boeing, as an excitement, and a landmark for you to boo by, and as an infallible nostrum for a man of the world to rise in the world.

Eger. Sir, I shall be proud to profit by your experience.

Sir P. Vary weel, sir; sit ye down then, sit you down here. (They sit down.) And now, sir, you must recall to your thoughts, that your grandfather was a mon, whose penurious income of captain's half-pay was the sum total of his fortune; and, sir, aw my provision fra him was a modicum of Latin, an expertness in arithmetic, and a short system of worldly counsel; the principal ingredients of which were, a persevering industry, a rigid economy, a smooth tongue, a pliability of temper, and a constant attention to make every mon well pleased with himself.

Eger. Very prudent advice, sir.

Sir P. Therefore, sir, I lay it before you. Now, sir, with these materials, I set out a raw-boned stripling fra the North, to try my fortune with them here in the south; and my first step in the world was a beggarly clerkship in Sawney Gordon's counting-house, here, in the city of London; which you'll say afforded but a barren sort of a prospect.

Eger. It was not a very fertile one, indeed, sir.

Sir P. The reverse, the reverse: weel, sir, seeing myself in this unprofitable situation, I reflected deeply; I cast about my thoughts morning, noon, and night, and marked every mon, and every mode of prosperity; at last, I concluded that a matrimonial adventure, prudently conducted, would be the readiest gait I could gang for the bettering of my condition; and accordingly I set about it. Now, sir, in this pursuit, beauty! beauty! ah! beauty often struck my een, and played about my heart: aud fluttered, and beat, and knocked, and knocked: but the devil an entrance I ever let it get: for I observed, sir, that beauty is, generally,—a proud, vain, saucy, expensive, impertinent sort of a commodity. Eger. Very justly observed. [modesty.]

Sir P. And therefore, sir, I left it to prodigals and coxcombs, that could afford to pay for it; and, in its stead, sir, mark!—I looked out for an ancient, weel-jointured, superannuated dowager; a consumptive, toothless, phthisicy, wealthy widow; or a shrivelled, cadaverous piece of deformity, in the shape of an izzard, or an appersi-and—or, in short, ainything, ainything that had the siller—the siller—for that, sir, was the north star of my affections. Do you take me, sir? was nae that right?

Eger. O! doubtless, doubtless, sir.

Sir P. Now, sir, where do you think I ganged to look for this woman with the siller? nae till court, nae till playhouses or assemblies; nae, sir, I ganged till the kirk, till the anabaptist, independent, Bradlonian, and Muggletonian meetings; till the morning and evening service of churches and chapels of ease, and till the midnight, melting, conciliating love feasts of the methodists; and there, sir, at last, I fell upon an old, slighted, antiquated, musty maiden, that looked—ha, ha, ha! she looked just like a skeleton in a surgeon's glass case. Now, sir, this miserable object was religiously angry with herself and aw the world; had nae comfort but in metaphysical visions and supernatural deliriums—ha, ha, ha! Sir, she was as mad—as mad as a Bedlamite.

Eger. Not improbable, sir: there are numbers of poor creatures in the same condition.

Sir P. O! numbers—numbers. Now, sir, this cracked creature used to pray, and sing, and sigh, and groan, and weep, and wail, and gnash her teeth constantly, morning and evening, at the tabernacle in Moorfields. And as soon as I found she had the siller, aha! guid traith, I plumped me down upon my knees, close by her—cheek by jowl—and prayed, and sighed, and sung, and groaned, and gnashed my teeth as vehemently as she could do for the life of her; ay, and turned up the whites of mine een, till the strings awmost cracked again. I watched her motions, handed her till her chair, waited on her home, got most religiously intimate with her in a week; married her in a fortnight, buried her in a month; touched the siller; and with a deep suit of mourning, a melancholy port, a sorrowful visage, and a joyful heart, I began the world again; (rises) and this, sir, was the first boo, that is the first effectual boo, I ever made till the vanity of human nature. Now, sir, do you understand this

Eger. Perfectly well, sir. [doctrine?]

Sir P. Ay, but was it not right? was it not ingenious, and weel hit off?

Eger. Certainly, sir: extremely well.

Sir P. My next boo, sir, was till your ain mother, whom I ran away with fra the boarding-school; by the interest of whose family I got a guid smart place in the treasury; and, sir, my vary next step was intill parliament; the which I entered with as ardent and as determined an ambition as ever agitated the heart of Cæsar himself. Sir, I booed, and watched, and hearkened, and ran about, backwards and forwards, and attended, and dangled upon the then great mon, till I got intill the vary bowels of his confidence; and then, sir, I wriggled and wrought, and wriggled, till I wriggled myself among the very thick of them. Ha! I got my snack of the clothing, the foraging, the contracts, the lottery tickets, and aw the political bonuses; till at length, sir, I became a much wealthier man than one half of the golden calves I had been so long a boeing to: and was nae that boeing to some purpose?

Eger. It was indeed, sir.

Sir P. But are you convinced of the guid effects and of the utility of boeing?

Eger. Thoroughly, sir.

Sir P. Sir, it is infallible. But, Charles, ah! while I was thus boeing, and wriggling, and raising this princely fortune, ah! I met with many heart-sores and disappointments fra the want of literature, eloquence, and other popular abeeleties. Sir, guin I could but have spoken in the house, I should have done the deed in half the time; but the instant I opened my mouth there they aw fell a laughing at me; aw which deficiencies, sir, I determined, at any expense, to have supplied by the polished education of a son, who I hoped would one day raise the house of Macsycophant till the highest pitch of ministerial ambition. This, sir, is my plan: I have done my part of it; Nature has done her's; you are popular, you are eloquent; aw parties like and respect you: and now, sir, it only remains for you to be directed—completion follows.

Eger. Your liberality, sir, in my education, is an obligation I shall ever remember with the deepest filial gratitude.

Sir P. Vary weel, sir: but, Charles, have you had any conversation yet with Lady Rodolpha, about the day of your marriage; your liveries, your equipage; or your domestic establishment?

Eger. Not yet, sir. [vary wrong.]

Sir P. Poh! why there again, now, you are wrong;

Eger. Sir, we have not had an opportunity.

Sir P. Why, Charles, you are vary tardy in this business.

Lord L. (Sings without, flushed with wine.)
“What have we with day to do?”

Sir P. O! here comes my lord.

Lord L. “Sons of care, ’twas made for you.”

Enter LORD LUMBERCOURT, drinking a dish of coffee; TOMLINS waiting.

“Sons of care, ’twas made for you.” Very good coffee, indeed, Mr. Tomlins. “Sons of care, ’twas made for you.” Here, Mr. Tomlins. [dish?]

Tom. Will your lordship please to have another

Lord L. No more, Mr. Tomlins. [Exit Tomlins.] Ha, ha, ha! my host of the Scotch pints, we have had warm work.

Sir P. Yes, you pushed the bottle about, my lord, with the joy and vigour of a bacchanal.

Lord L. That I did, my dear Mac; no loss of time with me: I have but three motions, old boy—charge, toast, fire—and off we go. Ha, ha, ha! that’s my exercise.

Sir P. And fine warm exercise it is, my lord; especially with the half-pint glasses.

Lord L. Zounds! it does execution point blank: ay, ay, none of your pimping acorn glasses for me, but your manly, old English half-pint bumpers, my dear; they try a fellow’s stamina at once: but where’s Egerton?

Sir P. Just at hand, my lord; there he stands.

Lord L. My dear Egerton.

Eger. Your lordship’s most obedient.

Lord L. I beg pardon, I did not see you. I am sorry you left us so soon after dinner: had you staid, you would have been highly entertained. I have made such examples of the commissioner, the captain, and the colonel.

Eger. So I understand, my lord.

Lord L. But, Egerton, I have slipped from the company for a few moments, on purpose to have a little chat with you. Rodolpha tells me she fancies there is a kind of demur on your side, about your marriage with her.

Sir P. A demur! how so, my lord?

Lord L. Why, as I was drinking my coffee with the women just now, I desired they would fix the wedding night, and the etiquette of the ceremony; upon which the girl burst into a loud laugh, telling me she supposed I was joking, for that Mr. Egerton had never yet given her a single glance or hint upon the subject.

Sir P. My lord, I have been just now talking to him about his shyness to the lady.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Counsellor Plausible is come, sir, and Sergeant Eitherside. [very evening, my lord.]

Sir P. Why then we can settle the business this

Lord L. As well as in seven years; and, to make the way as short as possible, pray, Mr. Tomlins, present your master’s compliments and mine to Lady Rodolpha, and let her ladyship know we wish to speak with her directly. [Exit Tomlins.] He shall attack her this instant, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Ay, this is doing business effectually, my lord.

Lord L. O! I will pit them in a moment, Sir Pertinax; that will bring them into the heat of the action at once, and save a great deal of awkwardness on both sides. O, here your dulcinea comes, sir.

Enter LADY RODOLPHA, singing.

Lady R. Weel, Sir Pertinax, I attend your commands; and your’s, my paternal lord.

Lord L. Why then, my filial lady, we are to inform you that the commission for your ladyship and this enamoured cavalier, commanding you to serve your country, jointly and inseparably, in the honourable and forlorn hope of matrimony, is to be signed this very evening.

Lady R. This evening, my lord!

Lord L. This evening, my lady. Come, Sir Pertinax, let us leave them to settle their liveries, wedding suits, carriages, and all their amorous equipage for the nuptial campaign.

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! excellent, excellent! Weel, I vow, my lord, you are a great officer: this is as guid a manœuvre to bring on a rapid engagement as the ablest general of them a’ could have started.

Lord L. Ay, ay! leave them together; they’ll soon come to a right understanding, I warrant you; or the needle and loadstone have lost their sympathy. [Exit with Sir Pertinax.]

Eger. (Aside.) What a dilemma am I in!

Lady R. (Aside.) Why, this is downright tyranny! it has quite damped my spirits; and my betrothed, yonder, seems planet-struck, too, I think.

Eger. (Aside.) A whimsical situation, mine.

Lady R. (Aside.) Ha, ha, ha! methinks we look like a couple of cautious generals, that are obliged to take the field, but neither of us seems willing to come till action. [dress her.]

Eger. (Aside.) I protest I know not how to ad-

Lady R. (Aside.) He will nae advance, I see: what am I to do in this affair? guid traith, I will even do, as I suppose many brave heroes have done before me; clap a guid face on the matter; and so conceal an aching heart under a swaggering countenance. Sir, as we have, by the commands of our guid fathers, a business of some little consequence to transact, I hope you will excuse my taking the liberty of recommending a chair till you, for the repose of your body, in the embarrassed deliberation of your perturbed spirits.

Eger. (Greatly embarrassed.) Madam, I beg your pardon. (Hands her a chair, then one for himself.) Please to sit, madam.

Lady R. (Aside.) Ah! he’s resolved not to come too near till me, I think. [hem!]

Eger. (Aside.) A pleasant interview this—hem,

Lady R. (Aside, mimics him to herself.) Hem! he will not open the congress, I see: then I will. (Very loud.) Come, sir, when will you begin?

Eger. (Greatly surprised.) Begin! what, madam?

Lady R. To make love till me.

Eger. Love, madam!

Lady R. Ay, love, sir. Why, you have never said a word till me on the subject, nor cast a single glance at me, nor heaved one tender sigh, nor even secretly squeezed my loof. Now, sir, th’of our fathers are so tyrannical as to dispose of us without the consent of our hearts, yet you, sir, I hope, have more humanity than to think of marrying me without administering some of the preliminaries usual on those occasions.

Eger. Madam, I own your reproach is just; I shall, therefore, no longer disguise my sentiments; but fairly let you know my heart.

Lady R. (Starts up, and runs to him.) That’s right, that is right, cousin! but sit you down, sit you down again. (They sit.) I shall return your frankness and your passion, cousin, with a melting tenderness, equal till the amorous enthusiasm of an ancient heroine.

Eger. Madam, if you will hear me—

Lady R. But remember, you must begin with fervency, and a most rapturous vehemency; for you are to consider, cousin, that our match is nae to arise fra the union of hearts, and a long decorum of ceremonious courtship, but is instantly to start at once, out of necessity, or mere accident. Ha, ha, ha! like a match in an ancient romance, where, you ken, cousin, the knight and the damsel are mutually smitten and dying for each other at first sight, or by an amorous sympathy, before they exchange a single glance. So, now cousin, with the true romantic enthusiasm, you are to suppose me the lady of the enchanted castle; and you—ha, ha, ha! you are to be the knight of the sorrowful countenance; ha, ha, ha! and, upon honour, you look the character admirably, ha, ha, ha!

Eger. Trifling creature! (Aside.)

Lady R. Come, sir, why do you nae begin to ravish me with your valour, your vows, your knight-errantry, and your amorous frenzy? Nay, nay, nay! guin you do nae begin at once, the lady of the enchanted castle will vanish in a twinkling.

Eger. Lady Rodolpha, I know your talent for raillery well; but at present, in my case, there is a kind of cruelty in it.

Lady R. Raillery! upon honour, cousin, you mistake me quite and clean. I am serious, very serious; ay, and I have cause to be serious; nay, I will submit my case even to yourself. (Whines.) Can any puir lassie be in a mair lamentable condition, than to be sent four hundred miles, by the command of a positive grandmother, to marry a man who, I find, has nae mair affection for me than if I had been his wife these seven years?

Eger. Madam, I am extremely sorry—

Lady R. (Cries and sobs.) But it is vary weel, cousin: I see your unkindness and aversion plain enough; and, sir, I must tell you fairly, you are the ainly man that ever slighted my person, or that drew tears fra these een. But it is vary weel, it's vary weel; I will return till Scotland to-morrow morning, and let my grandmother know how I hae been affronted by your slights, your contempts, and your aversions.

Eger. If you are serious, madam, your distress gives me a deep concern; but affection is not in our power; and you will forgive me when I tell you, I can never have that honour which is intended me, by a connexion with your ladyship.

Lady R. (Starting up.) How, sir; are you serious? And so you persist in slighting me?

Eger. I beg your pardon, madam; but I must be explicit, and at once declare, that I never can give my hand, where I cannot give my heart.

Lady R. (In great anger.) Why, then, sir, I must tell you, that your declaration is sic an affront as nae woman of spirit can, or ought to bear; and here I make a solemn vow, never to pardon it but on one condition.

Eger. If that condition be in my power, madam—

Lady R. (Snaps him up.) Sir, it is in your power.

Eger. Then, madam, you may command me.

Lady R. Why, then, sir, the condition is this—you must here give me your word and honour, that nae importunity, command, or menace of your father; in fine, that nae consideration whatsoever, shall induce you to take me, Rodolpha Lumbercourt, to be your wedded wife.

Eger. I most solemnly promise I never will.

Lady R. And I, sir, most solemnly and sincerely (curtsies) thank you for—(curtsies) your resolution, and your agreeable aversion; ha, ha, ha! for you have made me as happy as a puir wretch reprieved in the vara instant of intended execution.

Eger. Pray, madam, how am I to understand all this?

Lady R. (With frankness, and a reserve of manners.) Why, sir, your frankness and sincerity demand the same behaviour on my side; therefore, without further disguise or ambiguity, know, sir, that I myself (with a deep sigh) am as deeply smitten with a certain swain, as I understand you are with your Constantia.

Eger. Indeed, madam!

Lady R. (With an amiable, soft, tender sincerity.) O! sir, notwithstanding a' my shew of courage and mirth, here I stand as errant a trembling Thisbe as ever sighed or mourned for her Pyramus: and, sir, a' my extravagant levity and ridiculous behaviour in your presence now, and ever since your father prevailed upon mine to consent till this match, has been a premeditated scheme to provoke your gravity and guid sense intill a cordial disgust, and a positive refusal.

Eger. But, madam, if I may presume so far, pray, who is your lover?

Lady R. Why, in that too, I shall surprise you perhaps more than ever. In the first place, he is a beggar, and in disgrace with an unforgiving father; and, in the next place, he is (curtsies) your ain brother. So you see, cousin Charles, th'of I cou'd nae mingle affections with you, I have nae ganged out of the family. But now, sir, let me ask one question; pray, how is your mither affected in this business?

Eger. She knows of my passion; and will, I am sure, be a friend to the common cause.

Lady R. Ah! that's lucky. Our first step, then, must be to take her advice upon our conduct, so as to keep our fathers in the dark till we can hit off some measure that will wind them about till our ain purpose, and the common interest of our ain passion; so come along, cousin Charles. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter SIR PERTINAX and COUNSELLOR PLAUSIBLE.

Sir P. No, no. Come away, Counsellor Plausible; come away, I say; let them chew upon it. Why, Counsellor, did you ever see so impertinent, so meddling, and so obstinate a blockhead as that Sergeant Eitherside? Confound the fellow, he has put me out of a' temper.

Plaus. He is very positive, indeed, Sir Pertinax; and no doubt was intemperate and rude. But, Sir Pertinax, I would not break off the match notwithstanding; for certainly, even without the boroughs, it is an advantageous bargain both to you and your son.

Sir P. But, zounds! Plausible, do you think I will give up the nomination till three boroughs? Why, I would rather give him twenty, nay, thirty thousand pounds in any other part of the bargain; especially at this juncture, when votes are likely to become so valuable. Why, man, if a certain affair comes on, they will rise above five hundred per cent.

Plaus. You judge very rightly, Sir Pertinax; but what shall we do in this case? for Mr. Sergeant insists that you positively agreed to my lord's having the nomination to the three boroughs during his own life.

Sir P. Why, yes: in the first sketch of the agreement, I believe I did consent: but, at that time, mon, my lord's affairs did not appear to be half so desperate as I now find they turn out. Sir, he must acquiesce in whatever I demand; for I have got him into sic an hobble that he cannot—

Plaus. No doubt, Sir Pertinax, you have him absolutely in your power.

Sir P. Vary weel; and ought nae a man to make his vantage of it?

Plaus. No doubt you ought; no manner of doubt. But, Sir Pertinax, there is a secret spring in this business that you do not seem to perceive; and which, I am afraid, governs the matters respecting these boroughs.

Sir P. What spring do you mean, Counsellor?

Plaus. Why, this Sergeant Eitherside. I have some reason to think, that my lord is tied down, by some means or other, to bring the Sergeant in, the very first vacancy, for one of these boroughs; now, that, I believe, is the sole motive why the Sergeant is so strenuous that my lord should keep the boroughs in his own power; fearing that you might reject him for some man of your own.

Sir P. Odswunds and death! Plausible, you are clever, devilish clever. By the blood! you have hit upon the vary string that has made a' this discord. Oh! I see it—I see it now. But hauld—hauld—bide a wee bit—a wee bit, mon: I have a thought come intill my head—yes—I think, Plausible, with a little twist in our negotiation, that this vary string, properly tuned, may be still made to produce the vary harmony we wish for. Yes, yes, I have it: this Sergeant, I see, understands business; and, if I am not mistaken, knows how to take a hint.

Plaus. O! nobody better, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Why, then, Plausible, the short road is the best with sic a man. You must even come up till his mark at once, and assure him from me that I will secure him a seat for one of these vary boroughs.

Plaus. Oh! that will do, Sir Pertinax; that will do, I'll answer for't.

Sir P. And further, I beg you will let him know that I think myself obliged to consider him, in this affair, as acting for me as weel as my lord, as a common friend till baith; and for the services he has already done us, make my special compliments till him: and, pray let this amicable bit of paper be my faithful advocate to convince him of what my gratitude further intends for his great (gives him a bank-bill) equity in adjusting this agreement betwixt my lord and me.

Plaus. Ha, ha, ha! upon my word, Sir Pertinax, this is noble. Ay, ay! this is an eloquent bit of paper, indeed.

Sir P. Maister Plausible, in a' human dealings, the most effectual method is that of ganging at once till the vary bottom of a mon's heart: for, if we expect that men should serve us, we must first win their affections by serving them. O! here they baith come.

Enter LORD LUMBERCOURT and SERGEANT EITHERSIDE.

Lord L. My dear Sir Pertinax, what could provoke you to break off this business so abruptly? You are really wrong in the point; and, if you will give yourself time to recollect, you will find that my having the nomination to the boroughs for my life, was a preliminary article; I appeal to Mr. Sergeant Eitherside here, whether I did not always understand it so.

Serg. I assure you, Sir Pertinax, that in all his lordship's conversation with me upon this business, and in his positive instructions, both he and I always understood the nomination to be in my lord, durante vita.

Sir P. Why, then, my lord, to shorten the dispute, a' that I can say in answer till your Lordship is, that there has been a total mistake betwixt us in that point: and, therefore, the treaty must end here. I give it up. O! I wash my hands of it for ever.

Plaus. Well, but, gentlemen, gentlemen! a little patience. Surely this mistake, somehow or other, may be rectified. Pr'ythee, Mr. Sergeant, let you and I step into the next room by ourselves, and reconsider the clause relative to the boroughs, and try if we cannot hit upon a medium that will be agreeable to both parties.

Serg. (With great warmth.) Mr. Plausible, I have considered the clause fully; am entirely master of the question: my lord cannot give up the point. It's unkind and unreasonable to expect it.

Plaus. Nay, Mr. Sergeant, I beg you will not misunderstand me. Do not think I want his lordship to give up any point without an equivalent. Sir Pertinax, will you permit Mr. Sergeant and me to retire a few moments to re-consider this point?

Sir P. With a' my heart, Maister Plausible; anything to oblige his lordship; anything to accommodate his lordship; anything.

Plaus. What say you, my lord? [Sergeant.]

Lord L. Nay, I submit it entirely to you and Mr.

Plaus. Come, Mr. Sergeant, let us retire.

Lord L. Ay, ay, go, Mr. Sergeant, and hear what Mr. Plausible has to say.

Serg. Nay, I'll wait on Mr. Plausible, my lord, with all my heart; but I am sure I cannot suggest the shadow of a reason for altering my present opinion: impossible, impossible.

Plaus. Well, well, Mr. Sergeant, do not be positive. I am sure, reason, and your client's convenience, will always make you alter your opinion.

Serg. Ay, ay; reason and my client's convenience, Mr. Plausible, will always control my opinion, depend upon it; ay, ay! there you are right. Sir, I attend you. [Exeunt Lawyers.]

Sir P. I am sorry, my lord, extremely sorry, indeed, that this mistake has happened.

Lord L. Upon my honour, and so am I, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. But come, now, after a', your lordship must allow you have been in the wrong: come, my dear lord, you must allow me that now.

Lord L. How so, my dear Sir Pertinax?

Sir P. Not about the boroughs, my lord; for those I do not mind of a bawbee; but about your distrust of my friendship. Why, do you think, now—I appeal till your ain breast, my lord—do you think, I say, that I should ever have slighted your lordship's nomination till these boroughs.

Lord L. Why, really, I do not think you would, Sir Pertinax; but one must be directed by one's lawyer, you know.

Sir P. Ha! my lord, lawyers are a dangerous species of animals to have any dependance upon: they are always starting punctilios and difficulties among friends. Why, my lord, it is their interest that a' mankind should be at variance; for disagreement of every kind is the vary manure with which they enrich and fatten the land of litigation; and, as they find that that constantly promotes the best crop, depend upon it, they will always be sure to lay it on as thick as they can.

Lord L. Come, come, my dear Sir Pertinax; you must not be angry with the Sergeant for his insisting so warmly on this point; for those boroughs, you know, are my sheet anchor.

Sir P. I know it, my lord; and, as an instance of my promptness to study, and of my acquaintance till your lordship's inclination, as I see that this Sergeant Eitherside wishes you weel, and you of him, I think, now, he would be as guid a man to be returned for one of those boroughs as could be pitched upon; and, as such, I humbly recommend him till your lordship's consideration.

Lord L. Why, my dear Sir Pertinax, to tell you the truth, I have already promised him. He must be in for one of them, and that is one reason why I insisted so strenuously; he must be in.

Sir P. And why not? odswunds! why not? is nae your word a fiat? and will it nae be always so till me? are ye nae my friend, my patron? and are we nae, by this match of our children, to be united intill one interest?

Lord L. So I understand it, I own, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. My lord, it can nae be otherwise; then, for heaven's sake! as your lordship and I can have but one interest for the future, let us have nae mair words about these paltry boroughs, but conclude the agreement just as it stands; otherwise, there must be new writings drawn up, new consultations of lawyers; new objections and delays will arise; creditors will be impatient and impertinent; so that we shall nae finish the Lord knows when.

Lord L. You are right, you are right; say no more, Mac, say no more. Split the lawyers—you judge the point better than all Westminster-Hall could. It shall stand as it is: yes, you shall settle it your own way; for your interest and mine are the same, I see plainly.

Sir P. No doubt of it, my lord.

Lord L. O! here the lawyers come.

Enter COUNSELLOR PLAUSIBLE and SERGEANT EITHERSIDE.

Lord L. So, gentlemen—Well, what have you done?—How are your opinions now?

Serg. My lord, Mr. Plausible has convinced me; fully convinced me.

Plaus. Yes, my lord, I have convinced him: I have laid such arguments before Mr. Sergeant as were irresistible.

Serg. He has, indeed, my lord; besides, as Sir Pertinax gives his honour that your lordship's nomination shall be sacredly observed, why, upon a nearer review of the whole matter, I think it will be the wiser measure to conclude the agreement just as it is drawn.

Lord L. I am very glad you think so, Mr. Sergeant, because that is my opinion too: so my dear Eitherside, do you and Mr. Plausible despatch the business now as soon as possible.

Serg. My lord, every thing will be ready in less than an hour. Come, Mr. Plausible, let us go and fill up the blanks, and put the last hand to the writings on our part.

Plaus. I attend you, Mr. Sergeant.

[Exeunt Lawyers.]

Lord L. And, while the lawyers are preparing the writings, Sir Pertinax, I will go and saunter with the women. [presently.]

Sir P. Do, do, my lord; and I will come to you

Lord L. Very well, my dear Mac, I shall expect you. [Exit singing.]

Sir P. So! a little flattery, mixed with the finesse of a gilded promise on one side, and a quantum sufficit of the aurum palpabile on the other, have at last made me the happiest father in Great Britain. Ha! my heart expands itself, as it were, through every part of my whole body, at the completion of this business, and feels nothing but dignity and elevation. Hauld! hauld! bide a wee, bide a wee! I have but one little matter mair in this affair to adjust; and then, Sir Pertinax, you may dictate till fortune herself, and send her to govern fools; while you shew and convince the world that wise men always govern her. Wha's there?

Enter SAM.

Tell my son, Egerton, I would speak with him here in the library. [Exit Sam.] Now I have settled the grand point with my lord, this, I think, is the proper juncture to feel the political pulse of my spark; and, once for a', to set it to the exact measure that I would have it constantly beat.

Enter EGERTON.

Come, hither, Charles.

Eger. Your pleasure, sir.

Sir P. About twa hours since, I told you, Charles, that I received a letter express, complaining of your brother's activity at an election in Scotland, against a particular friend of mine, which has given great offence; and, sir, you are mentioned in the letter as well as he: to be plain, I must roundly tell you, that on this interview depends my happiness as a father and as a man; and my affection to you, sir, as a son, for the remainder of our days.

Eger. I hope, sir, I shall never do anything either to forfeit your affection, or disturb your happiness.

Sir P. I hope so, too: but to the point. The fact is this: there has been a motion made this vary day to bring on the grand affair, which is settled for Friday seven-night. Now, sir, as you are popular, have talents, and are weel heard, it is expected, and I insist upon it, that you endeavour to atone, sir, for your late misconduct, by preparing, and taking a larger share in that question, and supporting it with a' your power.

Eger. Sir, I hope you will not so exert your influence, as to insist upon my supporting a measure by an obvious, prostituted sophistry, in direct opposition to my character and conscience.

Sir P. Conscience! why, you are mad! Did you ever hear any man talk of conscience in political matters? Conscience, quotha! I have been in parliament these three and thraty years, and never heard the term made use of before. Sir, it is an unparliamentary word, and you will be laughed at for it.

Eger. Then, sir, I must frankly tell you, that you work against my nature; you would connect me with men I despise, and press me into measures I abhor; for know, sir, that the malignant ferment which the venal ambition of the times provokes in the heads and hearts of other men, I detest.

Sir P. What are you about, sir? Malignant ferment and venal ambition! Sir, every man should be ambitious to serve his country, and every man should be rewarded for it: and pray, sir, would nae you wish to serve your country? Answer me that. I say, would nae you wish to serve your country?

Eger. Only shew me how I can serve my country, and my life is her's. Were I qualified to lead her armies, to steer her fleets, and to deal her honest vengeance on her insulting foes;—or could my eloquence pull down a state leviathan, mighty by the plunder of his country, black with the treasons of her disgrace, and send his infamy down to a free posterity, as a monumental terror to corrupt ambition, I would be foremost in such service, and act with the unremitting ardour of a Roman spirit.

Sir P. Why, are you mad, sir? you have certainly been bit by some mad whig or other. Oh! you are young, vary young in these matters; but experience will convince you, sir, that every man in public business has twa consciences—a religious and a political conscience. Why, you see a merchant now, or a shopkeeper, that kens the science o'the world, always looks upon an oath at a custom-house, or behind the counter, only as an oath in business, a thing of course, a mere thing of course, that has nothing to do with religion; and just so it is at an election: for instance, now, I am a candidate, (pray observe,) and I gang till a periwig-maker, a hatter, or a hosier, and I give ten, twenty, or thraty guineas, for a periwig, a hat, or a pair of hose; and so on, through a majority of voters; vary weel! what is the consequence? why this commercial intercourse, you see, begets a friendship betwixt us—a commercial friendship—and in a day or twa, these men gang and give their suffrages; weel! what is the inference? Pray, sir, can you, or any lawyer, divine, or casuist, ca' this a bribe? Nae, sir, in fair political reasoning, it is ainly generosity on the one side, and gratitude on the other. So, sir, let me have nae more of your religious or philosophical refinements; but prepare, attend, and speak till the question, or you are nae son of mine.—Sir, I insist upon it.

Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir, my lord says the writings are now ready; and his lordship and the lawyers are waiting for you and Mr. Egerton.

Sir P. Vary weel, we'll attend his lordship. [Exit Sam.] Come, sir, let us gang down and finish this business.

Eger. (Stopping Sir P. as he is going off.) Sir, with your permission, I beg you will first hear a word or two upon this subject.

Sir P. Weel, sir, what would you say?

Eger. I have often resolved to let you know my aversion to this match—

Sir P. How, sir?

Eger. But my respect, and fear of disoblighing you, have hitherto kept me silent.

Sir P. Your aversion!—your aversion, sir! How dare you use sic language to me? Your aversion! Lookye, sir; I shall cut the matter vary short: consider, my fortune is nae inheritance; a' mine ain acquisition; I can make ducks and drakes of it; so do not provoke me, but sign the articles directly.

Eger. I beg your pardon, sir, but I must be free on this occasion, and tell you at once, that I can no longer dissemble the honest passion that fills my heart for another woman.

Sir P. How! another woman? and, you villain! how dare you love another woman without my leave? But what other woman? what is she? Speak, sir,

Eger. Constantia. [speak.]

Sir P. Constantia! Oh, you profligate! What, a creature taken in for charity!

Eger. Her poverty is not her crime, sir, but her misfortune: her birth is equal to the noblest; therefore, sir—

Sir P. Haud your jabbering, you villain! haud your jabbering; none of your romance nor refinement till me. I have but one question to ask you; but one question, and then I have done with you for ever—for ever; therefore, think before you answer: will you marry the lady, or will you break my heart?

Eger. Sir, my presence shall not offend you any longer; but when reason and reflection take their turn, I am sure you will not be pleased with yourself for this unparental passion. (Going.)

Sir P. Tarry, I command you; and I command you, likewise, not to stir till you have given me an answer—a definitive answer: will you marry the lady, or will you not?

Eger. Since you command me, sir—know, then, that I cannot, will not marry her. [Exit.]

Sir P. Oh! the villain has shot me through the head! he has cut my vitals! I shall run distracted! the fellow destroys a' my measures, a' my schemes: there never was sic a bargain as I have made with this foolish lord: possession of his whole estate, with three boroughs upon it—six members. Why, what an acquisition! what consequence! what dignity! what weight till the house of Macsycophant! O, d—n the fellow! three boroughs, only for sending down six broomsticks! O, miserable! O, miserable! ruined! undone! For these five-and-twenty years, ever since this fellow came intill the world, have I been secretly preparing him for ministerial dignity; and, with the fellow's eloquence, abilities, popularity, these boroughs, and proper connexions, he might certainly, in a little time, have done the deed: and sure never were times so favourable, every thing conspires, for a' the auld political post-horses are broken-winded and foundered, and cannot get on; and as till the rising generation, the vanity of surpassing one another in what they foolishly call taste and elegance, binds them hand and foot in the chains of luxury, which will always set them up till the best bidder; so that, if they can but get wherewithal to supply their dissipation, a minister may convert the political morals of a' sic voluptuaries, intill a vote that would sell the nation till Prester John, and their boasted liberties till the great Mogul. [Exit.]

ACT V.—SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter SIR PERTINAX and BETTY HINT.

Sir P. Come this way, Betty; come this way: you are a guid girl, and I will reward you for this discovery. Oh, the villain! offer her marriage!

Betty. It is true, indeed, sir; I would not tell your honour a lie for the world; but, in truth, it lay upon my conscience, and I thought it my duty to tell your worship.

Sir P. You are right, you are right; it was your duty to tell me, and I'll reward you for it. But you say Maister Sidney is in love with her too; pray how came you by that intelligence?

Betty. O, sir, I know when folks are in love, let them strive to hide it as much as they will. I know it by Mr. Sidney's eyes, when I see him stealing a sly look at her; by his trembling—his breathing short;—his sighing when they are reading together. Besides, sir, he has made love-verses upon her, in praise of her virtue, and her playing upon the music. Ay; and I suspect another thing, sir; she has a sweetheart, if not a husband, not far from hence.

Sir P. Wha, Constantia?

Betty. Ay, Constantia, sir. Lord, I can know the whole affair, sir, only for sending over to Hadley, to farmer Hilford's youngest daughter, Sukey Hilford.

Sir P. Then send this instant, and get me a particular account of it.

Betty. That I will, sir.

Sir P. In the meantime, keep a strict watch upon Constantia; and be sure you bring me word of whatever new matter you can pick up about her, my son, or this Hadley husband or sweetheart.

Betty. Never fear, sir. [Exit.]

Sir P. This love of Sidney's for Constantia is not unlikely. There is something promising in it. Yes, I think it is nae impossible to convert it into a special and immediate advantage. It is but trying. Wha's there? If it misses, I am but where I was.

Enter TOMLINS.

Where is Maister Sidney?

Tom. In the dining-room, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Tell him I would speak with him. [Exit Tomlins.] 'Tis more than probable. Spare to speak, and spare to speed. Try, try, always try the human heart; try is as guid a maxim in politics as in war. Why, suppose this Sidney, now, should be privy till his friend Charles's love for Constantia, what then? guid trath, it is natural to think that his ain love will demand the preference; ay, and obtain it, too. Yes; self, self is an eloquent advocate on these occasions, and seldom loses his cause. I hae the general principle of human nature, at least, to encourage me in the experiment; for only make it a man's interest to be a rascal, and I think we may safely depend upon his integrity—in serving himself.

Enter SIDNEY.

Sid. Sir Pertinax, your servant. Mr. Tomlins told me you desired to speak with me.

Sir P. Yes, I wanted to speak with you upon a vary singular business. Maister Sidney, give me your hand. Guin it did nae look like flattery, which I detest, I would tell you, Maister Sidney, that you are an honour till your cloth, your country, and till human nature.

Sid. Sir, you are very obliging.

Sir P. Sit you down, Maister Sidney; sit you down here by me. (They sit.) My friend, I am under the greatest obligations till you for the care you have taken of Charles. The principles, religious, moral, and political, that you have infused intill him, demand the warmest return of gratitude both fra him and fra me.

Sid. Your approbation, sir, next to that of my own conscience, is the best test of my endeavours, and the highest applause they can receive.

Sir P. Sir, you deserve it; richly deserve it. And now, sir, the same care that you have had of Charles, the same my wife has taken of her favourite Constantia; and sure, never were accomplishments, knowledge, or principles, social and religious, infused intill a better nature.

Sid. In truth, sir, I think so too.

Sir P. She is besides a gentlewoman, and of as guid a family as any in this country.

Sid. So I understand, sir.

Sir P. Sir, her father had a vast estate; the which he dissipated and melted in feastings, and friendships, and charities, and hospitalities, and sic kind of nonsense: but to the business. Maister Sidney, I love you; yes, I love you; and I have been looking out, and contriving how to settle you in the world. Sir, I want to see you comfortably and honourably fixed at the head of a respectable family; and guin you were mine ain son a thousand times, I cou'd nae make a more valuable present till you for that purpose, as a partner for life, than this same Constantia, with sic a fortune down with her as you yourself shall deem to be competent, and an assurance of every canonical contingency in my power to confer or promote.

Sid. Sir, your offer is noble and friendly; but though the highest station would derive lustre from Constantia's charms and worth, yet, were she more amiable than love could paint her in the lover's fancy, and wealthy beyond the thirst of the miser's appetite, I could not, would not wed her. (Rises.)

Sir P. Not wed her! odswounds, man! you surprise me! Why so—what hinders?

Sid. I beg you will not ask a reason for my refusal; but, briefly and finally, it cannot be; nor is it a subject I can long converse upon.

Sir P. Weel, weel, weel, sir! I have done, I have done. (Sidney sits down.) Sit you down, mon; sit you down again; sit you down; I shall mention it no more: not but I must confess honestly till you, friend Sidney, that the match, had you consented to my proposal, besides profiting you, would have been of singular service till me likewise. However, you may still serve me as effectually as if you had married her.

Sid. Then, sir, I am sure I will, most heartily.

Sir P. I believe it, friend Sidney; and I thank you: I have nae friend to depend upon but yourself. My heart is almost broke; I cannot help these tears. And, to tell you the fact at once, your friend Charles is struck with a most dangerous malady—a kind of insanity. You see I cannot help weeping when I think of it; in short, this Constantia, I am afraid, has cast an evil eye upon him. Do you understand me?

Sid. Not very well, sir.

Sir P. Why, he is grievously smitten with the love of her; and, I am afraid, will never be cured without a little of your assistance.

Sid. Of my assistance! pray, sir, in what manner?

Sir P. In what manner? lord! Maister Sidney, how can you be so dull? Now, then, my vary guid friend, guin you would but give him that hint, and take an opportunity to speak a good word for him intill the wench; and guin you would likewise cast about a little, now, and contrive to bring them together once: why, in a few days after, he would nae care a pinch of snuff for her. (Sidney starts up.) What is the matter with you, mon? What the devil gars you start, and look so astounded?

Sid. Sir, you amaze me! In what part of my mind or conduct have you found that baseness, which entitles you to treat me with this indignity?

Sir P. Indignity! What indignity do you mean, sir? Is asking you to serve a friend with a wench an indignity? Sir, am I not your patron and benefactor, eh?

Sid. You are, sir, and I feel your bounty at my heart; but the virtuous gratitude that sowed the deep sense of it there, does not inform me that, in return, the tutor's sacred function, or the social virtue of the man, must be debased into the pupil's pander, or the patron's prostitute.

Sir P. (Rising.) How! what, sir? do you dispute? Are you nae my dependant, eh? and do you hesitate about an ordinary civility, which is practised every day by men and women of the first fashion? Sir, let me tell you, however nice you may be, there is nae a client about the court that would nae jump at sic an opportunity to oblige his patron.

Sid. Indeed, sir, I believe the doctrine of pimping for patrons, as well as that of prostituting eloquence and public trust for private lucre, may be learned in your party schools: for, where faction and public venality are taught as measures necessary to good government and general prosperity, there every vice is to be expected.

Sir P. Oho! oho! vara weel, vara weel; fine slander upon ministers! fine sedition against government! O, ye villain! You—you—you are a black sheep, and I'll mark you. I am glad you shew yourself. Yes, yes; you have taken off the mask at last: you have been in my service for many years, and I never knew your principles before.

Sid. Sir, you never affronted them before; if you had, you should have known them sooner.

Sir P. It is vary weel; I have done with you. Ay, ay; now I can account for my son's conduct: his aversions till courts, till ministers, levees, public business, and his disobedience till my commands. Ah! you are a Judas—a perfidious fellow: you have ruined the morals of my son, you villain! But I have done with you. However, this I will prophecy at our parting, for your comfort, that guin you are so very squeamish about bringing a lad and a lass together, or about doing sic an a harmless, innocent job for your patron, you will never rise in the church.

Sid. Though my conduct, sir, should not make me rise in her power, I am sure it will in her favour; in the favour of my own conscience, too, and in the esteem of all worthy men; and that, sir, is a power and dignity beyond what patrons, or any minister, can bestow. [Exit.]

Sir P. What a rigorous, saucy, stiff-necked rascal it is! I see my folly now; I am undone by mine ain policy. This Sidney is the last man that should have been about my son. The fellow, indeed, hath given him principles that might have done vary weel among the ancient Romans, but are d—d unfit for the modern Britons. Weel, guin I had a thousand sons, I never would suffer one of these English university-bred fellows to be about a son of mine again; for they have sic an a pride of literature and character, and sic saucy English notions of liberty continually fermenting in their thoughts, that a mon is never sure of them. But what am I to do?—Zoons! he must nae marry this beggar; I cannot set down tamely under that. Stay! haud a wee: By the blood, I have it! yes, I have hit upon it.

Enter BETTY HINT.

Betty. O, sir! I have got the whole secret out.

Sir P. About what?

Betty. About Miss Constantia. I have just got all the particulars from farmer Hilford's youngest daughter, Sukey Hilford. [quick; what is it?]

Sir P. Weel, weel; but what is the story? quick,

Betty. Why, sir, it is certain that Mrs. Constantia has a sweetheart, or a husband; a sort of a gentleman, or a gentleman's gentleman, they don't know which, that lodges at Gaffer Hodges; for Sukey says she saw them together last night, in the dark walk, and Mrs. Constantia was all in tears.

Sir P. Zoons! I am afraid this is too guid news to be true.

Betty. O! sir, 'tis certainly true. Besides, sir, she has just writ a letter to her gallant, and I have sent John Gardener to her, who is to carry it to him to Hadley. Now, sir, if your worship would seize it—see, see, sir; here John comes, with the letter in his hand. [till me.]

Sir P. Step you out, Betty, and leave the fellow

Betty. I will, sir. [Exit.]

Enter JOHN, with a packet and a letter.

John. (Putting the packet into his pocket.) There, go you into my pocket. There's nobody in the library, so I'll e'en go through the short way. Let me see—what is the name?—Mel—Meltill—O, no! Melville, at Gaffer Hodge's.

Sir P. What letter is that, sir?

John. Letter, sir!

Sir P. Give it me, sir.

John. An't please you, sir, it is not mine.

Sir P. Deliver it this instant, sirrah, or I'll break your head.

John. There, there, your honour.

Sir P. Begone, rascal! This, I suppose, will let us intill the whole business.

John. (Aside.) You have got the letter, old Surly, but the packet is safe in my pocket. I'll go and deliver that, however, for I will be true to poor Mrs. Constantia in spite of you. [Exit.]

Sir P. (Reading the letter.) Um—um—“and bless my eyes with a sight of you.”—Um—um—“throw myself into your dear arms.” Zoons! this letter is invaluable. Aha, madam! yes, this will do; this will do, I think. Let me see how it is directed—“To Mr. Melville.” Vary weel. [Enter BETTY.] O, Betty, you are an excellent wench; this letter is worth a million.

Betty. Is it as I suspected—to her gallant?

Sir P. It is, it is. Bid Constantia pack out of the house this instant; and let them get a chaise ready to carry her wherever she pleases. But first send my wife and son hither.

Betty. I shall, sir.

Sir P. Do so; begone! [Exit Betty.] Aha, Maister Charles! I believe I shall cure you of your passion for a beggar now. I think he cannot be so infatuated as to be a dupe. Let me see, how am I to act now? Why, like a true politician, I must pretend most sincerity where I intend most deceit.

Enter EGERTON and LADY MACSYCOPHANT.

Weel, Charles, notwithstanding the misery you have brought upon me, I have sent for you and your mother, in order to convince you both of my affection and my readiness to forgive; nay, and even to indulge your perverse passion. Sir, since I find this Constantia has got hold of your heart, and that your mother and you think that you can never be happy without her, why, I'll nae longer oppose your inclinations.

Eger. Dear sir, you snatch me from the sharpest misery; on my knees, let my heart thank you for this goodness.

Lady M. Let me express my thanks, too, and my joy; for, had you not consented to his marrying her, we all should have been miserable.

Sir P. Weel, I am glad I have found a way to please you both at last. But, my dear Charles, suppose, now, that this spotless vestal—this wonder of virtue—this idol of your heart, should be a concealed wanton after a' or should have an engagement of marriage, or an intrigue with another man, and is only making a dupe of you a' this time; I say, only suppose it, Charles—what would you think of her?

Eger. I should think her the most deceitful, and most subtle of her sex; and, if possible, would never think of her again.

Sir P. Will you give me your honour of that?

Eger. Most solemnly, sir.

Sir P. Enough; I am satisfied: you make me young again. Your prudence has brought tears of joy fra my very vitals. I was afraid you were fascinated with the charms of a crack. Do you ken

Eger. Mighty well, sir. [this hand?]

Sir P. And you, madam? [stantia's.]

Lady M. As well as I do my own, sir; it is Con-

Sir P. It is so; and a better evidence it is, than any that can be given by the human tongue. Here is a warm, rapturous, lascivious letter, under the hypocritical syren's ain hand—her ain hand, sir. Ay, ay; here, take and read it yourself.

Eger. (Reads.) “I have only time to tell you, that the family came down sooner than I expected, and that I cannot bless my eyes with the sight of you till the evening. The notes and jewels, which the bearer of this will deliver to you, were presented to me since I saw you by the son of my benefactor.”—

Sir P. Now mark!

Eger. (Reads.) “All which I beg you will convert to your immediate use.”—

Sir P. Mark! I say.

Eger. (Reads.) “For my heart has no room for any wish or fortune, but what contributes to your relief and happiness.”—

Sir P. Oh! Charles, Charles! do you see, sir, what a dupe she makes of you? But mark what follows.

Eger. (Reads.) “O, how I long to throw myself into your dear, dear arms; to soothe your fears, your apprehensions, and your sorrows. I have something to tell you of the utmost moment, but will reserve it till we meet this evening in the dark walk.”—

Sir P. In the dark walk! in the dark walk! Ah! an evil-eyed curse upon her! Yes, yes; she has been often in the dark walk, I believe. But read on.

Eger. (Reads.) “In the meantime, banish all fears, and hope the best from fortune, and your ever dutiful CONSTANTIA HARRINGTON.”

Sir P. There! there's a warm epistle for you! in short, the hussy, you must know, is married till

Eger. Not unlikely, sir. [the fellow.]

Lady M. Indeed, by her letter I believe she is.

Sir P. Now, madam, what amends can you make me for countenancing your son's passion for sic a strumpet? And you, sir, what have you to say for your disobedience and your frenzy? O, Charles, Charles!

Eger. Pray, sir, be patient; compose yourself a moment: I will make you any compensation in my power.

Sir P. Then instantly sign the articles of marriage.

Eger. The lady, sir, has never yet been consulted; and I have some reason to believe that her heart is engaged to another man.

Sir P. Sir, that is nae business of your's. I know she will consent, and that's aw we are to consider. O! here comes my lord.

Enter LORD LUMBERCOURT.

Lord L. Sir Pertinax, every thing is ready and the lawyers wait for us. [Rodolpha?]

Sir P. We attend your lordship. Where is lady

Lord L. Giving some female consolation to poor Constantia. Why, my lady—ha, ha, ha!—I hear your vestal has been flirting.

Sir P. Yes, yes, my lord; she's in vary guid order for any man that wants a wife and an heir till his estate intill the bargain.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Sir, there is a man below that wants to speak to your honour upon particular business.

Sir P. I cannot speak till any body now; he must come another time: haud—stay—what, is he a gentleman?

Tom. He looks something like one, sir—a sort of a gentleman; but he seems to be in a kind of a passion; for when I asked his name, he answered hastily. “It is no matter, friend; go tell your master there is a gentleman here that must speak to him directly.”

Sir P. Must? ha! vary peremptory indeed: pry-thee, let's see him, for curiosity's sake. [Exit Tom.]

Enter LADY RODOLPHA.

Lady R. O! my Lady Macsycophant, I am come an humble advocate for a weeping piece of female frailty, wha begs she may be permitted to speak till your ladyship, before you finally reprobate her.

Sir P. I beg your pardon, Lady Rodolpha, but it must not be; see her she shall not.

Lady M. Nay, there can be no harm, my dear, in hearing what she has to say for herself.

Sir P. I tell you, it shall not be.

Lady M. Well, my dear, I have done.

Enter TOMLINS and MELVILLE.

Tom. Sir, that is my master. [Exit.]

Sir P. Weel, sir, what is your urgent business with me?

Mel. To shun disgrace, and punish baseness.

Sir P. Punish baseness! what does the fellow mean? Wha are you, sir?

Mel. A man, sir; and one whose fortune once bore as proud a sway as any within this country's limits.

Lord L. You seem to be a soldier, sir?

Mel. I was, sir; and have the soldier's certificate to prove my service—rags and scars. In my heart for ten long years, in India's parching clime, I bore my country's cause, and in noblest dangers sustained it with my sword; at length, ungrateful peace has laid me down where welcome war first took me up—in poverty, and the dread of cruel creditors. Paternal affection brought me to my native land, in quest of an only child: I found her, as I thought, amiable as parental fondness could desire; but foul seduction has snatched her from me; and hither am I come, fraught with a father's anger and a soldier's honour, to seek the seducer, and glut revenge.

Lady M. Pray, sir, who is your daughter?

Mel. I blush to own her—but—Constantia.

Eger. Is Constantia your daughter, sir?

Mel. She is; and was the only comfort that nature, fortune, or my own extravagance had left me.

Sir P. Guid traith, then, I fancy you will find but vary little comfort fra her; for she is nae better than she should be. She has had nae damage in this mansion. I am told she is with bairn; but you may gang till Hadley, till one farmer Hodge's, and there you may learn the whole story, and wha the father of the bairn is, frae a cheeld they call Melville.

Mel. Melville!

Sir P. Yes, sir, Melville.

Mel. O! would to heaven she had no crime to answer but her commerce with Melville! No, sir; he is not the man: it is your son, your Egerton, that has seduced her; and here, sir, are the evidence of his seduction.

Eger. Of my seduction!

Mel. Of your's, sir, if your name be Egerton.

Eger. I am that man, sir; but pray what is your evidence?

Mel. These bills, and these gorgeous jewels; not to be had in her menial state, but at the price of chastity! Not an hour since she sent them, imprudently sent them, by a servant of this house: contagious infamy started from their touch.

Eger. Sir, do you but clear her conduct with Melville, and I will instantly satisfy your fears concerning the jewels and her virtue.

Mel. Sir, you give me new life; you are my better angel: I believe in your words—your looks. Know, then, I am that Melville.

Sir P. How, sir? you that Melville that was at farmer Hodge's?

Mel. The same, sir; it was he brought my Constantia to my arms—lodged and secreted me; once my lowly tenant, now my only friend. The fear of inexorable creditors made me change my name from Harrington to Melville, till I could see and consult some who once called themselves my friends.

Eger. Sir, suspend your fears and anger but for a few minutes; I will keep my word with you religiously, and bring your Constantia to your arms, as virtuous and as happy as you could wish her.

[Exit with Lady Mac.]

Sir P. The clearing up of this wench's virtue is d—d unlucky; I am afraid it will ruin a' our affairs again; however, I have one stroke still in my head that will secure the bargain with my lord, let matters gang as they will. (Aside.) But I wonder, Maister Melville, that you did nae pick up some little matter of siller in the Indies. Ah! there have bonny fortunes snapt up there, of late years, by some of the military blades.

Mel. It is very true, sir; but it is an observation among soldiers, that there are some men who never meet with anything in the service, but blows and ill-fortune. I was one of those, even to a proverb.

Sir P. Ah! 'tis pity, sir, a great pity, now, that you did nae get a Mogul, or some sic an animal, intil your clutches. Ah! I should like to have the strangling of a nabob, the rummaging of his gold dust, his jewel-closet, and a' his magazines of bars and ingots. Ha, ha, ha! guid traith, naw, sic an a fellow would be a bonny cheeld to bring till this town, and to exhibit him riding on an elephant; upon honour, a man might raise a poll-tax by him, that would gang near to pay the debts of the nation.

Enter EGERTON, CONSTANTIA, LADY MACSYCOPHANT, and SIDNEY.

Eger. Sir, I promised to satisfy your fears concerning your daughter's virtue; and my best proof is, that I have made her the partner of my heart, and the tender guardian of my earthly happiness for life.

Sir P. How! married!

Eger. I know, sir, at present, we shall meet your anger; but time, reflection, and our dutiful conduct, we hope, will reconcile you to our happiness.

Sir P. Never, never! and, could I make you, her, and a' your issue beggars, I would move hell, heaven, and earth to do it.

Lord L. Why, Sir Pertinax, this is a total revolution, and will entirely ruin my affairs.

Sir P. My lord, with the consent of your lordship and Lady Rodolpha, I have an expedient to offer, that will not only punish that rebellious villain, but answer every end that your lordship and the lady proposed by the intended match with him.

Lord L. I doubt it much, Sir Pertinax; I doubt it much. But what is it, sir? what is your expedient?

Sir P. My lord, I have another son, Sandy—eh! he's a guid lad; and, provided the lady and your lordship have nae objection till him, every article of that rebel's intended marriage shall be amply fulfilled upon Lady Rodolpha's union with my younger son.

Lord L. Why, that is an expedient, indeed, Sir Pertinax. But what say you, Rodolpha?

Lady L. Nay, nay, my lord; as I ha nae reason to have the least affection till my cousin Egerton, and as my intended marriage with him was entirely an act of obedience till my grandmother, provided my cousin Sandy will be as agreeable till her ladyship as my cousin Charles here would have been, I have nae the least objection till the change. Ay, ay; one brother is as good to Rodolpha as another.

Sir P. I'll answer, madam, for your grandmother. Now, my lord, what say you?

Lord L. Nay, Sir Pertinax, so the agreement stands, all is right again. Come, child, let us begone. Ay, ay; so my affairs are made easy, it is equal to me whom she marries. I say, Sir Pertinax, let them be but easy, and rat me if I care if she incorporates with the cham of Tartary. [Exit.]

Sir P. As to you, my Lady Macsycophant, I suppose you concluded, before you gave your consent till this match, that there would be an end of a' intercourse betwixt you and me. You shall have a jointure; but not a bawbee besides, living or dead, shall you, or any of your issue, ever see of mine: and so, madam, live with your Constantia, with your son, and with that d—d black sheep there. [Exit.]

Lady R. Weel, cousin Egerton, in spite of the ambitious frenzy of your father, and the thoughtless dissipation of mine, Don Cupid has at last carried his point in favour of his devotees. But I must now take my leave; and so, guid folks, I will leave you with the fag end of an auld north-country wish: "May mutual love and guid humour be the guest of your hearts, the theme of your tongues, and the blithsome subjects of aw your tricksome dreams through the rugged road of this deceitful world; and may our fathers be an example till ourselves, to treat our bairns better than they have treated us." [Exit.]

Eger. You seem melancholy, sir.

Mel. These precarious turns of fortune, sir, will press upon the heart; for, notwithstanding my Constantia's happiness, and mine in her's, I own, I cannot help feeling some regret, that my misfortunes should be the cause of any disagreement between a father and the man to whom I am under the most endearing obligations.

Eger. You have no share in his disagreement: if affluence can procure content and ease, they are within our reach. My fortune is ample, and shall be dedicated to the happiness of this domestic circle.

*Myscheme, though mock'd by knave, coquette, and fool,
To thinking minds will prove this golden rule:*

In all pursuits, but chiefly in a wife,

Not wealth, but morals, make the happy life. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Alexander's Camp before Babylon.

*Enter HEPHESTION and LYSIMACHUS, fighting;
CLYTUS parting them.*

Cly. What, are you madmen? This a time for quarrel?

Put up, I say, or by the gods that form'd me,
He who refuses, makes a foe of Clytus.

Lys. I have his sword.

Cly. But must not have his life.

Lys. Must not, old Clytus!

Cly. Hare-brain'd boy, you must not.

Heph. Lend me thy sword, thou father of the war,
Thou far-fam'd guard of Alexander's life.

Curse on this weak, unexecuting arm!

Lend it, old Clytus, to redeem my fame;

Lysimachus is brave, and else will scorn me.

Lys. There, take thy sword, and since thou'rt bent on death,

Know, 'tis thy glory that thou dy'st by me.

Cly. Stay thee, Lysimachus; Hephestion, hold;
I bar you both, my body interpos'd;

Now let me see which of you dares to strike.

By Jove, you've stirr'd the old man!—that rash arm

That first advances moves against the gods,

And our great king, whose deputy I stand.

Lys. Some prop'rer time must terminate our quarrel.

Heph. And cure the bleeding wounds my honour [bears.

Cly. Some prop'rer time! 'tis false—no hour is proper;

No time should see a brave man do amiss.

Say, what's the noble cause of all this madness?

What vast ambition blows the dangerous fire?

Why, a vain, smiling, whining, coz'ning woman.

By all my triumphs! in the heat of youth,

When towns were sack'd, and beauties prostrate lay,

When my blood boil'd, and nature work'd me high,

Clytus ne'er bow'd his body to such shame;

I knew 'em, and despis'd their cobweb arts:

The whole sex is not worth a soldier's thought!

Lys. Our cause of quarrel may to thee seem light;

But know, a less has set the world in arms.

Cly. Yes, Troy, they tell us, by a woman fell:

Curse on the sex, they are the bane of virtue!

Death! I'd rather this right arm were lost,

Than that the king should hear of your imprudence—

What! on a day thus set apart for triumph!

Lys. We were, indeed, to blame.

Cly. This memorable day!

When our hot master, whose impatient soul

Outrides the sun, and sighs for other worlds

To spread his conquests, and diffuse his glory;

Now bids the trumpet for awhile be silent,

And plays with monarchs, whom he us'd to drive;

Shall we, by broils, awake him into rage,

And rouse the lion, that has ceas'd to roar?

Lys. Clytus, thou'rt right—put up thy sword,

Hephestion:

Had passion not eclips'd the light of reason,

Untold, we might this consequence have seen.

Heph. Why has not reason power to conquer

Why are we thus enslav'd?

[love?

Cly. Because unmann'd;

Because ye follow Alexander's steps.

Heav'ns! that a face should thus bewitch his soul,

And ruin all that's great and godlike in it.

Talk be my bane, yet the old man must talk;

Not so he lov'd, when he at Issus fought,

And join'd in mighty combat with Darius,
Whom, from his chariot, flaming all with gems,
He hurl'd to earth, and catch'd th' imperial crown.
'Twas not the shaft of love perform'd that feat;
He knew no Cupids then. Now mark the change:
A brace of rival queens embroil the court;
And, while each hand is thus employ'd in beauty,
Where has he room for glory?

Heph. In his heart.

Cly. Well said, young minion!—I, indeed, forgot
To whom I spoke—but Sysigambis comes:
Now is your time, for with her comes an idol,
That claims your homage.—I'll attend the king.
[Exit.]

Enter SYSIGAMBIS, with a letter, and PARISATIS.

Sys. Why will you wound me with your fond complaints,
And urge a suit that I can never grant?
You know, my child, 'tis Alexander's will;
He demands you for his lov'd Hephestion.
To disobey him might inflame his wrath,
And plunge our house in ruins yet unknown.

Par. To sooth this god, and charm him into
Is there no victim; none but Parisatis? [temper,
Must I be doom'd to wretchedness and woe,
That others may enjoy the conqueror's smiles;
Oh! if you ever lov'd my royal father—
And sure you did, your gushing tears proclaim it—
If still his name be dear, have pity on me!
He would not thus have forc'd me to despair;
Indeed he would not. Had I beg'd him thus,
He would have heard me, ere my heart was broke.

Sys. When will my suff'rings end? O, when, ye gods!
For sixty rolling years, my soul has stood
The dread vicissitudes of fate unmov'd:
I thought 'em your decrees, and therefore yielded.
But this last trial, as it springs from folly,
Exceeds my suff'rance, and I must complain.

Lys. When Sysigambis mourns, no common woe
Can be the cause—'tis misery, indeed.
Yet, pardon, mighty queen, a wretched prince,
Who thus presumes to plead the cause of love:
Beyond my life, beyond the world, (kneeling) I prize
Fair Parisatis. Hear me, I conjure you!
As you have authoriz'd Hephestion's vows,
Reject not mine; grant me but equal leave
To serve the princess, and let love decide.

Heph. A blessing like the beauteous Parisatis,
Whole years of service, and the world's wide empire,
With all the blood that circles in our veins,
Can never merit; therefore, in my favour,
I beg'd the king to interpose his int'rest;
Therefore, I beg'd your majesty's assistance;
Your word is pass'd, and all my hopes rest on't.

Lys. (Rising.) Perish such hopes! for love's
a generous passion,
Which seeks the happiness of her we love,
Beyond th' enjoyment of our own desires;
Nor kings, nor parents here have aught to do.
Love owns no influence, and disdains controul;
Let 'em stand neuter—'tis all I ask.

Heph. Such arrogance, did Alexander woo,
Would lose him all the conquests he has won.

Lys. To talk of conquests well becomes the man Whose life and sword are but his rival's gift.

Sys. It grieves me, brave Lysimachus, to find
My power fall short of my desires to serve you;
You know Hephestion first declar'd his love,
And 'tis as true, I promis'd him my aid.
Your glorious king, his mighty advocate,
Became himself an humble suppliant for him.
Forget her, prince, and triumph o'er your passion:
A conquest worthy of a soul like thine.

Lys. Forget her, madam! sooner shall the sun
Forget to shine, and tumble from his sphere.
Farewell, great queen; my honour now demands

That Alexander should himself explain
That wond'rous merit which exalts his fav'rite,
And casts Lysimachus at such a distance. [Exit.]

Sys. In this wild transport of ungovern'd passion
Too far, I fear, he will incense the king.

Is Alexander yet, my lord, arriv'd?

Heph. Madam, I know not, but Cassander comes;
He may, perhaps, inform us.

Sys. I would shun him.
Something there is, I know not why, that shocks me;
Something my nature shrinks at, when I see him.
[Exeunt.]

Enter CASSANDER.

Cas. The face of day now blushes scarlet deep:
Now blackens into night. The low'ring sun,
As if the dreadful business he foreknew,
Drives heavily his sable chariot on.
All nature seems alarm'd for Alexander.—
Why, be it so. Her pangs proclaim my triumph.
A mad Chaldean, with a flaming torch
Came to my bed last night, and bellowing o'er me,
Well had it been, for Babylon, he cried,
If curst Cassander never had been born.

Enter THESSALUS, with a packet.

How now, dear Thessalus, what packet's that?

Thes. From Macedon, a trusty slave just brought it.

Your father chides us for our cold delay;
He says, Craterus, by the king's appointment,
Comes, in his room, to govern Macedon,
Which nothing but the tyrant's death can hinder;
Therefore he bids us boldly strike at once,
Or quit our purpose, and confess our fears.

Cas. Is not his fate resolv'd?—this night he dies;
And thus my father but forestalls my purpose.
How am I slow then?—if I rode on thunder,
Wing'd as the light'ning, it would ask some moments,

Ere I could blast the growth of this Colossus.

Thes. Mark where the haughty Polyperchon
Some new affront by Alexander given, [comes!
Swells in his heart, and stings him into madness.

Cas. Now, now's our time; he must, he shall be ours:

His haughty soul will kindle at his wrongs,
Blaze into rage, and glory in revenge.

Enter POLYPERCHON.

Poly. Still as I pass, fresh murmurs fill my ears;
All talk of wrongs, and mutter their complaints.
Poor soul-less reptiles!—their revenge expires
In idle threats—the fortitude of cowards!
Their province is to talk! 'tis mine to act,
And shew this tyrant, when he dar'd to wrong me,
He wrong'd a man whose attribute is vengeance.

Cas. All nations bow their heads with servile homage,
And kiss the feet of this exalted man.

The name, the shout, the blast from ev'ry mouth
Is Alexander! Alexander stuns
The list'ning ear, and drowns the voice of heav'n.
The earth's commanders fawn like crouching spa-
And if this hunter of the barbarous world [niels;
But wind himself a god, all echo him,
With universal cry.

Poly. I fawn, or echo him!
Cassander, no! my soul disdains the thought!
Let eastern slaves, or prostituted Greeks
Crouch at his feet, or tremble if he frown.
When Polyperchon can descend so low,
False to that honour, which thro' fields of death,
I still have courted, where the fight was fiercest,
Be scorn my portion; infamy my lot.

Thes. The king may doom me to a thousand tortures,

Ply me with fire, and rack me like Philotas,
Ere I shall stoop to idolize his pride.

Cas. Not Aristander, had he rais'd all hell,

Could more have shock'd my soul, than thou hast done,

By the bare mention of Philotas' murder.

O Polyperchon! how shall I describe it!

Did not your eyes rain blood to see the hero?

Did not your spirits burst with smother'd vengeance

To see thy noble fellow-warrior tortur'd? [ance

Yet, without groaning, or a tear endure

The torments of the damn'd? O death to think it!

We saw him bruise'd; we saw his bones laid bare!

His veins wide lanc'd, and the poor quiv'ring flesh

With fiery pincers from his bosom torn;

Till all beheld where the great heart lay panting.

Poly. Yet all like statutes stood!—cold, lifeless statutes!

As if the sight had froze us into marble:

When, with collected rage, we should have flown

To instant vengeance on the ruthless cause,

And plung'd a thousand daggers in his heart.

Cas. At our last banquet, when the bowl had gone

The giddy round, and wine inflam'd my spirits;

I saw Craterus and Hephestion enter

In Persian robes; to Alexander's health

They largely drank; and falling at his feet

With impious adoration thus address'd

Their idol god. Hail, son of thund'ring Jove!

Hail, first of kings! young Ammon, live for ever!

Then kiss'd the ground; on which I laugh'd aloud,

And scoffing, ask'd 'em, why they kiss'd no harder:

Whereon the tyrant, starting from his throne,

Spurn'd me to earth, and stamping on my neck,

Learn thou to kiss it, was his fierce reply;

While, with his foot, he press'd me to the earth,

Till I lay welt'ring in a foam of blood.

Poly. Thus when I mock'd the Persians that ador'd him,

He struck me on the face, swung me around,

And bid his guards chastise me like a slave.

But if he 'scape my vengeance, may he live,

Great as that god whose name he thus profanes,

And, like a slave, may I again be beaten,

Scoff'd as I pass, and branded for a coward,

Cas. There spoke the spirit of Calisthenes:

Remember, he's a man, his flesh as penetrable

As any girl's, and wounded too as soon;

To give him death no thunders are requir'd.

Struck by a stone, young Jupiter has fall'n,

A sword has pierc'd him, and the blood has follow'd;

Nay, we have seen an hundred common ailments

Bring this immortal to the gates of death.

Poly. O let us not delay the glorious business!
Our wrongs are great, and honour calls for vengeance.

Cas. This day, exulting Babylon receives

The mighty robber—with him comes Roxana,

Fierce, haughty fair! On his return from India,

Artful she met him in the height of triumph,

And by a thousand wiles at Susa kept him,

In all the luxury of eastern revels.

Poly. How bore Statira his revolted love?

For, if I err not, ere the king espous'd her,

She made him promise to renounce Roxana.

Thes. No words can paint the anguish it occasion'd!

E'en Sysigambis wept, while the wrong'd queen

Struck to the heart, fell lifeless on the ground.

Cas. When the first tumult of her grief was laid,

I sought to fire her into wild revenge;

And to that end, with all the art I could,

Describ'd his passion for the bright Roxana:

But tho' I could not to my wish inflame her,

Thus far, at least, her jealousy will help;

She'll give him troubles that perhaps may end him,

And set the court in universal uproar.

But see, she comes. Our plots begin to ripen.

Now every one disperse,

And, with a face of friendship, meet the king,

[Exeunt.

Enter SYSIGAMBIS, STATIRA, and PARISATIS.

Sta. O for a dagger, a draught of poison, flames!
Swell heart, break, break, thou wretched stubborn thing.

Now, by the sacred fire, I'll not be held:

Pray give me leave to walk.

Sys. Is there no reverence to my person due?

Trust me, Statira, had thy father liv'd,

Darius wou'd have heard me.

Sta. O he's false.

This glorious man, this wonder of the world,

Is to his love, and every god foresworn.

O I have heard him breathe such ardent vows,

Out-weep the morning with his dewy eyes,

And sigh and swear the list'ning stars away.

Sys. Believe not rumour, 'tis impossible.

Thy Alexander is renown'd for truth;

Above deceit—

Sta. Away, and let me die.

Why, Alexander, why would'st thou deceive me!

Have I not kiss'd thy wounds with dying fondness,

Bath'd 'em in tears, and bound 'em with my hair!

Par. If man can thus renounce the solemn ties

Of sacred love, who would regard his vows?

Sta. Regard his vows, the monster, traitor! Oh!

I will forsake the haunts of men, converse

No more with aught that's human; dwell with darkness;

For since the sight of him is now unwelcome,

What has the world to give Statira joy?

Yet I must tell thee, perjur'd as he is,

Not the soft breezes of the genial spring,

The fragrant violet, or op'ning rose,

Are half so sweet as Alexander's breath:

Then he will talk—good gods, how he will talk!

He speaks the kindest words, and looks such things,

Vows with such passion, and swears with such a grace,

That it is heav'n to be deluded by him.

Sys. Her sorrows must have way.

Sta. Roxana then enjoys my perjur'd love;

Roxana clasps my monarch in her arms,

Doats on my conqu'ror, my dear lord, my king.

Oh 'tis too much! by heav'n I cannot bear it!

I'll die, or rid me of the burning torture.

Hear me, bright god of day, hear, ev'ry god.

Sys. Take heed, Statira; weigh it well, my child,
Ere desperate love enforces you to swear.

Sta. O fear not that, already have I weigh'd it;

And in the presence here of heav'n and you,

Renounce all converse with perfidious man.

Farewell, ye cozeners of our easy sex!

And thou the falsest of the faithless kind,

Farewell for ever! Oh, farewell! farewell!

If I but mention him, the tears will flow.

How cou'dst thou, cruel, wrong a heart like mine,

Thus fond, thus doting, ev'n to madness, on thee?

Sys. Clear up thy griefs, thy Alexander comes,

Triumphant in the spoils of conquer'd India;

This day the hero enters Babylon.

Sta. Why, let him come: all eyes will gaze with rapture.

All hearts will joy to see the victor pass,

All but the wretched, the forlorn Statira.

Sys. Wilt thou not see him then?

Sta. I swear, and heav'n be witness to my vow,
(Kneels.)

Never from this sad hour, never to see,

Nor speak, no, nor, if possible, to think

Of Alexander more: this is my vow,

And when I break it—

Sys. Do not ruin all!

Sta. May I again be perjured and deluded!

May furies rend my heart! may lightnings blast me!

Sys. Recal, my child, the dreadful imprecation.

Sta. No, I will publish it through all the court;

Then to the bow'rs of great Semiramis,

Retire for ever from the treacherous world.

There from man's sight will I conceal my woes,

And seek in solitude a calm repose :
Nor pray'rs nor tears, shall my resolves control,
Nor love itself, that tyrant of the soul. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A triumphal Arch at the entrance into Babylon.

Enter ALEXANDER in a triumphal car; trophies and warlike ensigns in procession before him; CLYTUS, HEPHESTION, LYSIMACHUS, CASSANDER, POLYPERCHON, THESSALUS, EUMENES, chorus of Priests, Youths, and Virgins, Guards, and Attendants.

*See the cong'ring hero comes,
Sound the trumpets, beat the drums;
Sports prepare, the laurel bring,
Songs of triumph to him sing.*

*See the godlike youth advance;
Breath the flute, and lead the dance;
Myrtles wreath, and roses twine,
To deck the hero's brow divine.*

Heph. Hail, son of Jove! great Alexander, hail!

Alex. Rise all; and thou, my second self, my friend!

Oh, my Hephestion! raise thee from the earth!
Come to my arms, and hide thee in my heart;
Nearer, yet nearer, else thou lov'st me not.

Heph. Not love my king! bear witness, all ye powers,

And let your thunder nail me to the centre,
If sacred friendship ever burn'd more brightly!
Immortal bosoms can alone admit

A flame more pure, more permanent than mine.

Alex. Thou dearer to me than my groves of laurel!

I know thou lov'st thy Alexander more,
Than Clytus does the king.

Lys. Now for my fate!
I see that death awaits me—yet I'll on.
Dread sir, I cast me at your royal feet.

Alex. Rise, my Lysimachus; thy veins and mine
From the same fountain have deriv'd their streams.
Rise to my arms, and let thy king embrace thee.
Is not that Clytus?

Cly. Your old faithful soldier.

Alex. Clytus, thy hand;—thy hand, Lysimachus;
Thus double-arm'd, methinks,
I stand tremendous as the Lybian god,
Who, while his priests and I quaff'd sacred blood,
Acknowledg'd me his son; my lightning thou,
And thou, my mighty thunder. I have seen
Thy glitt'ring sword out-fly celestial fire;
And, when I've cry'd, begone, and execute,
I've seen him run swifter than starting hinds,
Nor bent the tender grass beneath his feet.

Lys. When fame invites, and Alexander leads,
Dangers and toils but animate the brave.

Cly. Perish the soldier, inglorious and despis'd,
Who starts from either, when the king cries—on!

Alex. Oh, Clytus! Oh, my noble veteran!
'Twas, I remember, when I pass'd the Granicus,
Thy arm preserv'd me from unequal force;
When fierce Itanor and the bold Rhesaces,
Fell both upon me with two mighty blows,
And clove my temper'd helmet quite asunder;
Then, like a god, flew Clytus to my aid;
Thy thunder struck Rhesaces to the ground,
And turn'd with ready vengeance, on Itanor.

Cly. To your own deeds that victory you owe,
And sure your arms did never boast a nobler.

Alex. By heav'n, they never did: they never can:

And I am prouder to have pass'd that stream,
Than to have driven a million o'er the plain:
Can none remember?—Yes, I know all must—
When glory, like the dazzling eagle stood
Perch'd on my beaver in the Granic flood;

When fortune's self my standard trembling bore,
And the pale fates stood frighted on the shore;
When each immortal on the billows rode,
And I myself appear'd the leading god.

Enter ARISTANDER.

Aris. Haste, first of heroes, from this fatal place;
Far, far from Babylon, enjoy your triumph,
Or all the glories, which your youth has won,
Are blasted in their spring.

Alex. What mean thy fears?
And why that wild distraction on thy brow?

Aris. This morn, great king, I view'd the angry sky,

And frighted at the direful prodigies,
To Orosmales for instruction flew!

But, as I pray'd, deep-echoing groans I heard,
And shrieks, as of the damn'd that howl for sin.
Shock'd at the omen, while amaz'd I lay

In prostrate rev'rence on the trembling floor,
Thus spoke the god:

The brightest glory of imperial man,
The pride of nations, and the boast of fame,
Remorseless fate, in Babylon, has doom'd
To sudden and irrevocable ruin.

Alex. If heav'n ordains that Babylon must fall,
Can I prevent the immutable decree?

Enter PERDICCAS.

Per. Oh, horror! horror! Dreadful and portentous! [climation?]

Alex. How now, Perdicas! Whence this ex-

Per. As Meleager and myself, this morn,
Led forth the Persian horse to exercise,
We heard a noise as of a rushing wind;
When suddenly a flight of baleful birds,
Like a thick cloud, obscur'd the face of heav'n;
On sounding wings from diff'rent parts they flew,
Encount'ring met, and battled in the air;
Their talons clash'd, their beaks gave mighty blows,
And show'rs of blood fell copious from their wounds.

Alex. Though all the curtains of the sky were drawn,

And the stars wink, young Ammon shall go on;
While my Statira shines, I cannot stray,
Love lifts his torch to light me on my way,
And her bright eyes create another day.

Lys. Vouchsafe, dread sir, to hear my humble suit,

A prince intreats it, and what's more, your kinsman.

Alex. A soldier asks it; that's the noblest claim.

Lys. For all the services my sword has done,
Humbly I beg the princess Parisatis.

Alex. Lysimachus, no more—it is not well—
My word, you know, is to Hephestion given:
How dare you then—but let me hear no more on't.

Lys. At your command, to scale th' embattled wall,

Or fetch the gore-dy'd standard from the foe,
When has Hephestion flown with warmer zeal?
When did he leave Lysimachus behind?

These I have done, for these were in my pow'r;
But when you charge me to renounce my love,
And from my thoughts to banish Parisatis,
Obedience there becomes impossible;
Nature revolts, and my whole soul rebels.

Alex. It does, brave sir!—now hear me, and be dumb!

When, by my order, curst Calisthenes
Was, as a traitor, doom'd to live in torments—
Your pity sped him in despite of me.

Think not I have forgot your insolence;
No; though I pardon'd it:—yet, if again
Thou dar'st to cross me with another crime,
The bolts of fury shall be doubled on thee.—

In the mean time—think not of Parisatis;
For if thou dost—by the immortal Ammon!
I'll not regard that blood of mine thou shar'st,
But use thee as the vilest Macedonian.

Lys. I knew you partial, ere I mov'd my suit;
Yet, know, it shakes not my determin'd purpose;
While I have life and strength to wield a sword,
I never will forego the glorious claim.

Alex. Against my life!—ha! traitor, was it so?
'Tis said, that I am rash, of hasty humour!
But I appeal to the immortal gods,
If ever petty, poor, provincial lord
Had temper like to mine? My slave, whom I Could tread to clay, dares utter bloody threats.

Cly. Forgive dread sir, the frantic warmth of
love:

The noble prince,—I read it in his eyes,—
Would die a thousand deaths to serve his king,
And justify his loyalty and truth.

Lys. I meant his minion there should feel my arm,
Love claims his blood, nor shall he live to triumph
In that destruction that awaits his rival.

Alex. I pardon thee, for my old Clytus' sake;
But if once more thou mention thy rash love,
Or dar'st attempt Hephestion's precious life,
I'll pour such storms of indignation on thee,
Philota's rack, Calisthenes' disgrace,
Shall be delights, to what thou shalt endure.

Cly. My lord, the aged queen, with Parisatis,
Comes to congratulate your safe arrival.

Enter SYSIGAMBIS and PARISATIS.

Alex. Oh! thou, the best of women, Sysigambis,
Source of my joy, blest parent of my love!

Sys. In humble duty to the gods and you,
Permit us, sir, with gratitude to bow.
Through you the royal house of Persia shines,
Rais'd from the depth of wretchedness and ruin,
In all the splendour of imperial greatness.

Alex. To meet me thus, was generously done;
But still there wants, to crown my happiness,
That treasure of my soul, my dear Statira:
Had she but come to meet her Alexander,
I had been blest indeed.

Cly. Now who shall dare
To tell him of the queen's vow?

Alex. How fares
My love?—Ha! neither answer me! all silent!
A sudden horror, like a bolt of ice,
Shoots to my heart, and numbs the seat of life.

Heph. I would relate it, but my courage fails me.

Alex. Why stand you all as you were rooted here?
What, will none answer? my Hephestion silent?
If thou hast any love for Alexander;
If ever I obliged thee by my care;
When through the field of death my eye has watch'd
thee,

Resolve my doubts, and rescue me from madness.

Heph. Your mourning queen has no disease but grief,

Occasioned by the jealous pangs of love.
She heard, dread sir, (for what can 'scape a lover)
That you, regardless of your vows, at Susa,
Had to Roxana's charms resign'd your heart,
And revell'd in the joys you once forswore.

Alex. I own, the subtle sorceress, in my riot,
My reason gone, seduc'd me to her bed;
But, when I wak'd, I shook the Circe off;
Nor griev'd I less for that which I had done,
Than when at Thais' suit, enrag'd with wine,
I set the fam'd Persepolis on fire.

Heph. Your queen Statira, in the rage of grief,
And agony of desp'rate love, has sworn,
Never to see your majesty again.

Alex. Oh, madam, has she, has Statira sworn Never to see her Alexander more?

Par. With sorrow, sir, I heard the solemn vow;
My mother heard it, and in vain adjur'd her,
By every tender motive, to recall it.

Sys. But with that fierceness she resents her wrongs,
Dwells on your fault, and heightens the offence,

That I could wish your majesty forget her.

Alex. Ha, could you wish me to forget Statira?
The star which brightens Alexander's life,
His guide by day, and goddess of his nights!
I feel her now; she beats in every pulse,
Throbs at my heart, and circles with my blood.

Sys. Have patience, sir, and trust to heav'n and
me:

If my authority has any influence,
I will exert it, and she shall be yours.

Alex. Haste, madam, haste, if you would have me live;

Fly, ere for ever she abjure the world,
And stop the sad procession. [Exit Sysigambis.]

Parisatis,
Hang thou about her; wash her feet with tears,
Nay, haste; the breath of gods, and eloquence
Of angels, go along with you. [Exit Parisatis.]
Oh, my heart!

Lys. Now let your majesty, who feels the pangs
Of disappointed love, reflect on mine.

Alex. Ha!

Cly. What, are you mad? Is this a time to plead?

Lys. The prop'rest time; he dares not now be partial,

Lest heav'n, in justice, should avenge my wrongs,
And double every pang which he feels now.

Alex. Why dost thou tempt me thus to thy undoing?

Death thou shouldst have, were it not courted so:
But, know, to thy confusion, that my word,
Like destiny, admits of no repeal:
Therefore, in chains, shalt thou behold the nuptials
Of my Hephestion. Guards, take him prisoner.

(The Guards sieze Lysimachus.)

Lys. Away, ye slaves, I'll not resign my sword,
Till first I've drench'd it in my rival's blood.

Alex. I charge you, kill him not; take him alive:
The dignity of kings is now concern'd,
And I will find a way to tame this rebel.

Cly. Kneel—for I see rage lightning in his eyes.

Lys. I neither hope, nor will I sue for pardon:
Had I my sword and liberty again,
Again I would attempt his favourite's heart.

Alex. Hence, from my sight, and bear him to a dungeon.

Perdiccas, give this lion to a lion.—

None speak for him: fly; stop his mouth, away.

[Exeunt Lysimachus, Perdiccas, and Guards.]

Cly. This comes of woman—the result of love.
Yet were I heated now with wine, I doubt
I should be preaching in this fool's behalf.

Alex. Come hither, Clytus, and my friend He-phestion;

Lend me your arms; for I am sick o' the sudden.
I fear, betwixt Statira's cruel vows,
And fond Roxana's arts, your king will fall.

Cly. Better the race of women were destroy'd,
And Persia sunk in everlasting ruin.

Heph. Look up, my lord, and bend not thus your head,

As if you purpos'd to forsake the world,
Which you have greatly won.

Alex. Would I had not;
There's no true joy in such unwieldy fortune.
Eternal gazers lasting troubles make;
All find my spots, but few observe my brightness.
Stand from about me all, and give me air!

(They retire.)

Yes, I will shake this Cupid from my soul;
I'll fright the feeble god with war's alarms,
Or drown his pow'r in floods of hostile blood.
Grant me, great Mars, once more in arms to shine,
And break, like light'ning, through the embattl'd line;

O'er fields of death to whirl the rapid car,
And blaze amidst the thunder of the war,
Resistless as the bolt that rends the grove;—
Or greatly perish, like the son of Jove. [Exeunt.]

ACT. III.

SCENE I.—A Square before the palace.

Trumpets sounding a dead march. LYSIMACHUS led Prisoner, PARISATIS, EUMENES, PERDICCAS, and Guards.

Par. Stay, my Lysimachus! a moment stay!
Oh, whither art thou going?—hold a moment!
Unkind! thou know'st my life was wrapt in thine,
Why would'st thou then to worse than death expose me?

Lys. Oh, may'st thou live in joys without allay!
Grant it, ye gods! a better fortune waits thee;
Live and enjoy it—'tis my dying wish;
While to the grave the lost Lysimachus
Alone retires, and bids the world adieu.

Par. Even in that grave will Parisatis join thee;
Yes, cruel man! not death itself shall part us;
A mother's pow'r, a sister's soft'ning tears,
With all the fury of a tyrant's frown,
Shall not compel me to outlive thy loss.

Lys. Were I to live till nature's self decay'd,
This wond'rous waste of unexampled love
I never could repay—Oh, Parisatis!
Thy charms might fire a coward into courage;
How must they act, then, on a soul like mine?
Defenceless, and unarm'd, I fight for thee,
And may, perhaps, compel th' astonish'd world,
And force the king to own that I deserve thee.
Eumenes, take the princess to thy charge;
Away, Perdicas; all my soul's on fire.

[Exeunt Parisatis and Perdicas, Lysimachus and Guards.]

SCENE II.—A Pavilion,

Enter ROXANA and CASSANDER.

Rox. Deserted! saidst thou? for a girl abandon'd!

A puny girl, made up of wat'ry elements!
Shall she embrace the god of my desires,
And triumph in the heart Roxana claims?
If I forget it, may'st thou, Jove, deprive me
Of vengeance, make me the most wretched thing
On earth, while living, and when dead, the lowest
And blackest of the fiends;

Cas. Oh, nobly said!
Just is the vengeance which inflames your soul;
Your wrongs demand it—but let reason govern;
This wild rage, else, may disappoint your aims.

Rox. Away, away, and give a whirlwind room;
Pride, indignation, fury, and contempt,
War in my breast, and torture me to madness!

Cas. Oh, think not I would check your boldest flights;
No—I approve 'em, and will aid your vengeance.
But, princess, let us choose the safest course,
Or we may give our foes new cause of triumph,
Should they discover, and prevent our purpose.

Rox. Fear not, Cassander, nothing shall prevent
it;

Roxana dooms him, and her voice is fate.
My soul, from childhood, has aspir'd to empire;
In early non-age I was us'd to reign
Among my she-companions: I despis'd
The trifling arts, and little wiles of women,
And taught 'em, with an Amazonian spirit,
To wind the steed, to chase the foaming boar,
And conquer man, the lawless, charter'd savage.

Cas. Her words, her looks, her every motion fires me!

Rox. But when I heard of Alexander's fame,
How, with a handful, he had vanquish'd millions,
Spoil'd all the East, and captive held our queens;
While, like a god, unconquer'd by their charms,
With heav'nly pity he assuag'd their woes,
Dry'd up their tears, and sooth'd them into peace;
I hung attentive on my father's lips,
And wish'd him tell the wond'rous tale again.
No longer pleasing were my former sports;

Love had its turn, and all the woman reign'd.
Involuntary sighs heav'd in my breast,
And glowing blushes crimson'd on my cheek;
E'en in my slumbers I have often mourn'd
In plaintive sounds, and murmur'd Alexander.

Cas. Curse on his name!—she doats upon him still.

Rox. At length this conqueror to Zogdia came,
And, cover'd o'er with laurels, storm'd the city:
But, Oh, Cassander! where shall I find words
To paint the ecstatic transports of my soul?
When, midst a circle of unrivall'd beauties,
I saw myself distinguish'd by the hero!
With artless rapture I receiv'd his vows,
The warmest, sure, that ever lover breath'd,
Of fervent love, and everlasting truth. [past?

Cas. And need you then be told, those times are Statira now engrosses all his thoughts:
The Persian queen, without a rival, reigns
Sole mistress of his heart; nor can thy charms,
The brightest, sure, that ever woman boasted,
Nor all his vows of everlasting love,
Secure Roxana from disdain and insult.

Rox. Oh, thou hast rous'd the lion in my soul!
Ha! shall the daughter of Darius hold him?
No, 'tis resolv'd; I will resume my sphere,
Or, falling, spread a general ruin round me,
Roxana and Statira; they are names
That must for ever jar, like clashing clouds;
When they encounter, thunders must ensue.

Cas. Behold, she comes, in all the pomp of sorrow,
Determin'd to fulfil her solemn vow! (They retire.)

Rox. Away, and let us mark th' important scene.

Enter STATIRA and SYSIGAMBIS.

Sys. Oh, my Statira, how has passion chang'd thee!
Think, in the rage of disappointed love,
If treated thus, and hurried to extremes,
What Alexander may denounce against us;
Against the poor remains of lost Darius.

Sta. Oh, fear not that! I know he will be kind,
For my sake kind, to you and Parisatis:
Tell him, I rail'd not at his falsehood to me,
But with my parting breath spoke kindly of him;
Tell him I wept at our divided loves,
And, sighing, sent a last forgiveness to him.

Sys. No, I can ne'er again presume to meet him,
Never approach the much-wrong'd Alexander,
If thou refuse to see him. Oh, Statira!
Thy aged mother, and thy weeping country,
Claim thy regard, and challenge thy compassion:
Hear us, my child, and lift us from despair.

Sta. Thus low, I cast me at your royal feet,
To bathe them with my tears; or, if you please,
I'll let out life, and wash 'em with my blood.
But I conjure you not to rack my soul,
Nor hurry my wild thoughts to perfect madness:
Should now Darius' awful ghost appear,
And you, my mother, stand beseeching by,
I would persist to death, and keep my vow.

Rox. This fortitude of soul compels my wonder.
(Aside.)

Sys. Hence! from my sight! ungrateful wretch, begone!
And hide thee where bright virtue never shone;
For, in the sight of heaven, I here renounce,
And cast thee off an alien to my blood!

[Exeunt Sys. and Cas.]

Rox. (Advancing.) Forgive, great queen, th' intrusion of a stranger;
With grief Roxana sees Statira weep;
I've heard, and much applaud your fix'd resolve,
To quit the world for Alexander's sake;
And yet I fear, so greatly he adores you,
That he will rather choose to die of sorrow,
Than live for the despis'd Roxana's charms.

Sta. Spare, madam, spare your counterfeited fears;
You know your beauty, and have prov'd its pow'r;
Tho' humbly born, have you not captive held,

In love's soft chains, the conq'rour of the world?
Away to libertines, and boast thy conquest;
A shameful conquest! In his hours of riot,
When wine prevail'd, and virtue lost its influence,
Then, only then, Roxana could surprise
My Alexander's heart.

Rox. Affected girl,
To some romantic grove's sequester'd gloom
Thy sickly virtue would, it seems, retire,
To shun the triumphs of a favour'd rival. [thee;
In vain thou fliest; for there, ev'n there I'll haunt
Plague thee all day, and torture thee all night:
There shalt thou learn, in what ecstatic joys
Roxana revels with the first of men;
And, as thou hear'st the rapt'rous scene recited,
With frantic jealousy thou'lt madly curse
Thy own weak charms, that could not fix the rover,

Sta. How weak is woman! at the storm she shrinks, [der;
Dreads the drawn sword, and trembles at the thun-
Yet, when strong jealousy inflames her soul,
The sword may glitter, and the tempest roar,
She scorns the danger, and provokes her fate.
Rival, I thank thee; thou hast fir'd my soul,
And rais'd a storm beyond thy pow'r to lay;
Soon shalt thou tremble at the dire effects,
And curse, too late, the folly that undid thee.

Rox. Sure the disdain'd Statira dares not mean it.

Sta. By all my hopes of happiness I dare:
And know, proud woman, what a mother's threats,
A sister's sighs, and Alexander's tears;
Could not effect, thy rival rage has done.
I'll see the king, in spite of all I swore,
Though curs'd, that thou may'st never see him more.

Enter ALEXANDER, HEPHESTION, CLYTUS, POLY-PERCHON, THESSALUS, and EUMENES.

Alex. Oh, my Statira! thou relentless fair!
Turn thine eyes on me: I would talk to them.
What shall I say to work upon thy soul? [ness?
What words, what looks, can melt thee to forgive-

Sta. Talk of Roxana, and the conquer'd Indies,
Thy great adventures, thy successful love,
And I will listen to the rapt'rous tale:
But rather shun me, shun a desperate wretch,
Resign'd to sorrow, and eternal woe. [thee;

Alex. Oh! I could die, with transport, die before
Would'st thou but, as I lay convuls'd in death,
Cast a kind look, or drop a tender tear.

Rox. Am I then fall'n so low in thy esteem,
That for another thou would'st rather die,
Than live for me? How am I alter'd, tell me,
Since last at Susa, with repeated oaths,
You swore the conquest of the world afforded
Less joy, less glory, than Roxana's love?

Alex. Take, take that conquer'd world, dispose of crowns,

And canton out the empires of the globe;
But leave me, madam, with repentant tears,
And undissembled sorrows, to atone
The wrongs I've offer'd to this injur'd excellence.

Rox. Yes, I will go, ungrateful as thou art!
Bane to my life, and murd'rer of my peace,
I will be gone; this last disdain has cur'd me.
But have a care; I warn you not to trust me;
Or, by the gods, that witness to thy perjuries,
I'll raise a fire that shall consume you both,
Tho' I partake the ruin. [Exit.

Sta. Alexander! Oh, is it possible?
Immortal gods! can guilt appear so lovely?
Yet, yet I pardon, I forgive thee all.

Alex. Forgive me all! Oh, catch the heavenly sounds,
Catch 'em, ye winds, and, as you fly, disperse
The rapt'rous tidings through the extended world,
That all may share in Alexander's joy!

Sta. Yes, dear deceiver, I forgive thee all,
But longer dare not hear thy charming tongue;
For while I hear thee, my resolves give way:

Be therefore quick, and take thy last farewell;
Farewell, my love—eternally farewell!

Alex. Go, then, inhuman, triumph in my pains,
Feed on the pangs that rend this wretched heart;
For now 'tis plain you never lov'd. Statira!
Oh, I could sound that charming, cruel name,
Till the tir'd echo faint with repetition.
Oh, stay, my Statira! (Kneels.)

I swear, my queen, I'll not outlive our parting:
My soul grows still as death. Say, wilt thou pardon?
'Tis all I ask; wilt thou forgive the transports
Of a deep wounded heart, and all is well? [tira!

Sta. Rise; and may heav'n forgive you, like Sta-

Alex. You are too gracious. Clytus, bear me
hence.

When I am laid i' th' earth, yield her the world.
There's something here, that heaves as cold as ice,
That stops my breath. Farewell, farewell for ever!

Sta. Hold off, and let me run into his arms:

My life, my love, my lord, my Alexander!

If thy Statira's love can give thee joy,

Revive, and be immortal as the gods.

Alex. Oh, let me press thee in my eager arms,
And strain thee hard to my transported breast!

Sta. But shall Roxana—

Alex. Let her not be nam'd!

Oh! how shall I repay you for this goodness?

And you, my fellow warriors, who could grieve

For your lost king? But talk of griefs no more;

The banquet waits, and I invite you all:

My equals in the throne, as in the grave,

Without distinction come, and share my joys.

Cly. Excuse me, sir, if I for once am absent.

Alex. Excuse thee, Clytus! None shall be excus'd.

All revel out the day, 'tis my command;

Gay as the Persian god, ourself will stand,

With a crown'd goblet in our lifted hand;

Young Ammon and Statira shall go round,

While antic measures beat the burthen'd ground,

And to the vaulted skies our trumpet's clangors sound. [Flourish of trumpets, and exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Square before the palace.

Enter CLYTUS, HEPHESTION, and PERDICCAS.

Cly. Urge me no more; I hate the Persian dress:
Nor should the king be angry at the rev'rence
I owe my country: sacred are her customs,
And honest Clytus will to death observe 'em.
Oh! let me rot in Macedonian rags,
Or, like Calisthenes, be cag'd for life,
Rather than shine in fashions of the east.

Per. Let me, brave Clytus, as a friend entreat you.

Heph. What virtue is there that adorns a throne,
Exalts the heart, and dignifies the man,
Which shines not brightly in our royal master?
And yet perversely you'll oppose his will,
And thwart an innocent unhurtful humour.

Cly. Unhurtful! oh! 'tis monstrous affectation,
Pregnant with venom, in its nature black,
And not to be excus'd. Shall man, weak man,
Exact the rev'rence which we pay to heaven,
And bid his fellow-creatures kneel before him,
And yet be innocent? Hephestion, no;
The pride that lays a claim to adoration,
Insults our reason, and provokes the gods.

Per. Yet what was Jove, the god whom we adore?
Was he not once a man, and rais'd to heaven
For gen'rous acts, and virtues more than human?

Heph. By all his thunder, and his sov'reign pow'r,
I'll not believe the world yet ever felt
An arm like Alexander's! Not that god
You nam'd, though riding in a car of fire,
Could in a shorter space do greater deeds;
Or more effectually have taught mankind
To bend submissive, and confess his sway.

Cly. I tell you, boy, that Clytus loves the kin-
As well as you, or any soldier here,

Yet I disdain to sooth his growing pride;
The hero charms me, but the god offends.

Heph. Then go not to the banquet.

Cly. Why, I was bid,
Young minion, was I not, as well as you?
I'll go, my friends, in this old habit, thus,
And laugh, and drink the king's health heartily;
And while you, blushing, bow your heads to earth,
And hide them in the dust, I'll stand erect,
Straight as a spear, the pillar of my country,
And be by so much nearer to the gods.

Heph. But see, the king appears.

Enter ALEXANDER, STATIRA, THESSALUS, and Guards, PARISATIS and EUMENES.

Par. Oh, gracious monarch!
Spare him, oh, spare Lysimachus his life!
I know you will; the brave delight in mercy.

Alex. Shield me, Statira, shield me from her sorrows!

Par. Save him, oh, save him, ere it be too late!
Speak the kind word; let not your soldier perish
For one rash action, by despair occasion'd.
I'll follow thus for ever on my knees;
You shall not pass. Statira, oh, intreat him!

Alex. Oh, madam! take her, take her from about me;

Her streaming eyes assail my very soul,
And shake my best resolves.

Sta. Did I not break
Through all for you? Nay now, my lord, you must.
By all th' obedience I have paid you long,
By all your passion, sighs, and tender looks,
Oh, save a prince, whose only crime is love!
I had not join'd in this bold suit, my lord,
But that it adds new lustre to your honour. [it?

Alex. Honour! what's that? Has not Statira said
Fly, Clytus! snatch him from the jaws of death,
And to the royal banquet bring him straight;
Bring him in triumph, fit for loads of honour.

[Exeunt Clytus, Hephestion, and Parisatis.

Sta. Why are you thus beyond expression kind?
Oh, my lov'd lord! my fond, my raptur'd heart,
By gratitude and love at once inflam'd,
With wild emotion flutters in my breast;
Oh, teach it, then, instruct it how to thank you!

Alex. Excellent woman!

'Tis not in nature to support such joy. [quiet;

Sta. Go, my best love; unbend you at the ban-
Indulge in joy, and laugh your cares away;
While, in the bowers of great Semiramis,
I dress your bed with all the sweets of nature,
And crown it, as the altar of our loves;
Where I will lay me down, and softly mourn,
But never close my eyes till you return. [Exit.

Alex. Is she not more than mortal can desire;
As Venus lovely, and as Dian chaste?
And yet, I know not why, our parting shocks me;
A ghastly paleness sat upon her brow;
Her voice, like dying echoes, fainter grew;
And, as I wrung her by the rosy fingers, Methought the strings of my great heart were crack'd,

What could it mean? Forward, Laomedon.

Enter ROXANA, CASSANDER, and POLYPERCHON.

Why, madam, gaze you thus?

Rox. For a last look,
And to imprint the memory of my wrongs;
Roxana's wrongs, on Alexander's mind.

Alex. On to the banquet.

[Exeunt Alexander and his Train.

Rox. Ha! with such disdain!
So unconcern'd! Oh, I could tear myself,
Him, you, and all the hateful world to atoms!

Cas. Still keep this spirit up, preserve it still,
And know us for your friends. We like your rage;
'Tis lovely in you, and your wrongs require it.
Here, in the sight of heaven, Cassander swears,

Unaw'd by death, to second your revenge,
Speak but the word, and, swift as thought can fly,
The tyrant falls a victim to your fury.

Rox. Shall he, then, die? Shall I consent to kill him?

I, that have lov'd him with that eager fondness,
Shall I consent to have him basely murder'd,
And see him clasp'd in the cold arms of death?
Worlds should not tempt me to the deed of horror.

Poly. The weak fond scruples of your love might pass,

Were not the empire of the world concern'd:
But, madam, think, when time shall teach his tongue,

How will the glorious infant, which you bear,
Arraign his partial mother, for refusing
To fix him on the throne, which here we offer?

Cas. If Alexander lives, you cannot reign,
Nor will your child. Old Sysigambis plans
Your sure destruction. Boldly then prevent her;
Give but the word, and Alexander dies.

Poly. Not he alone; the Persian race shall bleed:
At your command, one universal ruin
Shall, like a deluge, whelm the eastern world,
Till gloriously we raise you to the throne.

Rox. But, till the mighty ruin be accomplish'd,
Where can Roxana fly th' avenging wrath
Of those who must succeed this godlike man?

Cas. Would you vouchsafe in these expanded arms

To seek a refuge, what could hurt you here?
Here you might reign, with undiminish'd lustre,
Queen of the East, and empress of my soul.

Rox. Disgrac'd Roxana! whither art thou fallen?
Till this curs'd hour I never was unhappy;
There's not one mark of former majesty
To awe the slave that offers at mine honour.

Cas. Impute not, madam, my unbounded passion
To want of rev'rence—I have lov'd you long.

Rox. Peace, villain, peace, and let me hear no more.

Think'st thou I'd leave the bosom of a god,
And stoop to thee, thou moving piece of earth?
Hence, from my sight, and never more presume
To meet my eyes; for, mark me, if thou dar'st,
To Alexander I'll unfold thy treason;
Whose life, in spite of all his wrongs to me,
Shall still be sacred, and above thy malice.

Cas. (Kneels.) By your own life, the greatest oath, I swear,
Cassander's passion from this hour is dumb;
And, as the best atonement I can make,
Statira dies, the victim of your vengeance.

Rox. Cassander, rise; 'tis ample expiation.
Yes, rival, yes; this night shall be thy last;
This night, I know, is destin'd for thy triumph,
And gives my Alexander to thy arms.
Oh! murd'rous thought!

Poly. The bow'rs of great Semiramis are made
The scene of love; Perdiccas holds the guard.

Cas. Now is your time, when Alexander revels,
And the whole court re-echoes with his riot,
To end her, and with her to end your fears.
Give me but half the Zogdian slaves that wait you,
And deem her dead: nor shall a soul escape
That serves your rival, to disperse the news.

Rox. By me they die, Perdiccas and Statira;
Hence with thy aid, I neither ask nor want it;
But will myself conduct the slaves to battle.
Were she to fall by any arm but mine,
Well might she murmur, and arraign her stars.
Rival, rejoice, and, pleas'd, resign thy breath,
Roxana's vengeance grants thee noble death. [Exit.

Cas. All but her Jove, this Semele disdains.
We must be quick. She may, perhaps, betray
The great design, and frustrate our revenge.

Poly. Has Philip got instruction how to act?

Cas. He has, my friend; and, faithful to our cause,
Resolves to execute the fatal order.

Bear him this phial; it contains a poison
Of that exalted force, that deadly nature,
Should Æsculapius drink it, in an hour,
For then it works, the god himself were mortal;
I drew it from Nonacri's horrid spring:
Mix'd with his wine, a single drop gives death,
And sends him howling to the shades below.

Poly. I know its power, for I have seen it try'd;
Pains of all sorts through every nerve and artery
At once it scatters; burns at once and freezes;
Till, by extremity of torture forc'd,
The soul consents to leave her joyless home,
And seek for ease in worlds unknown to this.

Cas. Now let us part: with Thessalus and Philip Haste to the banquet; at his second call
Let this be given him, and it crowns our hopes.

[Exit Polyperchon.

Now, Alexander, now we shall be quits;
Death for a blow is interest indeed. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Palace.

ALEXANDER, POLYPERCHON, CASSANDER, THES-SALUS, EUMENES, Guards, &c. discovered at a banquet. A flourish of trumpets, drums, &c.

Alex. To our immortal health, and our fair queen's!—

All drink it deep; and, while the bowl goes round,
Mars and Bellona join to make us music;
A hundred bulls be offer'd to the sun,
White as his beams; speak the big voice of war;
Strike all our drums, and sound our silver trumpets;
Provoke the gods to follow our example
In bowls of nectar, and replying thunder.

(Flourish of trumpets, drums, &c.)

Enter CLYTUS, HEPHESTION, and LYSIMACHUS, bloody.

Cly. Long live the king; long live great Alexander;
And conquest crown his arms with deathless laurels,
Propitious to his friends, and all he favours!

Alex. Did I not give command you should preserve Lysimachus?

Heph. Dread sir, you did.

Alex. What then

Portend these bloody marks?

Heph. Ere we arriv'd,
Perdiccas had already plac'd the prince
In a lone court, all but his hands unarm'd.

Cly. On them were gauntlets; such was his desire,
In death to shew the difference betwixt
The blood of Eacus, and common men.
Forth issuing from his den, amaz'd we saw
The horrid savage, with whose hideous roar
The palace shook; his angry eye-balls glaring
With triple fury, menac'd death and ruin.

Heph. With unconcern, the gallant prince ad-vanc'd;

Now, Parisatis, be the glory thine,
But mine the danger, were his only words;
For, as he spoke, the furious beast descried him,
And rush'd, outrageous, to devour his prey.

Cly. Agile and vigorous, he avoids the shock
With a slight wound; and, as the lion turn'd,
Thrust gauntlet, arm, and all, into his throat,
And, with Herculean strength, tears forth his tongue;
Foaming and bloody, the disabled savage
Sunk to the earth, and plough'd it with his teeth;
While, with an active bound, your conqu'ring soldier

Leap'd on his back, and dash'd his scull in pieces.

Alex. By all my laurels, 'twas a godlike act;
And 'tis my glory, as it shall be thine,
That Alexander could not pardon thee.

Oh, my brave soldier, think not all the pray'rs
And tears of the lamenting queens could move me
Like what thou hast perform'd! Grow to my breast.

Lys. Thus, self-condemn'd, and conscious of my guilt,
How shall I stand such unexampled goodness?

Oh, pardon, sir, the transports of despair,
The frantic outrage of ungovern'd love!
E'en when I shew'd the greatest want of reverence,
I could have died with rapture in your service.

Alex. Lysimachus, we both have been transported;
But, from this hour, be certain of my heart.

A lion be the impress of thy shield;
And that gold armour we from Porus won,
Thy king presents thee. But thy wounds ask rest.

Lys. I have no wounds, dread sir; or, if I had,
Were they all mortal, they should stream unminded,
When Alexander was the glorious health.

Alex. Thy hand, Hephestion. Clasp him to thy heart,

And wear him ever near thee. Parisatis
Shall now be his who serves me best in war.

Neither reply; but mark the charge I give—

Live, live as friends; you will, you must, you shall;
'Tis a god gives you life.

Cly. Oh, monstrous vanity!

Alex. Ha! what says Clytus? who am I?

Cly. The son
Of good king Philip.

Alex. By my kindred gods,
'Tis false: great Ammon gave me birth.

Cly. I've done.

Alex. Clytus, what means that dress? Give him a robe there.

Take it, and wear it.

Cly. Sir, the wine, the weather
Has heated me; besides, you know my humour.

Alex. Oh! 'tis not well! I'd rather perish, burn,
Than be so singular and froward.

Cly. So would I—

Burn, hang, or drown; but in a better cause.

I'll drink, or fight, for sacred majesty

With any here. Fill me another bowl.

Will you excuse me?

Alex. You will be excus'd.

But let him have his humour; he is old.

Cly. So was your father, sir; this to his mem'ry!
Sound all the trumpets there.

Alex. They shall not sound

Till the king drinks. Sure, I was born to wage

Eternal war! All are my enemies,

Whom I could tame. But let the sports go on.

Lys. Nay, Clytus, you that could advise so well—

Alex. Let him persist, be positive, and proud,

Envious and sullen 'mongst the nobler souls,

Like an infernal spirit that hath stol'n

From hell, and mingled with the mirth of gods.

Cly. When gods grow hot, no difference I know
'Twixt them and devils. Fill me Greek wine: yet,
Yet fuller; I want spirits.

Alex. Let me have music.

Cly. Music for boys. Clytus would hear the groans
Of dying soldiers, and the neigh of steeds;

Or, if I must be pester'd with shrill sounds,

Give me the cries of matrons in sack'd towns.

Heph. Let us, Lysimachus, awake the king;

A heavy gloom is gathering on his brow.

Kneel all, with humblest adoration, kneel,

And let a health to Jove's great son go round.

Alex. Sound, sound, that all the universe may hear, (A loud flourish of trumpets.)

Oh, for the voice of Jove! the world should know

The kindness of my people. Rise, Oh, rise!—

My hands, my arms, my heart, are ever your's.

Cly. I did not kiss the earth, nor must your hand;
I am unworthy, sir.

Alex. Thou art, indeed!

Thou enviest the great honour of thy master—

Sit, all my friends. Now let us talk of war;

The noblest subject for a soldier's mouth;

And speak, speak freely, else you love me not;

Who, think you, was the greatest general

That ever led an army to the field?

Heph. A chief so great, so fortunately brave,
And justly so renown'd as Alexander,

The radiant sun, since first his beams gave light,
Never yet saw.

Lys. Such was not Cyrus, nor the fam'd Alcides,
Nor great Achilles, whose tempestuous sword
Laid Troy in ashes, though the warring gods
Oppos'd him.

Alex. Oh, you flatter me! you flatter me!

Cly. They do, indeed; and yet you love 'em for't,
But hate old Clytus for his hardy virtue.

Come, shall I speak a man, with equal bravery,
A better general, and experter soldier?

Alex. Instruct me, sir; I should be glad to learn.

Cly. Your father, Philip. I have seen him march,
And fought beneath his dreadful banner, where
The boldest at this table would have trembled.
Nay, frown not, sir, you cannot look me dead.
When Greeks join'd Greeks, then was the tug of war,
The labour'd battle sweat, and conquest bled.

Why should I fear to speak a bolder truth,
Than e'er the lying priests of Ammon told you?
Philip fought men, but Alexander, women.

Alex. Proud spite, and burning envy, by the gods!
Is then my glory come to this at last,
To conquer women! Nay, he said, the stoutest,
The stoutest here would tremble at his dangers.
In all the sickness, all the wounds, I bore,
When, from my reins, the javelin's head was cut,
Lysimachus, Hephestion, speak, Perdiccas,
Did I once tremble? Oh, the cursed falsehood!
Did I once shake or groan? or act beneath
The dauntless resolution of a king?

Lys. Wine has transported him.

Alex. No, 'tis mere malice—
I was a woman too, at Oxydrace,
When, planting on the walls a scaling ladder,
I mounted, spite of show'rs of stones, bars, arrows,
And all the lumber which they thunder'd down;
When you, beneath, cried out, and spread your arms,
That I should leap among you; did I so?

Lys. Dread sir, the old man knows not what he says.

Alex. Was I a woman, when, like Mercury,
I leap'd the walls, and flew amidst the foe,
And, like a baited lion, dy'd myself
All over in the blood of those bold hunters;
Till, spent with toil, I battled on my knees,
Pluck'd forth the darts that made my shield a forest,

And hurl'd 'em back with most unconquer'd fury?
Then, shining in my arms, I sunn'd the field,
Mov'd, spoke, and fought, and was myself a war.

Cly. 'Twas all bravado; for, before you leap'd,
You saw that I had burst the gates asunder.

Alex. Oh, that thou wert but young again, and vigorous,
That I might strike thee prostrate to the earth
For this audacious lie, thou feeble dotard!

Cly. I know the reason why you use me thus.
I sav'd you from the sword of bold Rhesaces,
Else had your godship slumber'd in the dust;
And most ungratefully you hate me for it.

Alex. Hence from the banquet! Thus far I forgive thee.

Cly. First try, for none can want forgiveness more,
To have your own bold blasphemies forgiven,
The shameful riots of a vicious life,
Philotas' murder—

Alex. Ha! what said the traitor?

Heph. Clytus, withdraw; Eumenes, force him
hence.

Cly. No, let him send me, if I must be gone,
To Philip, Attalus, Calisthenes,
To great Parmenio, and his slaughter'd sons.

Alex. Give me a javelin.

Lys. Hold, mighty sir.

Alex. Sirrah! Off,
Lest I at once strike through his heart and thine.
Begone to Philip, Attalus, Calisthenes; (Stabs him.)
And let bold subjects learn, by thy example,

Not to provoke the patience of their prince.

(Clytus falls.)

Cly. The rage of wine is drown'd in gushing blood.
Oh, Alexander! I have been to blame;
Hate me not after death; for I repent,
That I so far have urg'd your noble nature.

Alex. What's this I hear! Say on, my dying soldier.

Cly. I should have kill'd myself, had I but liv'd
To be once sober; but now I fall with honour;
My own hands wou'd have brought foul death.
Oh, pardon. (Dies.)

Alex. Then I am lost! What has my vengeance done!

Who is it thou hast slain? Clytus! what was he?
The faithfullest subject, worthiest counsellor,
The bravest soldier! He who sav'd thy life,
Fighting bare-headed at the river Granick;
For a rash word, spoke in the heat of wine,
The poor, the honest Clytus thou hast slain;
Clytus, thy friend, thy guardian, thy preserver!

Heph. Remove the body, it inflames his sorrow.

Alex. None dare touch him; we must never part.
Cruel Hephestion and Lysimachus,
That had the power, yet would not hold me! Oh!

Lys. Dear sir, we did.

Alex. I know ye did; ye held me
Like a wild beast, to let me go again
With greater violence. Oh, ye've undone me!
Excuse it not—you that could stop a lion, (To Lys.) Cou'd not turn me? ye should have drawn your swords,

And barr'd my rage with their advancing points;
Made reason glitter in my dazzled eyes,
Till I had seen the precipice before me:
That had been noble, that had shewn the friend.
Clytus would so have done to save your lives.

Lys. When men shall hear how highly you were urg'd—

Alex. No; you have let me stain my rising glory,
Which else had ended brighter than the sun.
Oh, I am all a blot, which seas of tears,
And my heart's blood, can never wash away;
Yet 'tis but just I try, and on the point,
Still reeking, hurl my black polluted breast.

Heph. Oh, sacred sir—it shall not—must not be.

Lys. Forgive, dread sir, forgive my pious hands,
That dare, in duty, to disarm my master.

Alex. Yes, cruel men, ye now can shew your strength;
Here's not a slave, but dares oppose my justice,
Yet none had courage to prevent this murder.
But I will render all endeavours vain,
That tend to save my life. Here will I lie,
Close to my murder'd soldier's bleeding side,
Thus clasping his cold body in my arms,
Till death has clos'd my eyes, like his, for ever.

(Throws himself on the body of Clytus.)

Enter PERDICCAS.

Per. Treason! foul treason! Hephestion, where's
the king?

Heph. There, by old Clytus' side, whom he hath slain.

Per. Rise, sacred sir, and haste to save the queen:

Roxana, fill'd with furious jealousy,
Came with a guard unmark'd: she gain'd the bow'r,
And broke upon me with such sudden fury,
That all have perish'd who oppos'd her rage.

Alex. What says Perdiccas? Is the queen in danger?

Per. Haste, sir, to your Statira, or she dies.

Alex. Thus from the grave I rise to save her life.
All draw your swords, on wings of lightning move,
Young Ammon leads you, and the cause is love;
When I rush on, sure none will dare to stay;
'Tis beauty calls, and glory leads the way.

[Flourish of trumpets, drums, &c. Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—*The Gardens of Semiramis.*STATIRA discovered asleep.

Sta. Bless me, ye pow'rs above, and guard my virtue! [fled?
Where are ye fled, dear shades? Where are ye
'Twas but a dream; and yet I saw and heard
My royal parents, who, while pious care
Sat on their faded cheeks, pronounc'd with tears,
Tears such as angels weep, this hour my last.
But hence with fear—my Alexander comes,
And fear and danger ever fled from him.
My Alexander! Would that he were here!
For Oh, I tremble, and a thousand terrors
Rush in upon me, and alarm my heart.

(Distant flourish of trumpets.)

But hark, 'tis he, and all my fears are fled:
My life, my joy, my Alexander comes.

Rox. (Within.) Make fast the gate with all its massy bars;
At length we've conquer'd this stupendous height,
And reach'd the grove.

Sta. Ye guardian gods, defend me!
Roxana's voice! Then all the vision's true,
And die I must.

Enter ROXANA.

Rox. Secure the brazen gate.
Where is my rival? 'tis Roxana calls.

Sta. And what is she, who, with such tow'ring pride,
Would awe a princess that is born above her?

Rox. Behold this dagger! 'Tis thy fate, Statira!
Behold, and meet it as becomes a queen.

Fain would I find thee worthy of my vengeance;
Here, take my weapon then; and, if thou dar'st—

Sta. How little know'st thou what Statira dares!
Yes, cruel woman! yes, I dare meet death
With a resolve, at which thy coward heart
Wou'd shrink; for terror haunts the guilty mind;
While conscious innocence, that knows no fear,
Can smiling pass, and scorn thy idle threats.

Rox. Return, fair insolent! return, I say.
Dar'st thou, presumptuous, to invade my rights?
Restore him quickly to my longing arms,
And with him give me back his broken vows,
For perjur'd as he is, he still is mine,
Or I will rend him from thy bleeding heart.

Sta. Alas! Roxana, 'tis not in my power;
I cannot if I would—And, oh, ye gods,
What were the world to Alexander's loss!

Rox. Oh, sorceress, to thy accursed charms
I owe the frenzy that distracts my soul;
To them I owe my Alexander's loss.
Too late thou tremblest at my just revenge,
My wrongs cry out, and vengeance will have way.

(Holds up the dagger.)

Sta. Hold, hold, thy threat'ning hand advanc'd in air.

I read my sentence written in thy eyes:
Yet, Oh, Roxana, on thy black revenge
One kindly ray of female pity beam,
And give me death in Alexander's presence.

Rox. Not for the world's wide empire should'st thou see him.

Fool! but for him thou might'st unheeded live;
For his sake only art thou doom'd to die.
The sole remaining joy that glads my soul,
Is to deprive thee of the heart I've lost.

(Flourish of trumpets.)Enter a Slave.

Slave. Madam, the king and all his guards are come;

With frantic rage they thunder at the gate,
And must, ere this, have gain'd admittance.

[Exit Slave.]Rox. Ha!

Too long I've trifled; let me then redeem
The time mispent, and make great vengeance sure.

Sta. Is Alexander, Oh, ye gods, so nigh,
And can he not preserve me from her fury?

Rox. Nor he, nor heav'n, shall shield thee from my justice.

Die, sorc'ress, die, and all my wrongs die with thee.
(Stabs her.)

Alex. (Without.) Away, ye slaves, stand off!—
Quick let me fly

On lightning's wings;—nor heav'n nor earth, shall stop me.

Enter ALEXANDER, LYSIMACHUS, CASSANDER, PERDICCAS, THESSALUS, Officers and Guards.

Ha! Oh, my soul, my queen, my love, Statira!
These wounds! are these my promis'd joys?

Sta. Alas!

My only love, my best and dearest blessing,
Wou'd I had died before you enter'd here;
For thus delighted, while I gaze upon thee,
Death grows more horrid, and I'm loth to leave thee. [stars!]

Alex. Thou shalt not leave me. Cruel, cruel
Oh, where's the monster, where's the horrid fiend,
That struck at innocence, and murder'd thee?

Rox. Behold the wretch, who, desperate of thy
love,

In jealous madness gave the fatal blow.

Alex. To dungeons, tortures, drag her from my sight.

Sta. My soul is on the wing. Spare
Roxana's life. 'Twas love of you that caus'd
The death she gave me. And, Oh, sometimes think,
Amidst your revels, think on your poor queen;
And, ere the cheerful bowl salute your lips,
Enrich it with a tear, and I am happy. (Dies.)

Alex. Yet, ere thou tak'st thy flight—She's gone, she's gone!

All, all is hush'd; no music now is heard;
The roses wither; and the fragrant breath
That wak'd their sweets, shall never wake'em more.

Rox. Weep not, my lord! no sorrow can recall her.

Oh! turn your eyes, and in Roxana's arms,
You'll find fond love and everlasting truth.

Alex. Hence, from my sight, and thank my dear
Statira,

That yet thou art alive.

Rox. Yes, thus I'll fasten on your sacred robe;
Thus, on my knees, for ever cling around you,
Till you forgive me, or till death divide us.

Alex. Hence, fury, hence: there's not a glance of thine,

But, like a basilisk, comes wing'd with death.

Rox. Oh, speak not thus, to one who kneels for mercy.

Think, for whose sake it was I madly plung'd
Into a crime abhorrent to my nature.

Alex. Off, murd'ress, off! for ever shun my sight!
My eyes detest thee, for thy soul is ruin.

Rox. Barbarian! yes, I will for ever shun thee,
Repeated injuries have steel'd my heart,
And I cou'd curse myself for being kind.

If there is any majesty above,
That has revenge in store for perjur'd love,
Send, heav'n, the swiftest ruin on his head!
Strike the destroyer! lay the victor dead;
But what are curses? Curses will not kill,
Nor ease the tortures I am doom'd to feel. [Exit.]

Alex. Oh, my fair star, I shall be shortly with thee!

What means this deadly dew upon my forehead?
My heart too heaves!—

Cus. The poison works!Enter EUMENES.

Eume. Pardon, dear sir, a fatal messenger.
The royal Sysigambis is no more.

Struck with the horror of Statira's fate,
She soon expir'd, and, with her latest breath,
Left Parisatis to Lysimachus.
But what, I fear, most deeply will affect you,
Your lov'd Hephestion's—

Alex. Dead! then he is bless'd!
But here, here lies my fate. Hephestion! Clytus!
My victories all for ever folded up
In this dear body. Here my banner's lost,
My standard's triumphs gone.—Oh, when, Oh,
when,
Shall I be mad indeed?

[Exeunt all but Cassander and Thessalus.]

Cas. He's gone—but whither?—follow, Thessalus,
Attend his steps, and let me know what passes.

[Exeunt Thessalus and Cassander.]

SCENE II.—An Antichamber in the Palace.

Enter CASSANDER.

Cas. Vengeance, lie still, thy cravings shall be stated.

Death roams at large, the furies are unchain'd,
And murder plays her mighty master-piece.

Enter POLYPERCHON.

Saw you the king? He parted hence this moment.

Poly. Yes; with disorder'd wildness in his looks,
He rush'd along, till, with a casual glance,
He saw me where I stood; then stopping short,
Draw near, he cried; and grasp'd my hand in his,
Where more than fevers rag'd in ev'ry vein.
Oh, Polyperchon! I have lost my queen!
Statira's dead!—and, as he spoke, the tears
Gush'd from his eyes—I more than felt his pains.

Enter THESSALUS.

Thes. Hence, hence, away!

Cas. Where is he, Thessalus?

Thes. I left him circled by a crowd of princes,
The poison tears him with that height of horror,
E'en I could pity him; he call'd the chiefs;
Embrac'd 'em round—then, starting from amidst
'em [it.

Cried out, I come—'Twas Ammon's voice; I know
Father, I come; but, let me, ere I go,
Despatch the business of a kneeling world.

Poly. No more—I hear him—we must meet anon.

Cas. In Saturn's field, there give a loose to rapture,
Enjoy the tempest we ourselves have rais'd,
And triumph in the wreck which crowns our vengeance. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—The Palace.

ALEXANDER, LYSIMACHUS, EUMENES, PERDIC-
CAS, Officers, Guards, and Attendants, discovered.

Alex. Search there; nay, probe me; search my wounded reins—

Pull, draw it out.

Lys. We have search'd, but find no hurt.

Alex. Oh, I am shot!—a forked, burning arrow
Sticks 'cross my shoulders; the sad venom flies,
Like lightning thro' my flesh, my blood, my marrow.

Lys. How fierce his fever!

Alex. Ha! what a change of torments I endure!
A bolt of ice runs hissing through my bowels;

'Tis, sure, the arm of death. Give me a chair;
Cover me, for I freeze, and my teeth chatter,
And my knees knock together.

Eume. Have mercy, heav'n!

Alex. Who talks of heav'n?

I burn, I burn again!—

The wargrows wond'rous hot;—hey for the Tygris!
Bear me, Bucephalus, amongst the billows.

Oh, 'tis a noble beast; I would not change him
For the best horse the sun has in his stable;
For they are hot, their mangers full of coals;
Their manes are flakes of light'ning, curls of fire;
And their red tails, like meteors, whisk about.

Lys. Help, all! Eumenes, help.

Alex. Ha! ha! ha! I shall die with laughter.

Parmenio, Clytus, do you see yon fellow,
That ragged soldier, that poor tatter'd Greek?
See how he puts to flight the gaudy Persians,
With nothing but a rusty helmet on, through which The grizly bristles of his pushing beard
Drive 'em like pikes—ha! ha! ha!

Per. How wild he talks!

Lys. Yet warring in his wildness.

Alex. Sound, sound! keep your ranks close;
ay, now they come.

Oh, the brave din, the noblest clank of arms!—
Charge, charge apace; and let the phalanx move;
Darius comes—ay, 'tis Darius:

I see, I know him by the sparkling plumes,
And his gold chariot, drawn by ten white horses:
But, like a tempest, thus I pour upon him—
He bleeds; with that last blow I brought him down:

He tumbles, take him, snatch the imperial crown.
They fly, they fly; follow, follow: Victoria,
Victoria, Victoria—

(Throws himself into the arms of the Soldiers.)

Per. Let's bear him softly to his bed.

Alex. Hold; the least motion gives me sudden death;

My vital spirits are quite parch'd, burnt up,
And all my smoky entrails turn'd to ashes.

Lys. When you, the brightest star that ever shone,

Shall set, it must be night with us for ever.

Alex. Let me embrace you all, before I die.—

Weep not, my dear companions; the good gods
Shall send ye in my stead a nobler prince,
One that shall lead ye forth with matchless conduct.

Lys. Break not our hearts with such unkind expressions. [Mars.

Per. We will not part with you, nor change for Alex. Perdiccas, take this ring.

And see me laid in the temple of Jupiter Ammon.

Lys. To whom does your dread majesty bequeath
The empire of the world?

Alex. To him that is most worthy.

Per. When will you, sacred sir, that we should give

To your great memory, those divine honours
Which such exalted virtue does deserve?

Alex. When you are all most happy, and in peace.
Your hands—Oh, father, if I have discharg'd

The duty of a man to empire born;

If, by unwearied toil, I have deserv'd

The vast renown of thy adopted son,

Accept this soul which thou didst first inspire,

And which this sigh thus gives thee back again.

ACT. I.

SCENE I.—A Hall in the palace.

Enter PORCIUS and MARCUS.

Por. The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day,
The great, the important day, big with the fate
Of Cato and of Rome. Our father's death
Would fill up all the guilt of civil war,
And close the scene of blood. Already Cæsar
Has ravag'd more than half the globe, and sees
Mankind grown thin by his destructive sword:
Should he go further, numbers would be wanting
To form new battles, and support his crimes.
Ye gods, what havock does ambition make
Among your works!

Mar. Thy steady temper, Porcius,
Can look on guilt, rebellion, fraud, and Cæsar,
In the calm lights of mild philosophy:
I'm tortur'd, even to madness, when I think
On the proud victor: every time he's nam'd,
Pharsalia rises to my view; I see
The insulting tyrant prancing o'er the field Strew'd with Rome's citizens, and drench'd in slaughter.

O Porcius, is there not some chosen curse,
Some hidden thunder in the stores of heaven,
Red with uncommon wrath, to blast the man
Who owes his greatness to his country's ruin?

Por. Believe me, Marcus, 'tis an impious greatness,
And mix'd with too much horror to be envied.
How does the lustre of our father's actions,
Through the dark cloud of ills that cover him,
Break out, and burn with more triumphant bright-
ness!

His suff'rings shine, and spread a glory round him:
Greatly unfortunate, he fights the cause
Of honour, virtue, liberty, and Rome.

Mar. Who knows not this? But what can Cato do
Against a world, a base, degenerate world,
That courts the yoke, and bows the neck to Cæsar?
Pent up in Utica, he vainly forms
A poor epitome of Roman greatness,
And cover'd with Numidian guards, directs
A feeble army and an empty senate,
Remnants of mighty battles fought in vain.
By heavens! such virtues, join'd with such success,
Distract my very soul: our father's fortune
Would almost tempt us to renounce his precepts.

Por. Remember what our father oft has told us:
The ways of heaven are dark and intricate;
Our understanding traces them in vain;
Lost and bewilder'd in the fruitless search,
Nor sees with how much art the windings run,
Nor where the regular confusion ends.

Mar. These are suggestions of a mind at ease:
O Porcius, didst thou taste but half the griefs
That wring my soul, thou couldst not talk thus Passion unpitied and successful love [calmly.
Plant daggers in my heart, and aggravate
My other griefs. Were but my Lucia kind,—

Por. (Aside.) Thou seest not that thy brother is thy rival:

But I must hide it; for I know thy temper.—
Now, Marcus, now thy virtue's on the proof:
Put forth thy utmost strength, work every nerve,
And call up all thy father in thy soul:
To quell the tyrant love, and guard thy heart
On this weak side, where most our nature fails,
Would be a conquest worthy Cato's son.

Mar. Alas! the counsel which I cannot take,
Instead of healing, but upbraids my weakness.
Love is not to be reason'd down, or lost
In high ambition, and a thirst of greatness;
'Tis second life, that grows into the soul,
Warms every vein, and beats in every pulse;
I feel it here: my resolution melts—

Por. Behold young Juba, the Numidian prince :
He loves our sister Marcia, greatly loves her ;
But still the smother'd fondness burns within him :
The sense of honour and desire of fame
Drive the big passion back into his heart.
What ! shall an African, shall Juba's heir,
Reproach great Cato's son, and shew the world
A virtue wanting in a Roman soul ?

Mar. No more, no more ! your words leave stings behind 'em.

Whene'er did Juba, or did Porcius, shew
A virtue that has cast me at a distance,
And thrown me out in the pursuits of honour ?

Por. O Marcus ! did I know the way to ease
Thy troubled heart, and mitigate thy pains,
Believe me, I could freely die to do it. [friends !

Mar. Thou best of brothers, and thou best of Pardon a weak, distemper'd soul that swells
With sudden gusts, and sinks as soon in calms,
The sport of passions.—But, Sempronius comes :
He must not find this softness hanging on me.

[Exit.

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

Sem. Conspiracies no sooner should be form'd
Than executed. (Aside.) What means Porcius
here ?

I like not that cold youth. I must dissemble,
And speak a language foreign to my heart.
Good morrow, Porcius ! Let us once embrace,
Once more embrace, whilst yet we both are free :
To-morrow, should we thus express our friendship,

Each might receive a slave into his arms.
This sun, perhaps, this morning's sun's the last
That e'er shall rise on Roman liberty.

Por. My father has this morning call'd together
His little Roman senate,—
The leavings of Pharsalia,—to consult
If yet he can oppose the mighty torrent
That bears down Rome and all her gods before it ;
Or must, at length, give up the world to Cæsar.

Sem. Not all the pomp and majesty of Rome
Can raise her senate more than Cato's presence :
His virtues render her assembly awful,
They strike with something like religious fear,
And make even Cæsar tremble at the head
Of armies flush'd with conquest. O my Porcius !
Could I but call that wonderful man my father,
Would but thy sister Marcia be propitious
To thy friend's vows, I might be bless'd indeed.

Por. Alas ! Sempronius, would'st thou talk of love

To Marcia, whilst her father's life's in danger ?
Thou might'st as well court the pale trembling
vestal,
When she beholds the holy flame expiring.

Sem. The more I see the wonders of thy race,
The more I'm charm'd. Thou must take heed,
my Porcius ;

The world has all its eyes on Cato's son :
Thy father's merit sets thee up to view,
And shews thee in the fairest point of light,
To make thy virtues, or thy faults conspicuous.

Por. Well dost thou seem to check my lingering here

On this important hour. I'll straight away,
To animate the soldiers' drooping courage
With love of freedom, and contempt of life,
And try to rouse up all that's Roman in 'em.

'Tis not in mortals to command success ;

But we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it.

[Exit.

Sem. Curse on the stripling ! How he apes his sire :

Ambitiously sententious !—But I wonder,
Old Syphax comes not ; his Numidian genius
Is well dispos'd to mischief.

Cato has us'd me ill : he has refus'd
His daughter Marcia to my ardent vows :

Besides, his baffled arms and ruin'd cause
Are bars to my ambition. Cæsar's favour,
That showers down greatness on his friends, will raise me
To Rome's first honours. If I give up Cato,
I claim in my reward his captive daughter.—
Syphax comes.

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Sempronius, all is ready ;
I've sounded my Numidians, man by man,
And find them ripe for a revolt : they all
Complain aloud of Cato's discipline,
And wait but the command to change their master.

Sem. Believe me, Syphax, there's no time to waste ;

Even whilst we speak, our conqueror comes on,
And gathers ground upon us every moment.
But tell me, hast thou yet drawn o'er young Juba ?
That still would recommend thee more to Cæsar,
And challenge better terms.

Syph. Alas ! he's lost,
He's lost, Sempronius ; all his thoughts are full
Of Cato's virtues. But I'll try once more,
For every instant I expect him here,
If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles
Of faith, of honour, and I know not what,
That have corrupted his Numidian temper,
And struck the infection into all his soul.

Sem. Be sure to press upon him every motive :
Juba's surrender, since his father's death,
Would give up Afric into Cæsar's hands,
And make him lord of half the burning zone.

Syph. But is it true, Sempronius, that your senate

Is call'd together ? Gods ! thou must be cautious :
Cato has piercing eyes, and will discern
Our frauds, unless they're covered thick with art.

Sem. Let me alone, good Syphax : I'll conceal
My thoughts in passion : 'tis the surest way :
I'll bellow out for Rome and for my country,
And mouth at Cæsar, till I shake the senate.
Your cold hypocrisy's a stale device,
A worn-out trick : would'st thou be thought in earnest,

Clothe thy feign'd zeal in rage, in fire, in fury.

Syph. In troth, thou'rt able to instruct grey
And teach the wily African deceit. [hairs,

Sem. Once more, be sure to try thy skill on Juba.

Meanwhile, I'll hasten to my Roman soldiers,
Inflame the mutiny, and, underhand,
Blow up their discontents, till they break out,
Unlook'd for, and discharge themselves on Cato.
Remember, Syphax, we must work in haste.
O think, what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods ;
It is a dreadful interval of time,
Fill'd up with horror all, and big with death ;
Destruction hangs on every word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design. [Exit.

Syph. I'll try if yet I can reduce to reason
This headstrong youth, and make him spurn at Cato.

The time is short ; Cæsar comes rushing on us ;—
But hold !—young Juba sees me, and approaches.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Syphax, I joy to meet thee thus alone.
I have observ'd of late thy looks are fallen,
O'ercast with gloomy cares and discontent :
Then tell me, Syphax, I conjure thee, tell me,
What are the thoughts that knit thy brow in frowns,
And turn thine eye thus coldly on thy prince ?

Syph. 'Tis not my talent to conceal my thoughts,
Nor carry smiles and sunshine in my face,
When discontent sits heavy at my heart ;
I have not yet so much the Roman in me.

Juba. Why dost thou cast out such ungenerous terms

Against these wonderous sovereigns of the world?
Dost thou not see mankind fall down before 'em,
And own the force of their superior virtue?

Syph. Gods! where's the worth that sets this people up

Above your own Numidia's tawny sons?
Do they with tougher sinews bend the bow?
Or flies the javelin swifter to its mark,
Launch'd from the vigour of a Roman arm?
Who, like our active African, instructs
The fiery steed, and trains him to his hand?
Or guides in troops the embattled elephant,
Loaden with war? These, these are arts, my prince,
In which your Zama does not stoop to Rome.

Juba. These all are virtues of a meaner rank,
Perfections that are plac'd in bones and nerves:
A Roman soul is bent on higher views.
To make man mild and sociable to man,
To cultivate the wild, licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline, and liberal arts,
The embellishments of life; virtues like these
Make human nature shine, reform the soul,
And break our fierce barbarians into men.

Syph. Patience, kind heavens! Excuse an old man's warmth:—

What are these wonderous civilizing arts,
This Roman polish, and this smooth behaviour,
That render man thus tractable and tame?
Are they not only to disguise our passions,
To set our looks at variance with our thoughts?
In short, to change us into other creatures
Than what our nature and the gods design'd us?

Juba. To strike thee dumb, turn up thy eyes to Cato!

There may'st thou see to what a godlike height
The Roman virtues lift up mortal man:
Renouncing sleep, and rest, and food, and ease,
He strives with thirst and hunger, toil and heat;
And, when his fortune sets before him all
The pomps and pleasures that our souls can wish,
His rigid virtue will accept of none.

Syph. Believe me, prince, there's not an African
That traverses our vast Numidian deserts
In quest of prey, and lives upon his bow,
But better practises these boasted virtues:
Coarse are his meals, the fortune of the chase;
Amidst the running stream he slakes his thirst,
Toils all the day, and, at the approach of night,
On the first friendly bank he throws him down,
Or rests his head upon a rock till morn;
Then rises fresh, pursues his wonted game,
And if, the following day, he chance to find
A new repast, or an untasted spring,
Blesses his stars, and thinks it luxury.

Juba. Thy prejudices, Syphax, won't discern
What virtues grow from ignorance, and choice;
Nor how the hero differs from the brute.
But, grant that others could with equal glory,
Look down on pleasures and the baits of sense,
Where shall we find the man that bears affliction,
Great and majestic in his griefs, like Cato?
How does he rise against a load of woes,
And thank the gods that throw the weight upon him?

Syph. 'Tis pride, rank pride, and haughtiness of soul;

I think, the Romans call it stoicism.
Had not your royal father thought so highly
Of Roman virtue, and of Cato's cause,
He had not fallen, by a slave's hand, inglorious;
Nor would his slaughter'd army now have lain
On Afric's sands, disfigur'd with their wounds,
To gorge the wolves and vultures of Numidia.

Juba. Why dost thou call my sorrows up afresh?
My father's name brings tears into my eyes.

Syph. Oh, that you'd profit by your father's ills!

Juba. What wouldst thou have me do?

Syph. Abandon Cato.

Juba. Never: I should be more than twice an
By such a loss. [orphan

Syph. Ay, there's the tie that binds you;
You long to call him father: Marcia's charms
Work in your heart unseen, and plead for Cato;
No wonder, you are deaf to all I say. [nate.

Juba. No more; your zeal becomes importu-
I've hitherto permitted it to rave,
And talk at large: but learn to keep it in,
Lest it should take more freedom than I'll give it.

Syph. Yet hear me, prince, tho' hard to conquer
love,

'Tis easy to divert and break its force:
Absence might cure it, or a second mistress
Light up another flame, and put out this.
The glowing dames of Zama's royal court
Have faces flush'd with more exalted charms;
The sun that rolls his chariot o'er their heads,
Works up more fire and colour in their cheeks:
Were you with these, my prince, you'd soon forget
The pale, unripen'd beauties of the north.

Juba. 'Tis not a set of features, nor complexion,
The tincture of a skin, that I admire:
Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,
Fades in his eye, and palls upon the sense.
The virtuous Marcia towers above her sex:
True, she is fair,—O how divinely fair!
But still the lovely maid improves her charms
With inward greatness, unaffected wisdom,
And sanctity of manners. Cato's soul
Shines out in every thing she acts or speaks,
While winning mildness and attractive smiles
Dwell in her looks, and, with becoming grace,
Softens the rigour of her father's virtues.

Syph. How does your tongue grow wanton in her praise!

But, on my knees, I beg you would consider—

Juba. Ha! is't not she? It is:—she moves this way:

And with her Lucia, Lucius' fair daughter.
My heart beats thick. I pr'ythee, Syphax, leave me.

Syph. Ten thousand curses fasten on them both!
Now will this woman, with a single glance,
Undo what I've been labouring all this while. [Exit.

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Juba. Hail, charming maid! How does thy beauty smooth

The face of war, and make even horror smile!
At sight of thee my heart shakes off its sorrows;
I feel a dawn of joy break in upon me;
And, for a while, forget the approach of Cæsar.

Mar. I should be griev'd, young prince, to think my presence

Unbent your thoughts, and slacken'd them to arms,
While, warm with slaughter, our victorious foe
Threatens aloud, and calls you to the field.

Juba. O Marcia! let me hope thy kind concerns
And gentle wishes follow me to battle:
The thought will give new vigour to my arm,
Add strength and weight to my descending sword,
And drive it in a tempest on the foe.

Mar. My prayers and wishes always shall attend
The friends of Rome, the glorious cause of virtue,
And men approv'd of by the gods and Cato.

Juba. That Juba may deserve thy pious cares,
I'll gaze for ever on thy godlike father;
Transplanting, one by one, into my life
His bright perfections, till I shine like him.

Mar. My father never at a time like this
Would lay out his great soul in words, and waste
Such precious moments.

Juba. Thy reproofs are just,
Thou virtuous maid! I'll hasten to my troops,
And fire their languid souls with Cato's virtue.
If e'er I lead them to the field, when all
The war shall stand rang'd in its just array
And dreadful pomp, then will I think on thee,—
O lovely maid!—then will I think on thee;

And, in the shock of charging hosts, remember
What glorious deeds should grace the man who hopes
For Marcia's love. [Exit.]

Luc. Marcia, you're too severe.
How could you chide, and drive so sternly from you,
A prince that loves and dotes on you to death?

Mar. How, Lucia! would'st thou have me sink away

In pleasing dreams, and lose myself in love,
When every moment Cato's life's at stake?

Luc. Why have not I this constancy of mind,
Who have so many griefs to try its force?
Pity and love, by turns, oppress my heart.

Mar. Lucia, disburthen all thy cares on me,
And let me share thy most retir'd distress:
Tell me, who raises up this conflict in thee?

Luc. I need not blush to name them, when I say,
They're Marcia's brothers, and the sons of Cato.

Mar. But tell me, whose address thou favour'st
most:

I long to know, and yet I dread to hear it.

Luc. Suppose 'twere Porcius, could you blame my choice?

O Porcius, thou hast stolen away my soul!
Marcus is furious, wild, in his complaints;
I hear him with a secret kind of dread,
And tremble at his vehemence of temper.

Mar. Alas, poor youth! And canst thou throw him from thee?

How will thy coldness raise
Tempests and storms in his afflicted bosom!
I dread the consequence.

Luc. You seem to plead
Against your brother Porcius.

Mar. Lucia, no:
Had Porcius been the unsuccessful lover,
The same compassion would have fallen on him.

Luc. Porcius himself oft falls in tears before me,
As if he mourn'd his rival's ill success;
Then bids me hide the motions of my heart,
Nor shew which way it turns: so much he fears
The sad effects that it would have on Marcus.

Mar. Let us not, Lucia, aggravate our sorrows;
But to the gods submit the event of things.
Our lives, discolour'd with our present woes,
May still grow bright, and smile with happier hours:
So the pure limpid stream, when foul with stains
Of rushing torrents and descending rains,
Works itself clear, and, as it runs, refines,
Till, by degrees, the floating mirror shines,
Reflects each flower that on the border grows,
And a new heaven in its fair bosom shews. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Senate House.

SEMPRONIUS, LUCIUS, and Senators discovered.

Sem. Rome still survives in this assembled senate.
Let us remember we are Cato's friends,
And act like men who claim that glorious title.

Luci. Cato will soon be here, and open to us
The occasion of our meeting. (Trumpets.)
Hark! he comes.

May all the guardian-gods of Rome direct him!

Enter CATO, PORCIUS, and MARCUS.

Cato. Fathers, we once again are met in council:
Cæsar's approach has summon'd us together,
And Rome attends her fate from our resolves.
How shall we treat this bold, aspiring man?
Success still follows him, and backs his crimes:
Pharsalia gave him Rome; Egypt has since
Receiv'd his yoke, and the whole Nile is Cæsar's.
Why should I mention Juba's overthrow,
And Scipio's death? Numidia's burning sands
Still smoke with blood. 'Tis time we should decree
What course to take. Our foe advances on us,
And envies us even Libya's sultry deserts.
Fathers, pronounce your thoughts:—are they still
To hold it out, and fight it to the last? [fix'd

Or are your hearts subdu'd at length, and wrought
By time and ill success to a submission?
Sempronius, speak.

Sem. My voice is still for war.
Gods! can a Roman senate long debate
Which of the two to choose,—slavery or death?
No; let us rise at once, gird on our swords,
And, at the head of our remaining troops,
Attack the foe, break through the thick array
Of his throng'd legions, and charge home upon him.
Perhaps, some arm, more lucky than the rest,
May reach his heart, and free the world from bondage.
Rise, fathers, rise! 'tis Rome demands your help!
Rise, and revenge her slaughter'd citizens:
Rouse up for shame! our brothers of Pharsalia
Point at their wounds, and cry aloud,—To battle:
Great Pompey's shade complains that we are slow,
And Scipio's ghost walks unreveng'd amongst us.

Cato. Let not a torrent of impetuous zeal
Transport thee thus beyond the bounds of reason.
True fortitude is seen in great exploits
That justice warrants, and that wisdom guides:
All else is towering frenzy and distraction.
Are not the lives of those who draw the sword
In Rome's defence intrusted to our care?
Should we thus lead them to a field of slaughter,
Might not the impartial world too justly say,
We lavish'd at our death the blood of thousands,
To grace our fall, and make our ruin glorious?
Lucius, we next would know what's your opinion.

Luci. My thoughts, I must confess, are turn'd on peace.

We took up arms, not to revenge ourselves,
But free the commonwealth: when this end fails,
Arms have no further use: our country's cause,
That drew our swords, now wrests them from our hands,

And bids us not delight in Roman blood
Unprofitably shed. What men could do
Is done already: heaven and earth will witness,
If Rome must fall, that we are innocent. (Sits.)

Cato. Let us appear nor rash, nor diffident:
Immoderate valour swells into a fault;
And fear, admitted into public counsels,
Betrays like treason: let us shun them both.
Fathers, I cannot see that our affairs [us;
Are grown thus desperate: we have bulwarks round
Within our walls are troops inur'd to toil
In Afric's heats, and season'd to the sun;
Numidia's spacious kingdom lies behind us,
Ready to rise at its young prince's call.
While there is hope, do not distrust the gods;
But wait, at least, till Cæsar's near approach
Force us to yield. 'Twill never be too late
To sue for chains, and own a conqueror.
Why should Rome fall a moment ere her time?
No; let us draw her term of freedom out
In its full length, and spin it to the last;
So shall we gain still one day's liberty:
And let me perish, but, in Cato's judgment,
A day, an hour, of virtuous liberty
Is worth a whole eternity in bondage.

Enter JUNIUS.

Jun. Fathers, even now a herald is arriv'd
From Cæsar's camp; and with him comes old Decius,
The Roman knight: he carries in his looks
Impatience, and demands to speak with Cato.

Cato. By your permission, fathers. Bid him enter. [Exit Junius.]
Decius was once my friend: but other prospects
Have loos'd those ties, and bound him fast to Cæsar.
His message may determine our resolves.

Enter DECIUS, JUNIUS, and TITUS.

Dec. Cæsar sends health to Cato.
Cato. Could he send it
To Cato's slaughter'd friends, it would be welcome.
Are not your orders to address the senate?
Dec. My business is with Cato. Cæsar sees

The straits to which you're driven; and as he knows Cato's high worth, is anxious for your life.

Cato. My life is grafted on the fate of Rome. Would he save Cato? Bid him spare his country. Tell your dictator this: and tell him, Cato Disdains a life which he has power to offer.

Dec. Rome and her senators submit to Cæsar: Her generals and her consuls are no more, Who check'd his conquests, and denied his triumphs.

Why will not Cato be this Cæsar's friend? [it.

Cato. Those very reasons thou hast urg'd, forbid

Dec. Cæsar is well acquainted with your virtues, And therefore sets this value on your life:

Let him but know the price of Cato's friendship, And name your terms.

Cato. Bid him disband his legions; Restore the commonwealth to liberty; Submit his actions to the public censure, And stand the judgment of a Roman senate: Bid him do this, and Cato is his friend.

Dec. Cato, the world talks loudly of your wisdom.

Cato. Nay, more; though Cato's voice was ne'er employ'd

To clear the guilty, and to varnish crimes,— Myself will mount the rostrum in his favour, And strive to gain his pardon from the people.

Dec. A style like this becomes a conqueror.

Cato. Decius, a style like this becomes a Roman.

Dec. What is a Roman that is Cæsar's foe?

Cato. Greater than Cæsar; he's a friend to virtue.

Dec. Consider, Cato, you're in Utica, And at the head of your own little senate; You don't now thunder in the capitol, With all the mouths of Rome to second you.

Cato. Let him consider that who drives us hither: 'Tis Cæsar's sword has made Rome's senate little, And thinn'd its ranks. Alas! thy dazzled eye Beholds this man in a false glaring light, Which conquest and success have thrown upon him! Didst thou but view him right, thou'dst see him black With murder, treason, sacrilege, and crimes That strike my soul with horror but to name 'em. I know thou look'st on me, as on a wretch Beset with ills, and cover'd with misfortunes; But, by the gods I swear! millions of worlds Should never buy me to be like that Cæsar.

Dec. Does Cato send this answer back to Cæsar, For all his generous cares and proffer'd friendship?

Cato. His cares for me are insolent and vain: Presumptuous man! the gods take care of Cato. Would Cæsar shew the greatness of his soul, Bid him employ his care for these my friends, And make good use of his ill-gotten power, By sheltering men much better than himself. [get

Dec. Your high unconquer'd heart makes you for— You are a man. You rush on your destruction. But I have done. When I relate hereafter The tale of this unhappy embassy, All Rome will be in tears. [Exit, with Jun. and Titus.

Sem. Cato, we thank thee: Cæsar will shrink to hear the words thou utter'st, And shudder in the midst of all his conquests.

Luci. The senate owns its gratitude to Cato; Who with so great a soul consults its safety, And guards our lives, while he neglects his own.

Sem. Sempronius gives no thanks on this account.

Lucius seems fond of life: but what is life? 'Tis not to draw fresh air from time to time; 'Tis, to be free. When liberty is gone, Life grows insipid, and has lost its relish. Oh! could my dying hand but lodge a sword In Cæsar's bosom and revenge my country, By heavens, I could enjoy the pangs of death, And smile in agony!

Luci. Others, perhaps, May serve their country with as warm a zeal, Though 'tis not kindled into so much rage.

Sem. This sober conduct is a mighty virtue In lukewarm patriots.

Cato. Come, no more, Sempronius. All here are friends to Rome, and to each other: Let us not weaken still the weaker side By our divisions.

Sem. Cato, my resentments Are sacrific'd to Rome. I stand reprov'd.

Cato. Fathers, 'tis time you come to a resolve.

Luci. Cato, we all go in to your opinion: Cæsar's behaviour has convinc'd the senate We ought to hold it out, till terms arrive.

Sem. We ought to hold it out till death. But, Cato, My private voice is drown'd amid the senate's.

Cato. Then let us rise, my friends, and strive to This little interval, this pause of life, [fill While yet our liberty and fates are doubtful, With resolution, friendship, Roman bravery, And all the virtues we can crowd into it; That heaven may say, it ought to be prolong'd. Fathers, farewell! The young Numidian prince Comes forward, and expects to know our counsels.

[Exeunt all but Cato.

Enter JUBA.

Cato. Juba, the Roman senate has resolv'd, Till time give better prospects, still to keep The sword unsheath'd, and turn its edge on Cæsar.

Juba. The resolution fits a Roman senate. But, Cato, lend me for a while thy patience, And condescend to hear a young man speak. My father, when, some days before his death, He order'd me to march for Utica, (Alas, I thought not then his death so near!) Wept o'er me, press'd me in his aged arms, And, as his griefs gave way, "My son," he said, "However fortune may dispose of me, Be Cato's friend: he'll train thee up to great And virtuous deeds: do but observe him well, Thou'lt shun misfortunes, or thou'lt learn to bear 'em."

Cato. Thy sire, good Juba, was a worthy prince, And merited, alas! a better fate: But heaven thought otherwise.

Juba. His cruel fate, In spite of all the fortitude that shines Before my face in Cato's great example, Subdues my soul, and fills my eyes with tears.

Cato. It is an honest sorrow, and becomes thee.

Juba. His virtues drew respect from foreign climes:

The kings of Afric sought him for their friend; Kings far remote, that rule, as fame reports, Behind the hidden sources of the Nile; Oft have their black ambassadors appear'd, Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Zama.

Cato. I am no stranger to thy father's greatness.

Juba. I do not mean to boast his power and greatness. But point out new alliances to Cato. [ness,

Had we not better leave this Utica, To arm Numidia in our cause, and court The assistance of my father's numerous friends? Did they know Cato, our remotest kings Would pour embattled multitudes about him; Their swarthy hosts would darken all our plains, Doubling the native horror of the war, And making death more grim.

Cato. And canst thou think, Cato will fly before the sword of Cæsar, Reduc'd, like Hannibal, to seek relief From court to court, and wander up and down A vagabond in Afric?

Juba. Cato, perhaps, I'm too officious; but my forward cares Would fain preserve a life of so much value. My heart is wounded, when I see such virtue Afflicted by the weight of such misfortunes.

Cato. Thy nobleness of soul obliges me. But know, young prince, that valour soars above What the world calls misfortune and affliction,

These are not ills; else would they never fall
On heaven's first favourites, and the best of men:
The gods, in bounty, work up storms about us,
That give mankind occasion to exert
Their hidden strength, and throw out into practice
Virtues, which lie conceal'd
In the smooth seasons and the calms of life.

Juba. I'm charm'd whene'er thou talk'st: I pant for virtue,
And all my soul endeavours at perfection.

Cato. Dost thou love watchings, abstinence, and toil?—

Laborious virtues all;—learn them from Cato!
Success and fortune must thou learn from Cæsar.

Juba. The best good fortune that can fall on Juba,
The whole success at which my heart aspires,
Depends on Cato.

Cato. What does Juba say?
Tell me thy wishes, prince.

Juba. O, they're extravagant!
Still let me hide them.

Cato. Speak: what canst thou ask
That Cato will refuse?

Juba. I fear to name it:
Marcia inherits all her father's virtues—

Cato. Adieu, young prince: I would not hear a word

Might lessen thee in my esteem. Remember,
The hand of fate is over us, and heaven
Exacts severity from all our thoughts:
It is not now a time to talk of aught
But chains or conquest, liberty or death. [Exit.

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. How's this, my prince? What! cover'd with confusion?

You look, as if yon stern philosopher
Had just now chid you.

Juba. Syphax, I'm undone.

Syph. I know it well.

Juba. Cato thinks meanly of me.

Syph. And so will all mankind.

Juba. I've open'd to him
The weakness of my soul, my love for Marcia.

Syph. Cato's a proper person to intrust
A love-tale with!

Juba. O, I could pierce my heart,
My foolish heart! Was ever wretch like Juba?

Syph. Alas, my prince, how are you chang'd of late!

I've known young Juba rise before the sun,
To beat the thicket where the tiger slept,
Or seek the lion in his dreadful haunts:
How did the colour mount into your cheeks,
When first you rous'd him to the chase! I've seen
you,

Even in the Libyan dog-days, hunt him down;
Then charge him close, provoke him to the rage
Of fangs and claws, and, stooping from your horse,
Rivet the panting savage to the ground.

Juba. Pr'ythee, no more.

Syph. How would the old king smile
To see you weigh the paws, when tipp'd with gold,
And throw the shaggy spoils about your shoulders!

Juba. Syphax, this old man's talk, though honey flow'd

In every word, would now lose all its sweetness.
Cato's displeas'd, and Marcia's lost for ever!

Syph. Young prince, I yet could give you good
Marcia might still be yours. [advice:

Juba. What say'st thou, Syphax?
By heavens, thou turn'st me all into attention!

Syph. Marcia might still be yours.

Juba. As how, dear Syphax?

Syph. Juba commands Numidia's hardy troops,
Mounted on steeds unus'd to the restraint
Of curbs and bits, and fleetier than the wind:
Give but the word, we'll snatch this damsel up,
And bear her off.

Juba. Can such dishonest thoughts
Rise up in man? Would'st thou seduce my youth
To do an act, that would destroy my honour?

Syph. Gods, I could tear my beard to hear you talk!
Honour's a fine imaginary notion,
That draws in raw and inexperienced men
To real mischiefs, while they hunt a shadow.

Juba. Wouldst thou degrade thy prince into a ruffian?

Syph. The boasted ancestors of these great men
Whose virtues you admire, were all such ruffians:
This dread of nations, this almighty Rome,
That comprehends in her wide empire's bounds
All under heaven, was founded on a rape:
Your Scipios, Cæsars, Pompeys, and your Catos,—
These gods on earth,—are all the spurious brood
Of violated maids, of ravish'd Sabines.

Juba. Syphax, I fear, that hoary head of thine
Abounds too much in our Numidian wiles.

Syph. My prince, you want to know the world:
You have not read mankind; your youth admires
The throes and swellings of a Roman soul,
Cato's bold flights, the extravagance of virtue.

Juba. If knowledge of the world makes men per-fidious,

May Juba ever live in ignorance!

Syph. Go, go, you're young.

Juba. Gods! must I tamely bear
This arrogance unanswer'd? Thou'rt a traitor,
A false old traitor!

Syph. (Aside.) I have gone too far.

Juba. Cato shall know the baseness of thy soul.

Syph. (Aside.) I must appease this storm, or perish in it. [white

Young prince, behold these locks that are grown
Beneath a helmet in your father's battles.

Juba. Those locks shall ne'er protect thy insolence.

Syph. Must one rash word, the infirmity of age,
Throw down the merit of my better years?

This the reward of a whole life of service?

Curse on the boy! how steadily he hears me!

(Aside.)

Juba. Is it, because the throne of my forefathers
Still stands unfill'd, and that Numidia's crown
Hangs doubtful yet whose head it shall inclose,
Thou thus presum'st to treat thy prince with scorn?

Syph. Why will you rive my heart with such expressions?

Does not old Syphax follow you to war?

What are his aims? What is it he aspires to?

Is it not this? To shed the slow remains,

His last poor ebb of blood, in your defence?

Juba. Syphax, no more: I would not hear you talk. [to Juba,

Syph. Not hear me talk? What! when my faith
My royal master's son, is call'd in question?

My prince may strike me dead, and I'll be dumb:

But, whilst I live, I must not hold my tongue,

And languish out old age in his displeasure.

Juba. Thou know'st the way too well into my
I do believe thee loyal to thy prince. [heart:

Syph. What greater instance can I give? I've
To do an action which my soul abhors, [offer'd

And gain you whom you love, at any price:

And 'tis for this my prince has call'd me traitor.

Juba. Sure thou mistak'st: I did not call thee so.

Syph. You did, indeed, my prince; you call'd me traitor:

Nay, further, threaten'd you'd complain to Cato.

Of what, my prince, would you complain to Cato;

That Syphax loves you, and would sacrifice

His life, nay more, his honour, in your service?

Juba. Syphax, I know thou lov'st me: but thy
To serve thy master, carried thee too far. [zeal

Honour's a sacred tie, the law of kings,

The noble mind's distinguishing perfection,

That aids and strengthens virtue where it meets her,

And imitates her actions, where she is not:

It ought not to be sported with.

Syph. Believe me, prince, you make old Syphax weep,
To hear you talk; but 'tis with tears of joy.
If e'er your father's crown adorn your brows,
Numidia will be blest by Cato's lectures.

Juba. Give me thy hand: we'll mutually forget
The warmth of youth, and frowardness of age.
Thy prince esteems thy worth, and loves thy person:
If e'er the sceptre comes into my hand,
Syphax shall stand the second in my kingdom.

Syph. Why will you overwhelm my age with kindness?

My joy grows burthensome: I sha'n't support it.

Juba. My friend, farewell. I'll hence, and try to
Some blest occasion that may set me right [find
In Cato's thoughts. I'd rather have that man
Approve my deeds, than worlds for my admirers.

[Exit.

Syph. Young men soon give, and soon forget affronts;

Old age is slow in both. A false old traitor!
Those words, rash boy, may chance to cost thee dear.
My heart had still some foolish fondness for thee:
But hence! 'tis gone: I give it to the winds.
Cæsar, I'm wholly thine.

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

All hail, Sempronius!
Well, Cato's senate is resolv'd to wait
The fury of a siege, before it yields.

Sem. Syphax, we both were on the verge of fate:
Lucius declar'd for peace, and terms were offer'd
To Cato by a messenger from Cæsar.

Syph. Who is this messenger?

Sem. I've practis'd with him;
And found a means to let the victor know
That Syphax and Sempronius are his friends.
Is Juba fix'd?

Syph. Yes; but it is to Cato.
I've tried the force of every reason on him;
Laid safety, life, and interest, in his sight;
But all are vain; he scorns them all for Cato.

Sem. Well, 'tis no matter; we shall do without him.
My friend, I now may hope thou hast forsook
Thy Juba's cause, and wishest Marcia mine.

Syph. May she be thine as fast as thou would'st have her!

But are thy troops prepar'd for a revolt?
Does the sedition catch from man to man,
And run among their ranks?

Sem. All, all is ready;
The factious leaders are our friends, and spread
Murmurs and discontents among the soldiers:
Within an hour, they'll storm the senate-house.

Syph. Meanwhile, I'll draw up my Numidian troops

Within the square, to exercise their arms,
And, as I see occasion, favour thee.
I laugh to think how your unshaken Cato
Will look aghast, while unforeseen destruction
Pours in upon him thus from every side.
So, where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden th' impetuous hurricanes descend,
Wheel through the air, in circling eddies play,
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away,
The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And, smother'd in the dusty whirlwind, dies.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Portico of the palace.

Enter MARCUS, and PORCIUS.

Mar. Thanks to my stars, I have not rang'd about
The wilds of life, ere I could find a friend;
Nature first pointed out my Porcius to me,
And early taught me, by her secret force,
To love thy person, ere I knew thy merit;
Till what was instinct, grew up into friendship.

Por. The friendships of the world are oft, my brother,

Confed'racies in vice, or leagues of pleasure;
Ours has severest virtue for its basis,
And such a friendship ends not but with life.

Mar. Porcius, thou know'st my soul in all its weakness;

Then, pr'ythee, spare me on its tender side;
Indulge me but in love, my other passions
Shall rise and fall by virtue's nicest rules. [love:

Por. When love's well tim'd, 'tis not a fault to
The strong, the brave, the virtuous, and the wise
Sink in the soft captivity together.

I would not urge thee to dismiss thy passion,
I know 'twere vain, but to suppress its force,
Till better times may make it look more graceful.

Mar. Alas! thou talk'st like one who never felt
The impatient throbs and longings of a soul
That pants and reaches after distant good.

A lover does not live by vulgar time:
In every moment of my Lucia's absence
Life hangs upon me, and becomes a burthen;
And yet, when I behold the charming maid,
I'm ten times more undone; while hope, and fear,
And grief, and rage, and love, rise up at once,
And with variety of pain distract me.

Por. What can I say, or do, to give thee help?

Mar. Porcius, thou oft enjoy'st the fair one's presence:

Then undertake my cause, and plead it to her
With all the strength and heat of eloquence,
Fraternal love and friendship can inspire.
Tell her, thy brother languishes to death,
And fades away, and withers in his bloom;
That he forgets his sleep, and loathes his food,
That youth, and health, and war, are joyless to him:
Describe his anxious days, and restless nights,
And all the torments that thou see'st me suffer.

Por. I do entreat thee, give me not an office
That suits with me so ill: thou know'st my temper.

Mar. Canst thou behold me sinking in my woes,
And wilt thou not reach out a friendly arm,
To raise me from amidst this plunge of sorrows?
O, Porcius, Porcius! from my soul I wish
Thou didst but know thyself what 'tis to love:
Then would'st thou pity and assist thy brother.

(Retires, in great agitation.)

Por. (Aside.) What should I do? If I disclose
my passion,

Our friendship's at an end: if I conceal it,
The world will call me false to friend and brother.

Mar. But see where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon-day breeze! Behold her! Porcius,
That face, that shape, those eyes, that heaven of beauty!

Observe her well, and blame me if thou canst.

Por. She sees us, and advances.

Mar. I'll withdraw,
And leave you for a while. Remember, Porcius,
Thy brother's life depends upon thy tongue. [Exit.

Enter LUCIA.

Luc. Did I not see your brother Marcus here?
Why did he fly the place, and shun my presence?

Por. O, Lucia! language is too faint to shew
His rage of love; it preys upon his life;
He pines, he sickens, he despairs, he dies.
My heart bleeds for him:

Even now, while thus I stand blest in thy presence,
A secret damp of grief comes o'er my thoughts,
And I'm unhappy, though thou smil'st upon me.

Luc. How wilt thou guard thy honour in the shock
Of love and friendship? Think betimes, my Porcius, Think how the nuptial tie, that might ensure
Our mutual bliss, would raise to such a height
Thy brother's griefs, as might, perhaps, destroy him. [my Lucia?

Por. Alas, poor youth! What dost thou think,

His generous, open, undesigning heart
Has begg'd his rival to solicit for him :
Then do not strike him dead with a denial ;
But hold him up in life, and cheer his soul
With the faint glimmering of a doubtful hope :
Perhaps, when we have pass'd these gloomy hours,
And weather'd out the storm that beats upon us,—

Luc. No, Porcius, no : I see thy sister's tears,
Thy father's anguish, and thy brother's death,
In the pursuit of our ill-fated loves :
And, Porcius, here I swear, to heaven I swear,
To heaven, and all the powers that judge mankind,
Never to join my plighted hand with thine,
While such a cloud of mischief hangs about us ;
But to forget our loves, and drive thee out
From all my thoughts, as far as I am able.

Por. What hast thou said ? Recall those hasty
Or I am lost for ever. [words,

Luc. Think, Porcius ; think thou see'st thy dying
brother
Stabb'd at his heart, and all besmear'd with blood,
Storming at heaven and thee. Thy awful sire
Sternly demands the cause, the accursed cause
That robs him of his son. Farewell, my Porcius !
Farewell, though death is in the word, for ever !

Por. Thou must not go ; my soul still hovers o'er
And can't get loose. [thee,

Luc. If the firm Porcius shake
To hear of parting, think what Lucia suffers.
But see, thy brother Marcus bends this way :
I sicken at the sight. Once more, farewell !
Farewell ! and know, thou wrong'st me, if thou think'st
Ever was love, or ever grief, like mine. [Exit.

Enter MARCUS.

Mar. Porcius, what hopes ? How stands she ?
Am I doom'd
To life or death ?

Por. What would'st thou have me say ?

Mar. Thy downcast looks, and thy disorder'd thoughts,
Tell me my fate ; I ask not the success
My cause has found.

Por. I'm griev'd I undertook it.

Mar. What ! does the barbarous maid insult my
And triumph in my pains ? [heart,

Por. Away ! you're too suspicious in your griefs :
Lucia, though sworn never to think of love,
Compassionates your pains, and pities you.

Mar. Compassionates my pains, and pities me !
What is compassion, when 'tis void of love ?
Fool that I was, to choose so cold a friend
To urge my cause ! Compassionates my pains !
To one that asks the warm returns of love,
Compassion's cruelty : 'tis scorn—'tis death.

Por. Marcus, no more ! Have I deserv'd this treatment ? [me !

Mar. What have I said ? O Porcius ! O forgive
A soul exasperated in ills, falls out
With every thing, its friends, itself.

[Trumpets sound.]

But, ah !

What means that sound, big with the threat of war ?
What new alarm ? [Trumpets sound.]

Por. A second, louder yet,
Swells in the wind, and comes more full upon us.

Mar. Oh, for some glorious cause to fall in battle !
Lucia, thou hast undone me : thy disdain
Has broke my heart : 'tis death must give me ease.

Por. Quick, let us hence : who knows if Cato's life
Stands sure ? O Marcus, I am on fire ! my heart
Leaps at the trumpet's voice, and burns for glory.
[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Square before the palace.

Enter SEMPRONIUS, JUNIUS, TITUS, and other Mutineers.

Sem. At length the winds are rais'd, the storm blows high ;

Be it your care, my friends to keep it up
In its full fury, and direct it right,
Till it has spent itself on Cato's head.
Meanwhile, I'll herd among his friends, and seem
One of the number ; that, whate'er arrive,
My friends and fellow-soldiers may be safe. [Exit.

Jun. We are all safe ; Sempronius is our friend.
[Trumpets sound.]

Hark ! Cato enters. Bear up boldly to him ;
This day will end our toils, and give us rest.—
Fear nothing ; for Sempronius is our friend.
[Trumpets sound.]

Enter CATO, PORCIUS, MARCUS, LUCIUS, SEM-
PRONIUS, Senators, &c.

Cato. Where are these bold, intrepid sons of war,
That greatly turn their backs upon the foe,
And to their general send a brave defiance ?

Sem. (Aside.) Curse on their dastard souls, they stand astonish'd ! [honour

Cato. Perfidious men !—and will you thus dis-
Your past exploits, and sully all your wars ?
Do you confess, 'twas not a zeal for Rome,
Nor love of liberty,
Drew you thus far, but hopes to share the spoil
Of conquer'd towns, and plunder'd provinces ?
Fir'd with such motives, you do well to join
With Cato's foes, and follow Cæsar's banners.
Behold, ungrateful men !—

Behold my bosom naked to your swords,
And let the man that's injur'd strike the blow.
Which of you all suspects that he is wrong'd,
Or thinks he suffers greater ills than Cato ?
Am I distinguish'd from you but by toils ?
Superior toils, and heavier weight of cares ?
Painful pre-eminence !

Sem. (Aside.) By heavens they droop :—
Confusion to the villains !—all is lost.

Cato. Hence, worthless men !—hence, and complain to Cæsar,
You could not undergo the toils of war,
Nor bear the hardships that your general bore.

Luci. See, Cato, see,—the unhappy men !—they weep :

Fear, and remorse, and sorrow for their crime
Appear in every look, and plead for mercy.

Cato. Learn to be honest men ; give up your leaders,
And pardon shall descend on all the rest.

Sem. Cato, commit these wretches to my care :
First, let them each be broken on the rack,—
Then, with what life remains, impal'd, and left
To writhe at leisure round the bloody stake ;
There let them hang, and taint the southern wind :
The partners of their crime will learn obedience,
When they look up, and see their fellow-traitors
Stuck on a fork, and blackening in the sun.

Cato. Forbear, Sempronius :—see they suffer
death ;

But, in their deaths, remember they are men.—

[The Mutineers retire.—The four Senators advance into their places.]

Lucius, the base, degenerate age requires
Severity and justice in its rigour ;
This curbs an impious, bold, offending world,
Commands obedience, and gives force to laws.
When by just vengeance guilty mortals perish,
The gods behold their punishment with pleasure,
And lay the uplifted thunderbolt aside.

Sem. Cato, I gladly execute thy will.

Cato. Meanwhile, we'll sacrifice to liberty.
Remember, O my friends, the laws, the rights,
The generous plan of power deliver'd down,
From age to age, by your renown'd forefathers,
So dearly bought, the price of so much blood :
O let it never perish in your hands,
But piously transmit it to your children !
Do thou, great Liberty, inspire our souls,
And make our lives in thy possession happy,

Or our deaths glorious in thy just defence!

[Flourish.—Exeunt Cato, Porcius, Marcus, Lucius, Senators, &c.]

Jun. Sempronius, you have acted like yourself: One would have thought, you had been half in earnest.

Sem. Villain, stand off!—Base, groveling, worthless wretches!

Mongrels in faction! poor faint-hearted traitors!

Tit. Nay, now you carry it too far, Sempronius: Throw off the mask; there are none here but friends.

Sem. Know, villains, when such paltry slaves presume

To mix in treason, if the plot succeeds,
They're thrown neglected by: but, if it fails,
They're sure to die like dogs, as you shall do.—
Guards!—

Enter Guards.

Here, take these factious monsters, drag them forth
To sudden death.

Jun. Nay; since it comes to this,—

Sem. Despatch them quick;—but first, pluck out their tongues;

Lest with their dying breath they sow sedition.

[Exeunt Guards, with the Mutineers.]

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Our first design, my friend, has prov'd abortive;

Still there remains an after-game to play.

My troops are mounted; their Numidian steeds

Snuff up the wind, and long to scour the desert:

Let but Sempronius head us in our flight,

We'll force the gate where Marcus keeps his guard,

And hew down all that would oppose our passage.

A day will bring us into Cæsar's camp.

Sem. Confusion! I have fail'd of half my purpose:
Marcia, the charming Marcia's left behind!

Syph. How! will Sempronius turn a woman's slave?

Sem. Think not that I can ever feel the soft
Unmanly warmth and tenderness of love.

Syphax, I long to clasp that haughty maid,

And bend her stubborn virtue to my passion:

When I have gone thus far, I'd cast her off.

Syph. What hinders then, but that thou find her
And hurry her away by manly force. [out,

Sem. But how to gain admission? for access
Is given to none but Juba and her brothers.

Syph. Thou shalt have Juba's dress and Juba's guards:

The doors will open when Numidia's prince
Seems to appear before the slaves that watch them.

Sem. I thank thy friendly zeal:—Marcia's my own!

How will my bosom swell with anxious joy,
When I behold her struggling in my arms,
With glowing beauty and disorder'd charms;
While fear and anger, with alternate grace,
Pant in her breast, and vary in her face!
So Pluto, seiz'd of Proserpine, convey'd
To hell's tremendous gloom the affrighted maid;
There grimly smil'd, pleas'd with the beauteous prize,

Nor envied Jove his sunshine and his skies. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Portico of the palace.

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Luc. Now tell me, Marcia, tell me from thy soul,
If thou believ'st 'tis possible for woman
To suffer greater ills than Lucia suffers?

Mar. O Lucia, Lucia, might my big-swoln heart
Vent all its griefs, and give a loose to sorrow,
Marcia could answer thee in sighs, keep pace
With all thy woes, and count out tear for tear.

Luc. I know, thou'rt doom'd alike to be belov'd
By Juba, and thy father's friend Sempronius:

But which of these has power to charm like Porcius?

Mar. Still must I beg thee not to name Sempronius?

Lucia, I like not that loud boisterous man:

Juba, to all the bravery of a hero

Adds softest love and sweetness: he, I own,

Might make indeed the proudest woman happy.

Luc. But, should your father give you to Sempronius?—

Mar. I dare not think he will: but, if he should,—
I hear the sound of feet:—they march this way.—

Let us retire, and try if we can drown

Each softer thought in sense of present danger.

When love once pleads admission to our hearts,

In spite of all the virtue we can boast,

The woman that deliberates is lost. [Exeunt.]

Enter SEMPRONIUS, dressed like Juba, with Numidian Guards.

Sem. The deer is lodg'd: I've track'd her to her covert:

Be sure you mind the word; and, when I give it,
Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey:

Let not her cries or tears have force to move you,—

How will the young Numidian rave, to see

His mistress lost! If aught could glad my soul

Beyond the enjoyment of so bright a prize,

'Twould be to torture that young gay barbarian.—

But hark, what noise? Death to my hopes! 'tis he,

'Tis Juba's self, There is but one way left;

He must be murder'd, and a passage cut

Through those his guards. Ha! dastards, do you tremble?

Or act like men, or, by yon azure heaven,—

Enter JUBA, with Guards.

Juba. What do I see? Who's this, that dares usurp

The guards and habit of Numidia's prince?

Sem. One that was born to scourge thy arrogance,
Presumptuous youth.

Juba. What can this mean? Sempronius!

Sem. My sword shall answer thee:—have at thy heart.

Juba. Nay, then beware thy own, proud barbarous
man.

(They fight. Sempronius falls. His Guards surrender to Juba's.)

Sem. Curse on my stars! Am I then doom'd to fall

By a boy's hand, and for a worthless woman?

This my close of life?—

Oh, for a peal of thunder, that would make

Earth, sea, and air, and heaven, and Cato tremble!
(Dies.)

Juba. With what a spring his furious soul broke loose,

And left the limbs still quivering on the ground!

Hence let us carry off those slaves to Cato,

That we may there at length unravel all

This dark design, this mystery of fate.

[Exit, with Guards and Prisoners.]

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Luc. Sure, 'twas the clash of swords: my troubled heart

Is so cast down and sunk amidst its sorrows,

It throbs with fear, and aches at every sound.

O Marcia, should thy brothers, for my sake—

I die away with horror at the thought.

Mar. See, Lucia, see! here's blood!

What! a Numidian! Heavens preserve the prince!

The face lies muffled up within the garment,—

But hah!—death to my sight!—a diadem?—

O gods! 'tis he! Juba lies dead before us.

Luc. Now, Marcia, now call up to thy assistance
Thy wonted strength and constancy of mind.

Mar. Lucia, look there, and wonder at my patience:

Have I not cause to rave, and beat my breast,
To rend my heart with grief, and run distracted?
Luc. What can I think or say to give thee comfort?

Enter JUBA, with Guards.

Mar. Talk not of comfort, 'tis for lighter ills.
Behold a sight that strikes all comfort dead.
I will indulge my sorrows;
That man, that best of men, deserv'd it from me.

Juba. What do I hear? and was the false Sempronius

That best of men? O, had I fall'n like him,
And could have thus been mourn'd, I had been happy.

Mar. O Juba! Juba! Juba!
He's dead, and never knew how much I lov'd him.
Lucia, who knows but his poor bleeding heart,
Amidst its agonies, remember'd Marcia,
And the last words he utter'd call'd me cruel?
Alas! he knew not, hapless youth! he knew not
Marcia's whole soul was full of love and Juba.

Juba. Do I live? or am, indeed,
What Marcia thinks? All is Elysium round me.

Mar. Ye dear remains of the most lov'd of men
Nor modesty, nor virtue, here forbids
A last embrace, while thus—

Juba. (Comes forward.) See, Marcia; see,
The happy Juba lives! he lives to catch
That dear embrace, and to return it, too,
With mutual warmth and eagerness of love.

Mar. With pleasure and amaze I stand transported.

If thou art Juba, who lies there?

Juba. A wretch,
Disguis'd like Juba, on a curs'd design.

(Signs to his guards, to carry off the body.)

The tale is long, nor have I heard it out;
Thy father knows it all. I could not bear
To leave thee in the neighbourhood of death,
But flew, in all the haste of love, to find thee:
I found thee weeping; and confess, this once,
Am rapt with joy, to see my Marcia's tears.

Mar. I've been surpris'd in an unguarded hour,
But must not now go back: the love that lay
Half smother'd in my breast, has broke through all
Its weak restraints, and burns in its full lustre;
I cannot, if I would, conceal it from thee.

Juba. My joy! my best lov'd! my only wish!
How shall I speak the transport of my soul?

Mar. Lucia, thy arm: O, let me rest upon it!—
The vital blood that had forsook my heart,
Returns again in such tumultuous tides,
It quite o'ercomes me. Lead to my apartment.—
O prince! I blush, to think what I have said;
But fate has wrested the confession from me.
Go on, and prosper in the paths of honour:
Thy virtue will excuse my passion for thee,
And make the gods propitious to our love.

[Exit with Lucia.]

Juba. I am so bless'd, I fear 'tis all a dream.
Fortune, thou now hast made amends for all
Thy past unkindness: I absolve my stars.
What, though Numidia add her conquer'd towns
And provinces, to swell the victor's triumph?
Juba will never at his fate repine:
Let Cæsar have the world, if Marcia's mine. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Square before the palace.

Enter LUCIUS, CATO, Freedmen, &c.

Luci. I stand astonish'd. What! the bold Sempronius,
That still broke foremost through the crowd of pa-
As with a hurricane of zeal transported!
And, virtuous even to madness.

Cato. Trust me, my friend,
Our civil discords have produc'd such crimes,
Such monstrous crimes, I am surpris'd at nothing.
O Lucius! I am sick of this bad world:
The daylight and the sun grow painful to me.

Enter PORCIUS.

But see where Porcius comes. What means this haste?

Por. My heart is griev'd;
I bring such news as will afflict my father.

Cato. Has Cæsar shed more Roman blood?

Por. Not so:

The traitor Syphax, as within the square
He exercis'd his troops, the signal given,
Flew off at once with his Numidian horse
To the south gate, where Marcus holds the watch:
I saw, and call'd to stop him; but in vain:
He toss'd his arm aloft, and proudly told me,
He would not stay and perish like Sempronius.

Cato. Perfidious man! But haste, my son, and see Thy brother Marcus acts a Roman's part.

[Exit Porcius with the Freedmen.]

Lucius, the torrent bears too hard upon me:
Justice gives way to force; the conquer'd world
Is Cæsar's: Cato has no business in it.

Luci. While pride, oppression, and injustice reign,
The world will still demand her Cato's presence.
In pity to mankind, submit to Cæsar,
And reconcile thy mighty soul to life. [number

Cato. Would Lucius have me live, to swell the
Of Cæsar's slaves? or, by a base submission,
Give up the cause of Rome, and own a tyrant?

Luc. The victor never will impose on Cato
Ungenerous terms:—his enemies confess,
The virtues of humanity are Cæsar's. [country:

Cato. Curse on his virtues! they've undone his
Such popular humanity is treason.
But Juba comes: the ingenuous prince appears
Full of the guilt of his perfidious subjects.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. I blush, and am confounded, to appear Before thy presence, Cato.

Cato. What's thy crime?

Juba. I'm a Numidian.

Cato. And a brave one too:
Thou hast a Roman soul.

Juba. Hast thou not heard
Of my false countrymen?

Cato. Alas! good youth,
Falsehood and fraud shoot up in every soil,
The product of all climes; Rome has its Cæsars.

Juba. 'Tis generous, thus to comfort the distress'd. [serv'd.

Cato. 'Tis just, to give applause where 'tis de-
Thy virtue, prince, has stood the test of fortune,
Like purest gold, that, tortur'd in the furnace,
Comes out more bright, and brings forth all its weight.

Enter PORCIUS.

Por. Misfortune on misfortune! grief on grief!
My brother Marcus—

Cato. Ha! what has he done?
Has he forsook his post? Has he given way?
Did he look tamely on, and let them pass?

Por. Scarce had I left my father, but I met him,
Borne on the shields of his surviving soldiers,
Breathless and pale, and cover'd o'er with wounds.
Long, at the head of his few faithful friends,
He stood the shock of a whole host of foes,—
Till, obstinately brave, and bent on death,
Oppress'd, with multitudes, he greatly fell,

Cato. I'm satisfied.

Por. Nor did he fall, before [Syphax.
His sword had pierc'd thro' the false heart of
I saw the hoary traitor
Grin in the pangs of death, and bite the ground.

Cato. Thanks to the gods! my boy has done his duty.

Porcius, when I am dead, be sure you place
His urn near mine.

Por. Long may they keep asunder!

Luci. O Cato, arm thy soul with all its patience!
See where the corpse of thy dead son approaches;
The citizens and senators, alarm'd,
Have gather'd round it, and attend it weeping.

(A dead march sounds.)

Enter Lictors, Senators, Soldiers bearing the body of Marcus on a bier, Freedmen, with his helmet, shield, sword, and spear; eagle and other ensigns; and guards with their arms reversed.

Cato. Welcome, my son! Here set him down,
my friends,

Full in my sight; that I may view at leisure
The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds.
How beautiful is death, when earn'd by virtue!
Who would not be that youth? What pity is it
That we can die but once, to serve our country!
Why sits this sadness on your brows, my friends?
I should have blush'd, if Cato's house had stood
Secure, and flourish'd in a civil war.

Porcius, behold thy brother; and remember,
Thy life is not thy own, when Rome demands it.
When Rome demands? But Rome is now no more;
The Roman empire's fall'n,—O curs'd ambition!
Fall'n into Cæsar's hands:—our great forefathers
Had left him nought to conquer, but his country.

Juba. Behold that generous man! Rome fills his eyes

With tears, that flow'd not o'er his own dead son.

Por. While Cato lives, Cæsar will blush to see Mankind enslav'd, and be asham'd of empire.

Cato. Cæsar asham'd! Has he not seen Pharsalia?

Luci. Cato, 'tis time, thou save thyself and us.

Cato. Lose not a thought on me; I'm out of danger;

Cæsar shall never say, "I've conquer'd Cato."

But, O my friends, your safety fills my heart
With anxious thoughts. How shall I save my friends?
'Tis now, O Cæsar, I begin to fear thee.

Luci. Cæsar has mercy, if we ask it of him.

Cato. Then ask it, I conjure you: let him know,
Whate'er was done against him, Cato did it:
Add, if you please, that I request it of him,
That I myself, with tears, request it of him,
The virtue of my friends may pass unpunish'd.
Juba, my heart is troubled for thy sake:
Should I advise thee to regain Numidia,
Or seek the conqueror?

Juba. If I forsake thee

Whilst I have life, may Heaven abandon Juba!

Cato. Thy virtues, prince; if I foresee aright,
Will one day make thee great. At Rome, hereafter,
'Twill be no crime to have been Cato's friend.

Porcius, come hither to me. Ah! my son,
Despairing of success,

Let me advise thee to withdraw betimes

To our paternal seat, the Sabine field,
Where the great censor toil'd with his own hands,
And all our frugal ancestors were bless'd
In humble virtues, and a rural life:
There live retir'd:

Content thyself to be obscurely good:

When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,
The post of honour is a private station.

Por. I hope, my father does not recommend
A life to Porcius, that he scorns himself. [you]

Cato. Farewell, my friends! If there be any of
Who dare not trust the victor's clemency,
Know, there are ships prepar'd by my command,
Their sails already opening to the winds,
That shall convey you to the wish'd-for port.
Is there aught else, my friends, I can do for you?
The conqueror draws near. Once more, farewell!
If e'er we meet hereafter, we shall meet
In happier climes, and on a safer shore,
Where Cæsar never shall approach us more.

(Pointing to his dead son.)

There the brave youth, with love of virtue fir'd,
Who greatly in his country's cause expir'd,

Shall know he conquer'd.

[Exeunt Lucius and Senators.]

The firm patriot there,
Who made the welfare of mankind his care,
Though still by faction, vice, and fortune cross'd,
Shall find the generous labour was not lost.

[A dead march. Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in the Palace.

CATO discovered, sitting in a thoughtful posture. In his hand Plato's book on the Immortality of the Soul: a drawn sword on the table by him,

Cato. It must be so; Plato, thou reasonest well;
Else when this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?
Or whence this secret dread and inward horror
Of falling into nought? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself and startles at destruction?
'Tis the Divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.
Eternity! Thou pleasing, dreadful thought!
Through what variety of untried being,
Through what new scenes and changes must we pass!
The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before me,
But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.
Here will I hold: If there's a Power above us,
(And that there is, all nature cries aloud
Through all her works, he must delight in virtue;
And that which he delights in, must be happy.)
But when? or where? This world was made for Cæsar.

I'm weary of conjectures: This must end 'em.

(Laying his hand on his sword.)

Thus am I doubly arm'd: my death and life,
My bane and antidote, are both before me:
This in a moment brings me to an end;
But this informs me, I shall never die.
The soul, secur'd in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.
The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years;
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.
What means this heaviness that hangs upon me?
Nature oppress'd, and harass'd out with care,
Sinks down to rest. This once I'll favour her,
That my awaken'd soul may take her flight,
Renew'd in all her strength, and fresh with life,
An offering fit for heaven. Let guilt or fear
Disturb man's rest: Cato knows neither of 'em,
Indifferent in his choice to sleep or die.

Enter PORCIUS.

But ha! how's this? My son! Why this intrusion?
Were not my orders that I would be private?
Why am I disobey'd?

Por. Alas, my father!

What means this sword? this instrument of death?
Let me convey it hence. (Takes up the sword.)

Cato. Rash youth, forbear! [friends,]

Por. O, let the prayers, the entreaties of your Their tears, their common danger, wrest it from you.

Cato. Would'st thou betray me? would'st thou give me up,

A slave, a captive, into Cæsar's hands?

Retire: and learn obedience to a father;

Or know, young man,—

Por. Look not thus sternly on me:

(Lays down the sword.)

You know I'd rather die than disobey you.

Cato. 'Tis well: again I'm master of myself.

Now, Cæsar, let thy troops beset our gates,
And bar each avenue; thy gathering fleets
O'erspread the sea, and stop up every port;

Cato shall open to himself a passage,
And mock thy hopes.

Por. (Kneels.) O, sir, forgive your son,
Whose grief hangs heavy on him! O my father,—
How am I sure it is not the last time
I e'er shall call you so?—be not displeas'd,
O be not angry with me, whilst I weep,
And, in the anguish of my heart, beseech you
To quit the dreadful purpose of your soul.

Cato. Thou hast been ever good and dutiful.

(Raises and embraces him.)

Weep not, my son; all will be well again:
The righteous gods, whom I have sought to please,
Will succour Cato, and protect his children.

Por. Your words give comfort to my drooping heart.

Cato. Porcius, thou may'st rely upon my con-
Cato will never act what misbecomes him.

But go, my son; take care that nought be wanting
Among thy father's friends; see them embark'd;
And tell me if the winds and seas befriend 'em.
My soul is quite weigh'd down with care, and asks
The soft refreshment of a moment's sleep.

[Exit Cato.]

Por. My thoughts are more at ease; my heart revives.

Enter MARCIA.

O Marcia, O my sister, still there's hope:
Our father will not cast away a life
So needful to us all, and to his country.
He is retir'd to rest, and seems to cherish
Thoughts full of peace. He has despatch'd me hence
With orders that bespeak a mind compos'd,
And studious for the safety of his friends.
Marcia, take care that none disturb his slumbers.

[Exit Porcius.]

Mar. O ye immortal powers, that guard the just,
Watch round his couch, and soften his repose!
Banish his sorrows, and becalm his soul
With easy dreams! Remember all his virtues,
And shew mankind that goodness is your care!

Enter LUCIA.

Luc. Where is your father, Marcia? Where is Cato?

Mar. Lucia, speak low:—he is retir'd to rest.
My friend, I feel a gentle dawning hope
Rise in my soul: we may be happy still.

Luc. Alas! I tremble when I think on Cato;
In every view, in every thought, I tremble.
Cato is stern, and awful as a god:
He knows not how to wink at human frailty,
Or pardon weakness that he never felt.

Mar. Though stern and awful to the foes of Rome,
He is all goodness, Lucia, always mild,
Compassionate and gentle, to his friends:
Fill'd with domestic tenderness,—the best,
The kindest father. I have ever found him
Easy, and good, and bounteous to my wishes.

Luc. 'Tis his consent alone can make us happy.
But who knows Cato's thoughts?
Who knows how yet he may dispose of Porcius?
Or, how he has determin'd of thyself?

Mar. Let him but live, commit the rest to heaven.

Enter LUCIUS.

Luci. Sweet are the slumbers of the virtuous man.
O Marcia, I have seen thy godlike father:
Some power invisible supports his soul,
And bears it up in all its wonted greatness.
A kind refreshing sleep has fallen upon him:
I saw him stretch'd at ease, his fancy lost
In pleasing dreams: as I drew near his couch,
He smil'd, and cried, "Cæsar, thou canst not hurt
me."

Mar. His mind still labours with some dreadful

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Lucius, the horsemen are return'd from viewing

The number, strength, and posture of our foes,
Who now encamp within a short hour's march.
On the high point of yon bright western tower
We ken them from afar; the setting sun
Plays on their shining arms and burnish'd helmets,
And covers all the field with gleams of fire.

Luci. Marcia, 'tis time, we should awake thy father.
Cæsar is still dispos'd to give us terms;
And waits at distance, till he hears from Cato.

Enter PORCIUS.

Porcius, thy looks speak somewhat of importance.
What tidings dost thou bring? Methinks, I see
Unusual gladness sparkling in thy eyes.

Por. As I was hasting to the port, where now
My father's friends, impatient for a passage,
Accuse the lingering winds, a sail arriv'd
From Pompey's son, who through the realms of Spain

Calls out for vengeance on his father's death,
And rouses the whole nation up to arms.
Were Cato at their head, once more might Rome
Assert her rights, and claim her liberty.

(Cato's groans are heard.)

But hark! what means that groan? O, give me way,
And let me fly into my father's presence. [Exit.]

Luci. Cato, amidst his slumbers, thinks on Rome,
And in the wild disorder of his soul
Mourns o'er his country. (Cato groans again.)
Ha! a second groan!—Heaven guard us all!

Mar. Alas! 'tis not the voice
Of one who sleeps: 'tis agonizing pain,
'Tis death is in that sound.

Enter PORCIUS.

Por. O, sight of woe!
O Marcia, what we fear'd is come to pass!
Cato is fallen upon his sword.

Luci. O Porcius,
Hide all the horrors of thy mournful tale,
And let us guess the rest.

Por. I've rais'd him up,
And plac'd him in his chair, where, pale and faint,
He gasps for breath, and, as his life flows from him,
Demands to see his friends. His servants weeping,
Obsequious to his orders, bear him hither.

Mar. O heaven, assist me in this dreadful hour
To pay the last sad duties to my father!

Enter CATO, with two Freedmen.

Juba. These are thy triumphs, thy exploits, O
Cæsar!

Luci. Now is Rome fallen indeed!

Cato. Here set me down.

Porcius, come near me:—are my friends embark'd?
Can any thing be thought of for their service?

Whilst yet I live, let me not live in vain.
O Lucius, art thou here? Thou art too good!
Let this our friendship live between our children;
Make Porcius happy in thy daughter Lucia,
Alas, poor man he weeps! Marcia, my daughter,
O bend me forward! Juba loves thee, Marcia,
A senator of Rome, while Rome surviv'd,
Would not have match'd his daughter with a king;
But Cæsar's arms have thrown down all distinction:
Whoe'er is brave and virtuous, is a Roman.
I'm sick to death. O, when shall I get loose
From this vain world, the abode of guilt and sorrow!
And yet, methinks, a beam of light breaks in
On my departing soul. Alas! I fear,
I've been too hasty. O ye powers, that search
The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts,
If I have done amiss, impute it not!

The best may err; but you are good; and—oh!
(Dies.)

THE DRAGON OF WANTLEY;

A BURLESQUE OPERA, IN THREE ACTS,—BY H. CAREY:

TO WHICH IS ADDED, THE Old Ballad ON WHICH IT IS FOUNDED.

Act III.—Scene I.

CHARACTERS.

MOORE

DRAGON

MAUXALINDA
VILLAGERS

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Rural Prospect.—Enter Villagers.

CHORUS.

*Fly, neighbours, fly!
The Dragon's nigh;
Save, save your lives, and fly!*

*Away, away!
For if you stay,
Sure as a gun, you die.
Fly, &c.*

[Exeunt.]

(The Dragon crosses the stage.)

SCENE II.—A Hall.

Enter GUBBINS, MAUXALINDA, and Chorus.

Gub. What wretched havoc does this Dragon make!
He sticks at nothing for his belly's sake.
Feeding but makes his appetite the stronger;
He'll eat us all, if he 'bide here much longer.

AIR.—GUBBINS.

*Poor children three,
Devoured he,
That could not with him grapple;
And, at one sup,
He eat them up,
As one would eat an apple.*

CHORUS.

*Houses and churches,
To him are geese and turkeys.*

Enter MARGERY.

Marg. Oh! father, father! as our noble 'squire
Was sat at breakfast by his parlour fire,
With wife and children, all in pleasant tattle,
The table shook, the cups began to rattle:
The table shook, the cups began to rattle:
A dismal noise was heard within the hall,—
Away they flew! the Dragon scar'd them all!
He drank up all their coffee at a sup;
And next devour'd their toast and butter up.

AIR.—MARGERY.

*But to hear the children mutter,
When they'd lost their toast and butter,
And to see my lady moan,
Oh! 'twould melt a heart of stone.*

*Here the 'squire with servants wrangling;
There the maids and mistress jangling;
And the pretty hungry dears,
All together by the ears,
Scrambling for a barley-cake;
Oh! 'twould make one's heart to ache.
But to hear, &c.*

Gub. This Dragon very modish, sure, and nice is;
What shall we do in this disast'rous crisis?
Marg. A thought, to quell him, comes into my head;
No way more proper than to kill him dead.

Gub. Oh! miracle of wisdom! rare suggestion!
But how, or who to do it? that's the question.

Marg. Not far from hence there lives a valiant knight,
A man of prowess great, and mickle might;
He has done deeds St. George himself might brag on.

Maux. This very man is he shall kill the Dragon.

AIR.—MAUXALINDA.

*He's a man ev'ry inch, I assure you,
Stout, vig'rous, active, and tall;
There's none can from danger secure you,
Like brave gallant Moore, of Moore-hall.
No giant or knight ever quell'd him,
He fills all their hearts with alarms;
No virgin yet ever beheld him,
But wish'd herself clasp'd in his arms.*

CHORUS.

*Let's go to his dwelling,
With yelping and yelling,
And tell him a sorrowful ditty;
Who knows but the knight,
With this Dragon may fight,
If he have but a morsel of pity? [Exeunt.]*

SCENE III.—Moore Hall.

Enter MOORE and his Companions.

Moore. Come, friends, let's circulate the cheerful glass;
Let each true toper toast his favourite lass.
Sound all your instruments of joy, and play!
Let's drink and sing, and pass the time away.

AIR.—MOORE.

*Zeno, Plato, Aristotle,
All were lovers of the bottle;
Poets, painters, and musicians,
Churchmen, lawyers, and physicians,
All admire a pretty lass,
All require a cheerful glass.
Every pleasure has its season,
Love and drinking are no treason.
Zeno, &c.*

Enter GUBBINS, MARGERY, MAUXALINDA, and others.

CHORUS.

*Oh! save us all, (Kneeling.)
Moore of Moore Hall!
Or else this cursed Dragon
Will plunder our houses,
Our daughters and spouses,
And leave us the devil a rag on.*

AIR.—MARGERY.

*Gentle knight! all knights exceeding,
Pink of prowess and good breeding,
Let a virgin's tears inspire thee;
Let a maiden's blushes fire thee.
For my father and my mother,
For my sister and my brother,
For my friends that stand before thee,
Thus I sue thee, thus implore thee;
Thus I kiss thy valiant garment,
Humbly hoping there's no harm in't.*

Moore. (Aside.) Her looks shoot through my soul, her eyes strike fire;
I'm all a conflagration of desire.
Fair maid, I grant whatever you can ask,
(To Marg.)
The deed is done, when once you name the task.

Marg. The Dragon, sir! the Dragon!

Moore. Say no more,
You soon shall see him weltering in his gore.

Marg. Most mighty Moore! do but this Dragon kill,

All that we have is wholly at your will.

Moore. The only bounty I require is this:
That thou may'st fire me with an ardent kiss;
That thy soft hands may 'noint me over night,
And dress me in the morning ere I fight.

AIR.—MARGERY.

*If that's all you ask,
My sweetest,
My featest,
Completest,
And neatest,
I'm proud of the task.
Of love take your fill,
Past measure,
Sole spring of my pleasure,
As long as you will.*

Maux. (Overhearing.) A forward lady; she grows fond apace;
But I shall catch her in a proper place.

Moore. Leave her with me; conclude the Dragon dead:

If I don't maul the dog, I'll lose my head.

[Exeunt all but Moore and Marg.]

DUETT.

Moore. Let my dearest be near me,—

Marg. I'll ever be near thee,—

Moore. To warm me, to cheer me;—

Marg. To warm thee, to cheer thee;—

Moore. To fire me, inspire me,—

Marg. To fire thee, inspire thee,—

Both. With kisses and ale.

Moore. Your fears I'll abolish.

Marg. This Dragon demolish.

Moore. I'll work him;—

Marg. Ay, work him;—

Moore. I'll jerk him;—

Marg. Ay, jerk him;—

Both. From nostril to tail.

Moore leads off Margery; MAUXALINDA enters, and pulls him back by the sleeve.

Maux. Oh! villain! monster! devil! basely base!

How can you dare to look me in the face?

Did you not swear last Christmas we should marry?

Oh! 'tis enough to make a maid miscarry!

Witness this piece of sixpence, certain token

Of my true heart, and your false promise broken.

Moore. The devil's in the woman? What's the matter?

Maux. Now you insult me; time was you could flatter.

Moore. Upon my soul, I don't know what you mean!

Maux. Don't you know Margery, of Roth'ram Green?

Moore. Not I, upon my honour.

Maux. That's a lie!

What, do you think I've neither ear nor eye?

Villain! I will believe my eyes and ears:

She whom you kiss'd, and call'd ten thousand dears.

"Let my dearest be near me," &c. (Sings, mocking.)

Moore. By Jove! I'm blown.—Zounds! how came this about?
However, I'm resolv'd to stand it out.
I only of policy was civil; (To Maux.)
But, 'faith, I hate her, as I hate the devil.
You're all I value,—witness this close hug,—
I'm your's, and only your's.
Maux. Ah! coaxing pug!
Moore. My pretty Mauxy, pr'ythee, don't be jealous.
Maux. Dear me! you men are such bewitching fellows;
You steal into our hearts by sly degrees,
Then make poor girls believe just what you please.

AIR.—MOORE.

*By the beer as brown as berry,
By the cyder and the perry,
Which so oft has made us merry,
With a hey-down, ho-down derry,
Mauxalinda's I'll remain;
True blue will never stain.*

Maux. But, do you really love me?
Moore. By this kiss,
By raptures past, and hopes of future bliss.

DUETT.

*Pigs shall not be
So fond as we,
We will out-coo the turtle-dove;
Fondly toying,
Still enjoying,
Sporting sparrows we'll out-love.*

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter MARGERY.

AIR.

*Sure, my stays will burst with sobbing,
And my heart quite crack with throbbing;
My poor eyes are red as ferrets,
And I ha'n't a grain of spirits.
Oh! I wouldn't for any money,
This vile beast should kill my honey.
Better kiss me, gentle knight,
Than with dragons fierce to fight.*

Enter MOORE.

Moore. My Madge! my honey-suckle in the dumps!
Marg. Put your hand here, and feel my heart how't thumps.
Moore. Good lack-a-day! how great a palpitation!
Tell me, my dear, the cause of this vexation.
Marg. An ugly dream has put me in a fright:
I dreamt the Dragon slew my gentle knight.
If such a thing should happen unto thee,
Oh! miserable, miserable Margery!
Moore. Don't fright thyself with dreams, my girl; ne'er fear him;
I'll work his buff, if ever I come near him.
I've such a suit of spiked armour bought,
Bears, lions, dragons, it sets all at nought;
In which, when I'm equipp'd, my Madge shall see
I'll scare the Dragon, not the Dragon me—
But time grows short, I must awhile away.
Marg. Make haste, my dear.
Moore. My duck, I will not stay. [Exit.]

Enter MAUXALINDA.

Maux. So, madam, have I found you out at last?
You now shall pay full dear for all that's past.

Were you as fine as e'er wore silk or satin,
I'd beat your harlot's brains out with my patten,
Before you shall delude a man of mine.

Marg. Who, in the name of wonder, made him thine?

Maux. D'ye laugh, you minx? I'll make you change your note,
Or drive your grinning grinders down your throat.

DUETT.

*Insulting gipsy,
You're surely tipsy,
Or, non se ipse,
To chatter so:
Your too much feeding,
All rules exceeding,
Has spoil'd your breeding—
Go, trollop, go!*

Marg. Lauk! what a monstrous tail our cat has got.

Maux. Nay, if you brave me, then you go to pot.

Come, bodkin, come! take Mauxalinda's part,
And stab her hated rival to the heart.

(Goes to kill Margery; she swoons.)

Enter MOORE, who takes away the bodkin.

Moore. Why, what the devil is the woman doing?

Maux. To put an end to all your worship's wooing.

Moore. 'Tis well I came before the whim went further;

Had I staid longer, here had sure been murther.
This cursed jade has thrown the girl in fits.

How dost, my dear? (Margery recovers.)

Marg. Frighted out of my wits.

Moore. But, fear her not; for, by her own confession,

I'll bind her over to the quarter session.

AIR.—MAUXALINDA.

*Oh! give me not up to the law,
I'd much rather beg upon crutches;
Once in a solicitor's paw,
You never get out of his clutches.*

Marg. Come, come, forgive her.

Moore. Here my anger ends.

Maux. And so does mine.

Moore. Why, then, let's buss, and friends.

(Kiss round.)

TRIO.

Maux. Oh! how easy is a woman;
How deluding are you men;
Oh! how rare to find a true man,
Not so oft as one in ten!

Moore. Oh! how charming is a woman,
Form'd to captivate us men;
Yet so eager to subdue man,
For each one she covets ten.

Marg. Let's reward them as they treat us;
Women prove sincere as men;
But, if they deceive and cheat us,
Let us e'en cheat them again.

All. Let's reward them as they treat us, &c.

Enter GUBBINS.

Gub. Now, now, or never, save us, valiant Moore!

The Dragon's coming—Don't you hear him roar?

Moore. Why, let him roar his heart out, 'tis no matter:

Stand clear, my friends; this is no time to chatter.

MISS GRANTAM

ACT I. SCENE I.—A Lodging.

Enter YOUNG WILDING and PAPILLION.

Young W. And I am now, Papillion, perfectly equipped?

Pap. Personne mieux. Nobody better.

Young W. My figure?

Pap. Fait à peindre.

Young W. My air?

Pap. Libre.

Young W. My address?

Pap. Parisienne.

Young W. My hat sits easily under my arm; not like the draggled tail of my tattered academical habit.

Pap. Ah! bien autre chose.

Young W. Why, then adieu, Alma Mater! bien venue, la ville de Londres! farewell to the schools, and welcome the theatres; presidents, proctors, and short commons with long graces, must now give place to plays, bagnios, and long tavern bills, with no graces at all.

Pap. Ah! bravo, bravo!

Young W. How long have you left Paris, Papillion?

Pap. Twelve, thirteen year.

Young W. I can't compliment you upon your progress in English.

Pap. The accent is difficile.

Young W. But here you are at home.

Pap. C'est vrai.

Young W. No stranger to fashionable places.

Pap. O, faite!

Young W. Acquainted with the fashionable figures of both sexes.

Pap. Sans doute.

Young W. Well, then, open your lecture; and d'ye hear, Papillion? as you have the honour to be promoted from the mortifying condition of an humble valet to the important charge of a private tutor, let us discard all distance between us. See me ready to slake my thirst at your fountain of knowledge, my Magnus Apollo.

Pap. Here, then, I disclose my Helicon to my poetical pupil.

Young W. Hey, Papillion!

Pap. Sir?

Young W. What is this? Why you speak English?

Pap. Without doubt.

Young W. But like a native!

Pap. To be sure.

Young W. And what am I to conclude from all [this?

Pap. But, to be better understood, I believe it will be necessary to give you a short sketch of the principal incidents of my life.

Young W. Pr'ythee, do.

Pap. Why, then, you are to know, sir, that my former situation has been rather above my present condition, having once sustained the dignity of sub-preceptor to one of those cheap rural academies with which our county of York is so plentifully stocked.

Young W. Why this disguise? Why renounce your country?

Pap. There, sir, you make a little mistake: it was my country that renounced me.

Young W. Explain.

Pap. In an instant: upon quitting the school, and first coming to town, I got recommended to the compiler of the Monthly Review.

Young W. What, an author, too?

Pap. Oh! a voluminous one! The whole region of the belles lettres fell under my inspection; physic, divinity, and the mathematics, my mistress managed herself. There, sir, like another Aristarch, I dealt out fame and damnation at pleasure. In obedience to the caprice and commands of my master, I have condemned books I never read; and applauded the fidelity of a translation, without understanding one syllable of the original. But it would not answer. Notwithstanding what we say, people will judge for themselves: our work hung upon hand; and all I could get from the publisher was four shillings a-week and my small beer. Poor pittance!

Young W. Poor, indeed.

Pap. Oh! half-starved me.

Young W. What was your next change?

Pap. I was mightily puzzled to choose, when chance threw an old friend in my way, that quite retrieved my affairs.

Young W. Pray, who might he be?

Pap. A little bit of a Swiss genius, who had been French usher with me at the same school in the country. I opened my melancholy story to him over threepenny-worth of beef-à-la-mode, in a cellar in St. Ann's. My little foreign friend pursed up his lanthorn jaws, and, with a shrug of contempt, "Ah! maitre Jean, vous n'avez pas la politique; you have no finesse; to thrive here, you must study the folly of your own country." "How, monsieur?" "Taisez vous; keep-a your tongue. Autrefois, I teach you speak French, now I teach-a you to forget English. Go vid me to my logement, I vil give you proper dress; den go present yourself to de same hotels, de very same house, you vil find all de doors dat vere shut in your face as footman Anglois, vil fly open demselves to a French valet-de-chambre."

Young W. Well, Papillion.

Pap. Gad! sir, I thought it was but an honest artifice, so I determined to follow my friend's ad-

Young W. Did it succeed? [vice.

Pap. Better than expectation. My tawny face, long queue, and broken English, was a passe partout. Besides, when I am out of place, this disguise procures me many resources.

Young W. As how?

Pap. Why, at a pinch, sir, I am either a teacher of tongues, a friseur, a dentist, or a dancing-master; these, sir, are hereditary professions to Frenchmen. But now, sir, to the point: as you were pleased to be so candid with me, I was determined to have no reserve with you. You have studied books, I have studied men: you want advice, and I have some at your service.

Young W. Well, I'll be your customer. But let us sally. Where do we open?

Pap. Let us see—one o'clock—it is a fine day; the Mall will be crowded.

Young W. Allons!

Pap. But I would, sir, crave a moment's audience, upon a subject that may prove very material

Young W. Proceed. [to you.

Pap. You will pardon my presumption; but you have, my good master, one little foible that I could wish you to correct.

Young W. What is it? [well.

Pap. And yet it is a pity, too; you do it so very Young W. Pr'ythee, be plain.

Pap. You have, sir, a lively imagination, with a most happy turn for invention.

Young W. Well!

Pap. But, now and then, in your narratives, you are hurried, by a flow of spirits, to border upon the improbable; a little given to the marvellous.

Young W. I understand you; what, I am somewhat subject to lying?

Pap. Oh! pardon me, sir, I don't say that; no, no; only a little apt to embellish, that's all. To be sure, it is a fine gift, that there is no disputing; but men in general are so stupid, so rigorously attached to matter of fact—and, yet, this talent of your's is the very soul and spirit of poetry; and why it should not be the same in prose, I can't for my life determine.

Young W. You would advise me, then, not to be quite so poetical in prose?

Pap. Why, sir, if you would descend a little to the grovelling comprehension of the million, I think it would be as well.

Young W. I believe you are right. But we shall be late. D'ye hear me, Papillion? if at any time you find me too poetical, give me a hint; your advice sha'n't be thrown away. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—The Park.

Enter MISS GRANTAM, MISS GODFREY, and JOHN.

Miss Gr. John, let the chariot go round to Spring-gardens. [Exit John.] My dear Miss Godfrey, what trouble I have had to get you out. Why, child, you are as tedious as a long mourning. Do you know, now, that of all places of public rendezvous, I honour the park? Forty thousand million of times preferable to the playhouse! Don't you think so, my dear?

Miss Go. They are both well in their way.

Miss Gr. Way! why the purpose of both is the same, to meet company, isn't it? What, d'ye think I go there for the plays, or come here for the trees? ha, ha! Well, that is well enough. But, oh, gemini! I beg a million of pardons. You are a prude, and have no relish for the little innocent liberties with which a fine woman may indulge herself in public.

Miss Go. Liberties in public!

Miss Gr. Yes, child; such as encoring a song at an opera, interrupting a play in a critical scene of distress, hallooing to a pretty fellow across the Mall, as loud as if you were calling a coach. Why, do you know, now, my dear, that by a lucky stroke in dress, and a few high airs of my own making, I have had the good fortune to be gazed at and followed by as great a crowd, on a Sunday, as if I were the Tripoli ambassador.

Miss Go. The good fortune, ma'am? Surely, the wish of every decent woman is to be unnoticed in public.

Miss Gr. Decent! Oh! my dear queer creature, what a phrase have you found out for a woman of fashion! Decency is, child, a mere bourgeois, plebeian quality, and fit only for those who pay court to the world, and not for us to whom the world pays court. Upon my word, you must enlarge your ideas: you are a fine girl, and we must not have you lost; I'll undertake you myself. But as I was saying—Pray, my dear, what was I saying?

Miss Go. I profess I don't recollect.

Miss Gr. Hey!—Oh, ah! the Park. One great reason for my loving the Park is, that one has so many opportunities of creating connexions.

Miss Go. Ma'am!

Miss Gr. Nay, don't look grave. Why, do you know, that all my male friendships are formed in this place?

Miss Go. It is an odd spot: but you must pardon me if I doubt the possibility.

Miss Gr. Oh! I will convince you in a moment; for here seems to be coming a good smart figure that I don't recollect. I will throw out a lure. (Drops her handkerchief.)

Miss Go. Nay, for heaven's sake!

Miss Gr. I am determined, child: that is—

Miss Go. You will excuse my withdrawing.

Miss Gr. Oh! please yourself, my dear.

[Exit Miss Go.]

Enter YOUNG WILDING with PAPILLION.

Young W. Your ladyship's handkerchief, ma'am.

Miss Gr. I am, sir, concerned at the trouble—

Young W. A most happy incident for me, madam; as chance has given me an honour in one lucky minute, that the most diligent attention has not been able to procure for me in the whole tedious round of a revolving year.

Miss Gr. Is this meant to me, sir?

Young W. To whom else, madam? Surely, you must have marked my respectful assiduity, my uninterrupted attendance; to plays, operas, balls, routs, and ridottos, I have pursued you like your shadow; I have besieged your door for a glimpse of your exit and entrance, like a distressed creditor, who has no arms against privilege but perseverance.

Pap. So, now he is in for it; stop him who can. (Aside.)

Young W. In short, madam, ever since I quitted America, which I take now to be about a year, I have as faithfully guarded the live-long night, your ladyship's portal, as a sentinel the powder-magazine in a fortified city.

Pap. Quitted America! well pulled. (Aside.)

Miss Gr. You have served in America, then?

Young W. Full four years, ma'am; and, during that whole time, not a single action of consequence, but I had an opportunity to signalize myself; and I think I may, without vanity affirm, I did not miss the occasion. You have heard of Quebec, I presume?

Pap. What the deuce is he driving at now? (Aside.)

Young W. The project to surprise that place was thought a happy expedient, and the first mounting the breach a gallant exploit. There, indeed, the whole army did me justice.

Miss Gr. I have heard the honour of that conquest attributed to another name.

Young W. The mere taking the town, ma'am; but that's a trifle: sieges, now-a-days, are reduced to certainties; it is amazing how minutely exact we, who know the business, are at calculation; for instance now, we will suppose the commander-in-chief, addressing himself to me, were to say: "Colonel, I want to reduce that fortress; what will be the expense?" "Why, please your highness, the reduction of that fortress will cost you one thousand and two lives, sixty-nine legs, ditto arms, fourscore fractures, with about twenty dozen of flesh wounds."

Miss Gr. And you shall be near the mark?

Young W. To an odd joint, ma'am. But, madam, it is not to the French people alone that my feats are confined; Cherokees, Catabaws, with all the Aws and Ees of the continent, have felt the force of my arms.

Pap. This is too much, sir. (Aside to Young W.)

Young W. Hands off! Nor am I less adroit at a treaty, madam, than terrible in battle.

Miss Gr. And so young!

Young W. This gentleman, though a Frenchman and an enemy, I had the fortune to deliver from the Mohawks, whose prisoner he had been for nine years. He gives a most entertaining account of their laws and customs: he shall present you with the wampum-belt, and a scalping knife. Will you permit him, madam, just to give you a taste of the military dance, with a short specimen of their war-whoop?

Pap. For heaven's sake! (Aside to Young W.)

Miss Gr. The place is too public.

Young W. In short, madam, after having gathered as many laurels abroad as would garnish a Gothic cathedral at Christmas, I returned to reap the harvest of the well-fought field. Here it was my good fortune to encounter you: then was the victor vanquished; what the enemy could never accomplish, your eyes in an instant achieved: prouder to serve here than commander-in-chief elsewhere; and more glorious in wearing your chains, than in triumphing over the vanquished world.

Miss Gr. I have got here a most heroical lover; but I see Sir James Elliot coming, and must dismiss him. (Aside.) Well, sir, I accept the tender of your passion, and may find a time to renew our acquaintance; at present, it is necessary we should separate.

Young W. "Slave to your will, I live but to obey you." But may I be indulged with the knowledge of your residence?

Miss Gr. Sir?

Young W. Your place of abode.

Miss Gr. Oh! sir, you can't want to be acquainted with that; you have a whole year stood sentinel at my ladyship's portal.

Young W. Madam, I—I—I—

Miss Gr. Oh! sir, your servant. Ha, ha, ha! What, you are caught! Ha, ha, ha! Well, he has a most intrepid assurance. Adieu, my Mars. Ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

Pap. That last was an unlucky question, sir.

Young W. A little mal-a-propos I must confess.

Pap. A man should have a good memory who deals much in this poetical prose.

Young W. Pho! I'll soon re-establish my credit. But I must know who this girl is. Harkye! Papillion, could not you contrive to pump out of her footman,—I see there he stands,—the name of his mistress?

Pap. I will try.

[Exit.]

(Wilding retires up the stage.)

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT and WILLIAM.

Sir J. Music and an entertainment?

Wil. Yes, sir.

Sir J. Last night, upon the water?

Wil. Upon the water, last night.

Sir J. Who gave it?

Wil. That, sir, I can't say.

[Exit.]

Enter PAPILLION.

Young W. (Coming forward.) Sir James Elliot, your most devoted. [to town.]

Sir J. Ah, my dear Wilding! you are welcome

Young W. You will pardon my impatience; I interrupted you; you seemed upon an interesting subject.

Sir J. Oh! an affair of gallantry.

Young W. Of what kind?

Sir J. A young lady regaled last night by her lover, on the Thames.

Young W. As how?

Sir J. A band of music in boats.

Young W. Were they good performers?

Sir J. The best. Then conducted to Marble-hall, where she found a magnificent collation.

Young W. Well ordered?

Sir J. With elegance. After supper, a ball; and to conclude the night, a fire-work.

Young W. Was the last well designed?

Sir J. Superb.

Young W. And happily executed?

Sir J. Not a single faux-pas.

Young W. And you don't know who gave it?

Sir J. I can't even guess.

Young W. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir J. Why do you laugh?

Young W. Ha, ha, ha! It was I.

Sir J. You?

Pap. You, sir?

Young W. Moi—me.

Pap. So, so, so! he is entered again. (Aside.)

Sir J. Why, you are fortunate to find a mistress in so short a space of time.

Young W. Short! why, man, I have been in London these six weeks.

Pap. O lord! O lord! (Aside.)

Young W. It is true, not daring to encounter my father, I have rarely ventured out but at nights. But since the story is got abroad, I will, my dear friend, treat you with all the particulars.

Sir J. I shall hear it with pleasure.—This is a lucky adventure: but he must not know he is my rival. (Aside.)

Young W. Why, sir, between six and seven, my goddess embarked at the Temple-stairs, in one of the companies' barges, gilt and hung with damask, expressly for the occasion.

Pap. Mercy on us! (Aside.)

Young W. At the cabin-door she was accosted by a beautiful boy, who, in the garb of a Cupid, paid her some compliments in verse of my own composing: the conceits were pretty; allusions to Venus and the sea—the lady and the Thames—no great matter; but, however, well-timed, and what was better, well taken.

Sir J. Doubtless.

Pap. At what a rate he runs! (Aside.)

Young W. As soon as we had gained the centre of the river, two boats full of trumpets, French horns, and other martial music, struck up their sprightly strains from the Surrey side, which were echoed by a suitable number of lutes, flutes, and hautboys, from the opposite shore. In this state, the oars keeping time, we majestically sailed along, till the arches of the new bridge gave a pause, and an opportunity for an elegant dessert in Dresden china, by Robinson. Here the repast closed, with a few favourite airs from Eliza, Tenducci, and the Mattei.

Pap. Mercy on us! (Aside.)

Young W. Opposite Lambeth, I had prepared a naval engagement, in which Boscawen's victory over the French was repeated: the action was conducted by one of the commanders on that expedition, and not a single incident omitted.

Sir J. Surely, you exaggerate a little.

Pap. Yes, yes; this battle will sink him. (Aside.)

Young W. True to the letter, upon my honour! I sha'n't trouble you with a repetition of our collation, ball, feu-d'artifice, with the thousand little incidental amusements that chance or design produced; it is enough to know, that all that could flatter the senses, fire the imagination, or gratify the expectation, was there produced in a lavish abundance.

Sir J. The sacrifice was, I presume, grateful to your deity.

Young W. Upon that subject you must pardon my silence.

Pap. Modest creature! (Aside.)

Sir J. I wish you joy of your success. For the present you will excuse me.

Young W. Nay, but stay and hear the conclusion.

Sir J. For that I shall seize another occasion. [Exit.]

Pap. Nobly performed, sir.

Young W. Yes, I think happily hit off.

Pap. May I take the liberty to offer one question?

Young W. Freely.

Pap. Pray, sir, are you often visited with these waking dreams?

Young W. Dreams! what dost mean by dreams?

Pap. These ornamental reveries, these frolics of fancy, which, in the judgment of the vulgar, would be deemed absolute flams.

Young W. Why, Papillion, you have but a poor, narrow, circumscribed genius.

Pap. I must own, sir, I have not sublimity sufficient to relish the full fire of your Pindaric muse.

Young W. No; a plebeian soul! But I will animate thy clay; mark my example, follow my steps, and in time, thou mayest rival thy master.

Pap. Never, never, sir. I have no talents to fight battles without blows, and give feasts that don't cost me a farthing. Besides, sir, to what purpose are all these embellishments? Why tell the lady you have been in London a year?

Young W. The better to plead the length, and consequently the strength of my passion.

Pap. But why, sir, a soldier?

Young W. How little thou knowest of the sex! What, I suppose thou wouldst have me attack them in mood and figure, by a pedantic classical quotation, or a pompous parade of jargon from the schools? What, dost think that women are to be got like degrees?

Pap. Nay, sir—

Young W. No, no; the man of war is their man; they must be taken like towns, by lines of approach, counterscarps, angles, trenches, cohornes, and covert-ways; then enter sword in hand, pell-mell. Oh! how they melt at the Gothic names of General Swappinback, Count Rousomousky, Prince Montecuculi, and Marshal Fustinburgh! Men may say what they will of their Ovid, their Petrarch, and their Waller, but I'll undertake to do more business by the single aid of the London Gazette, than by all the sighing, dying, crying crotchets, that the whole race of rhymers ever produced.

Pap. Very well, sir; this is all very lively: but remember the travelling pitcher. If you don't one time or other, under favour, lie yourself into some confounded scrape, I will be content to be hanged.

Young W. Do you think so, Papillion? And whenever that happens, if I don't lie myself out of it again, why then I will be content to be crucified. And so, along after the lady. (Stops short, going out.) Zounds! here comes my father! I must fly. Watch him, Papillion, and bring me word to the Cardigan. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

YOUNG WILDING and PAPILLION rising from table.

Young W. Gad! I had like to have run into the old gentleman's mouth.

Pap. It is pretty near the same thing; for I saw him join Sir James Elliot, so your arrival is no longer a secret.

Young W. Well, then, I must lose my pleasure, and you your preferment; I must submit to the dull decency of a sober family, and you to the customary duties of brushing and powdering. But I was so fluttered at meeting my father, that I forgot the fair; pr'ythee, who is she?

Pap. There were two.

Young W. That I saw.

Pap. From her footman I learnt her name was Godfrey.

Young W. And her fortune?

Pap. Immense.

Young W. Single, I hope?

Pap. Certainly.

Young W. Then will I have her.

Pap. What, whether she will or no?

Young W. Yes.

Pap. How will you manage that?

Young W. By making it impossible for her to marry any one else.

Pap. I don't understand you, sir.

Young W. Oh! I shall only have recourse to that talent you so mightily admire. You will see, by the circulation of a few anecdotes, how soon I will get rid of my rivals.

Pap. At the expense of the lady's reputation, perhaps.

Young W. That will be as it happens.

Pap. And have you no qualms, sir?

Young W. Why, where's the injury?

Pap. No injury to ruin her fame?

Young W. I will restore it to her again.

Pap. How?

Young W. Turn tinker, and mend it myself.

Pap. Which way?

Young W. The old way; solder it by marriage; that, you know, is the modern salve for every sore.

Enter Waiter.

Wait. An elderly gentleman to inquire for Mr. Wilding.

Young W. For me! what sort of a being is it?

Wait. Being, sir!

Young W. Ay; how is he dressed?

Wait. In a tie-wig and a snuff-coloured coat.

Pap. Zooks! sir, it is your father.

Young W. Shew him up. [Exit Waiter.]

Pap. And what must I do?

Young W. Recover your broken English, but preserve your rank; I have a reason for it.

Enter WILDING.

Wild. Your servant, sir; you are welcome to town.

Young W. You have just prevented me, sir—I was preparing to pay my duty to you.

Wild. If you thought it a duty, you should, I think, have sooner discharged it.

Young W. Sir!

Wild. Was it quite so decent, Jack, to be six weeks in town, and conceal yourself only from me?

Young W. Six weeks! I have scarcely been six hours.

Wild. Come, come; I am better informed.

Young W. Indeed, sir, you are imposed upon. This gentleman, (who first give me leave to have the honour of introducing to you,) this, sir, is the Marquis de Chateau Briant, of an ancient house in Britany; who, travelling through England, chose to make Oxford, for some time, the place of his residence, where I had the happiness of his acquaintance.

Wild. Does he speak English?

Young W. Not fluently, but understands it perfectly.

Pap. Pray, sir,—(Aside to Young W.)

Wild. Any services, sir, that I can render you here, you may readily command.

Pap. Beaucoup d'honneur.

Young W. This gentleman, I say, sir, whose quality and country are sufficient securities for his veracity, will assure you that yesterday we left Oxford together.

Wild. Indeed!

Pap. C'est vrai.

Wild. This is amazing! I was, at the same time, informed of another circumstance too, that, I confess, made me a little uneasy, as it interfered with a favourite scheme of my own.

Young W. What could that be, pray, sir?

Wild. That you had conceived a violent affection for a fair lady.

Young W. Sir!

Wild. And had given her very gallant and very expensive proofs of your passion.

Young W. Me, sir!

Wild. Particularly last night; music, collations, ball, and fire-works.

Young W. Monsieur le Marquis! And, pray, sir, who could tell you all this?

Wild. An old friend of your's.

Young W. His name, if you please.

Wild. Sir James Elliot.

Young W. Yes; I thought he was the man.

Wild. Your reason.

Young W. Why, sir, though Sir James Elliot has a great many good qualities, and is, upon the whole, a valuable man, yet he has one fault which has long determined me to drop his acquaintance.

Wild. What may that be?

Young W. Why you can't, sir, be a stranger to his prodigious skill in the traveller's talent.

Wild. How!

Young W. Oh! notorious to a proverb. His friends, who are tender of his fame, gloss over his foible, by calling him an agreeable novelist; and so he is, with a vengeance. Why, he will tell you more lies in an hour, than all the circulating libraries, put together, will publish in a year.

Wild. Indeed!

Young W. Oh! he is the modern Mandeville; at Oxford, he was always distinguished by the facetious appellation of the Bouncer.

Wild. Amazing!

Young W. Lord! sir, he is so well understood in his own county, that, at the last Hereford assize, a cause as clear as the sun, was absolutely thrown away by his being merely mentioned as a witness.

Wild. A strange turn.

Young W. Unaccountable. But there I think they went a little too far; for if it had come to an oath, I don't think he would have bounced neither; but in common occurrences there is no repeating after him. Indeed, my great reason for dropping him was, that my credit began to be a little suspected, too.

Pap. Poor gentleman! (Aside.)

Wild. Why, I never heard this of him.

Young W. That may be; but can there be a stronger proof of his practice than the flam he has been telling you, of fire-works, and the lord knows what. And I dare swear, sir, he was very fluent and florid in his description.

Wild. Extremely.

Young W. Yes, that is just his way; and not a syllable of truth from the beginning to the ending, eh, marquis?

Pap. Oh! dat is all a fiction upon mine honour.

Wild. Clearly. I really can't help pitying the poor man. I have heard of people, who, by long habit, became a kind of constitutional liars.

Young W. Your observation is just; that is exactly his case.

Pap. I'm sure it is your's. (Aside.)

Wild. Well, sir, I suppose I shall see you this evening?

Young W. The marquis has an appointment with some of his countrymen, which I have promised to attend: besides, sir, as he is an entire stranger in town, he may want my little services.

Wild. Where can I see you in about an hour? I have a short visit to make, in which you are deeply concerned.

Young W. I shall attend your commands; but where?

Wild. Why here. Marquis, I am your obedient servant.

Pap. Votre serviteur très humble. [Exit Wild.]

Young W. So, Papillion; that difficulty is despatched. I think I am even with Sir James for his tattling.

Pap. Most ingeniously managed: but are not you afraid of the consequence?

Young W. I do not comprehend you.

Pap. A future explanation between the parties.

Young W. That may embarrass: but the day is distant. I warrant I will bring myself off.

Pap. It is in vain for me to advise.

Young W. Why, to say truth, I do begin to find my system attended with danger. Give me your hand, Papillion, I will reform.

Pap. Ah, sir!

Young W. I positively will; why this practice may in time destroy my credit.

Pap. That is pretty well done already. (Aside.) Ay, think of that, sir.

Young W. Well, if I don't turn out the merest dull matter-of-fact fellow—but, Papillion, I must scribble a billet to my new flame. I think her name is—

Pap. Godfrey; her father was an Indian governor and left her all his wealth; she lives near Miss Grantam, by Grosvenor Square.

Young W. A governor! oh, oh! Bushels of rупees, and pecks of pagodas, I reckon. Well, I long to be rummaging. But the old gentlemen will soon return; I will hasten to finish my letter. But, Papillion, what could my father mean by a visit in which I am deeply concerned?

Pap. I can't guess.

Young W. I shall know presently. To Miss Godfrey, formerly of Calcutta, now residing in Grosvenor Square. Papillion, I won't tell her a word of a lie.

Pap. You won't, sir?

Young W. No; it would be ungenerous to deceive a lady. No; I will be open, candid, and sincere.

Pap. And if you be, it will be the first time.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in Miss Grantam's house.

Enter MISS GRANTAM and MISS GODFREY.

Miss Go. And you really like this gallant spark?

Miss Gr. Prodigiously. Oh! I'm quite in love with his assurance. I wonder who he is; he can't have been long in town; a young fellow of his easy impudence must have soon made his way to the best of company.

Miss Go. By way of amusement, he may prove no disagreeable acquaintance; but you can't, surely, have any serious designs upon him.

Miss Gr. Indeed but I have.

Miss Go. And poor Sir James Elliot is to be discarded at once?

Miss Gr. Oh! no.

Miss Go. What is your intention in regard to him?

Miss Gr. Hey! I can't tell you. Perhaps, if I don't like this new man better, I may marry him.

Miss Go. Thou art a strange, giddy girl.

Miss Gr. Quite the reverse; a perfect pattern of prudence. Why, would you have me less careful of my person than my purse?

Miss Go. My dear!

Miss Gr. Why, I say, child, my fortune being in money, I have some in India bonds, some in the bank, some on this loan, some on the other; so that if one fund fail, I have a sure resource in the rest.

Miss Go. Very true.

Miss Gr. Well, my dear, just so I manage my love affairs; if I should not like this man; if he should not like me; if we should quarrel; if, if—or, in short, if any of the ifs should happen, which you know break engagements every day, why, by this means, I shall never be at a loss.

Enter JOHN.

John. A letter to you, madam. (To Miss G.) Sir James Elliot to wait on your ladyship. (To Miss Gr.) [Exit.]

Miss Gr. Lord! I hope he won't stay long here. He comes, and seems entirely wrapped up in the dismal; what can be the matter now?

Miss Go. You'll excuse me?

[Exit.]

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT.

Sir J. In passing by your door, I took the liberty, madam, of inquiring after your health.

Miss Gr. Very obliging. I hope, sir, you received a favourable account.

Sir J. I did not know but you might have caught cold last night.

Miss Gr. Cold! why, sir, I hope I did not sleep with my chamber window open.

Sir J. Madam!

Miss Gr. Sir!

Sir J. No, madam; but it was rather hazardous to stay so late upon the water.

Miss Gr. Upon the water!

Sir J. Not but the variety of amusements, it must be owned, was a sufficient temptation.

Miss Gr. What can he be driving at now? (Aside.)

Sir J. And pray, madam, what think you of young Wilding? Is not he a gay, agreeable, sprightly—

Miss Gr. I never give my opinion of people I don't know.

Sir J. You don't know him?

Miss Gr. No.

Sir J. And his father I did not meet at your door?

Miss Gr. Most likely you did.

Sir J. I am glad you own that, however; but, for the son, you never—

Miss Gr. Set eyes upon him.

Sir J. Really?

Miss Gr. Really.

Sir J. Finely supported. Now, madam, do you know that one of us is just going to make a very ridiculous figure?

Miss Gr. Sir, I never had the least doubt of your talents for excelling in that way.

Sir J. Madam, you do me honour; but it does not happen to fall to my lot upon this occasion, however.

Miss Gr. And that is a wonder. What, then, I am to be the fool of the comedy, I suppose.

Sir J. Admirably rallied; but I shall dash the spirit of that triumphant laugh.

Miss Gr. I dare the attack. Come on, sir.

Sir J. Know then, and blush, if you be not as lost to shame as dead to decency, that I am no stranger to all last night's transactions.

Miss Gr. Indeed!

Sir J. From your first entering the barge at the Temple, to your last landing at Whitehall.

Miss Gr. Surprising!

Sir J. Cupids, collations, feasts, fire-works, all have reached me.

Miss Gr. Why you deal in magic.

Sir J. My intelligence is as natural as it is infallible.

Miss Gr. May I be indulged with the name of your informer?

Sir J. Freely, madam. Only the very individual spark, to whose folly you were indebted for this gallant profusion.

Miss Gr. But his name?

Sir J. Young Wilding.

Miss Gr. You had this story from him?

Sir J. I had.

Miss Gr. From Wilding! That is amazing.

Sir J. Oh, ho! what, you are confounded at last! and no evasion, no subterfuge, no—

Miss Gr. Lookye, Sir James; what you can mean by this strange story, and very extraordinary behaviour, it is impossible for me to conceive; but if it be meant as an artifice to palliate your infidelity to me, less pains would have answered your purpose.

Sir J. Oh! madam, I know you are provided.

Miss Gr. Matchless insolence! as you can't expect that I should be prodigiously pleased with the subject of this visit, you won't be surprised at my wishing it as short as possible.

Sir J. I don't wonder you feel pain at my presence; but you may rest secure you will have no interruption from me; and I really think it would be a pity to part two people so exactly formed for each other. Your ladyship's servant. (Going.) But, madam, though your sex secures you from any farther resentment, yet the present object of your favour may have something to fear. [Exit.]

Miss Gr. Very well. To what a pretty condition I must have been reduced, if my hopes had rested upon one lover! [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter WILDING, YOUNG WILDING, and PAPILION.

Wild. There, marquis, you must pardon me; for though Paris may be more compact, yet surely London covers a much greater quantity. Oh! Jack, look at that corner house; how d'ye like it?

Young W. Very well; but I don't see anything extraordinary.

Wild. I wish, though, you were the master of what it contains.

Young W. What may that be, sir?

Wild. The mistress, you rogue you:—a fine girl and an immense fortune; ay, and a prudent, sensible wench into the bargain.

Young W. Time enough yet, sir.

Wild. I don't see that; you are, lad, the last of our race, and I should be glad to see some probability of its continuance.

Young W. Suppose, sir, you were to repeat your endeavours; you have cordially my consent.

Wild. No; rather too late in life for that experiment.

Young W. Why, sir, would you recommend a condition to me, that you disapprove of yourself?

Wild. Why, sirrah, I have done my duty to the public and my family, by producing you. Now, sir, it is incumbent on you to discharge your debt.

Young W. In the college cant, I shall beg leave to tick a little longer.

Wild. Why, then, to be serious, son, this is the very business I wanted to talk with you about. In a word, I wish you married; and, by providing the lady of that mansion for the purpose, I have proved myself both a father and a friend.

Young W. Far be it from me to question your care; yet some preparation for so important a change—

Wild. Oh! I will allow you a week.

Young W. A little more knowledge of the world.

Wild. That you may study at leisure.

Young W. Now all Europe is in arms, my design was to serve my country abroad.

Wild. You will be full as useful to it by recruiting her subjects at home.

Young W. You are then resolved?

Wild. Fixed.

Young W. Positively?

Wild. Peremptorily.

Young W. No prayers—

Wild. Can move me.

Young W. How the deuce shall I get out of this toil? (Aside.) But suppose, sir, there should be an insurmountable objection?

Wild. Oh! leave the reconciling that to me; I am an excellent casuist.

Young W. But I say, sir, if it should be impossible to obey your commands?

Wild. Impossible! I don't understand you.

Young W. Oh! sir,—But on my knees first let me crave your pardon. (Kneels.)

Wild. Pardon! for what?

Young W. I fear I have lost all title to your future favour.

Wild. Which way?

Young W. I have done a deed,—

Wild. Let's hear it.

Young W. At Abingdon, in the county of Berks.

Wild. Well?

Young W. I am—

Wild. What?

Young W. Already married!

Wild. Married!

Pap. Married!

Young W. Married.

Wild. And without my consent?

Young W. Compelled; fatally forced. Oh! sir, did you but know all the circumstances of my sad, sad story, your rage would soon convert itself into pity.

Wild. What an unlucky event! But rise, and let me hear it all.

Young W. (Rising.) The shame and confusion I now feel, renders that task, at present, impossible; I must, therefore, rely for the relation on the good offices of this faithful friend.

Pap. Me, sir! I never heard one word of the matter. (Aside to Young W.) [ticulars.

Wild. Come, marquis, favour me with the par-

Pap. Upon my vord, sire, dis affair has so shock me, dat I am almost as incapable to tell de tale as your son. (To Young W.) Dry-a your tears. What can I say, sir? (Aside to him.)

Young W. Anything. Oh! (Seems to weep.)

Pap. You see, sare,—

Wild. Your kind concern at the misfortunes of my family calls for the most grateful acknowledgment.

Pap. Dis is great misfortune, sans doute.

Wild. But if you, a stranger, are thus affected, what must a father feel?

Pap. Oh! beaucoup; a great deal more.

Wild. But since the evil is without a remedy, let us know the worst at once. Well, sir at Abingdon—

Pap. Yes, at Abingdon.

Wild. In the county of Berks.

Pap. Dat is right, in the county of Berks.

Young W. Oh! oh!

Wild. Ah! Jack, Jack; are all my hopes then— Though I dread to ask, yet it must be known; who is the girl, pray, sir?

Pap. De girl, sare,—(Aside to Young W.)—Who shall I say?

Young W. Anybody. (Aside to Pap.)

Pap. For de girl, I can't say, upon my vord.

Wild. Her condition?

Pap. Pas grande condition; dat is to be sure. But dere is no help. (Aside to Young W.) Sir, I am quite a-ground.

Wild. Yes, I read my shame in his reserve; some artful hussy.

Pap. Dat may be. Vat you call hussy?

Wild. Or, perhaps, some common creature. But I'm prepared to hear the worst.

Pap. Have you no mercy? (Aside to Young W.)

Young W. I'll step to your relief, sir. (To Pap.)

Pap. Oh, lord! a happy deliverance. (Aside.)

Young W. Though it is almost death for me to speak, yet it would be infamous to let the reputation of the lady suffer by my silence. She is, sir, of an ancient house and unblemished character.

Wild. That is something.

Young W. And though her fortune may not be equal to the warm wishes of a fond father, yet—

Wild. Her name?

Young W. Miss Lydia Sybthorpe.

Wild. Sybthorpe—I never heard of the name. But proceed.

Young W. The latter end of last long vacation,

I went with Sir James Elliot to pass a few days at a new purchase of his, near Abingdon. There, at an assembly, it was my chance to meet and dance with this lady.

Wild. Is she handsome?

Young W. Oh! sir, more beautiful—

Wild. Nay, no raptures; but go on.

Young W. But to her beauty she adds politeness, affability, and discretion; unless she forfeited that character by fixing her affection on me.

Wild. Modestly observed.

Young W. I was deterred from a public declaration of my passion, dreading the scantiness of her fortune would prove an objection to you. Some private interviews she permitted.

Wild. Was that so decent? But, love and prudence, madness and reason!

Young W. One fatal evening, (the twentieth of September, if I mistake not,) we were in a retired room innocently exchanging mutual vows, when her father, whom we expected to sup abroad, came suddenly upon us. I had just time to conceal myself in a closet.

Wild. What, unobserved by him?

Young W. Entirely. But, as my ill stars would have it, a cat, of whom my wife is vastly fond, had a few days before lodged a litter of kittens in the same place, I unhappily trod upon one of the brood, which so provoked the implacable mother, that she flew at me with the fury of a tiger.

Pap. I shall hate a cat as long as I live.

Young W. The noise roused the old gentleman's attention; he opened the door, and there discovered your son.

Pap. Unlucky!

Young W. I rushed to the door; but, fatally, my foot slipped at the top of the stairs, and down I came tumbling to the bottom. The pistol in my hand went off by accident; this alarmed her three brothers in the parlour, who, with all their servants, rushed with united force upon me.

Wild. And, so surprised you.

Young W. No, sir; with my sword, I, for some time, made a gallant defence, and should have inevitably escaped; but, a raw-boned, over-grown, clumsy cook-wench struck at my sword with a kitchen-poker, broke it in two, and compelled me to surrender at discretion; the consequence of which is obvious enough.

Wild. Natural. The lady's reputation, your condition, her beauty, your love, all combined to make marriage an unavoidable measure.

Young W. May I hope, then, you rather think me unfortunate than culpable?

Wild. Why, your situation is a sufficient excuse; all I blame you for is, your keeping it a secret from me. With Miss Grantam, I shall make an awkward figure; but the best apology is the truth. I'll hasten and explain it to her all. Oh! Jack, Jack! this is a mortifying business.

Young W. Most melancholy. [Exit Wild.

Pap. I am amazed, sir, that you have so carefully concealed this transaction from me.

Young W. Heyday! what, do you believe it, too?

Pap. Believe it! why, is not the story of the marriage true?

Young W. Not a syllable.

Pap. And the cat, and the pistol, and the poker?

Young W. All invention. And were you really taken in?

Pap. Lord, sir! how was it possible to avoid it? Mercy on us! what a collection of circumstances have you crowded together!

Young W. Genius! the mere effects of genius, Papillion. But to deceive you, who so thoroughly know me!

Pap. But, to prevent that for the future, could you not give your humble servant a hint when you are just bent upon bouncing? Besides, sir, if you recollect your fixed resolution to reform—

Young W. Ay; as to matter of fancy, the mere sport and frolic of invention: but, in case of necessity,—why, Miss Godfrey was at stake, and I was forced to use all my finesse.

Enter WILLIAM and JOHN.

Both Ser. A letter, sir. [Exit.

Pap. (Aside.) There are two things in my conscience my master will never want,—a prompt lie, and a ready excuse for telling it.

Young W. Hum! business begins to thicken upon us: a challenge from Sir James Elliot, and a rendezvous from the pretty Miss Godfrey. They shall both be observed, but in their order; therefore, the lady first. Let me see; I have not been twenty hours in town, and I have already got a challenge, a mistress, and a wife: now, if I can but get engaged in a chancery suit, I shall have my hands pretty full of employment. Come, Papillion, we have no time to idle. [Exit.

SCENE IV.—A Room, with table, pen, ink, paper, and chairs.

Enter JOHN, conducting in WILDING.

John. My lady, sir, will be at home immediately; Sir James Elliot is in the next room waiting her return.

Wild. Pray, honest friend, will you tell Sir James that I beg the favour of a word with him?—[Exit John.]—This unthinking boy! Half the purpose of my life has been to plan this scheme for his happiness, and in one heedless hour has he mangled all.

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT.

Sir, I ask your pardon; but, upon so interesting a subject, I know you will excuse my intrusion. Pray, sir, of what credit is the family of the Sybthorpes in Berkshire?

Sir J. Sir!

Wild. I don't mean as to property; that I am not so solicitous about; but, as to their character. Do they live in reputation? Are they respected in the neighbourhood?

Sir J. The family of the Sybthorpes!

Wild. Of the Sybthorpes.

Sir J. Really I don't know, sir.

Wild. Not know!

Sir J. No; it is the very first time I have ever heard of the name.

Wild. (Aside.) How steadily he denies it! Well done, baronet! I find Jack's account was a just one.—Pray, Sir James, recollect yourself.

Sir J. It will be to no purpose.

Wild. Come, sir, your motive for this affected ignorance is a generous, but unnecessary proof of your friendship for my son; but I know the whole affair.

Sir J. What affair?

Wild. Jack's marriage.

Sir J. What Jack?

Wild. My son Jack.

Sir J. Is he married?

Wild. Is he married! why, you know he is.

Sir J. Not I, upon my honour.

Wild. Nay, that is going a little too far: but, to remove all your scruples at once, he has owned it himself.

Sir J. He has!

Wild. Ay, ay, to me: every circumstance. Going to your new purchase at Abingdon; meeting Lydia Sybthorpe at the assembly; their private interviews; surprised by the father; pistol, poker, and marriage; in short, every particular.

Sir J. And this account you had from your son?

Wild. From Jack; not two hours ago.

Sir J. I wish you joy, sir.

Wild. Not much of that, I believe.

Sir J. Why, sir, does the marriage displease you?

Wild. Doubtless.

Sir J. Then I fancy you may make yourself easy.

Wild. Why so?

Sir J. You have got, sir, the most prudent daughter-in-law in the British dominions.

Wild. I am happy to hear it.

Sir J. For, though she mayn't have brought you much, I'm sure she'll not cost you a farthing.

Wild. Ay; exactly Jack's account.

Sir J. She'll be easily jointured.

Wild. Justice shall be done her.

Sir J. No provision necessary for younger children.

Wild. No, sir! why not? I can tell you, if she answer your account, not the daughter of a duke—

Sir J. Ha, ha, ha!

Wild. You are very merry, sir.

Sir J. What an unaccountable fellow!

Wild. Sir?

Sir J. I beg your pardon, sir. But, with regard to this marriage,—

Wild. Well, sir?

Sir J. I take the whole history to be neither more nor less than an absolute fable.

Wild. How, sir?

Sir J. Even so.

Wild. Why, sir, do you think my son would dare to impose upon me?

Sir J. Sir, he would dare to impose upon any body. Don't I know him?

Wild. What do you know?

Sir J. I know, sir, that his narratives gain him more applause than credit; and that, whether from constitution or habit, there is no believing a syllable he says.

Wild. Oh! mighty well, sir! He wants to turn the tables upon Jack. But it won't do; you are forestalled; your novels won't pass upon me.

Sir J. Sir?

Wild. Nor is the character of my son to be blasted with the breath of a bouncer.

Sir J. What is this?

Wild. No, no; Mr. Mandeville, it won't do; you are as well known here as in your own county of Hereford.

Sir J. Mr. Wilding, but that I am sure this extravagant behaviour owes its rise to some impudent impositions of your son, your age would scarce prove your protection.

Wild. Nor, sir, but that I know my boy equal to the defence of his own honour, should he want a protector in this arm, withered and impotent as you may think it.

Enter MISS GRANTAM.

Miss Gr. Bless me, gentlemen, what is the meaning of this?

Sir J. No more at present, sir; I have another demand upon your son; we'll settle the whole together.

Wild. I am sure he will do you justice.

Miss Gr. How, Sir James Elliot? I flattered myself that you had finished your visits here, sir. Must I be the eternal object of your outrage? not only insulted in my own person, but in that of my friends! Pray, sir, what right—

Wild. Madam, I ask your pardon; a disagreeable occasion brought me here: I come, madam, to renounce all hopes of being nearer allied to you, my son, unfortunately, being married already.

Miss Gr. Married!

Sir J. Yes, madam; to a lady in the clouds; and, because I have refused to acknowledge her family, this old gentleman has behaved in a manner very inconsistent with his usual politeness.

Wild. Sir, I thought this affair was to be reserved for another occasion; but you, it seems—

Miss Gr. Oh! is that the business? Why, I begin to be afraid that we are here a little in the wrong, Mr. Wilding.

Wild. Madam!

Miss Gr. Your son has just confirmed Sir James Elliot's opinion, at a conference under Miss Godfrey's window.

Wild. Is it possible?

Miss Gr. Most true; and assigned two most whimsical motives for the unaccountable tale.

Wild. What can they be?

Miss Gr. An aversion for me, whom he has seen but once; and an affection for Miss Godfrey, whom I am almost sure he never saw in his life.

Wild. You amaze me!

Miss Gr. Indeed, Mr. Wilding, your son is a most extraordinary youth; he has finely perplexed us all. I think, Sir James, you have a small obligation to him.

Sir J. Which I shall take care to acknowledge the first opportunity.

Wild. You have my consent. An abandoned profligate! Was his father a proper subject for his—But I discard him.

Miss Gr. Nay, now, gentlemen, you are rather too warm: I can't think Mr. Wilding bad-hearted. This is a levity.

Wild. How, madam, a levity?

Miss Gr. Take my word for it, no more; inflamed into habit by the approbation of his juvenile friends. Will you submit his punishment to me? I think I have the means in my hands, both to satisfy your resentments, and accomplish his cure into the bargain.

Sir J. I have no quarrel to him, but for the ill offices he has done me with you.

Miss Gr. D'ye hear, Mr. Wilding? I am afraid my union with Sir James must cement the general peace.

Wild. Madam, I submit to any—

Enter JOHN.

John. Mr. Wilding, to wait upon you, madam. [Exit.]

Miss Gr. He is punctual, I find. Come, good folks, you all act under my direction. You, sir, will get from your son, by what means you think fit, the real truth of the Abingdon business. I intend to produce another performer, who will want a little instruction. Come, Sir James. Nay, no ceremony; we must be as busy as bees.

[Exit with Sir J.]

Wild. This strange boy! But I must command my temper.

Enter YOUNG WILDING.

Young W. (Speaking as he enters.) People to speak with me! See what they want, Papillion. My father here! that's unlucky enough.

Wild. Ha! Jack, what brings you here?

Young W. Why, I thought it my duty to wait upon Miss Grantam, in order to make her some apology for the late unfortunate—

Wild. Well, now, that is prudently as well as politely done. [approbation.]

Young W. I am happy to meet, sir, with your Wild. I have been thinking, Jack, about my daughter-in-law: as the affair is public, it is not decent to let her continue longer at her father's.

Young W. Sir!

Wild. Would it not be right to send for her home?

Young W. Doubtless, sir.

Wild. I think so. Why, then, to-morrow, my chariot shall fetch her.

Young W. The devil it shall! (Aside.)—Not quite so soon, if you please, sir.

Wild. No! Why not?

Young W. The journey may be dangerous in her present condition.

Wild. What's the matter with her?

Young W. She is big with child, sir.

Wild. An audacious—Big with child! That is fortunate. But, however, an easy carriage and short stages can't hurt her.

Young W. Pardon me, sir, I dare not trust her: she is six months gone.

Wild. Nay, then, there may be danger, indeed. But should not I write to her father, just to let him know that you have discovered the secret?

Young W. By all means, sir; it will make him extremely happy.

Wild. Why, then, I will instantly about it. Pray, how do you direct to him?

Young W. Abingdon, Berkshire.

Wild. True: but his address?

Young W. You need not trouble yourself, sir: I shall write by this post to my wife, and will send your letter inclosed.

Wild. Ay ay, that will do. (Going.)

Young W. So, I have parried that thrust.

Wild. Though, upon second thoughts, Jack, that will rather look too familiar for an introductory letter.

Young W. Sir!

Wild. And these country gentlemen are full of punctilios. No, I'll send him a letter apart; so give me his direction.

Young W. You have it, sir.

Wild. Ay, but his name: I have been so hurried that I have entirely forgotten it.

Young W. I am sure, so have I. (Aside.) His name—his name, sir—Hopkins.

Wild. Hopkins?

Young W. Yes, sir.

Wild. That is not the same name that you gave me before; that, if I recollect, was either Sythorpe, or Sybthorpe.

Young W. You are right, sir; that is his paternal appellation; but the name of Hopkins he took for an estate of his mother's; so he is indiscriminately called Hopkins, or Sybthorpe; and, now I recollect, I have his letter in my pocket: he signs himself Sybthorpe Hopkins.

Wild. (Aside.) There is no end of this; I must stop him at once.—Harkye! sir, I think you are called my son.

Young W. I hope, sir, you have no reason to doubt it.

Wild. And look upon yourself as a gentleman?

Young W. In having the honour of descending from you.

Wild. And that you think a sufficient pretension?

Young W. Sir, pray, sir—

Wild. And by what means do you imagine your ancestors obtained that distinguishing title? by their pre-eminence in virtue, I suppose.

Young W. Doubtless, sir.

Wild. And has it never occurred to you, that what was gained by honour might be lost by infamy?

Young W. Perfectly, sir.

Wild. Are you to learn what redress even the imputation of a lie demands, and that nothing less than the life of the adversary can extinguish the affront.

Young W. Doubtless, sir.

Wild. Then how dare you call yourself a gentleman? you, whose whole life has been one continued scene of fraud and falsity! Not satisfied with violating the great bond of society, mutual confidence, the most sacred rights of nature must be invaded, and your father made the innocent instrument to circulate your abominable impositions.

Young W. But, sir—

Wild. Within this hour my life was nearly sacrificed in defence of your fame; but, perhaps, that was your intention, and the story of your marriage merely calculated to send me out of the world, as a grateful return for my bringing you into it.

Young W. For heaven's sake! sir,—

Wild. What other motive?

Young W. But, hear me, sir; I own the Abingdon business—

Wild. An absolute fiction?

Young W. I do.

Wild. And how dare you—

Young W. I crave but a moment's audience.

Wild. Go on.

Young W. Previous to the communication of your intention for me, I accidentally met with a lady, whose charms—

Wild. So! what, here is another marriage trumped up! Well, sir; and this charming lady, residing, I suppose, in nubibus—

Young W. No, sir; in London.

Wild. Indeed!

Young W. Nay, more; and, at this instant, in this house.

Wild. And her name?

Young W. Godfrey.

Wild. The friend of Miss Grantam?

Young W. The very same, sir.

Wild. Have you spoken to her?

Young W. Parted from her not ten minutes ago; nay, am here by her appointment.

Wild. Has she favoured your address?

Young W. Time, sir, and your approbation will, I hope.

Wild. Lookye, sir; as there is some little probability in this story, I shall think it worth farther inquiry. If I discover the least falsehood, the least duplicity, remember, you have lost a father.

Young W. I shall submit without a murmur.

[Exit Wilding.]

Enter PAPILLION.

Well, Papillion.

Pap. Sir, here has been the devil to pay within.

Young W. What's the matter?

Pap. A whole legion of cooks, confectioners, musicians, waiters, and watermen.

Young W. What do they want?

Pap. You, sir.

Young W. Me!

Pap. Yes, sir; they have brought in their bills.

Young W. Bills! for what?

Pap. For the entertainment you gave last night upon the water.

Young W. That I gave!

Pap. Yes, sir; you remember the bill of fare; but, however, I have despatched them to your lodgings, with a promise that you shall immediately meet them.

Young W. Oh! there we shall soon rid our hands of the troop. Now, Papillion, I have news for you. My father has got to the bottom of the whole Abingdon business.

Pap. The deuce!

Young W. We parted this moment. Such a scene!

Pap. And what was the issue?

Young W. Happy, beyond my hopes. Not only an act of oblivion, but a promise to plead my cause with the fair.

Pap. With Miss Godfrey?

Young W. Who else? he is now with her in another room. [this?]

Pap. And there is no—you understand me—in all

Young W. No, no; that is all over now; my reformation is fixed.

Pap. As a weathercock.

Young W. Here comes my father.

Enter WILDING and MISS GODFREY.

Wild. If, madam, he has not the highest sense of the great honour you do him, I shall cease to regard him. There, sir; make your own acknowledgments to that lady.

Young W. Sir!

Wild. This is more than you merit; but let your future behaviour testify your gratitude.

Young W. Papillion! Madam! Sir!

Wild. What! is the puppy petrified? Why don't you go up to the lady?

Young W. Up to the lady! That lady?

Wild. That lady! To be sure. What other lady? To Miss Godfrey.

Young W. That lady Miss Godfrey?

Wild. What is all this? Harkye! sir, I see what you are at—But, no trifling; this instant your hand to the contract, or tremble at the consequence.

Young W. Sir, that, I hope, is—might not I—to be sure—

Wild. No further evasions; there, sir.

Young W. Heigho! (Signs the contract.)

Wild. Very well. Now, madam, your name, if you please.

Young W. Papillion, do you know who she is?

Pap. That's a question, indeed! Don't you, sir?

Young W. Not I, as I hope to be saved.

Enter JOHN.

John. A young lady begs to speak with Mr. Wilding.

Young W. With me!

Miss Go. A young lady, with Mr. Wilding!

John. Seems distressed, madam, and extremely pressing for admittance.

Miss Go. Indeed! There may be something in this. You must permit me, sir, to pause a little: who knows but a prior claim may prevent—

Wild. How, sir? who is this lady?

Young W. It is impossible for me to divine, sir.

Wild. You know nothing of her?

Young W. How should I?

Wild. You hear, madam.

Miss Go. I presume your son can have no objection to the lady's appearance.

Young W. Not in the least, madam.

Miss Go. Shew her in, John. [Exit.]

Wild. No, madam; I don't think there is the least room for suspecting him; he can't be so abandoned as to—But, she is here. Upon my word, a slightly woman!

Enter KITTY, as Miss Sybthorpe.

Kitty. Where is he? Oh! let me throw my arms—my life—my—

Young W. Heyday!

Kitty. And could you leave me? and for so long a space? Think how the tedious time has lagged along.

Young W. Madam!

Kitty. But we are met at last, and now we will part no more.

Young W. The deuce we won't!

Kitty. What! not one kind look? no tender word to hail our second meeting?

Young W. What the devil is all this?

Kitty. Are all your oaths, your protestations, come to this? Have I deserved such treatment? Quitted my father's house, left all my friends, and wandered here alone in search of thee, thou first, last, only object of my love.

Wild. To what can all this tend? Harkye! sir, unriddle this mystery.

Young W. It is beyond me, I confess. Some lunatic escaped from her keeper, I suppose.

Kitty. Am I disowned, then? contemned—slighted?

Wild. Hold! let me inquire into this matter a little. Pray, madam—You seem to be pretty familiar here—Do you know this gentleman?

Kitty. Too well.

Wild. His name?

Kitty. Wilding.

Wild. So far she is right. Now, your's, if you please?

Kitty. Wilding.

All. Wilding!

Wild. And how came you by that name, pray?

Kitty. Most lawfully, sir: by the sacred band, the holy tie that made us one.

Wild. What! married to him?

Kitty. Most true.

All. How?

Young W. Sir, may I never—

Wild. Peace, monster! One question more; your maiden name?

Kitty. Sybthorpe.

Wild. Lydia, from Abingdon, in the county of Berks?

Kitty. The same.

Wild. As I suspected. So, then, the whole story is true, and the monster is married at last!

Young W. Me, sir! By all that's—

Wild. Eternal dumbness seize thee, measureless liar!

Young W. If not me, hear this gentleman. Marquis—

Pap. Not I! I'll be drawn into none of your scrapes: it is a pit of your own digging, and so get out as well as you can. Meantime, I'll shift for myself. [Exit.]

Wild. What evasion, now, monster?

Miss Go. Deceiver!

Wild. Liar!

Miss Go. Imposter!

Young W. Why, this is a general combination to distract me; but I will be heard. Sir, you are grossly imposed upon; the low contriver of this woman's shallow artifice I shall soon find means to discover; and, as to you, madam, with whom I have been suddenly surprised into a contract, I most solemnly declare, this is the first time I ever set eyes on you.

Wild. Amazing confidence! Did not I bring her at your request?

Young W. No.

Miss Go. Is not this your own letter?

Young W. No.

Kitty. Am not I your wife?

Young W. No.

Wild. Did not you own it to me?

Young W. No.

Kitty. Hear me.

Young W. No.

Miss Go. Answer me.

Young W. No.

Wild. Have not I—

Young W. No, no, no. Zounds! you are all mad; and, if I stay, I shall catch the infection. [Exit.]

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT and MISS GRANTAM.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Miss Gr. Finely performed.

Wild. If his cure be complete, he will gratefully acknowledge the cause; if not, the punishment comes far short of his crime. To the ladies, indeed, no character is so dangerous as that of a liar.

They in the fairest frames can fix a flaw,

And vanquish females whom they never saw.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE 1.—A Garden belonging to Sciolto's Palace.

Enter ALTAMONT and HORATIO.

Alt. Let this auspicious day be ever sacred;
No mourning, no misfortunes happen on it:
Let it be mark'd for triumphs and rejoicings;
Let happy lovers ever make it holy,
Choose it to bless their hopes, and crown their wishes;

This happy day, that gives me my Calista.

Hor. Yes, Altamont; to-day thy better stars
Are join'd to shed their kindest influence on thee;
Sciolto's noble hand, that rais'd thee first,
Half dead and drooping o'er thy father's grave,
Completes its bounty, and restores thy name
To that high rank and lustre which it boasted,
Before ungrateful Genoa had forgot
The merit of thy god-like father's arms;
Before that country, which he long had serv'd
In watchful councils and in winter camps,
Had cast off his white age to want and wretched-
ness,

And made their court to factions by his ruin.

Alt. Oh, great Sciolto! Oh, my more than father!

Let me not live, but at thy very name
My eager heart springs up, and leaps with joy.
When I forget the vast, vast debt I owe thee,—
(Forget!—but 'tis impossible) then let me
Forget the use and privilege of reason;
Be driven from the commerce of mankind,
To wander in the desert among brutes,
To be the scorn of earth, and curse of heaven!

Hor. So open, so unbounded was his goodness,

It reach'd even me, because I was thy friend.
When that great man I lov'd, thy noble father,
Bequeath'd thy gentle sister to my arms,
His last dear pledge and legacy of friendship,
That happy tie made me Sciolto's son;
He call'd us his, and, with a parent's fondness,
Indulg'd us in his wealth, bless'd us with plenty,
Heal'd all our cares, and sweeten'd love itself.

Alt. By heaven, he found my fortunes so abandon'd,

That nothing but a miracle could raise 'em:
My father's bounty, and the state's ingratitude,
Had stripp'd him bare, nor left him e'en a grave.
Undone myself, and sinking in his ruin,
I had no wealth to bring, nothing to succour him,
But fruitless tears.

Hor. Yet what thou couldst thou didst,
And didst it like a son; when his hard creditors,
Urg'd and assisted by Lothario's father,
(Foe to thy house, and rival of their greatness,)
By sentence of the cruel law forbade
His venerable corpse to rest in earth,
Thou gav'st thyself a ransom for his bones;
Heav'n, who beheld the pious act, approv'd it,
And bade Sciolto's bounty be its proxy,
To bless thy filial virtue with abundauce.

Alt. But see, he comes, the author of my happi-
ness,

The man who sav'd my life from deadly sorrow,
Who bids my days be blest with peace and plenty,
And satisfies my soul with love and beauty.

*Enter SCIOLTO; he runs to Altamont, and embraces
him.*

Sci. Joy to thee, Altamont! Joy to myself!

Joy to this happy morn, that makes thee mine ;
That kindly grants what nature had denied me,
And makes me father of a son like thee.

Alt. My father! Oh, let me unlade my breast,
Pour out the fulness of my soul before you;
Shew ev'ry tender, ev'ry grateful thought,
This wondrous goodness stirs. But 'tis impossible,
And utterance all is vile; since I can only
Swear you reign here, but never tell how much.

Sci. O, noble youth! I swear, since first I knew
thee,

Ev'n from that day of sorrow when I saw thee
Adorn'd and lovely in thy filial tears,
The mourner and redeemer of thy father,
I set thee down and seal'd thee for my own:
Thou art my son, ev'n near me as Calista.
Horatio and Lavinia, too, are mine; (Embraces Hor.)
All are my children, and shall share my heart.
But wherefore waste we thus this happy day?
The laughing minutes summon thee to joy,
And with new pleasures court thee as they pass;
Thy waiting bride e'en chides thee for delaying,
And swears thou com'st not with a bridegroom's haste.

Alt. Oh! could I hope there was one thought of Altamont,

One kind remembrance in Calista's breast,
The winds, with all their wings, would be too slow
To bear me to her feet. For, oh, my father!
Amidst the stream of joy that bears me on,
Blest as I am, and honour'd in your friendship,
There is one pain that hangs upon my heart.

Sci. What means my son?

Alt. When, at your intercession,
Last night, Calista yielded to my happiness,
Just ere we parted, as I seal'd my vows
With rapture on her lips, I found her cold
As a dead lover's statue on his tomb;
A rising storm of passion shook her breast,
Her eyes a piteous show'r of tears let fall,
And then she sigh'd as if her heart were breaking.
With all the tend'rest eloquence of love
I begg'd to be a sharer in her grief;
But she, with looks averse, and eyes that froze me,
Sadly reply'd, her sorrows were her own,
Nor in a father's power to dispose of.

Sci. Away! it is the coz'nage of their sex;
One of the common arts they practise on us:
To sigh and weep then when their hearts beat high
With expectation of the coming joy.
Thou hast in camps and fighting fields been bred,
Unknowing in the subtleties of women;
The virgin bride, who swoons with deadly fear,
To see the end of all her wishes near,
When, blushing, from the light and public eyes,
To the kind covert of the night she flies,
With equal fires to meet the bridegroom moves,
Melts in his arms, and with a loose she loves.

[Exeunt.]

Enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Loth. The father, and the husband!

Ros. Let them pass.

They saw us not.

Loth. I care not if they did;
Ere long I mean to meet 'em face to face,
And gall 'em with my triumph o'er Calista.

Ros. You lov'd her once.

Loth. I lik'd her, would have marry'd her,
But that it pleas'd her father to refuse me,
To make this honourable fool her husband;
For which, if I forget him, may the shame
I mean to brand his name with, stick on mine.

Ros. She, gentle soul, was kinder than her father.

Loth. She was, and oft in private gave me hearing;
Till, by long list'ning to the soothing tale,
At length her easy heart was wholly mine.

Ros. I've heard you oft describe her haughty, insolent,

And fierce with high disdain: it moves my wonder,
That virtue thus defended, should be yielded
A prey to loose desires.

Loth. Hear, then, I'll tell thee:

Once, in a lone and secret hour of night,
When ev'ry eye was clos'd, and the pale moon
And stars alone shone conscious of the theft,
Hot with the Tuscan grape, and high in blood,
Haply I stole, unheeded, to her chamber.

Ros. That minute sure was lucky.

Loth. Oh, 'twas great!

I found the fond, believing, love-sick maid,
Loose, unattir'd, warm, tender, full of wishes;
Fierceness and pride, the guardians of her honour
Were charm'd to rest, and love alone was waking.
Within her rising bosom all was calm,
As peaceful seas that know no storms, and only
Are gently lifted up and down by tides.
I snatch'd the glorious, golden opportunity,
And with prevailing, youthful ardour, press'd her;
Till, with short sighs, and murmuring reluctance,
The yielding fair one gave me perfect happiness.
Ev'n all the live-long night we pass'd in bliss,
In ecstasies too fierce to last for ever;
At length the morn, and cold indifference, came;
When, fully sated with the luscious banquet,
I hastily took leave, and left the nymph
To think on what was past, and sigh alone.

Ros. You saw her soon again?

Loth. Too soon I saw her:

For, oh! that meeting was not like the former:
I found my heart no more beat high with transport,
No more I sigh'd and languish'd for enjoyment;
'Twas past, and reason took her turn to reign,
While ev'ry weakness fell before her throne.

Ros. What of the lady?

Loth. With uneasy fondness

She hung upon me, wept, and sigh'd, and swore
She was undone; talk'd of a priest and marriage;
Of flying with me from her father's power;
Call'd ev'ry saint and blessed angel down,
To witness for her that she was my wife.
I started at that name.

Ros. What answer made you?

Loth. None; but, pretending sudden pain and illness,

Escap'd the persecution. Two nights since,
By message urg'd, and frequent importunity,
Again I saw her. Straight, with tears and sighs,
With swelling breasts, with swooning and distraction,

With all the subtleties, and pow'ful arts
Of wilful woman lab'ring for her purpose,
Again she told the same dull, nauseous tale.
Unmov'd, I begg'd her spare th'ungrateful subject,
Since I resolv'd, that love and peace of mind
Might flourish long inviolate betwixt us,
Never to load it with the marriage chain:
That I would still retain her in my heart,
My ever gentle mistress, and my friend;
But for those other names, of wife and husband,
They only meant ill nature, cares, and quarrels.

Ros. How bore she this reply?

Loth. At first her rage was dumb, and wanted words;

But, when the storm found way, 'twas wild and loud:

Mad as the priestess of the Delphic god,
Enthusiastic passion swell'd her breast,
Enlarg'd her voice, and ruffled all her form.
Proud, and disdainful of the love I proffer'd,
She call'd me villain! monster! base betrayer!
At last, in very bitterness of soul,
With deadly imprecations on herself,
She vow'd severely ne'er to see me more;
Then bade me fly that minute: I obey'd,
And, bowing, left her to grow cool at leisure.

Ros. She has relented since, else why this message,

To meet the keeper of her secrets here,
This morning?

Loth. See the person whom you nam'd.

Enter LUCILLA.

Well, my ambassadress, what must we treat of?
Come you to menace war and proud defiance,
Or does the peaceful olive grace your message?
Is your fair mistress calmer? Does she soften?
And must we love again? Perhaps she means
To treat in juncture with her new ally,
And make her husband party to th' agreement.

Luc. Is this well done, my lord? Have you put off

All sense of human nature? Keep a little,
A little pity, to distinguish manhood,
Lest other men, though cruel, should disclaim you,
And judge you to be number'd with the brutes.

Loth. I see thou'st learnt to rail.

Luc. I've learn'd to weep:

That lesson my sad mistress often gives me:
By day she seeks some melancholy shade,
To hide her sorrows from the prying world;
At night she watches all the long, long hours,
And listens to the winds and beating rain,
With sighs as loud, and tears that fall as fast;
Then ever and anon she wrings her hands,
And cries, false, false Lothario!

Loth. Oh, no more!

I swear thou'lt spoil thy pretty face with crying,
And thou hast beauty that may make thy fortune:
Some keeping cardinal shall dote upon thee,
And barter his church treasure for thy freshness.

Luc. What! shall I sell my innocence and youth,
For wealth or titles, to perfidious man?
To man, who makes his mirth of our undoing!
The base, profess'd betrayer of our sex!
Let me grow old in all misfortunes else,
Rather than know the sorrows of Calista!

Loth. Does she send thee to chide in her behalf?

I swear thou dost it with so good a grace,
That I could almost love thee for thy frowning.

Luc. Read there, my lord, there in her own sad lines, (Giving a letter.)

Which best can tell the story of her woes,
That grief of heart which your unkindness gives her.

Loth. (Reads.) "Your cruelty—Obedience to my father—give my hand to Altamont."

By heav'n, 'tis well! such ever be the gifts

(Aside.)

With which I greet the man whom my soul hates.
But to go on—"wish—heart—honour—too faithless
—weakness—to-morrow—last trouble—lost Calista."

Women, I see, can change, as well as men.
She writes me here, forsaken as I am,
That I should bind my brows with mournful willow,
For she has given her hand to Altamont:
Yet tell the fair inconstant—

Luc. How, my lord!

Loth. Nay, no more angry words: say to Calista,
The humblest of her slaves shall wait her pleasure;

If she can leave her happy husband's arms,
To think upon so lost a thing as I am.

Luc. Alas! for pity, come with gentler looks:
Wound not her heart with this unmanly triumph;
And though you love her not, yet swear you do;
So shall dissembling once be virtuous in you.

Loth. Ha! who comes here?

Luc. The bridegroom's friend, Horatio.
He must not see us here. To-morrow, early,
Be at the garden gate.

Loth. Bear to my love

My kindest thoughts, and swear I will not fail her.
(Lothario putting up the letter hastily, drops it as he goes out. Exeunt Lothario and Rossano one way, Lucilla another.)

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Sure 'tis the very error of my eyes;
Waking, I dream, or I beheld Lothario;
He seem'd conferring with Calista's woman:
At my approach they started and retir'd.
What business could he have here, and with her?
I know he bears the noble Altamont

Profess'd and deadly hate. What paper's this?

(Taking up the letter.)

Ha! To Lothario! 'Sdeath! Calista's name!

(Opens it and reads.)

"Your cruelty has at length determined me; and I have resolved this morning to yield a perfect obedience to my father, and to give my hand to Altamont, in spite of my weakness for the false Lothario. I could almost wish I had that heart and that honour to bestow with it, which you have robbed me of!"—D—n!
to the rest—"But, oh! I fear, could I relieve 'em, I should again be undone by the too faithless, yet too lovely Lothario. This is the last weakness of my pen, and to-morrow shall be the last in which I will indulge my eyes. Lucilla shall conduct you, if you are kind enough to let me see you; it shall be the last trouble you shall meet with from the lost

CALISTA."

The lost, indeed! for thou art gone as far
As there can be perdition. Fire and sulphur!
Hell is the sole avenger of such crimes.

Oh, that the ruin were but all thy own!

Thou wilt even make thy father curse his age:

At sight of this black scroll, the gentle Altamont

(For, oh! I know his heart is set upon thee)

Shall droop and hang his discontented head,

Like merit scorn'd by insolent authority,

And never grace the public with his virtues.

What if I give this paper to her father?

It follows that his justice dooms her dead,

And breaks his heart with sorrow; hard return

For all the good his hand has heap'd on us!

Hold, let me take a moment's thought.

Enter LAVINIA.

Lav. My lord!

Trust me, it joys my heart that I have found you.

Inquiring wherefore you had left the company,

Before my brother's nuptial rites were ended,

They told me you had felt some sudden illness.

Hor. It were unjust. No, let me spare my friend,

Lock up the fatal secret in my breast,

Nor tell him that which will undo his quiet.

Lav. What means my lord?

Hor. Ha! said'st thou, my Lavinia?

Lav. Alas! you know not what you make me suffer.

Whence is that sigh? And wherefore are your eyes

Severely rais'd to heav'n? The sick man thus,

Acknowledging the summons of his fate,

Lifts up his feeble hands and eyes for mercy,

And with confusion thinks upon his audit.

Hor. Oh, no! thou hast mistook my sickness quite;

These pangs are of the soul. Would I had met

Sharpest convulsions, spotted pestilence,

Or any other deadly foe to life,

Rather than heave beneath this load of thought!

Lav. Alas! what is it? Wherefore turn you from me?

Why did you falsely call me your Lavinia,

And swear I was Horatio's better half,

Since now you mourn unkindly by yourself,

And rob me of my partnership of sadness?

Hor. Seek not to know what I would hide from all,

But most from thee. I never knew a pleasure,

Aught that was joyful, fortunate, or good,

But straight I ran to bless thee with the tidings,

And laid up all my happiness with thee:

But wherefore, wherefore should I give thee pain?

Then spare me, I conjure thee; ask no further;

Allow my melancholy thoughts this privilege,
And let 'em brood in secret o'er their sorrows.

Lav. It is enough; chide not, and all is well!
Forgive me if I saw you sad, Horatio,
And ask'd to weep out part of your misfortunes:
I wo't press to know what you forbid me.
Yet, my lov'd lord, yet you must grant me this,
Forget your cares for this one happy day,
Devote this day to mirth, and to your Altamont;
For his dear sake, let peace be in your looks.
Ev'n now the jocund bridegroom waits your wishes,
He thinks the priest has but half bless'd his marriage,
Till his friend hails him with the sound of joy.

Hor. Oh, never, never, never! Thou art innocent:

Simplicity from ill, pure native truth,
And candour of the mind, adorn thee ever;
But there are such, such false ones, in the world,
'Twould fill thy gentle soul with wild amazement
To hear their story told.

Lav. False ones, my lord?

Hor. Fatally fair they are, and in their smiles
The graces, little loves, and young desires inhabit;
But all that gaze upon 'em are undone;
For they are false, luxurious in their appetites,
And all the heaven they hope for is variety:
One lover to another still succeeds,
Another, and another after that,
And the last fool is welcome as the former;
Till having lov'd his hour out, he gives place,
And mingles with the herd that went before him.

Lav. Can there be such, and have they peace of mind?

Have they, in all the series of their changing,
One happy hour? If women are such things,
How was I form'd so diff'rent from my sex?
My little heart is satisfy'd with you;
You take up all her room, as in a cottage
Which harbours some benighted princely stranger,
Where the good man, proud of his hospitality,
Yields all his homely dwelling to his guest,
And hardly keeps a corner for himself.

Hor. Oh, were they all like thee, men would adore 'em,

And all the business of their lives be loving;
The nuptial band should be the pledge of peace,
And all domestic cares and quarrels cease!
The world should learn to love by virtuous rules,
And marriage be no more the jest of fools.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter CALISTA and LUCILLA.

Cal. Be dumb for ever, silent as the grave,
Nor let thy fond, officious love disturb
My solemn sadness with the sound of joy.
If thou wilt sooth me, tell some dismal tale
Of pining discontent, and black despair;
For, oh! I've gone around through all my thoughts,
But all are indignation, love, or shame,
And my dear peace of mind is lost for ever.

Luc. Why do you follow still that wand'ring fire,
That has misled your weary steps, and leaves you
Benighted in a wilderness of woe,
That false Lothario? Turn from the deceiver;
Turn, and behold where gentle Altamont,
Sighs at your feet, and wooes you to be happy.

Cal. Away! I think not of him. My sad soul
Has form'd a dismal, melancholy scene,
Such a retreat as I would wish to find;
An unfrequented vale, o'ergrown with trees
Mossy and old, within whose lonesome shade
Ravens and birds ill-omen'd only dwell:
No sound to break the silence, but a brook
That bubbling winds among the weeds: no mark
Of any human shape that had been there,

Unless a skeleton of some poor wretch,
Who had long since, like me, by love undone,
Sought that sad place out to despair and die in.

Luc. Alas, for pity!

Cal. There I fain would hide me
From the base world, from malice, and from shame;
For 'tis the solemn counsel of my soul
Never to live with public loss of honour:
'Tis fix'd to die, rather than bear the insolence
Of each affected she that tells my story,
And blesses her good stars that she is virtuous.
To be a tale for fools! Scorn'd by the women,
And pity'd by the men! Oh, insupportable!

Luc. Oh, hear me, hear your ever faithful creature!

By all the good I wish you, by all the ill
My trembling heart forebodes, let me entreat you
Never to see this faithless man again;—
Let me forbid his coming.

Cal. On thy life,
I charge thee no: my genius drives me on;
I must, I will behold him once again:
Perhaps it is the crisis of my fate,
And this one interview shall end my cares.
My lab'ring heart, that swells with indignation,
Heaves to discharge the burden; that once done,
The busy thing shall rest within its cell,
And never beat again.

Luc. Trust not to that:
Rage is the shortest passion of our souls:
Like narrow brooks that rise with sudden show'rs,
It swells in haste, and falls again as soon;
Still as it ebbs the softer thoughts flow in,
And the deceiver, love, supplies its place.

Cal. I have been wrong'd enough to arm my temper
Against the smooth delusion; but, alas!
(Chide not my weakness, gentle maid, but pity me,)

A woman's softness hangs about me still;
Then let me blush, and tell thee all my folly.
I swear I could not see the dear betrayer
Kneel at my feet and sigh to be forgiv'n,
But my relenting heart would pardon all,
And quite forget 'twas he that had undone me.

[Exit Lucilla.]

Ha! Altamont! Calista, now be wary,
And guard thy soul's excesses with dissembling:
Nor let this hostile husband's eyes explore
The warring passions and tumultuous thoughts
That rage within thee, and deform thy reason.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Be gone my cares, I give you to the winds,
Far to be borne, far from the happy Altamont;
Calista is the mistress of the year;
She crowns the seasons with auspicious beauty,
And bids ev'n all my hours be good and joyful.

Cel. If I were ever mistress of such happiness,
Oh! wherefore did I play th' unthrifty fool,
And, wasting all on others, leave myself
Without one thought of joy to give me comfort?

Alt. Oh, mighty love! Shall that fair face profane

This thy great festival with frowns and sadness?
I swear it sha'not be, for I will woo thee
With sighs so moving, with so warm a transport,
That thou shalt catch the gentle flame from me,
And kindle into joy.

Cal. I tell thee, Altamont,
Such hearts as ours were never pair'd above:
Ill-suited to each other,—join'd, not match'd;
Some sullen influence, a foe to both,
Has wrought this fatal marriage to undo us.
Mark but the frame and temper of our minds,
How very much we differ. Ev'n this day,
That fills thee with such ecstasy and transport,
To me brings nothing that should make me bless it,
Or think it better than the day before,

Or any other in the course of time,
That duly took its turn, and was forgotten.

Alt. If to behold thee as my pledge of happiness,
To know none fair, none excellent, but thee;
If still to love thee with unweary'd constancy,
Through wrinkled age, through sickness and misfortune,

Through ev'ry season, ev'ry change of life,
Be worth the least return of grateful love,
Oh, then let my Calista bless this day,
And set it down for happy.

Cal. 'Tis the day
In which my father gave my hand to Altamont;
As such, I will remember it for ever.

Enter SCIOLO, HORATIO, and LAVINIA.

Sci. Let mirth go on, let pleasure know no pause,

But fill up ev'ry minute of this day.
'Tis yours, my children, sacred to your loves;
The glorious sun himself for you looks gay;
He shines for Altamont and for Calista.
Let there be music, let the master touch
The sprightly string and softly-breathing flute,
Till harmony rouse ev'ry gentle passion,
Teach the cold maid to lose her fears in love,
And the fierce youth to languish at her feet.
Begin: ev'n age itself is cheer'd with music;
It wakes a glad remembrance of our youth,
Calls back past joys, and warms us into transport.

(Music.)

Take care my gates be open, bid all welcome;
All who rejoice with me to-day are friends:
Let each indulge his genius, each be glad,
Jocund, and free, and swell the feast with mirth;
The sprightly bowl shall cheerfully go round,
None shall be grave, nor too severely wise;
Losses and disappointments, cares and poverty,
The rich man's insolence, and great man's scorn,
In wine shall be forgotten all. To-morrow
Will be too soon to think and to be wretched.
Oh grant, ye pow'rs, that I may see these happy.

(Pointing to Altamont and Calista.)
Completely blest, and I have life enough!

And leave the rest indifferently to fate. [Exeunt.]
Hor. What if, while all are here intent on revelling,

I privately went forth, and sought Lothario?
This letter may be forg'd, perhaps the wantonness
Of his vain youth, to stain a lady's fame;
Perhaps his malice to disturb my friend.—
Oh, no! my heart forebodes it must be true.
Methought, ev'n now, I mark'd the starts of guilt
That shook her soul; though damn'd dissimulation
Screen'd her dark thoughts, and set to public view
A specious face of innocence and beauty.
With such smooth looks and many a gentle word,
The first fair she beguil'd her easy lord;
Too blind with love and beauty, to beware,
He fell unthinking in the fatal snare;
Nor could believe that such a heavenly face
Had bargain'd with the devil, to damn her wretched race. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Garden of Sciolto's Palace.

Enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Loth. To tell thee then the purport of my thoughts;
The loss of this fond paper would not give me
A moment of disquiet, were it not
My instrument of vengeance on this Altamont;
Therefore I mean to wait some opportunity
Of speaking with the maid we saw this morning.

Ros. I wish you, sir, to think upon the danger
Of being seen; to-day their friends are round 'em;
And any eye that lights by chance on you,
Shall put your life and safety to the hazard. [Exeunt.]

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Still I must doubt some mystery of mischief,

Some artifice beneath. Lothario's father!
I knew him well; he was sagacious, cunning,
Fluent in words, and bold in peaceful counsels,
But of a cold, unactive hand in war;
Yet, with these coward's virtues, he undid
My unsuspecting, valiant, honest friend.
This son, if fame mistakes not, is more hot,
More open and unartful—

Re-enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Ha! he's here! (Seeing him.)

Loth. Damnation! He again! This second time
To-day, he has cross'd me like my evil genius.

Hor. I sought you, sir.

Loth. 'Tis well then I am found.

Hor. 'Tis well you are. The man who wrongs
my friend

To the earth's utmost verge I would pursue;
No place, though e'er so holy, should protect him;
No shape that artful fear e'er form'd, should hide
him,

Till he fair answer made, and did me justice.

Loth. Ha! dost thou know me? that I am Lothario?

As great a name as this proud city boasts of.
Who is this mighty man, then, this Horatio,
That I should basely hide me from his anger,
Lest he should chide me for his friend's displeasure?

Hor. The brave, 'tis true, do never shun the light;

Just are their thoughts, and open are their tempers,
Still are they found in the fair face of day,
And heav'n and men are judges of their actions.

Loth. Such let 'em be of mine; there's not a purpose

Which my soul e'er fram'd, or my hand acted,
But I could well have bid the world look on,
And what I once durst do, have dar'd to justify.

Hor. Where was this open boldness, this free spirit,

When but this very morning I surpris'd thee,
In base, dishonest privacy, consulting
And bribing a poor mercenary wretch,
To sell her lady's secrets, stain her honour,
And, with a forg'd contrivance, blast her virtue?—
At sight of me thou fled'st.

Loth. Ha! fled from thee?

Hor. Thou fled'st, and guilt was on thee like a thief,

A pilferer descry'd in some dark corner,
Who there had lodg'd, with mischievous intent,
To rob and ravage at the hour of rest,
And do a midnight murder on the sleepers.

Loth. Slave! villain!

(Offers to draw; Rossano holds him.)

Ros. Hold, my lord! think where you are,
Think how unsafe and hurtful to your honour,
It were to urge a quarrel in this place,
And shock the peaceful city with a broil.

Loth. Then, since thou dost provoke my vengeance, know

I would not, for this city's wealth, for all
Which the sea wafts to our Ligurian shore,
But that the joys I reap'd with that fond wanton,
The wife of Altamont, should be as public
As is the noon-day sun, air, earth, or water,
Or any common benefit of nature.
Think'st thou I meant the shame should be con-ceal'd?

Oh, no! by hell and vengeance, all I wanted
Was some fit messenger to bear the news
To the dull doating husband: now I have found
him,

And thou art he.

Hor. I hold thee base enough
To break through law, and spurn at sacred order,
And do a brutal injury like this.
Yet mark me well, young lord; I think Calista
Too nice, too noble, and too great of soul,

To be the prey of such a thing as thou art.
'Twas base and poor, unworthy of a man,
To forge a scroll so villanous and loose,
And mark it with a noble lady's name:
These are the mean dishonest arts of cowards,
Who, bred at home in idleness and riot,
Ransack for mistresses th' unwholesome stews,
And never know the worth of virtuous love.

Loth. Think'st thou I forg'd the letter? Think so still,
Till the broad shame come staring in thy face,
And boys shall hoot the cuckold as he passes.

Hor. Away! no woman could descend so low:
A skipping, dancing, worthless tribe you are;
Fit only for yourselves, you herd together;
And when the circling glass warms your vain hearts,
You talk of beauties that you never saw,
And fancy raptures that you never knew.

Loth. But that I do not hold it worth my leisure,
I could produce such damning proof—

Hor. 'Tis false!
You blast the fair with lies, because they scorn you,
Hate you like age, like ugliness and impotence:
Rather than make you blest, they would die virgins,
And stop the propagation of mankind.

Loth. It is the curse of fools to be secure,
And that be thine and Altamont's. Dream on;
Nor think upon my vengeance till thou feel'st it.

(Going.)

Hor. Hold, sir; another word, and then farewell.

Though I think greatly of Calista's virtue,
And hold it far beyond thy power to hurt;
Yet, as she shares the honour of my Altamont,
That treasure of a soldier, bought with blood,
And kept at life's expense, I must not have (Mark me, young sir) her very name profan'd.
Learn to restrain the licence of your speech;
'Tis held you are too lavish. When you are met
Among your set of fools, talk of your dress,
Of dice, of whores, of horses, and yourselves;
'Tis safer, and becomes your understandings.

Loth. What if we pass beyond this solemn order,
And, in defiance of the stern Horatio,
Indulge our gayer thoughts, let laughter loose,
And use his sacred friendship for our mirth?

Hor. 'Tis well, sir, you are pleasant—

Loth. By the joys
Which my soul yet has uncontrol'd pursu'd,
I would not turn aside from my least pleasure,
Though all thy force were arm'd to bar my way;
But like the birds, great nature's happy commoners,
That haunt in woods, in meads, and flow'ry gardens,
Rifle the sweets, and taste the choicest fruits,
Yet scorn to ask the lordly owner's leave.

Hor. What liberty has vain presumptuous youth,
That thou shouldst dare provoke me unchastis'd?
But henceforth, boy, I warn thee, shun my walks.
If, in the bounds of this forbidden place
Again thou'rt found, expect a punishment,
Such as great souls, impatient of an injury,
Exact from those who wrong 'em much, ev'n death;
Or something worse: an injur'd husband's vengeance

Shall print a thousand wounds, tear thy fine form,
And scatter thee to all the winds of heav'n.

Loth. Is then my way in Genoa prescrib'd
By a dependant on the wretched Altamont,
A talking sir, that brawls for him in taverns,
And vouches for his valour's reputation?

Hor. Away! thy speech is fouler than thy manners.

Loth. Or, if there be a name more vile, his parasite;
A beggar's parasite!

Hor. Now learn humanity,

(Offers to strike him: Rossano interposes.)

Since brutes and boys are only taught with blows.

Loth. Damnation!

(They draw.)

Ros. Hold, this goes no further here.

Loth. Oh, Rossano!

Or give me way, or thou'rt no more my friend.

Ros. Sciolto's servants, sir, have ta'en th' alarm;
You'll be oppress'd by numbers. Be advis'd,
Or I must force you hence.

Loth. This wo't brook delay;
West of the town a mile, among the rocks,
Two hours ere noon, to-morrow, I expect thee,
Thy single hand to mine.

Hor. I'll meet thee there.

Loth. To-morrow, oh, my better stars! to-morrow

Exert your influence; shine strongly for me;
'Tis not a common conquest I would gain,
Since love as well as arms must grace my triumph.

[Exeunt Lothario and Rossano.]

Hor. Two hours ere noon to-morrow! ha! ere that

He sees Calista! Oh, unthinking fool!
What if I urg'd her with the crime and danger?
If any spark from heav'n remain unquench'd
Within her breast, my breath perhaps may wake it.
Could I but prosper there, I should not doubt
My combat with that loud, vain-glorious boaster.
Were you, ye fair, but cautious whom ye trust,
Did you but think how seldom fools are just,
So many of your sex would not in vain
Of broken vows, and faithless men complain:
Of all the various wretches love has made,
How few have been by men of sense betray'd!
Convinc'd by reason, they your pow'r confess,
Pleas'd to be happy, as you're pleas'd to bless,
And, conscious of your worth, can never love you less. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Sciolto's Palace.

Enter SCIOLTO and CALISTA.

Sci. Now, by my life, my honour, 'tis too much!
Have I not mark'd thee, wayward as thou art,
Perverse and sullen all this day of joy?
When every heart was cheer'd, and mirth went round,

Sorrow, displeasure, and repining anguish
Sat on thy brow.

Cal. Is, then, the task of duty half perform'd?
Has not your daughter given herself to Altamont,
Yielded the native freedom of her will
To an imperious husband's lordly rule,
To gratify a father's stern command?

Sci. Dost thou complain?

Cal. For pity, do not frown, then,
If, in despite of all my vow'd obedience,
A sigh breaks out, or a tear falls by chance:
For, oh! that sorrow which has drawn your anger,
Is the sad native of Calista's breast.

Sci. Now by the sacred dust of that dear saint
That was thy mother; by her wondrous goodness,
Her soft, her tender, most complying sweetness,
I swear, some sullen thought that shuns the light,
Lurks underneath that sadness in thy visage.
But mark me well; though, by yon heaven! I love
thee

As much, I think, as a fond parent can;
Yet shouldst thou (which the pow'rs above forbid!)
E'er stain the honour of thy name with infamy,
I'll cast thee off, as one whose impious hands
Had rent asunder nature's nearest ties,
Which, once divided, never join again.
To-day I've made a noble youth thy husband;
Consider well his worth; reward his love;
Be willing to be happy, and thou art so. [Exit.]

Cal. How hard is the condition of our sex,
Through ev'ry state of life the slaves of man!
In all the dear delightful days of youth
A rigid father dictates to our wills,
And deals out pleasure with a scanty hand.

To his, the tyrant husband's reign succeeds ;
 Proud with opinion of superior reason,
 He holds domestic bus'ness and devotion
 All we are capable to know ; and shuts us,
 Like cloister'd idiots, from the world's acquaintance,
 And all the joys of freedom. Wherefore are we
 Born with high souls, but to assert ourselves,
 Shake off this vile obedience they exact,
 And claim an equal empire o'er the world ?

(She sits down.)

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. She's here! yet, oh! my tongue is at a loss.
 Teach me, some pow'r, that happy art of speech,
 To dress my purpose up in gracious words ;
 Such as may softly steal upon her soul,
 And never waken the tempestuous passions.
 By heav'n, she weeps! Forgive me, fair Calista,

(She starts up.)

If I presume on privilege of friendship,
 To join my grief to your's, and mourn the evils
 That hurt your peace, and quench those eyes in tears.

Cal. To steal unlook'd for on my private sorrow,
 Speaks not the man of honour, nor the friend,
 But rather means the spy.

Hor. Unkindly said!
 For, oh! as sure as you accuse me falsely,
 I come to prove myself Calista's friend.

Cal. You are my husband's friend, the friend of Altamont!

Hor. Are you not one? Are you not join'd by
 heav'n?

Each interwoven with the other's fate?
 Then who can give his friendship but to one?
 Who can be Altamont's and not Calista's?

Cal. Force, and the wills of our imperious rulers,
 May bind two bodies in one wretched chain ;
 But minds will still look back to their own choice.

Hor. When souls that should agree to will the same,

To have one common object for their wishes,
 Look different ways, regardless of each other,
 Think what a train of wretchedness ensues:
 Love shall be banish'd from the genial bed,
 The night shall all be lonely and unquiet,
 And every day shall be a day of cares.

Cal. Then all the boasted office of thy friendship,
 Was but to tell Calista what a wretch she is.
 Alas! what needeth that?

Hor. Oh! rather say,
 I came to tell her how she might be happy ;
 To sooth the secret anguish of her soul ;
 To comfort that fair mourner, that forlorn one,
 And teach her steps to know the paths of peace.

Cal. Say, thou, to whom this paradise is known,
 Where lies the blissful region? Mark my way to it ;
 For, oh! 'tis sure, I long to be at rest.

Hor. Then—to be good is to be happy. Angels
 Are happier than mankind, because they're better.
 Guilt is the source of sorrow ; 'tis the fiend,
 Th' avenging fiend, that follows us behind
 With whips and stings. The blest know none of this,
 But rest in everlasting peace of mind,
 And find the height of all their heav'n is goodness.

Cal. And what bold parasite's officious tongue
 Shall dare to tax Calista's name with guilt?

Hor. None should ; but 'tis a busy, talking world,
 That with licentious breath blows like the wind,
 As freely on the palace as the cottage.

Cal. What mystic riddle lurks beneath thy words,
 Which thou wouldst seem unwilling to express,
 As if it meant dishonour to my virtue?

Away with this ambiguous shuffling phrase,
 And let thy oracle be understood.

Hor. Lothario!

Cal. Ha! what wouldst thou mean by him?

Hor. Lothario and Calista! Thus they join

Two names, which heaven decreed should never meet.

Hence have the talkers of this populous city
 A shameful tale to tell, for public sport,
 Of an unhappy beauty, a false fair one,
 Who plighted to a noble youth her faith,
 When she had giv'n her honour to a wretch.

Cal. Death and confusion! Have I liv'd to this?
 Thus to be treated with unmanly insolence!
 To be the sport of a loose ruffian's tongue!
 Thus to be us'd! thus! like the vilest creature,
 That ever was a slave to vice and infamy!

Hor. By honour and fair truth, you wrong me much ;

For, on my soul, nothing but strong necessity
 Could urge my tongue to this ungrateful office.
 I came with strong reluctance, as if death
 Had stood across my way, to save your honour,
 Your's and Sciolto's ; your's and Altamont's ;
 Like one who ventures through a burning pile,
 To save his tender wife, with all her brood
 Of little fondlings, from the dreadful ruin.

Cal. Is this the famous friend of Altamont,
 For noble worth, and deeds of arms renown'd?
 Is this,—this the tale-bearing officious fellow,
 That watches for intelligence from eyes ;
 This wretched Argus of a jealous husband,
 That fills his easy ears with monstrous tales,
 And makes him toss, and rave, and wreak at length
 Bloody revenge on his defenceless wife,
 Who guiltless dies, because her fool ran mad?

Hor. Alas! this rage is vain ; for if your fame
 Or peace be worth your care, you must be calm,
 And listen to the means are left to save 'em.
 'Tis now the lucky minute of your fate.

By me your genius speaks, by me it warns you,
 Never to see that curs'd Lothario more ;
 Unless you mean to be despis'd, be shunn'd
 By all our virtuous maids and noble matrons ;
 Unless you have devoted this rare beauty
 To infamy, diseases, prostitution—

Cal. Dishonour blast thee, base, unmanner'd slave!

That dar'st forget my birth, and sacred sex,
 And shock me with the rude, unhallow'd sound!

Hor. Here kneel, and in the awful face of heav'n,
 Breathe out a solemn vow, never to see,
 Nor think, if possible, on him that ruin'd thee ;
 Or, by my Altamont's dear life, I swear,
 This paper,—nay, you must not fly,—this paper,
 (Holding her.)

This guilty paper shall divulge your shame.

Cal. What mean'st thou by that paper? What contrivance

Hast thou been forging to deceive my father ;
 To turn his heart against his wretched daughter ;
 That Altamont and thou may share his wealth?
 A wrong like this will make me ev'n forget
 The weakness of my sex. Oh! for a sword,
 To urge my vengeance on the villain's head
 That forg'd the scroll!

Hor. Behold! Can this be forg'd?
 See where Calista's name—

(Shewing the letter near.)

Cal. To atoms thus, (Snatches and tears it.)
 Thus let me tear the vile, detested falsehood,
 The wicked, lying vidence of shame.

Hor. Confusion!

Cal. Henceforth, thou officious fool,
 Meddle no more, nor dare, ev'n on thy life,
 To breathe an accent that may touch my virtue.
 I am myself the guardian of my honour,
 And will not bear so insolent a monitor.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Where is my life, my love, my charming bride,
 Joy of my heart, and pleasure of my eyes?—
 Disorder'd! and in tears! Horatio too

My friend is in amaze. What can it mean?
Tell me, Calista, who has done thee wrong,
That my swift sword may find out the offender,
And do thee ample justice.

Cal. Turn to him.

Alt. Horatio!

Cal. To that insolent.

Alt. My friend!

Could he do this? Have I not found him just,
Honest as truth itself? and could he break
The sanctity of friendship? Could he wound
The heart of Altamont in his Calista?

Cal. I thought what justice I should find from thee!

Go fawn upon him, listen to his tale;
Applaud his malice that would blast my fame,
And treat me like a common prostitute.
Thou art, perhaps, confederate in his mischief,
And wilt believe the legend, if he tells it.

Alt. Oh, impious! what presumptuous wretch shall dare

To offer at an injury like that?

Priesthood, nor age, nor cowardice itself,
Shall save him from the fury of my vengeance.

Cal. The man who dar'd to do it was Horatio;
Thy darling friend; 'twas Altamont's Horatio.
But mark me well: while thy divided heart,
Dotes on a villain that has wrong'd me thus,
No force shall drag me to thy hated bed.
Nor can my cruel father's pow'r do more
Than shut me in a cloister: there, well pleas'd,
Religious hardships will I learn to bear;
To fast and freeze at midnight hours of pray'r:
Nor think it hard, within a lonely cell,
With melancholy, speechless saints to dwell;
But bless the day I to that refuge ran,
Free from the marriage-chain, and from that tyrant,
man. [Exit.]

Alt. She's gone; and, as she went, ten thousand fires

Shot from her angry eyes; as if she meant
Too well to keep the cruel vow she made.
Now, as thou art a man, Horatio, tell me,
What means this wild confusion in thy looks;
As if thou wert at variance with thyself,
Madness and reason combating with thee,
And thou wert doubtful which should get the better?

Hor. I would be dumb for ever; but thy fate
Has otherwise decreed it. Thou hast seen
That idol of thy soul, that fair Calista;
Thou has beheld her tears.

Alt. I have seen her weep;
I have seen that lovely one, that dear Calista,
Complaining, in the bitterness of sorrow,
That thou, my friend Horatio, thou hast wrong'd
her. [been fed]

Hor. That I have wrong'd her! Had her eyes
From that rich stream which warms her heart, and number'd

For every falling tear a drop of blood,
It had not been too much; for she has ruin'd thee,
Ev'n thee, my Altamont. She has undone thee.

Alt. Dost thou join ruin with Calista's name?
What is so fair, so exquisitely good?
Is she not more than painting can express,
Or youthful poets fancy when they love?

Does she not come, like wisdom, or good fortune,
Replete with blessings, giving wealth and honour?

Hor. It had been better thou hadst liv'd a beggar,
And fed on scraps at great men's surly doors,
Than to have match'd with one so false, so fatal.

Alt. It is too much for friendship to allow thee.
Because I tamely bore the wrong thou didst her,
Thou dost avow the barb'rous, brutal part,
And urge the injury ev'n to my face.

Hor. I see she has got possession of thy heart,
She has charm'd thee, like a siren, to her bed,
With looks of love, and with enchanting sounds:
Too late the rocks and quicksands will appear;

When thou art wreck'd upon the faithless shore,
Then vainly wish thou hadst not left thy friend,
To follow her delusion.

Alt. If thy friendship
Does churlishly deny my love a room,
It is not worth my keeping; I disclaim it.

Hor. Canst thou so soon forget what I've been to thee?

I shar'd the task of nature with thy father,
And form'd with care thy unexperienc'd youth
To virtue and to arms.

Thy noble father, oh, thou light young man!
Would he have us'd me thus? One fortune fed us;
For his was ever mine, mine his, and both
Together flourish'd, and together fell.

He call'd me friend, like thee: would he have left
me

Thus for a woman, and a vile one, too?

Alt. Thou canst not, dar'st not mean it! Speak again;

Say, who is vile; but dare not name Calista.

Hor. I had not spoke at first, unless compell'd,
And forc'd to clear myself; but since thus urg'd,
I must avow, I do not know a viler.

Alt. Thou wert my father's friend; he lov'd thee
well;

A kind of venerable mark of him
Hangs round thee, and protects thee from my vengeance.

I cannot, dare not lift my sword against thee,
But henceforth never let me see thee more.

(Going out.)

Hor. I love thee still, ungrateful as thou art,
And must and will preserve thee from dishonour,
Ev'n in despite of thee. (Holds him.)

Alt. Let go my arm.

Hor. If honour be thy care, if thou wouldst live
Without the name of credulous, wittol husband,
Avoid thy bride, shun her detested bed,
The joys it yields are dash'd with poison.

Alt. Off!

To urge me but a minute more is fatal.

Hor. She is polluted, stain'd—

Alt. Madness and raging!

But, hence—

Hor. Dishonour'd by the man you hate.

Alt. I pr'ythee, loose me yet, for thy own sake,
If life be worth thy keeping.

Hor. By Lothario.

Alt. Perdition take thee, villain, for the falsehood! (Strikes him.)

Now, nothing but thy life can make atonement.

Hor. A blow! thou hast us'd me well. (Draws.)

Alt. This to thy heart!

Hor. Yet, hold! By heav'n, his father's in his face!

Spite of my wrongs, my heart runs o'er with tenderness,

And I could rather die myself than hurt him.

Alt. Defend thyself; for by my much-wrong'd
love,

I swear, the poor evasion shall not save thee.

Hor. Yet, hold! thou know'st I dare.

(They fight.)

Enter LAVINIA, who runs between their swords.

Lav. My brother! my Horatio! Is it possible?
Oh! turn your cruel swords upon Lavinia.

If you must quench your impious rage in blood,
Behold my heart shall give you all her store,
To save those dearer streams that flow from your's.

Alt. 'Tis well thou hast found a safeguard; none
but this,

No pow'r on earth, could save thee from my fury.

Hor. Safety from thee!

Away, vain boy! Hast thou forgot the rev'rence
Due to my arm; thy first, thy great example;
Which pointed out thy way to noble daring,
And shew'd thee what is was to be a man?

Lav. What busy, meddling fiend, what foe to goodness,
Could kindle such a discord?

Hor. Ask'st thou what made us foes? 'Twas base ingratitude,
'Twas such a sin to friendship, as heaven's mercy,
That strives with man's untoward, monstrous wickedness,

Unwearied with forgiving, scarce could pardon.
He who was all to me, child, brother, friend,
With barb'rous bloody malice, sought my life.

Alt. Thou art my sister, and I would not make thee

The lonely mourner of a widow'd bed;
Therefore, thy husband's life is safe: but warn him,
No more to know this hospitable roof.
He has but ill repaid Sciolto's bounty.

We must not meet; 'tis dangerous. Farewell!
(He is going, Lavinia holds him.)

Lav. Stay, Altamont; my brother, stay.

Alt. It cannot, sha'not be; you must not hold me.

Lav. Look kindly, then.

Alt. Each minute that I stay,
Is a new injury to fair Calista.
From thy false friendship, to her arms I'll fly:
Then own, the joys which on her charms attend,
Have more than paid me for my faithless friend.

[Breaks from Lavinia, and exit.]

Hor. Oh! raise thee, my Lavinia, from the earth.
It is too much; this tide of flowing grief,
This wond'rous waste of tears, too much to give
To an ungrateful friend, and cruel brother.

Lav. Is there not cause for weeping? Oh, Horatio!

A brother and a husband were my treasure;
'Twas all the little wealth that poor Lavinia
Sav'd from the shipwreck of her father's fortunes.
One half is lost already. If thou leav'st me,
If thou shouldst prove unkind to me, as Altamont,
Whom shall I find to pity my distress;
To have compassion on a helpless wanderer,
And give her where to lay her wretched head?

Hor. Why dost thou wound me with thy soft complainings?

Though Altamont be false, and use me hardly,
Yet think not I impute his crimes to thee.
Talk not of being forsaken; for I'll keep thee
Next to my heart, my certain pledge of happiness.

Lav. Then you will love me still, cherish me ever,
And hide me from misfortune in your bosom?

Hor. But for the love I owe the good Sciolto,
From Genoa, from falsehood, and inconstancy,
To some more honest, distant clime I'd go.
Nor would I be beholden to my country,
For aught but thee, the partner of my flight.

Lav. And I would follow thee: forsake, for thee,

My country, brother, friends, ev'n all I have.
Though mine's a little all, yet were it more,
And better far, it should be left for thee,
And all that I would keep should be Horatio.
So, when a merchant sees his vessel lost,
Though richly freighted from a foreign coast,
Gladly, for life, the treasure he would give,
And only wishes to escape, and live:
Gold, and his gains, no more employ his mind;
But, driving o'er the billows with the wind,
Cleaves to one faithful plank, and leaves the rest behind. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

LOTHARIO and CALISTA discovered.

Loth. Weep not, my fair; but let the god of love
Laugh in thy eyes, and revel in thy heart,
Kindle again his torch, and hold it high,
To light us to new joys. Nor let a thought
Of discord, or disquiet past, molest thee;

But to a long oblivion give thy cares,
And let us melt the present hour in bliss.

Cal. Seek not to sooth me with thy false endearments,

To charm me with thy softness: 'tis in vain:
Thou canst no more betray, nor I be ruin'd.
The hours of folly and of fond delight,
Are wasted all, and fled; those that remain
Are doom'd to weeping, anguish, and repentance.
I come to charge thee with a long account
Of all the sorrows I have known already,
And all I have to come; thou hast undone me.

Loth. Unjust Calista! dost thou call it ruin,
To love as we have done; to melt, to languish,
To wish for somewhat exquisitely happy,
And then be blest ev'n to that wish's height?
To die with joy, and straight to live again;
Speechless to gaze, and with tumultuous transport—

Cal. Oh! let me hear no more; I cannot bear it;
'Tis deadly to remembrance. Let that night,
That guilty night, be blotted from the year;
For 'twas that night that gave me up to shame,
To sorrow, to the false Lothario.

Loth. Hear this, ye pow'rs! mark, how the fair deceiver

Sadly complains of violated truth;
She calls me false, ev'n she, the faithless she,
Whom day and night, whom heav'n and earth,
have heard

Sighing to vow, and tenderly protest,
Ten thousand times, she would be only mine;
And yet, behold, she has giv'n herself away;
Fled from my arms, and wedded to another,
Ev'n to the man whom most I hate on earth.

Cal. Art thou so base to upbraid me with a crime,
Which nothing but thy cruelty could cause?
If indignation raging in my soul,
For thy unmanly insolence and scorn,
Urg'd me to do a deed of desperation,
And wound myself to be reveng'd on thee,
Think whom I should devote to death and hell,
Whom curse as my undoer, but Lothario?
Hadst thou been just, not all Sciolto's pow'r,
Not all the vows and pray'rs of sighing Altamont,
Could have prevail'd, or won me to forsake thee.

Loth. How have I fail'd in justice, or in love?
Burns not my flame as brightly as at first?
Ev'n now my heart beats high, I languish for thee,
My transports are as fierce, as strong my wishes,
As if thou ne'er hadst bless'd me with thy beauty.

Cal. How didst thou dare to think that I would live

A slave to base desires and brutal pleasures,
To be a wretched wanton for thy leisure,
To toy and waste an hour of idle time with?
My soul disdains thee for so mean a thought.

Loth. The driving storm of passion will have
way,

And I must yield before it. Wert thou calm,
Love, the poor criminal whom thou hast doom'd,
Has yet a thousand tender things to plead,
To charm thy rage, and mitigate his fate.

Enter ALTAMONT behind.

Alt. Ha! Do I live and wake? (Aside.)

Cal. Hadst thou been true, how happy had I been!

Not Altamont, but thou, hadst been my lord.
But wherefore nam'd I happiness with thee?
It is for thee, for thee, that I am curs'd;
For thee my secret soul each hour arraigns me,
Calls me to answer for my virtue stain'd;
My honour lost to thee: for thee it haunts me
With stern Sciolto vowing vengeance on me,
With Altamont complaining for his wrongs—

Alt. Behold him here! (Coming forward.)

Cal. Ah! (Starting.)

Alt. The wretch! whom thou has made.

Curses and sorrows hast thou heap'd upon him,
And vengeance is the only good that's left.

(Drawing.)

Loth. Thou hast ta'en me somewhat unawares,
'tis true:

But love and war take turns, like day and night,
And little preparation serves my turn,
Equal to both, and arm'd for either field.
We've long been foes; this moment ends our quarrel;

Earth, heav'n, and fair Calista, judge the combat!

(They fight: Lothario falls.)

Oh, Altamont! thy genius is the stronger!
Thou hast prevail'd! My fierce, ambitious soul
Declining droops, and all her fires grow pale;
Yet let not this advantage swell thy pride;
I conquer'd in my turn, in love I triumph'd.
Those joys are lodg'd beyond the reach of fate;
That sweet revenge comes smiling to my thoughts,
Adorns my fall, and cheers my heart in dying.

(Dies.)

Cal. And what remains for me, beset with shame, Encompass'd round with wretchedness? There is
But this one way to break the toil, and 'scape.

(She catches up Lothario's sword, and offers to kill herself; Altamont runs to her, and wrests it from her.)

Alt. What means thy frantic rage?

Cal. Off! let me go.

Alt. Oh! thou hast more than murder'd me; yet still,
Still art thou here! and my soul starts with horror,
At thought of any danger that may reach thee.

Cal. Think'st thou I mean to live? to be forgiven?
Oh, thou hast known but little of Calista!
If thou hadst never heard my shame, if only
The midnight moon and silent stars had seen it,
I would not bear to be reproach'd by them,
But dig down deep to find a grave beneath,
And hide me from their beams.

Sci. (Within.) What, ho! my son!

Cal. Is it the voice of thunder, or my father?
Madness! Confusion! let the storm come on,
Let the tumultuous roar drive all upon me;
Dash my devoted bark, ye surges, break it!
'Tis for my ruin that the tempest rises.
When I am lost, sunk to the bottom low,
Peace shall return, and all be calm again.

Enter SCIOLO.

Sci. Ev'n now Rossano leap'd the garden wall.
Ha! death has been among you—Oh, my fears!
Last night thou hadst a diff'rence with thy friend,
The cause thou gav'st me for it was a damn'd one.
Didst thou not wrong the man who told thee truth?
Answer me quick—

Alt. Oh! press me not to speak;
Ev'n now my heart is breaking, and the mention
Will lay me dead before you. See that body,
And guess my shame! my ruin! Oh, Calista!

Sci. It is enough! but I am slow to execute,
And justice lingers in my lazy hand;
Thus let me wipe dishonour from my name,
And cut thee from the earth, thou stain to goodness—

(Offers to kill Calista; Altamont holds him.)

Alt. Stay thee, Sciolto, thou rash father, stay,
Or turn the point on me, and through my breast
Cut out the bloody passage to Calista;
So shall my love be perfect, while for her
I die, for whom alone I wish'd to live.

Cal. No, Altamont; my heart, that scorn'd thy
love,
Shall never be indebted to thy pity.
Thus torn, defac'd, and wretched as I seem,
Still I have something of Sciolto's virtue.
Yes, yes, my father, I applaud thy justice;
Strike home, and I will bless thee for the blow;
Be merciful, and free me from my pain;

'Tis sharp, 'tis terrible, and I could curse
The cheerful day, men, earth, and heav'n, and thee,
Ev'n thee, thou venerable, good, old man,
For being author of a wretch like me.

Sci. Thy pious care has giv'n me time to think,
And sav'd me from a crime; then rest, my sword;
To honour have I kept thee ever sacred,
Nor will I stain thee with a rash revenge.
But, mark me well, I will have justice done;
Hope not to bear away thy crimes unpunish'd:
I will see justice executed on thee,
Ev'n to a Roman strictness; and thou, nature,
Or whatsoe'er thou art that plead'st within me,
Be still; thy tender strugglings are in vain.

Cal. Then am I doom'd to live, and bear your triumph?

To groan beneath your scorn and fierce upbraiding?
Daily to be reproach'd, and have my misery
At morn, at noon, at night, told over to me?
Is this, is this the mercy of a father?
I only beg to die, and he denies me.

Sci. Hence from my sight! thy father cannot bear thee;

Fly with thy infamy to some dark cell,
Where, on the confines of eternal night,
Mourning, misfortune, cares, and anguish dwell;
Where ugly shame hides her opprobrious head,
And death and hell detested rule maintain;
There howl out the remainder of thy life,
And wish thy name may be no more remember'd.

Cal. Yes, I will fly to some such dismal place,
And be more curs'd than you can wish I were;
This fatal form, that drew on my undoing,
Fasting, and tears, and hardships, shall destroy;
Nor light, nor food, nor comfort will I know,
Nor aught that may continue hated life.
Then when you see me meagre, wan, and chang'd,
Stretch'd at my length, and dying in my cave,
On that cold earth I mean shall be my grave,
Perhaps you may relent, and sighing say,
At length her tears have wash'd her stains away;
At length 'tis time her punishment should cease;
Die, thou poor suff'ring wretch, and be at peace.

[Exit.]

Sci. Who of my servants wait there?

Enter two or three Servants.

Raise that body, and bear it in. On your lives
Take care my doors be guarded well, that none
Pass out, or enter, but by my appointment.

[Exeunt Servants, with Lothario's body.]

Alt. There is a fatal fury in your visage,
It blazes fierce, and menaces destruction.
I tremble at the vengeance which you meditate
On the poor, faithless, lovely, dear Calista.

Sci. Hast thou not read what brave Virginius did?

With his own hand he slew his only daughter,
To save her from the fierce Decemvir's lust.
He slew her, yet unspotted, to prevent The shame which she might know. Then what should I do?

But thou hast tied my hand. I won't kill her;
Yet, by the ruin she has brought upon us,
The common infamy that brands us both,
She sha'n't escape.

Alt. You mean that she shall die then?

Sci. Ask me not what, nor how I have resolv'd,
For all within is anarchy and uproar.
Oh, Altamont! what a vast scheme of joy
Has this one day destroy'd? Well did I hope
This daughter would have bless'd my latter days;
That I should live to see you the world's wonder,
So happy, great, and good, that none were like
you.

While I, from busy life and care set free,
Had spent the evening of my age at home,
Among a little prattling race of yours;
There, like an old man, talk'd awhile, and then

Laid down and slept in peace. Instead of this,
Sorrow and shame must bring me to my grave—
Oh, damn her! damn her!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Arm yourself, my lord;
Rossano, but now escap'd the garden,
Has gather'd in the street a band of rioters,
Who threaten you and all your friends with ruin,
Unless Lothario be return'd in safety. [Exit.]

Sci. By heav'n, their fury rises to my wish,
Nor shall misfortune know my house alone;
But thou, Lothario, and thy race, shall pay me
For all the sorrows which my age is curs'd with.
I think my name as great, my friends as potent,
As any in the state; all shall be summon'd;
I know that all will join their hands to ours,
And vindicate thy vengeance. When our force
Is full and arm'd, we shall expect thy sword
To join with us, and sacrifice to justice. [Exit.]

Alt. There is a heavy weight upon my senses;
A dismal, sullen stillness, that succeeds
The storm of rage and grief, like silent death,
After the tumult and the noise of life.
Would it were death, as sure 'tis wondrous like it,
For I am sick of living; my soul's pall'd,
She kindles not with anger or revenge;
Love was th' informing, active fire within:
Now that is quench'd, the mass forgets to move,
And longs to mingle with its kindred earth. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—*A Room hung with black; on one side
Lothario's body on a bier; on the other a table, with a skull and other bones, a book and a lamp on it.*

CALISTA is discovered on a couch, in black; her hair hanging loose and disordered. After soft music, she rises and comes forward.

Cal. 'Tis well! these solemn sounds, this pomp of horror,

Are fit to feed the frenzy in my soul.
Here's room for meditation ev'n to madness,
Till the mind burst with thinking. This dull flame
Sleeps in the socket. Sure the book was left
To tell me something; for instruction then—
He teaches holy sorrow and contrition,
And penitence.—Is it become an art then?
A trick that lazy, dull, luxurious gownmen
Can teach us to do over? I'll no more on't;
(Throwing away the book.)

I have more real anguish in my heart,
Than all their pedant discipline e'er knew.
What charnel has been rifled for these bones?
Fie! this is pageantry; they look uncouthly.
But what of that, if he or she that own'd 'em
Safe from disquiet sit, and smile to see
The farce their miserable relics play?
But here's a sight is terrible indeed!
Is this that haughty, gallant, gay Lothario,
That dear, perfidious—Ah!—how pale he looks!
And those dead eyes!—How grim with clotted
blood!—

Ascend, ye ghosts, fantastic forms of night,
In all your diff'rent dreadful shapes ascend,
And match the present horror, if you can.

Enter SCIOLO.

Sci. This dead of night, this silent hour of dark-
ness,

Nature for rest ordain'd, and soft repose;
And yet distraction and tumultuous jars,
Keep all our frightened citizens awake:
Amidst the gen'ral wreck, see where she stands,
(Pointing to Calista.)

Like Helen, in the night when Troy was sack'd,
Spectatress of the mischief which she made.

Cal. It is Sciolto! Be thyself, my soul,
Be strong to bear his fatal indignation,

That he might see thou art not lost so far,
But somewhat still of his great spirit lives
In the forlorn Calista.

Sci. Thou wert once
My daughter.

Cal. Happy were it I had died,
And never lost that name.

Sci. That's something yet;
Thou wert the very darling of my age:
I thought the day too short to gaze upon thee,
That all the blessings I could gather for thee,
By cares on earth, and by my pray'rs to heav'n,
Were little for my fondness to bestow;
Why didst thou turn to folly then, and curse me?

Cal. Because my soul was rudely drawn from yours,
A poor, imperfect copy of my father;
It was because I lov'd, and was a woman.

Sci. Hadst thou been honest, thou hadst been a cherubim;

But of that joy, as of a gem long lost,
Beyond redemption gone, think we no more.
Hast thou e'er dar'd to meditate on death?

Cal. I have, as on the end of shame and sorrow.

Sci. Ha! answer me! Say, hast thou coolly thought?

'Tis not the stoic's lessons got by rote,
The pomp of words, and pedant dissertations,
That can sustain thee in that hour of terror;
Books have taught cowards to talk nobly of it,
But when the trial comes they stand aghast;
Hast thou consider'd what may happen after it?
How thy account may stand, and what to answer?

Cal. I've turn'd my eyes inward upon myself,
Where foul offence and shame have laid all waste;
Therefore my soul abhors the wretched dwelling,
And longs to find some better place of rest.

Sci. 'Tis justly thought, and worthy of that spirit
That dwelt in ancient Latian breasts, when Rome
Was mistress of the world. I would go on,
And tell thee all my purpose; but it sticks
Here at my heart, and cannot find a way.

Cal. Then spare the telling, if it be a pain,
And write the meaning with your poniard here.

Sci. Oh! truly guess'd; seest thou this trembling hand? (Holding up a dagger.)
Thrice justice urg'd—and thrice the slackening sinews

Forgot their office, and confess'd the father.
At length the stubborn virtue has prevail'd;
It must, it must be so—Oh! take it then,

(Giving the dagger.)
And know the rest untaught.

Cal. I understand you.

It is but thus, and both are satisfied.

(She offers to kill herself; Sciolto catches hold of her arm.)

Sci. A moment, give me yet a moment's space.
The stern, the rigid judge has been obey'd;
Now nature, and the father, claim their turns.
I've held the balance with an iron hand,
And put off every tender human thought,
To doom my child to death; but spare my eyes
The most unnat'ral sight, lest their strings crack,
My old brain split, and I grow mad with horror.

Cal. Ha! is it possible? and is there yet
Some little, dear remain of love and tenderness
For poor, undone Calista, in your heart?

Sci. Oh! when I think what pleasure I took in
thee,

What joys thou gav'st me in thy prattling infancy,
Thy sprightly wit, and early blooming beauty;
How have I stood and fed my eyes upon thee,
Then, lifting up my hands and wond'ring bless'd
thee;

By my strong grief, my heart ev'n melts within me;
I could curse nature, and that tyrant, honour,
For making me thy father and thy judge;
Thou art my daughter still.

Cal. For that kind word,
Thus let me fall, thus humbly to the earth,
Weep on your feet, and bless you for this goodness.
Oh! 'tis too much for this offending wretch,
This parricide, that murders with her crimes,
Shortens her father's age, and cuts him off,
Ere little more than half his years be number'd.

Sci. Would it were otherwise! but thou must die.

Cal. That I must die, it is my only comfort;
Death is the privilege of human nature,
And life without it were not worth our taking:
Come then,
Thou meagre shade: here let me breathe my last,
Charm'd with my father's pity and forgiveness,
More than if angels tun'd their golden viols,
And sung a requiem to my parting soul.

Sci. I'm summon'd hence; ere this my friends expect me.

There is I know not what of sad presage,
That tells me I shall never see thee more;
If it be so, this is our last farewell,
And these the parting pangs, which nature feels,
When anguish rends the heart-strings.—Oh, my daughter! [Exit.]

Cal. Now think, thou curs'd Calista, now behold
The desolation, horror, blood, and ruin,
Thy crimes and fatal folly spread around,
That loudly cry for vengeance on thy head;
Yet heav'n, who knows our weak imperfect natures,
How blind with passions, and how prone to evil,
Makes not too strict inquiry for offences,
But is aton'd by penitence and pray'r:
Cheap recompense! here 'twould not be receiv'd;
Nothing but blood can make the expiation,
And cleanse the soul from inbred deep pollution.
And see, another injur'd wretch appears,
To call for justice from my tardy hand.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Hail to you, horrors! hail, thou house of death!
And thou, the lovely mistress of these shades,
Whose beauty gilds the more than midnight darkness,
And makes it grateful as the dawn of day.
Oh, take me in, a fellow mourner with thee,
I'll number groan for groan, and tear for tear;
And when the fountain of thy eyes are dry,
Mine shall supply the stream, and weep for both.

Cal. I know thee well, thou art the injur'd Altamont;
Thou com'st to urge me with the wrongs I've done thee;

But know I stand upon the brink of life,
And in a moment mean to set me free
From shame and thy upbraiding.

Alt. Falsely, falsely
Dost thou accuse me! O, forbid me not
To mourn thy loss,
To wish some better fate had rul'd our loves,
And that Calista had been mine, and true.

Cal. Oh, Altamont! 'tis hard for souls like mine,
Haughty and fierce, to yield they've done amiss.
But, oh, behold! my proud, disdainful heart
Bends to thy gentler virtue. Yes, I own,
Such is thy truth, thy tenderness, and love,
That, were I not abandon'd to destruction,
With thee I might have liv'd for ages bless'd,
And died in peace within thy faithful arms.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Now mourn indeed, ye miserable pair!
For now the measure of your woes is full.
The great, the good Sciolto dies this moment.

Cal. My father!

Alt. That's a deadly stroke indeed.

Hor. Not long ago, he privately went forth,
Attended but by few, and those unbidden.
I heard which way he took, and straight pursu'd him;

But found him compass'd by Lothario's faction,
Almost alone, amidst a crowd of foes.
Too late we brought him aid, and drove them back;
Ere that, his frantic valour had provok'd
The death he seem'd to wish for from their swords.

Cal. And dost thou bear me yet, thou patient earth?

Dost thou not labour with thy murd'rous weight?
And you, ye glitt'ring, heav'nly host of stars,
Hide your fair heads in clouds, or I shall blast you;
For I am all contagion, death, and ruin,
And nature sickens at me. Rest, thou world,
This parricide shall be thy plague no more;
Thus, thus I set thee free. (Stabs herself.)

Hor. Oh, fatal rashness!

Enter SCIOLTO, pale and bloody, supported by Servants.

Cal. Oh, my heart!

Well may'st thou fail; for see, the spring that fed
Thy vital stream is wasted, and runs low.
My father! will you now, at last, forgive me,
If, after all my crimes, and all your suff'rings,
I call you once again by that dear name?
Will you forget my shame, and those wide wounds?
Lift up your hand and bless me, ere I go
Down to my dark abode!

Sci. Alas, my daughter!
Thou hast rashly ventur'd in a stormy sea,
Where life, fame, virtue, all were wreck'd and lost.
But sure thou hast borne thy part in all the anguish,
And smarted with the pain. Then rest in peace:
Let silence and oblivion hide thy name,
And save thee from the malice of posterity;
And may'st thou find with heav'n the same forgiveness,
As with thy father here.—Die, and be happy.

Cal. Celestial sounds! Peace dawns upon my soul,
And ev'ry pain grows less—Oh, gentle Altamont!
Think not too hardly of me when I'm gone;
But pity me. Had I but early known
Thy wond'rous worth, thou excellent young man,
We had been happier both; now 'tis too late;
And yet my eyes take pleasure to behold thee;
Thou art their last dear object. Mercy, heav'n! (Dies.)

Sci. Oh, turn thee from that fatal object, Altamont!

Come near, and let me bless thee ere I die.
To thee and brave Horatio I bequeath
My fortunes.—Lay me by thy noble father,
And love my memory as thou hast his;
For thou hast been my son.—Oh, gracious heav'n!
Thou that hast endless blessings still in store
For virtue and for filial piety,
Let grief, disgrace, and want be far away;
But multiply thy mercies on his head.
Let honour, greatness, goodness, still be with him,
And peace in all his ways. (Dies.)

Hor. The storm of grief bears hard upon his youth,
And bends him, like a drooping flow'r to earth.
By such examples are we taught to prove
The sorrows that attend unlawful love.
Death, or some worse misfortune, soon divide
The injur'd bridegroom from his guilty bride.
If you would have the nuptial union last,
Let virtue be the bond that ties it fast. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A rocky Shore, with a Fisherman's Cabin in the Cliff: A violent tempest, with thunder and lightning: A Ship discovered stranded on the coast. After having looked out of their cabin, as if waiting for the abatement of the storm.—

Enter OLD GOODWIN, PHILIP, and FANNY.

Philip. It blows a rank storm; 'tis well, father, we hauled the boat ashore before the weather came on; she's safe bestowed, however, let what will happen.

O. Good. Ay, Philip, we had need be provident; except that poor skiff, my child, what have we left in this world that we can call our own?

Philip. To my thoughts, now, we live as happily in this poor hut as we did yonder in the great house, when you was 'Squire Belfield's principal tenant, and as topping a farmer as any in the whole county of Cornwall.

O. Good. Ah, child!

Philip. Nay, never droop; to be sure, father, the squire has dealt hardly with you, and a mighty point, truly, he has gained—the ruin of an honest man. If those are to be the uses of a great estate, heaven continue me what I am!

Fanny. Ay, ay, brother, a good conscience in a coarse druggot, is better than an aching heart in a silken gown.

O. Good. Well, children, well, if you can bear misfortunes patiently, 'twere an ill office for me to repine; we have long tilled the earth for a subsistence; now, Philip, we must plough the ocean; in those waves lies our harvest; there, my brave lad, we have an equal inheritance with the best.

Philip. True, father; the sea that feeds us, provides us an habitation here in the hollow of the cliff; I trust the squire will exact no rent for this dwelling. Alas! that ever two brothers should have been so opposite, as our merciless landlord, and the poor young gentleman they say is now dead!

O. Good. Sirrah, I charge you, name not that unhappy youth to me any more. I was endeavouring to forget him and his misfortunes, when the sight of that vessel in distress brought him afresh to my remembrance; for, it seems, he perished by sea; the more shame upon him whose cruelty and injustice drove him thither.—But come, the wind lulls apace; let us launch the boat, and make a trip to yonder vessel; if we can assist in lightening her, perhaps she may ride it out.

Philip. 'Tis to no purpose; the crew are coming ashore in their boat, I saw them enter the creek.

O. Good. Did you so? Then do you and your sister step into the cabin, make a good fire, and provide such fish and other stores as you have within; I will go down and meet them. Whoever they may be, that have suffered this misfortune on our coasts, let us remember, children, never to regard any man as an enemy, who stands in need of our protection. [Exit.]

Philip. I am strongly tempted to go down to the creek too. If father should light on any mischief,—well, for once in my life, I'll disobey him; sister, you can look to matters within doors, I'll go round by the point, and be there as soon as he.

Fanny. Do so, Philip, 'twill be best. [Exeunt.]

Enter OLD GOODWIN, followed by FRANCIS, and several Sailors, carrying goods and chests from the wreck.

O. Good. This way, my friends, this way; there's stowage enough within for all your goods.

Francis. Come, bear a hand, my brave lads; there's no time to lose: follow that honest man, and set down your chests where he directs you.

Sailor. Troth, I care not how soon I'm quit of mine; 'tis plaguy heavy. [Exeunt.]

Enter Sailors.

1 Sailor. Here's a pretty spot of work! plague on't, what a night has this been! I thought this d—d lee-shore would catch us at last.

2 Sailor. Why, 'twas impossible to claw her off; well, there's an end of her—the Charming Sally privateer! Poor soul! a better sea-boat never swam upon the salt sea.

3 Sailor. I knew we should have no luck, after we took up that woman there from the packet that sunk alongside us.

1 Sailor. What, Madam Violetta, as they call her? Why, 'tis like enough; but, hush, here comes our captain's nephew; he's a brave lad, and a sea-man's friend; and, between you and me—(Boatswain's whistle.)—But hark, we are called; come along. [Exeunt.]

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR, and FRANCIS.

Belf. jun. That ever fortune should cast us upon this coast, Francis.

Francis. Sir?

Belf. jun. Have the people landed those chests we brought off with us in the boat?

Francis. They have, sir; an old fisherman, whom we met, has shewn us here to a cavern in the cliff, where we have stowed them all in safety.

Belf. jun. That's well. Where's my uncle?

Francis. On board; no persuasions can prevail on him to quit the ship, which he swears will lift with the tide; his old crony, the master, is with him, and they ply the casks so briskly, that it seems a moot point which fills the fastest, they or the wreck.

Belf. jun. Strange insensibility! but you must bring him off by force then, if there is no other way of saving him; I think, o' my conscience, he is as indifferent to danger as the plank he treads on. We are now thrown upon my unnatural brother's estate; that house, Francis, which you see to the left, is his; and what may be the consequence if he and my uncle should meet, I know not; for such has been Captain Ironsides' resentment on my account, that he has declared war against the very name of Belfield, and, in one of his whimsical passions, you know, insisted on my laying it aside for ever; so that, hitherto, I have been known on board by no other name than that of Lewson.

Francis. 'Tis true, sir; and I think 'twill be advisable to continue the disguise as long as you can. As for the old Captain, from the life he always leads on shore, and his impatience to get on board again, I think 'tis very possible an interview between him and your brother may be prevented.

Belf. jun. I think so too. Go then, Francis, and conduct the old gentleman hither; I see Violetta coming. [Exit Francis.] Sure, there is something in that woman's story uncommonly mysterious. Of English parents, born in Lisbon, her family and fortune buried in the earthquake; so much she freely tells, but more, I am convinced, remains untold, and of a melancholy sort; she has once or twice, as I thought, seemed disposed to unbosom herself to me; but it is so painful to be told of sorrows one has not power to relieve, that I have hitherto avoided the discourse.

Enter VIOLETTA.

Well, madam, melancholy still? still that face of sorrow and despair? twice shipwrecked, and twice rescued from the jaws of death, do you regret your preservation? and have I incurred your displeasure by prolonging your existence?

Vio. Not so, Mr. Lewson; such ingratitude be far from me. Can I forget, when the vessel in which I had sailed from Portugal, foundered by your side, with what noble, what benevolent ardour, you flew to my assistance. Regardful only of my safety, your own seemed no part of your care.

Belf. jun. Oh, no more of this; the preservation of a fellow-creature is as natural as self-defence. You now, for the first time in your life, breathe the air of England; a rough reception it has given you; but be not, therefore, discouraged; our hearts, Violetta, are more accessible than our shores, nor can you find inhospitality in Britain, save only in our climate.

Vio. These characteristics of the English may be just; I take my estimate from a less favourable example.

Belf. jun. Villany, madam, is the growth of every soil; nor can I, while yonder habitation is in my view, forget that England has given birth to monsters that disgrace humanity; but this I will say for my countrymen, that where you can point out one rascal with a heart to wrong you, I will produce fifty honest fellows, ready and resolute to redress you.

Vio. Ah! but on what part of the English coast is it that we are now landed?

Belf. jun. On the coast of Cornwall.

Vio. Of Cornwall is it? You seem to know the owner of that house; are you well acquainted with the country hereabouts?

Belf. jun. Intimately; it has been the cradle of my infancy, and, with little interruption, my residence ever since.

Vio. You are amongst your friends, then, no doubt; how fortunate is it, that you will have their consolation and assistance in your distress!

Belf. jun. Madam—

Vio. Every moment will bring them down to the very shores; this brave, humane, this hospitable people, will flock in crowds to your relief; your friends, Mr. Lewson—

Belf. jun. My friends, Violetta! Must I confess it to you? I have no friends. Those rocks—that have thus scattered my treasures,—those waves, that have devoured them, to me are not so fatal as hath been that man whom nature meant to be my nearest friend.

Vio. What! and are you a fellow-sufferer, then? Is this the way you reconcile me to your nation? Are these the friends of human kind? Why don't we fly from this ungenerous, this ungrateful country?

Belf. jun. Hold, madam! one villain, however base, can no more involve a whole nation in his crimes, than one example, however dignified, can inspire it with his virtues. Thank heaven, the worthless owner of that mansion is yet without a rival.

Vio. You have twice directed my attention to that house; 'tis a lovely spot; what pity that so delicious a retirement should be made the residence of so undeserving a being.

Belf. jun. It is, indeed, a charming place; and was once the seat of hospitality and honour; but its present possessor, Andrew Belfield—Madam! for heaven's sake, what ails you? You seem suddenly disordered. Have I said—

Vio. No, 'tis nothing; don't regard me, Mr. Lewson; I am weak, and subject to these surprises; I shall be glad, however, to retire.

Belf. jun. A little repose, I hope, will relieve you; within this hut some accommodation may be found. Lean on my arm. (Leads her to the door of the cabin.)

Enter OLD GOODWIN.

O. Good. Heaven defend me! do my eyes deceive me? 'tis wondrous like his shape, his air, his look—

Belf. jun. What is your astonishment, friend? Do you know me? If it was not for that habit, I should say your name is Goodwin.

O. Good. 'Tis he! he is alive! my dear young master, Mr. Belfield! Yes, sir, my name is Goodwin. However changed my appearance, my heart is still the same, and overflows with joy at this unexpected meeting.

Belf. jun. Give me thy hand, my old, my honest friend; and is this sorry hole thy habitation?

O. Good. It is.

Belf. jun. The world, I see, has frowned on thee since we parted.

O. Good. Yes, sir; but what are my misfortunes? You must have undergone innumerable hardships; and now, at last, shipwrecked on your own coast. Well, but your vessel is not totally lost; and we will work night and day in saving your effects.

Belf. jun. Oh! as for that, the sea gave all, let it take back a part; I have enough on shore not to envy my brother his fortune. But there is one blessing, Master Goodwin, I own I should grudge him the possession of—There was a young lady—

O. Good. What, sir, haven't you forgot Miss Sophia?

Belf. jun. Forgot her! my heart trembles while I ask you, if she is indeed as you call her, Miss Sophia?

O. Good. She is yet unmarried, though every day we expect—

Belf. jun. 'Tis enough! Fortune, I acquit thee! Happy be the winds that threw me on this coast, and blest the rocks that received me. Let my vessel go to pieces; she has done her part in bearing me hither; while I can cast myself at the feet of my Sophia, recount to her my unabating passion, and have one fair struggle for her heart. [Exeunt.

Enter VIOLETTA.

Vio. Once more I am alone. How my heart sunk, when Lewson pronounced the name of Belfield! It must be he! it must be my false, cruel, yet (spite of all my wrongs) beloved husband!—Yes, there he lives, each circumstance confirms it: Cornwall the county; here the sea-coast, and these white craggy cliffs; there the disposition of his seat, the grove, lake, lawn; every feature of the landscape tallies with the descriptions he has given me of it. What shall I do, and to whom shall I complain? When Lewson spoke of him, it was with a bitterness that shocked me. I will not disclose myself to him; by what fell from him, I suspect he is related to Mr. Belfield; but hush! I talk to these rocks, and forget that they have ears.

Enter FANNY.

Fanny. Are you any better, madam? Is the air of any service to you?

Vio. I am much relieved by it; the beauty of that place attracted my attention; and, if you please, we will walk further up the hill to take a nearer view of it. [Exeunt.

Enter Sailors.

Omnes. Huzza! huzza! huzza!

1 Sailor. Long life to your honour! welcome ashore, noble Captain.

2 Sailor. Avast there, Jack! stand clear, and let his old honour pass; bless his heart, he looks cheerly, howsomever; let the world wag as it will, he'll never flinch.

3 Sailor. Not he; he's true English oak to the heart of him; and a fine old seaman-like figure he is.

Enter IRONSIDES and SKIFF.

Ironsides. Ah, messmates, we're all a-ground; I have been taking a parting cup with the Charming Sally: she's gone, but the stoutest bark must have an end; master, here, and I did all we could to lighten her; we took leave of her in an officer-like manner.

1 Sailor. Hang sorrow; we know the worst on't: 'tis only taking a fresh cruize; and, for my part, I'll sail with Captain Ironsides as far as there's water to carry me.

Omnes. So we will all.

Ironsides. Say ye so, my hearts? if the wind sits that way, hoist sail, say I; old George will make one amongst you, if that be all; I hate an idle life. So, so, away to your work; to-morrow we'll make a day on't. [Exeunt Sailors.

Ironsides. Skiff!

Skiff. Here, your honour.

Ironsides. I told you, Skiff, how 'twould be; if you had luff'd up in time, as I would have had you, and not made so free with the land, this mishap had never come to pass.

Skiff. Lord love you, Captain Ironsides, 'twas a barrel of beef to a biscuit, the wind had not shifted so direct contrary as it did; who could have thought it?

Ironsides. Why, I could have thought it; every body could have thought it. Do you consider whereabouts you are, mun? Upon the coast of England, as I take it. Everything here goes contrary both by sea and land. Everything whips, and chops, and changes about, like mad in this country; and the people, I think, are as full of vagaries as the climate.

Skiff. Well, I could have sworn—

Ironsides. Ay, so you could, Skiff, and so you did, pretty roundly too; but for the good you did by it, you might as well have puff'd a whiff of tobacco in the wind's face.

Skiff. Well, Captain, though we have lost our ship, we haven't lost our all; thank the fates we've saved treasure enough to make all our fortunes, notwithstanding.

Ironsides. Fortunes, quotha? What have two such old weather-beaten fellows as thee and I are, to do with fortune? or, indeed, what has fortune to do with us? Flip and tobacco is the only luxury we have any relish for; had we fine houses, could we live in them?—a greasy hammock has been our birth for these fifty years;—fine horses? could we ride them? and as for the fair sex there, that my nephew makes such a pother about, I don't know what thou may'st think of the matter, Skiff; but, for my own part, I should not care if there were no such animals in the creation.

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR.

Belf. jun. Uncle; what cheer, man?

Ironsides. Oh, Bob, is it thee? whither bound now, my dear boy?

Belf. jun. Why, how can you ask such a question? We have landed our treasure, saved all our friends, and set foot upon English ground; and what business, think you, can a young fellow like me have, but one?

Ironsides. Psha! you're a fool, Bob; these wenches will be the undoing of you; a plague of them altogether, say I. What are they good for, but to spoil company, and keep brave fellows from their duty? O' my conscience, they do more mischief to the king's navy in one twelvemonth, than the French have done in ten; a pack of—but I ha' done with 'em; thank the stars, I ha' fairly washed my hands of them; I ha' nothing to say to none of them.

Skiff. Mercy be good unto us! that my wife could but hear your worship talk!

Belf. jun. Oh, my dear uncle—

Ironsides. But I'll veer away no more good advice after you; so even drive as you will, under your petticoat-sails; black, brown, fair, or tawny, 'tis all fish that comes in your net; why, where's your reason, Bob, all this here while? Where's your religion, and be d—d to you?

Belf. jun. Come, come, my dear uncle, a truce to your philosophy. Go, throw your dollars into yonder ocean, and bribe the tempest to be still; you shall as soon reverse the operations of nature as wean my heart from my Sophia.

Ironsides. Hold, hold, take me right; if, by Sophia, you mean the daughter of Sir Benjamin Dove, I don't care if I make one with you. What say'st thou, boy? shall it be so?

Belf. jun. So, then you think there may be one good woman, however?

Ironsides. Just as I think there may be one honest Dutchman, one sober German, or one righteous methodist. Look ye, Bob, so I do but keep single, I have no objection to other people's marrying; but, on those occasions, I would manage myself as I would my ship; not by running her into every odd creek and cranny, in the smuggling fashion, as if I had no good credentials to produce; but play fairly, and in sight d'ye see; and, whenever a safe harbour opens, stand boldly in, boy, and lay her up snug, in a good birth, once for all.

Belf. jun. Come then, uncle, let us about it; and you may greatly favour my enterprise, since you can keep the father and mother in play, while I—

Ironsides. Avast, young man, avast! the father, if you please, without the mother; Sir Benjamin's a passable good companion for a landman, but for my lady—I'll have nothing to say to my lady; she's his wife, thank the stars, and not mine.

Belf. jun. Be it as you will; I shall be glad of your company on any terms.

Ironsides. Say no more then. About ship! if you are bound for that port, I'm your mate. Master, look to the wreck; I'm for a fresh cruize. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Outside of Sir Benjamin Dove's house.

Enter BELFIELD SENIOR, and LUCY WATERS.

Lucy. What, don't I know you? haven't you been to me, of all mankind, the basest?

Belf. Not yet, Lucy.

Lucy. Sure, Mr. Belfield, you won't pretend to deny it to my face!

Belf. To thy face, child, I will not pretend that I can deny anything; you are much too handsome to be contradicted.

Lucy. Pish!

Belf. So, so.

Lucy. Haven't you, faithless as you are, promised me marriage, over and over again?

Belf. Repeatedly.

Lucy. And you have now engaged yourself to the daughter of Sir Benjamin Dove, have you not?

Belf. Assuredly.

Lucy. Let me demand of you, then, Mr. Belfield, since you have no honourable designs towards me yourself, why you prevented those of an humbler lover, young Philip, the son of your late tenant, poor Goodwin?

Belf. For the very reasons you state in your question; because I had no honourable designs, and he had. You disappointed my hopes, and I was resolved to defeat his.

Lucy. And this you thought reason sufficient to expel his father from your farm; to persecute him, and his innocent family, till you had accomplished their ruin, and driven them to the very brink of the ocean for their habitation and subsistence?

Belf. Your questions, Miss Lucy, begin to be impertinent.

Lucy. Oh, do they touch you, sir? But I'll waste no more time with you, my business is with your Sophia; here, in the very spot which you hope to make the scene of your guilty triumphs, will I expose you to her; set forth your inhuman conduct to your unhappy brother, and detect the mean artifices you have been driven to, in order to displace him in her affections.

Belf. You will?

Lucy. I will, be assured; so let them pass.

Belf. Stay, Lucy, understand yourself a little better. Didn't you pretend to Sophia, that my brother paid his addresses to you; that he had pledged himself to marry you; nay, that he had—

Lucy. Hold, Mr. Belfield, nor further explain a transaction, which, though it reflects shame enough upon me, that was your instrument, ought to cover you, who was principal in the crime, with treble confusion and remorse.

Belf. True, child, it was rather a disreputable transaction; and 'tis therefore fit no part of it should rest with me: I shall disavow it altogether.

Lucy. Incredible confidence!

Belf. We shall see who will meet most belief in the world, you or I; chuse, therefore, your part; if you keep my secret, you make me your friend; if you betray it, you have me for your enemy; and a fatal one you shall find me. Now enter, if you think fit; there lies your way to Sophia. [Exit Lucy into the house.] So! how am I to parry this blow? what plea shall I use with Sophia?—'twas the ardour of my love; anything will find pardon with a woman, that conveys flattery to her charms. After all, if the worst should happen, and I should be defeated in this match, so shall I be saved from doing that, which, when done, 'tis probable I may repent of; and I have some intimations from within, which tell me that it will be so: I perceive that, in this life, he, who is checked by the rubs of compunction, can never arrive at the summit of prosperity.

Enter PATERSON.

Paterson. What, melancholy, Mr. Belfield? So near your happiness, and so full of thought?

Belf. Happiness! What's that?

Paterson. I'll tell you, sir; the possession of a lovely girl with fifty thousand pounds in her lap, and twice fifty thousand virtues in her mind; this I call happiness, as much as mortal man can merit; and this, as I take it, you are destined to enjoy.

Belf. That is not so certain, Mr. Paterson. Would you believe it? that perverse hussy, Lucy Waters, who left me but this minute, threatens to transverse all my hopes, and is gone this instant to Sophia with that resolution.

Paterson. Impossible! how is Miss Waters provided or provoked to do this?

Belf. Why, 'tis a foolish story, and scarce worth relating to you; but you know, when your letters called me home from Portugal, I found my younger brother in close attendance on Miss Dove; and, indeed, such good use had the fellow made of his time in my absence, that I found it impossible to counterwork his operations by fair and open approaches; so, to make short of the story, I took this girl, Lucy Waters, into partnership, and, by a happy device, ruined him with Sophia.

Paterson. This, Mr. Belfield, I neither know, nor wish to know.

Belf. Let it pass, then. Defeated in these views, my brother, as you know, betook himself to the desperate course of privateering, with that old tar-barrel, my uncle; what may have been his fate, I know not, but I have found it convenient to propagate a report of his death.

Paterson. I am sorry for it, Mr. Belfield; I wish nothing was convenient, that can be thought dishonourable.

Belf. Nature, Mr. Paterson, never put into a human composition more candour and credulity than she did into mine; but acquaintance with life has shewn me how impracticable these principles are; to live with mankind, we must live like mankind; were it a world of honesty, I should blush to be a man of art.

Paterson. And do you dream of ever reaching your journey's end by such crooked paths as these are?

Belf. And yet, my most sage moralist, wonderful as it may seem to thee, true it is, notwithstanding, that, after having treaded all these by-ways and crooked alleys, which thy right-lined apprehensions knows nothing of; after having driven my rival from the field, and being almost in possession of the spoil, still I feel a repugnance in me that almost tempts me to renounce my good fortune, and abandon a victory I have struggled so hard to obtain.

Paterson. I guessed as much; 'tis your Violetta, 'tis your fair Portuguese, that counterworks your good fortune; and I must own to you, it was principally to save you from that improvident attachment, that I wrote so pressingly for your return; but though I have got your body in safe holding, your heart is still at Lisbon; and if you marry Miss Dove, 'tis because Violetta's fortune was demolished by the earthquake; and Sir Benjamin's stands safe upon terra firma.

Belf. jun. Pr'ythee, Paterson, don't be too hard upon me; sure you don't suspect that I am married to Violetta?

Paterson. Married to Violetta! Now you grow much too serious, and 'tis time to put an end to the discourse. [Exit into the house.]

Belf. jun. And you grow much too quick-sighted, Mr. Paterson, for my acquaintance. I think he does not quite suspect me of double-dealing in this business; and yet I have my doubts: his reply to my question was equivocal, and his departure abrupt; I know not what to think;—this I know, that love is a deity, and avarice a devil; that Violetta is my lawful wife; and that Andrew Belfield is a villain. [Exit.]

Re-enter PATERSON.

Paterson. All abroad this fine day, not a creature within doors.

Enter KITTY.

Kitty. Mr. Paterson! hist! Mr. Paterson, a word in your ear, sweet sir.

Paterson. Curse on't, she has caught me. Well, Mrs. Kitty?

Kitty. Why, I have been hunting you all the house over; my lady's impatient to see you.

Paterson. Oh, I'm my Lady Dove's most obedient servant. And what are her ladyship's commands, pray?

Kitty. Fie, Mr. Paterson; how should I know what her ladyship wants with you? but a secret it is, no doubt, for she desires you to come to her immediately in the garden, at the bottom of the yew-tree walk, next the warren.

Paterson. The devil she does? What a pity it is, Mrs. Kitty, we can't cure your lady of this turn for solitude; I wish you would go with me; your company, probably, will divert her from her contemplations; besides, I shall certainly mistake the place.

Kitty. I go with you, Mr. Paterson! a fine thing truly! I'd have you to know that my character is not to be trusted with young fellows in yew-tree walks, whatever my lady may think of the matter; besides, I've an assignation in another place. [Exit.]

Paterson. What a devilish dilemma am I in! Why, this is a peremptory assignation. Certain it is, there are some ladies that no wise man should be commonly civil to; here have I been flattering myself that I was stroking a termagant into humour, and all the while have been betraying a tender victim into love. Love! love, did I say? her ladyship's passion is a disgrace to the name; but what shall I do? 'tis a pitiful thing to run away from a victory; but 'tis frequently the case in precipitate successes, we conquer more than we have wit to keep, or ability to enjoy. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Yew-tree Walk.

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR.

Belf. jun. Now, could I but meet my Sophia—Where can she have hid herself? Hush! Lady Dove, as I live.

Enter LADY DOVE.

Lady D. So, Mr. Paterson, you're a pretty gentleman, to keep a lady waiting here; why, how you stand? Come, come, I shall expect a very handsome atonement for this indecorum. Why, what! let me look. Ah! who have we here?

Belf. jun. A man, madam; and, though not your man, yet one as honest and as secret: come, come, my lady, I'm no tell-tale; be you but grateful, this goes no further.

Lady D. Lost and undone! young Belfield!

Belf. jun. The same, but be not alarmed; we both have our secrets; I am, like you, a votary to love: favour but my virtuous passion for Miss Dove, and take you your Paterson; I shall be silent as the grave.

Lady D. Humph!

Belf. jun. Nay, never hesitate; my brother, I know, had your wishes: but wherein has nature favoured him more than me? And, since fortune has now made my scale as heavy as his, why should you partially direct the beam?

Lady D. Well, if it is so, and that you promise not to betray me—but this accident has so discomposed me; (plague on't, say I!) don't press me any further, at present; I must leave you; remember the condition of our agreement, and expect my friendship. Oh! I could tear your eyes out! [Exit.]

Belf. jun. Well, Sir Benjamin, keep your own counsel, if you are wise; I'll do as I would be done by; had I such a wife as Lady Dove, I should be very happy to have such a friend as Mr. Paterson. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another part of the Garden.

Enter SOPHIA DOVE and LUCY WATERS.

Lucy. If there is faith in woman, I have seen young Belfield; I have beheld his apparition; for what else could it be?

Sophia. How? When? Where? I shall faint with surprise.

Lucy. As I crossed the yew-tree walk, I saw him pass by the head of the canal, towards the house. Alas, poor youth! the injuries I have done him have called him from his grave.

Sophia. Injuries, Miss Waters! What injuries have you done him? Tell me; for therein, perhaps, I may be concerned.

Lucy. Deeply concerned you are: with the most penitent remorse I confess it to you, that his affections to you were pure, honest, and sincere. Yes, amiable Sophia, you was unrivalled in his esteem; and I, who persuaded you to the contrary, am the basest, the falsest of womankind; every syllable I told you of his engagements to me was a malicious invention: how could you be so blind to your own superiority, to give credit to the imposition, and suffer him to depart without an explanation? Oh! that villain, that villain, his brother, has undone us all!

Sophia. Villain, do you call him? Whither would you transport my imagination? You hurry me with such rapidity from one surprise to another, that I know not where to fix, how to act, or what to believe.

Lucy. Oh, madam, he is a villain! a most accomplished one; and if I can but snatch you from the snare he has spread for you, I hope it will, in some measure, atone for the injuries I have done to you, and to that unhappy youth, who now—O, heavens! I see him again; he comes this way; I cannot endure his sight; alive or dead, I must avoid him. [Runs out.]

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR.

Belf. jun. Adorable Sophia! this transport overpays my labours. [me.]

Sophia. Sir! Mr. Belfield, is it you? Oh! support

Belf. jun. With my life, thou loveliest of women! Behold, your poor adventurer is returned: happy past compute, if his fate is not indifferent to you; rich beyond measure, if his safety is worthy your concern.

Sophia. Release me, I beseech you. What have I done? Sure, you are too generous to take advantage of my confusion.

Belf. jun. Pardon me, my Sophia; the advantages I take from your confusion are not to be purchased by the riches of the east: I would not forego the transport of holding you one minute in my arms for all that wealth and greatness have to give.

Enter LADY DOVE, while Belfield Junior is kneeling and embracing Sophia.

Lady D. Hey-day! What's here to do with you Sophia. Ah! (Shrieks.) [both?

Belf. jun. Confusion! Lady Dove here?

Lady D. Yes, sir, Lady Dove is here, and will take care you shall have no more garden dialogues. On your knees too! The fellow was not half so civil to me. (Aside.) Ridiculous! a poor, beggarly swabber, truly! As for you, Mrs.—

Belf. jun. Hold, madam; as much of your fury and foul language as you please upon me; but not one hard word against that lady, or by heavens!—

Lady D. Come, sir, none of your reprobate swearing; none of your sea-noises here: I would my first husband was alive, I would he was, for your sake. I am surprised, Miss Dove, you have no more regard for your reputation; a delicate swain, truly, you have chosen; just thrown ashore from a shipwrecked privateer. Go, go; get you in, for shame; your father shall know of these goings on, depend on't. [Exit Sophia.] As for you, sir—(As Lady Dove is going out, Belfield Junior stops her.)

Belf. jun. A word with you, madam: is this fair dealing? What would you have said, if I had broke in thus upon you and Mr. Paterson?

Lady D. Mr. Paterson! Why, you rave. What is it you mean?

Belf. jun. Come, come, this is too ridiculous; you know your reputation is in my keeping; call to mind what passed between us a while ago, and the engagement you are under on that account.

Lady D. Ha, ha, ha!

Belf. jun. Very well, truly; and you think to brave this matter out, do you?

Lady D. Most assuredly; and shall make Sir Benjamin call you to account, if you dare to breathe a word against my reputation. Incurable coxcomb! to think I would keep any terms with you after such an event. Take my word for it, Belfield, you are come home no wiser than you went out; you missed the only advantage you might have taken of that rencontre, and now I set you at defiance: take heed to what you say, or look to hear from Sir Benjamin.

Belf. jun. Oh, no doubt on't! How can Sir Benjamin avoid fighting for your sake, when your ladyship has so liberally equipped him with weapons?

[Exeunt severally.]

SCENE IV.—A Hall.

Enter JONATHAN and FRANCIS.

Jon. And so, sir, 'tis just as I tell you, everything in this family goes according to the will of the lady: for my own part, I am one of those that hate trouble; I swim with the stream, and make my place as easy as I can.

Francis. Your looks, Mr. Jonathan, convince me that you live at your ease.

Jon. I do so; and, therefore, in spite of the old proverb, "like master like man," you never saw two people more different than I and Sir Benjamin Dove. He, Lord help him! is a little, peaking, puling thing; I am a jolly, portable man, as you see. It so happened, that we both became widowers at the same time: I knew when I was well, and have continued single ever since. He fell into the clutches of—hark! sure, I heard my lady.

Francis. No, it was nothing. When did the poor gentleman light upon this termagant?

Jon. Lack-a-day! 'twas here at the borough of Knavestown, when master had the great contest with Squire Belfield, about three years ago; her first husband, Mr. Searcher, was a king's messenger, as they call it, and came down express from a great man about court during the poll; he caught a surfeit, as ill-luck would have it, at the election-dinner; and, before he died, his wife, that's now my lady, came down to see him; then it was master fell in love with her. Egad! 'twas the unluckiest job of all his life.

Sir B. (Without.) Jonathan! Why, Jonathan!

Francis. Hark! you are called.

Jon. Ay, ay! 'tis only my master: my lady tells the servants not to mind what Sir Benjamin says, and I love to do as I am bid.

Francis. Well, honest Jonathan, if you won't move, I must: by this time, I hope, my young master is happy with your young mistress. [Exit.]

Enter SIR BENJAMIN DOVE.

Sir B. Why, Jonathan, I say! Oh! are you here? Why couldn't you come when I called you?

Jon. Lack-a-day, sir! you don't consider how much easier it is for you to call, than for me to come.

Sir B. I think, honest Jonathan, when I first knew you, you was a parish orphan; I 'prenticed you out; you ran away from your master; I took you into my family; you married; I set you up in a farm of my own, stocked it; you paid me no rent; I received you again into my service, or rather, I should say, my lady's. Are these things so, or does my memory fail me, Jonathan?

Jon. Why, to be sure, I partly remember somewhat of what your worship mentions.

Sir B. If you partly remember something of all this, Jonathan, don't entirely forget to come when I call.

Ironsides. (Without.) Hoy, there! Within! What, nobody stirring! all hands asleep; all under the hatches!

Sir B. Hey-day! Who the dickens have we got here? Old Captain Ironsides, as I am a sinner! Who could have thought of this? Run to the door, good Jonathan—nay, hold, there's no escaping now. What will become of me? He'll ruin everything; and throw the whole house into confusion.

Enter IRONSIDES.

Ironsides. What, Sir Ben! My little knight of Malta! Give me a buss, my boy. Hold, hold! sure, I'm out of my reckoning; let me look a little nearer: why, what mishap has befallen you, that you heave out these signals of distress?

Sir B. I'm heartily glad to see thee, my old friend; but a truce to your sea-phrases, for I don't understand them: what signals of distress have I about me?

Ironsides. Why, that white flag there, at your main-top-mast head: in plain English, what dost do with that clout about thy pate?

Sir B. Clout, do you call it? 'Tis a little en dishabille, indeed; but there's nothing extraordinary, I take it, in a man's wearing his gown and cap in a morning; 'tis the dress I usually chuse to study in.

Ironsides. And this hall is your library, is it? Ah, my old friend! my old friend! But come, I want to have a little chat with you, and thought to have dropped in at pudding-time, as they say; for though it may be morning with thee, Sir Ben, 'tis mid-day with the rest of the world.

Sir B. Indeed, is it so late? But I was fallen upon an agreeable tête-à-tête with Lady Dove, and hardly knew how the time passed.

Ironsides. Come, come, 'tis very clear how your time has passed; but what occasion is there for this fellow's being privy to our conversation. Why don't the lubber stir? What does the fat lazy oaf stand staring at?

Sir B. What shall I say now? Was ever anything so distressing? (Aside.) Why, that's Jonathan, Captain; don't you remember your old friend, Jonathan?

Jon. I hope your honour's in good health; I'm glad to see your honour come home again.

Ironsides. Honest Jonathan, I came to visit your master, and not you; if you'll go and hasten dinner, and bring Sir Benjamin his periwig and clothes, you'll do me a very acceptable piece of service; for, to tell you the truth, my friend, I haven't had a comfortable meal of fresh provision this many a day. [Exit Jonathan.]

Sir B. 'Foregad! you are come to the wrong house to find one. (Aside.)

Ironsides. And so, sir knight, knowing I was welcome, and having met with a mishap here, upon your coast, I am come to taste your good cheer, and pass an evening with you over a tiff of punch.

Sir B. The devil you are! (Aside.) This is very kind of you: there is no man in England, Captain Ironsides, better pleased to see his friends about him than I am.

Ironsides. Ay, ay! if I didn't think I was welcome, I shouldn't ha' come.

Sir B. You may be assured you are welcome.

Ironsides. I am assured.

Sir B. You are, by my soul; take my word for it, you are.

Ironsides. Well, well, what need of all this ceremony about a meal's meat? Who doubts you?

Sir B. You need not doubt me, believe it: I'll only step out and ask my lady what time she has ordered dinner; or whether she has made any engagement I'm not apprised of.

Ironsides. No, no: engagement! how can that be, and you in this pickle? Come, come, sit down; dinner won't come the quicker for your inquiry: and now tell me, how does my god-daughter, Sophia?

Sir B. Thank you heartily, Captain, my daughter's well in health.

Ironsides. That's well; and how fares your fine new wife? How goes on matrimony? Fond as ever, my little amorous Dove? always billing, always cooing?

Sir B. No, Captain, no: we are totally altered in that respect; we shew no fondness now before company; my lady is so delicate in that particular, that from the little notice she takes of me in public, you would scarce believe we were man and wife.

Ironsides. Ha, ha, ha! why, 'tis the very circumstance would confirm it; but I'm glad to hear it; for of all things under the sun I most nauseate your nuptial familiarities; and though, you remember, I was fool enough to dissuade you from this match, I'm rejoiced to hear you manage so well and so wisely.

Sir B. No man happier in this life, Captain; no man happier: one thing only is wanting; had the kind stars but crowned our endearments—

Ironsides. What, my lady don't breed, then!

Sir B. Hush, hush! for heaven's sake, don't speak so loud; should my lady overhear you, it might put strange things into her head; oh! she is a lady of delicate spirits, tender nerves, quite weak and tender nerves; a small matter throws her down; gentle as a lamb; starts at a straw; speak loud, and it destroys her: oh! my friend, you are not used to deal with women's constitutions; these hypochondriac cases require a deal of management; 'tis but charity to humour them; and you cannot think what pains it requires to keep them always quiet and in temper.

Ironsides. Ay! like enough.

Lady D. (Without.) Hey-day! Sir Benjamin!

Ironsides. But here comes my lady, and in excellent temper, if her looks don't belie her.

Enter LADY DOVE.

Lady D. What's to do now, Sir Benjamin? What's the matter, that you send for your clothes in such a hurry? Can't you be contented to remain as you are? Your present dress is well enough to stay at home in; and I don't know that you have any call out of doors.

Ironsides. Gentle as a lamb, Sir Benjamin.

Sir B. This attention of your's, my dear, is beyond measure flattering. I am infinitely beholden to you; but you are so taken up with your concern on my account, that you overlook our old friend and neighbour, Captain Ironsides.

Lady D. Sir Benjamin, you make yourself quite ridiculous; this folly is not to be endured; you are enough to tire the patience of any woman living.

Sir B. She's quite discomposed, all in a flutter for fear I should take cold by changing my dress.

Ironsides. Yes, I perceive she has exceeding weak nerves. You are much in the right to humour her.

Lady D. Sir Benjamin Dove, if you mean that I should stay a minute longer in this house, I insist upon your turning that old porpoise out of it: is it not enough to bring your nauseous sea-companions within these doors, but must I be compelled to entertain them? Poh! I sha'n't get the scent of his tar-jacket out of my nostrils this fortnight.

Sir B. Hush, my dear Lady Dove! for heaven's sake, don't shame and expose me in this manner! How can I possibly turn an honest gentleman out of my doors, who has given me no offence in life?

Lady D. Marry, but he has, though; and great offence too! I tell you, Sir Benjamin, you are made a fool of. [posed.]

Sir B. Nay, now, my dear, sweet love, be com-

Lady D. Yes, forsooth! and let a young, rambling, raking prodigal run away with your daughter.

Sir B. How! What?

Lady D. A fine thing, truly, to be composed—

Ironsides. Who is it your ladyship suspects of such a design?

Lady D. Who, sir? Why, who but your nephew Robert? You flattered us with a false hope he was dead; but, to our sorrow, we find him alive, and returned; and now you are cajoling this poor, simple, unthinking man, while your wild Indian, your savage there, is making off with his daughter.

Sir B. Mercy on us! What am I to think of all this?

Ironsides. What are you to think! Why, that it is a lie; that you are an ass; and that your wife is a termagant. My nephew is a lad of honour, and scorns to run away with any man's daughter, or wife either; though, I think, there's little danger of that here. As for me, sooner than mess with such a vixen, I'd starve; and so, Sir Benjamin, I wish you a good stomach to your dinner. [Exit.]

Lady D. Insolent, unmannerly brute! Was ever the like heard? And you to stand tamely by! I declare, I've a great mind to raise the servants upon him, since I have no other defenders. Thus am I for ever treated by your scurvy companions!

Sir B. Be pacified, my dear; am I in fault? But, for heaven's sake! what is become of my daughter?

Lady D. Yes, you can think of your daughter; but she is safe enough for this turn. I have taken care of her for one while, and thus I am rewarded for it. Am I a vixen? am I a termagant? Oh! had my first husband—had my poor, dear, dead Mr. Searcher heard such a word, he would have rattled him! But he—what do I talk of? he was a man: yes, yes, he was, indeed, a man. As for you—

Sir B. Strain the comparison no further, Lady Dove; there are particulars, I dare say, in which I fall short of Mr. Searcher.

Lady D. Short of him! I'll tell you what, Sir Benjamin; I valued the dear greyhound that hung at his button-hole, more than I do all the foolish trinkets your vanity has lavished on me.

Sir B. Your ladyship, doubtless, was the paragon of wives: I well remember, when the poor man laid ill, at my borough of Knavestown, how you came flying on the wings of love, by the Exeter waggon, to visit him before he died.

Lady D. I understand your sneer, sir, and I despise it: there is one condition only, upon which you may regain my forfeited opinion; young Belfield, who, with this old fellow, has designs in hand of a dangerous nature, has treated me with an indignity still greater than what you have been a witness to. Shew yourself a man upon this occasion, Sir Benjamin.

Sir B. Anything, dearest, for peace sake.

Lady D. Peace sake! It is war, and not peace, which I require. But come, if you'll walk this way, I'll lay the matter open to you. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Sea-shore before Goodwin's cabin.

Enter VIOLETTA and FANNY.

Vio. And when is this great match of Mr. Belfield's to be? [day.]

Fanny. Alas, madam! we look to hear of it every

Vio. You seem to consider this event, child, as a misfortune to yourself: however others may be affected by Mr. Belfield's marrying Miss Dove, to you, I conceive, it must be a matter of indifference.

Fanny. I have been taught, madam, to consider no event as matter of indifference to me, by which good people are made unhappy. Miss Sophy is the best young lady living: Mr. Belfield is—

Vio. Hold, Fanny, do step into the house; in my writing-box you will find a letter sealed, but without a direction; bring it to me. [Exit Fanny.] I have been writing to this base man, for I want fortitude to support an interview. What if I unbosomed myself to this girl, and entrusted the letter to her conveyance? She seems exceedingly honest, and, for one of so mean a condition, uncommonly sensible; I think I may safely confide in her. Well, Fanny?

Enter FANNY.

Fanny. Here is your letter, madam.

Vio. I thank you: I trouble you too much; but thou art a good-natured girl, and your attention to me shall not go unrewarded.

Fanny. I am happy to wait upon you. I wish I could do or say anything to divert you; but my discourse can't be very amusing to a lady of your sort; and talking of this wedding seems to have made you more melancholy than you was before.

Vio. Come hither, child; you have remarked my disquietude, I will now disclose to you the occasion of it: you seem interested for Miss Dove; I too am touched with her situation; you tell me, she is the best young lady living.

Fanny. Oh, madam! if it were possible for an angel to take a human shape, she must be one.

Vio. 'Tis very well: I commend your zeal; you are speaking now of the qualities of her mind?

Fanny. Not of them alone; she has not only the virtues, but the beauties, of an angel.

Vio. Indeed! Pray tell me, is she so very handsome?

Fanny. As fine a person as you could wish to see.

Vio. Tall?

Fanny. About your size.

Vio. Fair, or dark complexioned?

Fanny. Of a most lovely complexion; 'tis her greatest beauty, and all pure nature, I'll be answerable; then her eyes are so soft, and so smiling! and as for her hair—

Vio. Hey-day! Why, where are you rambling, child? I am satisfied; I make no doubt she is a consummate beauty, and that Mr. Belfield loves her to distraction. (Aside.) I don't like this girl so well as I did; she is a great talker; I am glad I did not disclose my mind to her. I'll go in, and determine on some expedient. [Exit.]

Fanny. Alas, poor lady! as sure as can be, she has been crossed in love; nothing in this world besides could make her so miserable; but, sure, I see Mr. Francis! If falling in love leads to such misfortunes, 'tis fit I should get out of his way. [Exit.]

Enter FRANCIS and PHILIP.

Francis. Wasn't that your sister, Philip, that ran into the cabin?

Philip. I think it was.

Francis. You've made a good day's work on't; the weather coming about so fair, I think we've scarce lost anything of value, but the ship: didn't you meet the old captain, as you came down to the creek?

Philip. I did; he has been at Sir Benjamin Dove's here, at Copley Castle, and is come back in a curious humour.

Francis. So, so! I attended my young master thither at the same time; how came they not to return together?

Philip. That I can't tell.—Come, let's go in, and refresh ourselves. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Garden.

Enter SOPHIA DOVE and LUCY WATERS.

Sophia. Indeed, and indeed, Miss Lucy Waters, these are strong facts which you tell me; and I do believe, that no prudent woman would engage with a man of Mr. Andrew Belfield's disposition: but what course am I to follow? and how am I to extricate myself from the embarrassments of my situation?

Lucy. Truly, madam, you have but one refuge that I know of.

Sophia. And that lies in the arms of a young adventurer! O Lucy, Lucy! this is a flattering prescription, calculated rather to humour the patient, than to remove the disease.

Lucy. Nay, but if there is a necessity for your taking this step—

Sophia. Ay! necessity is grown strangely commodious of late, and always compels us to do the very thing we have most a mind to.

Lucy. Well, madam, but common humanity to young Mr. Belfield—you must allow, he has been hardly treated.

Sophia. By me, Lucy?

Lucy. Madam! No, madam, not by you; but 'tis charity to heal the wounded, though you have not been a party in the fray.

Sophia. I grant you. You are a true female philosopher; you would let charity recommend you a husband, and a husband recommend you to charity. But I won't reason upon the matter; at least, not in the humour I am now, nor at this particular time: no, Lucy, nor in this particular spot; for here it was, at this very hour, yesterday evening, young Belfield surprised me.

Lucy. And see, madam, punctual to the same lucky moment, he comes again: let him plead his own cause; you need fear no interruption; my lady has too agreeable an engagement of her own, to endeavour at disturbing those of other people. [Exit.]

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR.

Belf. jun. Have I then found thee, loveliest of women? Oh, Sophia! report has struck me to the heart, if, as I am told, to-morrow gives you to my brother, this is the last time I am ever to behold you.

Sophia. Why so, Mr. Belfield? Why should our separation be a necessary consequence of our alliance?

Belf. jun. Because I have been ambitious, and cannot survive the pangs of disappointment.

Sophia. Alas, poor man! but you know where to bury your disappointments; the sea is still open to you, and take my word for it, Mr. Belfield, the man who can live for three years, ay! or three months, in separation from the woman of his heart, need be under no apprehensions for his life, let what will befall her.

Belf. jun. Cruel, insulting Sophia! when I last parted from you, I flattered myself, I had left some impression on your heart; but in every event of my life, I meet a base, injurious brother; the everlasting bar to my happiness. I can support it no longer; and Mr. Belfield, madam, never can, never shall, be your's.

Sophia. How, sir! Never shall be mine? What do you tell me? There is but that man on earth with whom I can be happy; and, if my fate is such, that he is never to be mine, the world, and all it contains, will for ever after be indifferent to me.

Belf. jun. I have heard enough; farewell!

Sophia. Farewell, sagacious Mr. Belfield! the next fond female who thus openly declares herself to you, will, I hope, meet with a more gallant reception than I have done.

Belf. jun. How, what! Is't possible? O heavens!

Sophia. What, you've discovered it at last? Oh, fie upon you!

Belf. jun. Thus, thus, let me embrace my unexpected blessing! Come to my heart, my fond o'erflowing heart! and tell me, once again, that my Sophia will be only mine!

Sophia. O man, man! all despondency one moment, all rapture the next. No question now but you conceive every difficulty surmounted, and that we have nothing to do but to run into each other's arms, make a fashionable elopement, and be happy for life; and I must own to you, Mr. Belfield, were there no other condition of our union, even this project should not deter me; but I have better hopes, provided you will be piloted by me; for, believe me, my good friend, I am better acquainted with this coast than you are.

Belf. jun. I doubt not your discretion, and shall implicitly surrender myself to your guidance.

Sophia. Give me a proof of it then, by retreating from this place immediately; 'tis my father's hour for walking, and I would not have you meet; besides, your brother is expected.

Belf. jun. Ay! that brother, my Sophia, that brother brings vexation and regret whenever he is named; but I hope I need not dread a second injury in your esteem; and yet, I know not how it is, but if I were addicted to superstition—

Sophia. And if I were addicted to anger, I should quarrel with you for not obeying my injunctions with more readiness.

Belf. jun. I will obey thee, and, yet, 'tis difficult. Those lips, which thus have blest me, cannot dismiss me without—

Sophia. Nay, Mr. Belfield, don't you—well, then—Mercy upon us! who's coming here?

Belf. jun. How! Oh, yes! never fear; 'tis a friend; 'tis Violetta; 'tis a lady that I—

Sophia. That you what, Mr. Belfield? What lady is it? I never saw her in my life before.

Belf. jun. No; she is a foreigner; born in Portugal, though of an English family; the packet, in which she was coming to England, foundered alongside of our ship, and I was the instrument of saving her life. I interest myself much in her happiness, and I beseech you, for my sake, to be kind to her. [Exit.]

Sophia. He interests himself much in her happiness; he beseeches me, for his sake, to be kind to her! What am I to judge of all this?

Enter VIOLETTA.

Vio. Madam, I ask pardon for this intrusion, but I have business with you of a nature that—I presume I'm not mistaken, you are the young lady I have been directed to, the daughter of Sir Benjamin Dove?

Sophia. I am, madam; but won't you please to repose yourself in the house? I understand you are a stranger in this country. May I beg to know what commands you have for me? Mr. Belfield has made me acquainted with some circumstances relative to your story, and for his sake, madam, I shall be proud to render you any service in my power.

Vio. For Mr. Belfield's sake, did you say, madam? Has Mr. Belfield named me to you, madam?

Sophia. Is there any wonder in that, pray?

Vio. No, none at all. In any man else such confidence would surprise me; but in Mr. Belfield 'tis natural; there is no wondering at what he does.

Sophia. You must pardon me, I find we think differently of Mr. Belfield; he left me but this minute, and, in the kindest terms, recommended you to my friendship.

Vio. 'Twas he then that parted from you as I came up: I thought so, but I was too much agitated to observe him, and, I am confident, he is too guilty to dare to look upon me.

Sophia. Why so, madam? For heaven's sake, inform me what injuries you have received from Mr. Belfield. I must own to you, I am much interested in finding him to be a man of honour.

Vio. I know your situation, madam, and I pity it; Providence has sent me here, in time, to save you, and to tell you—

Sophia. What? To tell me what? Oh, speak! or I shall sink with apprehension.

Vio. To tell you that he is my husband.

Sophia. Husband! Your husband? What do I hear? ungenerous, base, deceitful Belfield! I thought he seemed confounded at your appearance; everything confirms his treachery, and I cannot doubt the truth of what you tell me.

Vio. A truth it is, madam, that I must ever reflect on with the most sorrowful regret.

Sophia. Come, let me beg you to walk towards the house. I ask no account of this transaction of Mr. Belfield's; I would fain banish his name from my memory for ever, and you shall, this instant, be a witness to his peremptory dismissal. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another part of the Garden.

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR, and PATERSON.

Belf. jun. And so, sir, these are her ladyship's commands, are they?

Pateron. This is what I am commissioned by Lady Dove to tell you. What report shall I make to her?

Belf. jun. Even what you please, Mr. Pateron: mould it, and model it to your liking; put as many palliatives as you think proper, to sweeten it to her ladyship's taste, so you do but give her to understand that I neither can, nor will, abandon my Sophia. Cease to think of her indeed! What earthly power can exclude her idea from my thoughts? I am surprised Lady Dove should think of sending me such a message; and I wonder, sir, that you should consent to bring it.

Pateron. Sir!

Belf. jun. Nay, Mr. Pateron, don't assume such a menacing air, nor practise on my temper too far in this business. I know both your situation and my own; consider, sir, mine is a cause that would animate the most dastardly spirit; your's is enough to damp the most courageous. [Exit.]

Pateron. A very short and sententious gentleman! but there is truth in his remark; mine is but a sorry commission after all: the man's in the right to fight for his mistress; she's worth the venture, and if there was no way else to be quit of mine, I should be in the right to fight too. Egad! I don't see why aversion shouldn't make me as desperate, as love makes him. Hell and fury! here comes my Venus!

Enter LADY DOVE.

Lady D. Well, Pateron, what says the fellow to my message?

Pateron. Says, madam! I'm ashamed to tell you what he says; he's the arrantest boatswain that ever I conversed with.

Lady D. But tell me what he says.

Pateron. Everything, that scandal and scurrility can utter against you. [me?]

Lady D. Against me! What could he say against Paterson. Modesty forbids me to tell you.

Lady D. Oh, the vile reprobate! I, that have been so guarded in my conduct, so discreet in my partialities, as to keep them secret, even from my own husband; but, I hope, he didn't venture to abuse my person?

Paterson. No, madam, no; had he proceeded to such lengths, I couldn't, in honour, have put up with it; I hope I have more spirit than to suffer any reflections upon your ladyship's personal accomplishments.

Lady D. Well, but did you say nothing in defence of my reputation?

Paterson. Nothing.

Lady D. No?

Paterson. Not a syllable; trust me for that: 'tis the wisest way upon all tender topics to be silent; for he, who takes upon himself to defend a lady's reputation, only publishes her favours to the world; and, therefore, I would always leave that office to a husband. [heart—

Lady D. 'Tis true; and if Sir Benjamin had any Paterson. Come, come, my dear lady, don't be too severe upon Sir Benjamin; many men of no better appearance than Sir Benjamin, have shewn themselves perfect heroes: I know a whole family that, with the limbs of ladies, have the hearts of lions. Who can tell but your husband may be one of this sort?

Lady D. Ah!—

Paterson. Well, but try him; tell him how you have been used, and see what his spirit will prompt him to do. Apropos! here the little gentleman comes; if he won't fight, 'tis but what you expect; if he will, who can tell where a lucky arrow may hit? [Exit.

Enter SIR BENJAMIN DOVE.

Lady D. Sir Benjamin, I want to have a little discourse in private with you.

Sir B. With me, my lady?

Lady D. With you, Sir Benjamin; 'tis upon a matter of a very serious nature; pray sit down by me. I don't know how it is, my dear, but I have observed of late, with much concern, a great abatement in your regard for me.

Sir B. Oh, fie, my lady! Why do you think so? What reason have you for so unkind a suspicion?

Lady D. 'Tis in vain for you to deny it. I am convinced you have done loving me.

Sir B. Well, now, I vow, my dear, as I am a sinner, you do me wrong.

Lady D. Lookye, Sir Benjamin, love, like mine, is apt to be quick-sighted, and, I am persuaded, I am not deceived in my observations.

Sir B. Indeed, and indeed, my Lady Dove, you accuse me wrongfully.

Lady D. Mistake me not, my dear, I do not accuse you, I accuse myself; I am sensible there are faults and imperfections in my temper.

Sir B. Oh! trifles, my dear; mere trifles!

Lady D. Come, come, I know you have led but an uncomfortable life of late; and, I am afraid, I have been innocently, in some degree, the cause of it.

Sir B. Far be it from me to contradict your ladyship, if you are pleased to say so.

Lady D. I am sure it has been as I say: my overfondness for you has been troublesome and vexatious; you hate confinement, I know you do; you are a man of spirit, and formed to figure in the world.

Sir B. Oh! you flatter me.

Lady D. Nay, nay, there's no disguising it: you sigh for action; your looks declare it: this alteration in your habit and appearance puts it out of doubt; there is a certain quickness in your eye; 'twas the first symptom that attracted my regards; and, I am mistaken, Sir Benjamin, if you do not possess as much courage as any man.

Sir B. Your ladyship does me honour.

Lady D. I do you justice, Sir Benjamin.

Sir B. Why, I believe, for the matter of courage, I have as much as my neighbours; but 'tis of a strange perverse quality; for, as some spirits rise with the difficulties they have to encounter, my courage, on the contrary, is always greatest when there is least call for it.

Lady D. Oh! you shall never make me believe this, Sir Benjamin. You couldn't bear to see me ill used; I'm positive you couldn't.

Sir B. 'Tis as well, however, not to be too sure of that. (Aside.)

Lady D. You couldn't be so mean-spirited, as to stand by and hear your poor dear wife abused and insulted, and—

Sir B. Oh, no, by no means; 'twould break my heart; but who has abused you, and insulted you, and—

Lady D. Who? why this young Belfield, that I told you of.

Sir B. Oh, never listen to him! a woman of your years should have more sense than to mind what such idle young fleers can say of you.

Lady D. (Rising.) My years, Sir Benjamin! Why, you are more intolerable than he is; but let him take his course; let him run away with your daughter; it shall be no further concern of mine to prevent him.

Sir B. No, my dear, I've done that effectually.

Lady D. How so, pray?

Sir B. By taking care she sha'n't run away with my estate at the same time. Some people lock their daughters up, to prevent their eloping; I've gone a wiser way to work with mine, let her go loose, and locked up her fortune.

Lady D. And, o' my conscience, I believe you mean to do the same by your wife; turn her loose upon the world, as you do your daughter; leave her to the mercy of every freebooter; let her be vilified and abused—her honour, her reputation, mangled and torn by every paltry, privateering fellow, that fortune casts upon your coast.

Sir B. Hold, my lady, hold; young Belfield did not glance at your reputation, I hope.—Did he?

Lady D. Indeed, but he did though; and there, in I think every wife has a title to her husband's protection.

Sir B. True, my dear; 'tis our duty to plead, but yours to provide us with the brief.

Lady D. There are some insults, Sir Benjamin, that no man of spirit ought to put up with; and the imputation of being made a wittol of, is the most unpardonable of any.

Sir B. Right, my dear; even truth, you know, is not to be spoke at all times.

Lady D. How, sir, would you insinuate anything to the disparagement of my fidelity? But chuse your side, quarrel you must, either with him or with me.

Sir B. Oh, if that is the alternative, what a deal of time have we wasted. Step with me into the library, and I'll pen him a challenge immediately.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Cabin, with a View of the Sea, as before.

Enter PHILIP, and LUCY WATERS.

Philip. How I have loved you, Lucy, and what I have suffered on your account, you know well enough; and you shou'dn't now, when I am struggling to forget you, come to put me in mind of past afflictions. Go, go, leave me, I pray you, leave me.

Lucy. Nay, Philip, but hear me.

Philip. Hear you, ungrateful girl! you know it has been all my delight to hear you, to see you, and to sit by your side,—for hours I have done it; for whole days together. But those days are past;

I must labour now for my livelihood, and, if you rob me of my time, you wrong me of my subsistence.

Lucy. O, Philip! I am undone if you don't protect me!

Philip. Ah, Lucy! that I fear is past prevention.

Lucy. No, Philip, no! I am innocent, and therefore persecuted by the most criminal of men. I have disclosed all Mr. Belfield's artifices to Miss Sophia, and now am terrified to death. I saw him follow me out of the Park, as I was coming hither, and I dare not return home alone; indeed, Philip, I dare not.

Philip. Well, Lucy, step in with me, and fear nothing; I see the squire is coming. He, who can refuse his protection to a woman, may he never taste the blessings a woman can bestow!

[Exeunt.]

Enter BELFIELD SENIOR.

Belf. Ay, 'tis she! confusion follow her! How perversely has she traversed my projects with Sophia! By all that's resolute, I'll be revenged! My brother, too, returned—vexatious circumstance! there am I foiled again. Since first I stepped out of the path of honour, what have I obtained? O, treachery! treachery! if thou can'st not, in this world, make us happy, better have remained that dull formal thing, an honest man, and trusted to what the future might produce.

Enter PHILIP.

So, fellow, who are you?

Philip. A man, sir; an honest man.

Belf. A saucy one, methinks.

Philip. The injurious are apt to think so; however, I ask pardon. As your riches make you too proud, my honesty, perhaps, makes me too bold.

Belf. O, I know you now: you are son to that old fellow I thought proper to discharge from my farm. Please to betake yourself from the door of your cabin; there's a young woman within I must have a word with. [with—

Philip. If 'tis Lucy Waters you would speak

Belf. If, rascal! It is Lucy Waters that I would speak with—that I will speak with—and, spite of your insolence, compel to answer whatever I please to ask, and go with me wherever I please to carry her.

Philip. Then, sir, I must tell you, poor as I am, she is under my protection. You see, sir, I am armed; you have no right to force an entrance here, and, while I have life, you never shall.

Belf. Then be it at your peril, villain, if you oppose me. (They fight.)

Enter PATERSON, who beats down their swords.

Paterson. For shame, Mr. Belfield! what are you about—tilting with this peasant?

Belf. Paterson, stand off.

Paterson. Come, come, put up your sword.

Belf. D——n, sir! what do you mean? Do you turn against me? Give way, or, by my soul, I'll run you through.

Enter CAPTAIN IRONSIDES and SKIFF.

Ironsides. Heyday, what the devil ails you all! I thought the whole ship's company had sprung a mutiny. Master and I were taking a nap together for good fellowship; and you made such a d—d clattering and clashing, there's no sleeping in peace for you.

Belf. Come, Mr. Paterson, will you please to bear me company, or stay with your new acquaintance?

Ironsides. Oh, ho, my righteous nephew! is it you that are kicking up this riot? Why, you ungracious profligate, would you murder an honest lad at the door of his own house? his castle—his castellum. Are these your fresh-water tricks?

Belf. Your language, Captain Ironsides, savours strongly of your profession; and I hold both you, your occupation, and opinion, equally vulgar and contemptible.

Ironsides. My profession! Why, what have you to say to my profession, you unsanctified whelp, you? I hope it is an honest vocation to fight the enemies of one's country: you, it seems, are for murdering friends: I trust it is not for such a skip-jack as thee art to flee at my profession. Master, did'st ever hear the like?

Skiff. Never, never, captain; for my own part, I am one of few words; but, for my own part, I always thought that to be a brave seaman, like your honour, was the greatest title an Englishman can wear.

Ironsides. Why, so it is, Skiff; ahem!

Belf. Well, sir, I leave you to the enjoyment of your honours; so, your servant. Sirrah, I shall find a time for you. (Belfield is going out.)

Ironsides. Hark ye, sir; come back: one more word with you.

Belf. Well, sir!

Ironsides. Your father was an honest gentleman: your mother, though I say it that should not say it, was an angel; my eyes ache when I speak of her: ar'n't you ashamed, sirrah, to disgrace such parents? My nephew, Bob, your brother, is an honest lad, and as brave as ever stepped between stem and stern; a' has a few faults, indeed, as who is free? But you, Andrew, you are as false as a quicksand, and as full of mischief as a fire-ship.

Paterson. Come, Mr. Belfield, for heaven's sake, let us go home. [Exit, with Belfield.]

Ironsides. Hark ye, Philip, I forgot to ask you what all this stir was about. [form you.

Philip. Sir, if you please to walk in, I will in—

Ironsides. With all my heart: a pragmatical, impertinent coxcomb! Come, master, we'll fill a pipe, and hear the lad's story within doors. I never yet was ashamed of my profession, and I'll take care my profession shall have no reason to be ashamed of me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter BELFIELD JUNIOR, and SOPHIA.

Belf. jun. Madam! madam! will you vouchsafe to give me a hearing?

Sophia. Unless you could recall an act no earthly power can cancel, all attempt at explanation is vain.

Belf. jun. Yet, before we part for ever, obstinate, inexorable Sophia, tell me what is my offence?

Sophia. Answer yourself that question, Mr. Belfield; consult your own heart; consult your Violetta.

Belf. jun. Now, on my life, she's meanly jealous of Violetta; that grateful woman has been warm in her commendations of me, and her distempered fancy turns that candour into criminality. (Aside.)

Sophia. Ha! he seems confounded! guilty, beyond all doubt. (Aside.)

Belf. jun. By heaven, I'll no longer be the dupe to these bad humours! Lucy Waters, Violetta, every woman she sees or hears, alarms her jealousy, overthrows my hopes, and rouses every passion into fury. Well madam, at length I see what you allude to: I shall follow your advice, and consult my Violetta;—nay, more, consult my happiness; for, with her, at least, I shall find repose; with you, I plainly see, there can be none.

Sophia. 'Tis very well, sir; the only favour you can now grant me is never to see you again: for, after what has passed between us, every time you intrude into my company, you will commit an insult upon good breeding and humanity.

Belf. jun. Madam, I'll take care to give you no further offence. [Exit.]

Sophia. Oh, my poor heart will break!

Enter SIR BENJAMIN DOVE.

Sir B. Hey-day, Sophia! what's the matter?—

What ails my child? Who has offended you! Did not I see the younger Belfield part from you just now?

Sophia. O, sir! if you have any love for me, don't name that base treacherous wretch to me any more. [Exit.]

Sir B. Upon my word, I am young Mr. Belfield's most obsequious servant; a very notable confusion, truly, he has been pleased to make in my family! Lady Dove raves, Sophia cries: my wife calls him a saucy impudent fellow; my daughter says he's a base treacherous wretch; from all which I am to conclude, that he has spoke too plain truths to the one, and told too many lies to the other. Lady Dove has peremptorily insisted upon my giving him a challenge; but, to say the truth, I had no great stomach to the business, till this fresh provocation: I perceive now, I am growing into a most unaccountable rage; 'tis something so different from what I ever felt before, that, for what I know, it may be courage, and I mistake it for anger. I never did quarrel with any man, and hitherto, no man ever quarrelled with me. Egad, if I once break the ice, it sha'n't stop here; if young Belfield does not prove me a coward, Lady Dove shall see that I am a man of spirit. Sure, I see my gentleman coming here again! (Steps aside.)

Enter BELFIELD, JUNIOR.

Belf. jun. What meanness, what infatuation possesses me, that I should resolve to throw myself once more in her way!—but she's gone, and yet I may escape with credit.

Sir B. Ay; there he is, sure enough! By the mass, I don't like him! I'll listen a while, and discover what sort of a humour he is in.

Belf. jun. I am ashamed of this weakness: I am determined to assume a proper spirit, and act as becomes a man upon this occasion.

Sir B. Upon my soul, I am very sorry for it.

Belf. jun. Now am I so distracted between love, rage, and disappointment, that I could find in my heart to sacrifice her, myself, and all mankind.

Sir B. Lord ha' mercy upon us! I'd better steal off, and leave him to himself.

Belf. jun. And yet, perhaps, all this may proceed from an excess of fondness in my Sophia.

Sir B. Upon my word, you are blest with a most happy assurance!

Belf. jun. Something may have dropped from Violante to alarm her jealousy; and, working upon the exquisite sensibility of her innocent mind, may have brought my sincerity into question.

Sir B. I don't understand a word of all this.

Belf. jun. Now could I fall at her feet for pardon, though I know not in what I have offended: I have not the heart to move. Fie upon it! What an arrant coward has love made me!

Sir B. A coward, does he say? I am heartily rejoiced to hear it; if I must needs come to action, pray heaven, it be with a coward! I'll even take him while he is in the humour, for fear he should recover his courage, and I lose mine. So, sir! your humble servant, Mr. Belfield! I'm glad I have found you, sir.

Belf. jun. Sir Benjamin, your most obedient. Pray, what are your commands, now you have found me?

Sir B. Hold! hold! don't come any nearer: don't you see I am in a most prodigious passion? Fire and fury! what's the reason you have made all this disorder in my house? my daughter in tears; my wife in fits; every thing in an uproar; and all your doing! Do you think I'll put up with this treatment? If you suppose you have a coward to deal with, you'll find yourself mistaken—greatly mistaken, let me tell you, sir! Mercy upon me, what a passion I am in! In short, Mr. Belfield, the honour of my house is concerned, and I must and will have satisfaction. (Aside.) I think this is pretty well to set in with: I'm horribly out of breath. What great fatigues do men of courage undergo!

Belf. jun. Look ye, Sir Benjamin, I don't rightly comprehend what you would be at; but, if you think I have injured you, few words are best; disputes between men of honour are soon adjusted. I'm at your service, in any way you think fit.

Sir B. How you fly out, now! Is that giving me the satisfaction I require? I am the person injured in this matter, and, as such, have a right to be in a passion; but I see neither right nor reason, why you, who have done the wrong, should be as angry as I who have received it.

Belf. jun. (Aside.) I suspect, I have totally mistaken this honest gentleman; he only wants to build some reputation with his wife upon this rencounter, and 'twould be inhuman not to gratify him.

Sir B. What shall I do now? Egad, I seem to have posed him! This plaguy sword sticks so hard in the scabbard! Well, come forth, rapier; 'tis but one thrust; and what should a man fear, that has Lady Dove for his wife?

Belf. jun. Heyday! is the man mad? Put up your sword, Sir Benjamin; put it up, and don't expose yourself in this manner.

Sir B. You shall excuse me, sir; I have had some difficulty in drawing it, and am determined now to try what metal it's made of. So, come on, sir!

Belf. jun. Really, this is too ridiculous: I tell you, Sir Benjamin, I am in no humour for these follies. I've done no wrong to you, or yours; on the contrary, great wrong has been done to me: but I have no quarrel with you, so, pray put up your sword.

Sir B. And I tell you, Mr. Belfield, 'tis in vain to excuse yourself. The less readiness he shews, so much the more resolution I feel.

Belf. jun. Well, sir knight, if such is your humour, I won't spoil your longing. So, have at you!

Enter LADY DOVE.

Lady D. Ah! (Shrieks.)

Belf. jun. Hold, hold, Sir Benjamin! I never fight in ladies' company.

Sir B. Oh, my lady! is it you? Don't be alarmed, my dear; 'tis all over: a small fracas between this gentleman and myself, that's all; don't be under any surprise; I believe the gentleman has had enough: I believe he is perfectly satisfied with my behaviour, and, I persuade myself, you will have no cause in future to complain of his. Mr. Belfield, this is Lady Dove.

Belf. jun. Madam, to a generous enemy, 'tis mean to deny justice, or withhold applause. You are happy in the most valiant of defenders, gentle as you may find him in the tender passions; to a man, madam, he acquits himself like a man. Sir Benjamin Dove, in justice to your merit, I am ready to make any submission to this lady you shall please to impose. If you suffer her to bully you after this, you deserve to be hen-pecked all the days of your life. (Aside to Sir B.)

Sir B. Say no more, my dear Bob; I shall love you for this the longest hour I have to live.

Belf. jun. If I have done you any service, promise me only one hour's conversation with your lovely daughter, and make what use of me you please.

Sir B. Here's my hand; you shall have it; leave us. [Exit Belfield, Junior.]

Lady D. What am I to think of all this? It can't well be a contrivance; and yet, 'tis strange, that yon little animal should have the assurance to face a man, and to be so bashful at a rencontre with a woman!

Sir B. Well, Lady Dove, what are you musing upon? You see, you are obeyed; the honour of your family is vindicated: slow to enter into these affairs, being once engaged, I pertinaciously conduct them to an issue.

Lady D. Sir Benjamin, I—I—

Sir B. Here, Jonathan, do you hear? set my things ready in the library; make haste.

Lady D. I say, Sir Benjamin, I think—

Sir B. Well, let's hear what it is you think?

Lady D. Bless us all! why, you snap one up so! I say, I think, my dear, you have acquitted yourself tolerably well, and I am perfectly satisfied.

Sir B. Humph! you think I have done tolerably well; I think so too: do you apprehend me? Tolerably! for this business, that you think tolerably well done, is but half concluded, let me tell you: nay, what some would call the toughest part of the undertaking, remains unfinished; but, I dare say, with your concurrence, I shall find it easy enough.

Lady D. What is it you mean to do with my concurrence? what mighty project does your wise brain teem with?

Sir B. Nay, now I reflect on't again, I don't think there'll be any need of your concurrence; for, volens or volens, I'm determined it shall be done. In short, this it is:—I am unalterably resolved, from this time forward, Lady Dove, to be sole and absolute in this house;—master of my own servants, father to my own child, and sovereign lord and governor, madam, over my own wife!

Lady D. You are?

Sir B. I am. Gods! gods! what a pitiful, contemptible figure does a man make under petticoat government! I am determined to be free.

Enter PATERSON, and whispers Lady Dove.

Ha! how's this, Mr. Paterson! What liberties are these you take with my wife, and before my face? No more of these freedoms, I do beseech you, sir, as you expect to have to answer it to a husband, who will have no secrets whispered to his wife, to which he is not privy; nor any appointments made, in which he is not a party.

Paterson. Heyday! what a change of government is here! Egad, I'm very glad on't. Sir Benjamin, I see you are busy about family affairs; so I'll wait on you some other time. [Exit.]

Lady Dove. What insolence is this, Sir Benjamin? what ribaldry do you shock my ears with? Let me pass, sir; I'll stay no longer in the same room with you.

Sir B. Not in the same room, nor under the same roof, shall you long abide, unless you reform your manners; however, for the present, you must be content to stay where you are.

Lady D. What, sir! will you imprison me in my own house? I'm sick; I'm ill; I'm suffocated; I want air: I must and will walk into the garden.

Sir B. Then, madam, you must find some better weapon than your fan to parry my sword with: this pass I defend: what, dost think, after having encountered a man, I shall turn my back on a woman? No, madam; I have ventured my life to defend your honour; 'twould be hard if I wanted spirit to protect my own. To-morrow, madam, you leave this house for ever.

Lady D. Will you break my heart, you tyrant? Will you turn me out of doors, to starve, you barbarous man?

Sir B. Oh! never fear; you will fare, to the full, as well as you did in your first husband's time; in your poor, dear, dead Mr. Searcher's time. You told me once, that you prized the paltry greyhound that hung at his button-hole, more than all the jewels my folly had lavished upon you. I take you at your word; you shall have your bauble, and I will take back all mine; they'll be of no use to you hereafter.

Lady D. O, Sir Benjamin! Sir Benjamin! for mercy's sake turn me not out of your house! I will be obedient, gentle, and complying, for the future; don't shame me; on my knees, I beseech you, don't.

Enter BELFIELD, SENIOR.

Sir B. Mr. Belfield, I am heartily glad to see you; don't go back, sir; you catch us, indeed, a little unawares; but these situations are not uncommon in well-ordered families: rewards and punishments are the life of government; and the authority of a husband must be upheld.

Belf. I confess, Sir Benjamin, I was greatly surprised at finding Lady Dove in that attitude; but I never pry into family secrets: I had much rather suppose your lady was on her knees to intercede with you in my behalf, than be told she was reduced to that humble posture for any reason that affects herself.

Sir B. Sir, you are free to suppose what you please for Lady Dove; I'm willing to spare you that trouble on my account; and, therefore, I tell you plainly, if you will sign and seal your articles this night, to-morrow morning Sophia shall be your's. I'm resolved, that the self-same day which consecrates the redemption of my liberty, shall confirm the surrender of your's.

Lady D. O, Mr. Belfield! I beseech you, intercede with this dear cruel man in my behalf! Would you believe, that he harbours a design of expelling me his house, on the very day, too, when he purposes celebrating the nuptials of his daughter?

Belf. Come, Sir Benjamin, I must speak to you now as a friend in the nearest connexion: I beg you will not damp our happiness with so melancholy an event. I will venture to pledge myself for her ladyship.

Sir B. Well, for your sake, perhaps, I may prolong her departure for one day; but I'm determined, if she does stay to-morrow, she shall not preside at table; if 'tis only to shew the company what a refractory wife, in the hands of a man of spirit, may be brought to submit to. Our wives, Mr. Belfield, may tease us, and vex us, and still escape with impunity; but, if once they thoroughly provoke us, the charm breaks, and they are lost for ever. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Sea Coast.

Enter OLD GOODWIN and FANNY.

O. Good. What you tell me, Fanny, gives me great concern; that Mr. Francis should think to seduce the innocence of my child, for a paltry bribe! What can have passed to encourage him to put such an affront upon you?

Fanny. Till this proposal, which I tell you of, I always took Mr. Francis for one of the best-behaved, modestest young men, I had ever met with.

O. Good. To say the truth, Fanny, so did I; but the world is full of hypocrisy, and our acquaintance with him has been very short.

Enter FRANCIS.

Hark ye, young man, a word with you. What is it I or my children have done to offend you?

Francis. Offend me! what is it you mean?

O. Good. When your vessel was stranded upon our coast, did we take advantage of your distress? On the contrary, wasn't this poor hut thrown open to your use, as a receptacle for your treasures, and a repose for your fatigues! Have either those treasures, or that repose, been invaded? Whom amongst you have we robbed or defrauded?

Francis. None, none; your honesty has been as conspicuous as your hospitality.

O. Good. Why, then, having received no injury, do you seek to do one? an injury of the basest nature. You see there a poor girl, whose only portion in this world is her innocence, and of that you have sought to—

Francis. Hold; nor impute designs to me which I abhor. You say your daughter has no portion but her innocence; assured of that, I ask none else; and if she can forgive the stratagem I have made use of, I am ready to atone for it by a life devoted to her service.

O. Good. Well, sir, I am happy to find you are the man I took you for, and cannot discommend your caution; so, that, if you like my daughter, and Fanny is consenting—But, soft! who have we got here?

Fanny. I wish Mr. Paterson was further off, for interrupting us just now.

Enter PATERSON.

Paterson. Pray, good people, isn't there a lady with you, of the name of Violetta?

O. Good. There is.

Paterson. Can you direct me to her? I have business with her of the utmost consequence.

O. Good. Fanny, you and Mr. Francis step in, and let the lady know. [Exeunt Fanny and Francis.] If it's no offence, Mr. Paterson, allow me to ask you, whether there is any hope of our young gentleman here, who is just returned, succeeding in his addresses to Miss Dove?

Paterson. Certainly none, Master Goodwin.

G. Good. I'm heartily sorry for it.

Paterson. I find you are a stranger to the reasons which make against it; but how are you interested in his success?

O. Good. I am a witness of his virtues; and, consequently, not indifferent to his success. [Exit.

Enter VIOLETTA.

Paterson. Madam, I presume your name is Violetta?

Vio. It is, sir.

Paterson. I wait upon you, madam, at Miss Dove's desire, and as a particular friend of Mr. Andrew Belfield's.

Vio. Sir!

Paterson. Madam!

Vio. Pray, proceed.

Paterson. To entreat the favour of your company at Cropley Castle, upon business, wherein that lady and gentleman are intimately concerned; I presume, madam, you guess what I mean?

Vio. Indeed, sir, I cannot easily guess how I can possibly be a party in any business between Miss Dove and Mr. Belfield. I thought all intercourse between those persons was now entirely at an end.

Paterson. Oh, no, madam; by no means: the affair is far from being at an end.

Vio. How, sir! not at an end?

Paterson. No, madam; on the contrary, from Sir Benjamin's great anxiety for the match, and, above all, from the very seasonable intelligence you was so good to communicate to Miss Sophia, I am not without hopes that Mr. Andrew Belfield will be happy enough to conquer all her scruples, and engage her to consent to marry him.

Vio. Indeed! but pray, sir, those scruples of Miss Dove's, which you flatter yourself Mr. Belfield will so happily conquer, how is it that ladies in this country reconcile themselves to such matters? I should have thought such an obstacle utterly insurmountable.

Paterson. Why, to be sure, madam, Miss Dove has had some doubts and difficulties to contend with; but duty, you know—and, as I said before, you, madam, you have been a great friend to Mr. Belfield, you have forwarded matters surprisingly.

Vio. It is very surprising, truly, if I have.

Paterson. You seem greatly staggered at what I tell you. I see you are a stranger to the principles upon which young ladies frequently act in this country; I believe, madam, in England, as many, or more, matches are made from pique, than for love; and, to say the truth, I take this of Miss Dove's to be one of that sort. There is a certain person, you know, who will feel upon this occasion.

Vio. Yes; I well know there is a certain person, who will feel upon this occasion; but, are the sufferings of that unhappy one to be converted into raillery and amusement?

Paterson. Oh, madam, the ladies will tell you, that therein consists the very luxury of revenge! But, I beseech you, have the goodness to make haste, my friend, Mr. Belfield, may stand in need of your support.

Vio. Thus insulted, I can contain myself no longer. Upon what infernal shore am I cast? Into what society of demons am I fallen? that a woman whom, by an act of honour, I would have redeemed from misery and ruin, should have the insolence, the inhumanity, to invite me to be a spectatress of her marriage with my own husband!

Paterson. With your husband! What do I hear? Is Mr. Andrew Belfield your husband?

Vio. Ay, do you doubt it? 'Would I could say he was not!

Paterson. Just heaven! you then are the Violetta, you are the Portuguese lady I have heard so much of, and married to Mr. Belfield.—Base and perfidious! Why, madam, both Miss Dove and myself conceived that 'twas the young adventurer with whom you suffered shipwreck, that—

Vio. What, Lewson! the brave, generous, honourable Lewson?

Paterson. Lewson! Lewson! as sure as can be, you mean young Belfield; for now the recollection strikes me, that I've heard he took that name before he quitted England. That Lewson, madam, whom we believed you married to, is Robert Belfield, the younger brother to your husband.

Vio. Mercy defend me! into what distress had this mutual mistake nearly involved us.

Paterson. Come then, madam, let us lose no time, but fly, with all despatch, to Cropley Castle; I have a postchaise waiting, which will convey us thither, in a few minutes; but before we go, I'll step in and direct these good people to find young Belfield, and send him after us. Old Ironsides and all must be there. [Exit.

Vio. Let me reflect upon my fate—wedded, betrayed, abandoned! at once a widow and a wife, all that my soul held dear, in the same hour obtained and lost. O false, false Belfield! Strong, indeed, must be that passion, and deeply seated in my heart, which even thy treachery could not eradicate! Twice shipwrecked! twice rescued from the jaws of death! Just heaven! I do not, dare not, murmur; nor can I doubt but that thy hand invisibly is stretched forth to save me; and, through this labyrinth of sorrow, to conduct me to repose. Re-enter PATERSON.

Paterson. Now, madam, if you will trust yourself to my convoy, I'll bring you into harbour, where you shall never suffer shipwreck more.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Sir Benjamin Dove's House.

Enter SIR BENJAMIN and LADY DOVE.

Sir B. Upon these terms and stipulations, Lady Dove, I consent to your remaining at Cropley Castle. Enjoy you your own prerogative, and leave me in possession of mine; above all things, my dear, I must insist that Mr. Paterson be henceforward considered as my friend and companion, and not your ladyship's.

Lady D. Nay, but indeed and indeed, my dear Sir Benjamin, this is being too hard with me, to debar me the common gratifications of every woman of distinction; Mr. Paterson, you know, is my very particular friend.

Sir B. 'Tis for his being so very particular, my dear, that I object to him.

Lady D. Friendship, Sir Benjamin, is the virtuous recreation of delicate and susceptible minds; would you envy me that innocent pleasure? Why, you know, my dearest, that your passion for me, which was once so violent, is now softened and subsided into mere friendship.

Sir B. True, my dear; and, therefore, I am afraid, lest my love having, by easy degrees, slackened into friendship, his friendship should, by as natural a transition, quicken into love; say no more, therefore, upon this point, but leave me to Mr. Paterson, and Mr. Paterson to me; go, send Sophia to me—Oh, here she comes: your ladyship need not be present at our conference; I think my own daughter, surely, belongs to my province, and not yours. Good morning to you. [Exit Lady D.]

Enter SOPHIA.

Well, daughter, are you prepared to comply with my desires, and give your hand to Andrew Belfield, this morning?

Sophia. Sir!

Sir B. My heart is fixed upon this event; I have watched late and early to bring it to bear; and you'll find, my child, when you come to peruse your marriage settlement, how tenderly I have consulted your happiness in this match.

Sophia. Alas! I should never think of searching for happiness amongst deeds and conveyances; 'tis the man, and not the money, that is likely to determine my lot.

Sir B. Well, and is not Mr. Belfield a man? a fine man, as I take it he is, and a fine estate I'm sure he has got. Then, consider, likewise, how this alliance will accommodate matters in the borough of Knavestown, where I and my family have stood three contested elections with his, and lost two of them; that sport will now be at an end; and our interests will be consolidated by this match, as well as our estates.

Sophia. Still you mistake my meaning; I talk of the qualities of a man, you of his possessions; I require in a husband, good morals, good nature, and good sense; what has all this to do with contiguous estates, connected interests, and contested elections?

Sir B. I don't rightly understand what you would have, child; but this I well know, that if money alone will not make a woman happy, 'twill always purchase that that will. I hope, Sophy, you've done thinking of that rambling, idle young fellow, Bob Belfield.

Sophia. Perish all thought of him for ever! Nothing can be more contrary, more impossible in nature, than my union with young Belfield.—Age, ugliness, ill-nature, bring any-thing to my arms, rather than him.

Sir B. But why so angry with him, child? This violent detestation and abhorrence, is as favourable a symptom as any reasonable lover could wish for.

Enter PATERSON.

Paterson. Joy to you, Sir Benjamin! all joy attend you both; the bridegroom by this time is arrived; we saw his equipage enter the avenue, as ours drove into the court.

Sir B. Mr. Paterson, sir, I know not if yet your friend is to be a bridegroom, I find my daughter, here, so cold and uncomplying, for my own part, I don't know how I shall look Mr. Belfield in the face.

Paterson. Fear nothing, Sir Benjamin; make haste and receive your son-in-law; I have news to communicate to miss Dove, which I am confident will dispose her to comply with your wishes.

Sir B. Well, sir, I shall leave her to your tutorage. This obliging gentleman undertakes not only for my wife, but my daughter too. [Exit.]

Sophia. I am surprised, Mr. Paterson—

Paterson. Hold, madam, for one moment; I have made a discovery of the last importance to your welfare; you are in an error with regard to young Belfield. Violetta, the lady you believed him married to, is here in the house; I have brought her hither at your request; and from her I learn, that the elder brother is her husband—he who, this very morning, but for my discovery, had been yours also.

Sophia. What's this you tell me, sir? Where is this lady—where is Violetta? where is young Belfield?

Paterson. Violetta, madam, I have put under safe convoy; and by this time, your waiting woman has lodged her privately in the closet of your bed-chamber: there you will find her, and learn the whole process of this providential escape. I'll only speak a word to Sir Benjamin, and come to you without any further delay. [Exit Sophia.]

Enter SIR BENJAMIN DOVE and BELFIELD, SEN.

Sir B. Well, Mr. Paterson, what says my daughter?

Paterson. Every thing that becomes an obedient daughter to say: so, that if this gentleman is not made completely happy within this hour, the fault will lie at his door, and not with Miss Sophia.

Sir B. This is good news, Paterson; but I am impatient to have the ceremony concluded; the bells are ringing, the parson is waiting, and the equipages are at the door: step up to Sophia, and tell her to hasten; and hark ye, my friend, as you go by Lady Dove's door, give her a call; do you mind me, only call at the door: don't you go in; she's busy at work upon a large parcel of ribbons, which I've given her to make into wedding favours; she'll be very angry if you go into her chamber. Go, go, get you gone. [Exit Paterson.]

Belf. How comes it to pass, Sir Benjamin, that Mr. Paterson is become so necessary an agent in the female affairs of your family? I confess to you my pride is wounded, when I find I am to thank him for your daughter's consent to marry me. The man that can prevail upon a woman to act against her liking, what may he not persuade her to do, with it?

Sir B. Your remark is just: Paterson has certainly some secret faculty of persuasion; and all that can be said is, that 'tis better to see your danger before marriage, than to be feeling it out, as I have done, afterwards.

Enter CAPTAIN IRONSIDES and BELFIELD, JUN.

Sir B. What, old acquaintance, are you come to rejoice with me on this occasion? Bob Belfield too, as I live! you are both heartily welcome. I could have spared their visit notwithstanding. (Aside.)

Belf. My brother here? vexation!

Belf. jun. Sir Benjamin! I come now to claim your promise of one hour's conversation with your

Sir B. The devil you do! [daughter.]

Belf. Ridiculous!

Belf. jun. To you, sir, obligations of this sort may be matter of ridicule: but while I religiously observe all promises I make to others, I shall expect others to be as observant of those they make to me.

Belf. Sir, I have a most profound veneration for your principles, and am happy to find your understanding so much cultivated by travel; but, in spite of your address, you will find it rather difficult to induce me to waive my right in Miss Dove, in favour of a professed adventurer.

Belf. jun. Shameless, unfeeling man! an adventurer do you call me? You, whose unbrotherly persecution drove me to this hazardous, this humiliating occupation?

Ironsides. Sirrah! Bob! no reflections upon privateering; it has lined your pockets well, you young rogue; and you may tell your fine brother there, that we have landed treasure enough upon his estate to buy the fee-simple of it: ay, and, for what I know, of Sir Wiseacre's here into the bargain.

Sir B. What's that you say, Captain Ironsides? Let's have a word in a corner with you.

Belf. Look ye, sir, if you conceive yourself wronged by me, there is but one way. You know your remedy.

Belf. jun. I know your meaning, brother; and, to demonstrate how much greater my courage is than your's, I must confess to you, I dare not accept your proposal. [believe.]

Sir B. No, no, I've given him enough of that, I

Ironsides. Bob Belfield, if I did not know thee for a lad of mettle, I should not tell what to make of all this; for my own part, I understand none of your scruples and refinements, not I; a man is a man; and if I take care to give an affront to no man, I think I have a right to take an affront from no man.

Sir B. Come, gentlemen, suspend your dispute; here comes my daughter—let her decide betwixt you.

Belf. jun. Let me receive my sentence from her lips, and I will submit to it.

Enter SOPHIA, PATERSON, and LADY DOVE.

Sir B. Here's a young gentleman, daughter, that will take no denial; he comes to forbid the bans just when you are both going into the church to be married.

Sophia. Upon my word, this is something extraordinary. What are the gentleman's reasons for this behaviour?

Sir B. He claims a sort of promise from me that he should be indulged in an hour's conversation with you, before you give your hand to his brother.

Sophia. An hour's conversation! What little that gentleman can have to say to me, I believe, may be said in a very few minutes.

Belf. I think, brother, this conversation don't promise a great deal.

Sophia. In the first place, then, I own to this gentleman, and the company present, that there was a time when I entertained the highest opinion of his merit. Nay, I will not scruple to confess that I had conceived a regard for him of the tenderest sort.

Ironsides. And pray, young lady, how came my nephew to forfeit your good opinion?

Sophia. By a conduct, sir, that must for ever forfeit, not my esteem only, but your's, and all mankind's: I am sorry to be his accuser; but I will appeal to you, Mr. Belfield, who are his brother, whether it is reconcilable either to honour or humanity, to prosecute an affair of marriage with one woman, when you are previously and indispensably engaged to another?

Belf. Humph!

Sophia. Yet this, sir, is the treatment I received: judge, therefore, if I can desire or consent to have any long conversation with a gentleman, who is under such engagements; nay, whom I can prove actually married to another woman, in this very house, and ready to vouch the truth of what I assert. Judge for me, Mr. Belfield, could you believe any man capable of such complicated, such inconceivable villany?

Belf. Heavens! This touches me too closely.

Sir B. Sir, I would fain know what excuse you can have for this behaviour? I can tell you, sir, I don't understand it.

Lady D. Oh, fie! fie upon you, Mr. Belfield! I wonder you are not ashamed to shew your face in this family.

Sir B. Who desired you to put in your oar?

Ironsides. Why, sirrah, would not one wife content you? 'Tis enough, in all reason, for one man; is it not, Sir Benjamin? [accuse me.]

Belf. jun. Sir, when it is proved I am married,

Ironsides. Look ye, Bob, I don't blame you for marrying; 'twas an indiscretion, and I can forgive it; but to deny it, is a meanness, and I abhor it.

Sophia. Mr. Belfield, do you say nothing upon this occasion?

Belf. Paterson, I am struck to the heart; I cannot support my guilt! I am married to Violetta; save me the confusion of relating it: this dishonourable engagement for ever I renounce; nor will I rest till I have made an atonement to an injured wife. Madam, I beg leave to withdraw for a few minutes.

Belf. jun. Hold, sir! this contrivance is of your forging; you have touched me too near; and now, if you dare draw your sword, follow me.

Sophia. Hold, gentlemen! you forget the lady is now in the house; she is a witness that will effectually put an end to your dispute: I will conduct her hither. [Exit.]

Belf. jun. I agree to it.

Ironsides. Harkye, nephew; I shrewdly suspect you have been laying a train to blow yourself up: if once Bob comes fairly alongside of you, you'll find your quarters too hot to hold you. I never yet found my boy out in a lie, and sha'n't tamely see a lie imposed upon him; for, while he is honest, and I have breath, he shall never want a friend to stand by him, or a father to protect him.

Belf. Mr. Paterson, explain my story: I will depart this instant in search of Violetta.

Enter SOPHIA and VIOLETTA.

Sophia. Stay, I conjure you! stay, turn, and look back upon this lady, before you go. (Presenting Violetta.)

Belf. My wife!

Sophia. Yes, sir, your wife, and my unanswerable witness.

Sir B. Heyday! here's a turn!

Ironsides. I thought how 'twould be.

Vio. Yes, sir, your faithful, your forsaken wife.

Sophia. Thank heaven, that I can add, your only wife!

Belf. How shall I look upon you? What shall I say? Where shall I hide my confusion? Oh, take me to your arms, and, in that soft shelter, let me find forgiveness and protection.

Vio. Be this your only punishment! and this!

Belf. jun. Was it then a sister I preserved from death? [pardon too?]

Belf. What's this I hear? Oh, brother! can you

Belf. jun. Be indeed a brother, and let this providential event be the renovation of our friendship.

Belf. What shall I say to you, madam? (To Sophia.) Paterson, you know my heart: bear witness to its remorse. By heaven, my secret resolution was instantly to have departed in search of this my injured wife; but I'm not worthy even of your resentment; here is one that merits and returns your love. (Turning to his brother.)

Ironsides. Come, god-daughter, we can never say the fleet's fairly come to an anchor while the admiral's ship is out at sea. (Presenting Belfield, Junior.) My nephew here is as honest a lad as lives, and loves you at the soul of him; give him your hand, and I'll broach the last chest of dollars to make him a fortune deserving of you. What say you, my old friend?

Sir B. Here's my hand; I've spoke the word; she's his own. Lady Dove, I won't hear a syllable to the contrary.

Ironsides. Then, the galleon is thy own, boy. What should an old fellow like me do with money? Give me a warm nightcap, a tiff of punch, and an elbow-chair in your chimney corner, and I'll lay up for the remainder of my days.

Belf. jun. How shall I give utterance to my gratitude, or my love?

Belf. Now are you all assembled to overwhelm me with confusion. Like some poor culprit, surrounded by a crowd of witnesses, I stand convicted and appalled. But all your wrongs shall be redressed; my whole life shall be employed in acts of justice and atonement. Virtue, and this virtuous woman, were my first ruling passions.

Now they resume their social, soft controul,

And love and happiness possess my soul.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I. SCENE I.—A Room in an Inn.

Enter YOUNG FASHION, LORY, and Postillion.

Young F. Lory, pay the post-boy, and take the portmanteau.

Lory. 'Faith, sir, we had better let the postboy take the portmanteau and pay himself.

Young F. Why sure there's something left in it.

Lory. Not a rag, upon my honour, sir—

Young F. Why, 'sdeath! it appears full.

Lory. Yes, sir; I made bold to stuff it with hay, to save appearances, and look like baggage.

Young F. What the devil shall I do? harkye, boy, what's the chaise?

Post. Thirteen shillings, please your honour.

Young F. Can you give me change for a guinea?

Post. O yes, sir.

Lory. So, what will he do now? Lord, sir, you had better let the boy be paid below. [be as well.

Young F. Why, as you say, Lory, I believe it will Lory. Yes, yes; I'll tell them to discharge you below, honest friend. [pikes, too.

Post. Please your honour, there are the turn-

Young F. Ay, ay, the turnpikes by all means.

Post. I hope your honour will order me something.

Young F. To be sure; bid them give you a crown.

Lory. Yes, yes, my master doesn't care what you charge them, so get along, you—

Post. And there's the ostler, your honour.

Lory. Psha! damn the ostler; would you impose on the gentleman's generosity! [Exit Postillion.

Lory. Well, sir, we have arrived at Scarborough not worth a guinea: I hope you'll own yourself a happy man—you have outlived all your cares.

Young F. How so, sir?

Lory. Why you have nothing left to take care of. But, now, sir, for my Lord Foppington, your elder Young F. D—n my eldest brother. [brother.

Lory. With all my heart; but get him to redeem your annuity, however. Look you, sir—

Young F. Look you, sir, are you so impenetrable a blockhead as to believe he'll help me with a far-thing?

Lory. Not if you treat him de haut en bas, as you used to do.

Young F. Why how would'st have me treat him?

Lory. Like a trout, tickle him.

Young F. I can't flatter.

Lory. Can you starve?

Young F. Yes.

Lory. I can't; good-by-t'ye, sir.

Young F. Stay, thou'lt distract me. But who comes here? my old friend, Colonel Townly.

Enter COLONEL TOWNLY.

My dear Colonel, I am rejoiced to meet you here.

Col. T. Dear Tom, this is an unexpected pleasure; what, are you come to Scarborough to be present at your brother's wedding?

Lory. Ah, sir, if it had been his funeral, we should have come with pleasure. [still?

Col. T. What, Lory, are you with your master

Lory. Yes, sir, I have been starving with him ever since I saw your honour last. [gaze.

Young F. Go, go, sir, and take care of the bag-

Lory. Yes, sir! The baggage! O Lord! I suppose, sir, I must charge the landlord to be very particular where he stows it.

Young F. Get along, you rascal. [Exit Lory.]

But, Colonel, are you acquainted with my proposed sister-in-law?

Col. T. Only by character; her father, Sir Tunbelly Clumsy, lives within a quarter of a mile of this place, in a lonely old house, which nobody comes near. She never goes abroad, nor sees company at home; in short, nobody has free admission there but our old acquaintance, Mother Coupler, who has procured your brother this match, and is, I believe, a distant relation of Sir Tunbelly's.

Young F. But is her fortune so considerable?

Col. T. Three thousand a-year, and a good sum of money, independant of her father, beside.

Young F. 'Sdeath! that my old acquaintance, Dame Coupler, could not have thought of me, as well as my brother, for such a prize.

Col. T. Egad, I wouldn't swear that you are too late, his lordship, I know, hasn't yet seen the lady, and, I believe has quarrelled with his patroness.

Young F. My dear Colonel, what an idea have you started!

Col. T. Pursue it if you can, and you shall have my assistance; for beside my natural contempt for his lordship, I have at present the enmity of a rival towards him. [the widow Berinthia?

Young F. Has he been addressing your old flame,

Col. T. Faith, Tom, I am at present most whimsically circumstanced. I came here a month ago to meet the lady you mention; but she failing in her promise, I, partly from pique, and partly from idleness, have been diverting my chagrin by offering up incense to the beauties of Amanda, our friend Loveless's wife.

Young F. And Berinthia has never appeared?

Col. T. Oh, there's the perplexity; for just as I began not to care whether I ever saw her again or not, last night she arrived: not condescending to give me any serious reasons for having fooled me for a month, I left her in a huff.

Young F. Well, well, I'll answer for it she'll soon resume her power; but my coxcomb of a brother is an admirer of Amanda's too, is he?

Col. T. Yes, and I believe is most heartily despised by her; but come with me, and you shall see her and your old friend Loveless.

Young F. I must pay my respects to his lordship: perhaps you can direct me to his lodgings.

Col. T. Come with me; I shall pass by it.

Young F. I wish you could pay this visit for me, or could tell me what I should say to him.

Col. T. Say nothing to him; apply yourself to his bag, his sword, his feather, his snuff-box; and when you are well with them, desire him to lend you a thousand pounds, and I'll engage you prosper.

Young F. 'Sdeath and furies! why was that coxcomb thrust into the world before me? O Fortune, Fortune, thou art a jilt, by gad! [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Dressing Room.

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON, and LA VAROLE.

Lord F. Well, 'tis an unspeakable pleasure to be a man of quality; strike me dumb; even the boors of this northern spa have learned the respect due to a title. (Aside.) La Varole!

La Var. Mi lor—

Lord F. You han't yet been at Muddymoat-hall, to announce my arrival, have you?

La Var. Not yet, mi lor.

Lord F. Then you need not go till Saturday. [Exit La Varole.] as I am in no particular haste to view my intended sposa, I shall sacrifice a day or two more to the pursuit of my friend Loveless's wife: Amanda is a charming creature, strike me ugly: and if I have any discernment in the world, she thinks no less of my Lord Foppington.

Re-enter LA VAROLE.

La Var. Mi lor, de shoemaker, de tailor, de hosier, de sempstress, de peru, be all ready, if your lordship please to dress.

Lord F. 'Tis well; admit them.

La Var. Hey, messieurs, entrez.

Enter Tailor, Shoemaker, and Servants.

Lord F. So, gentlemen, I hope you have all taken pains to shew yourselves masters in your professions.

Tai. I think I may presume, sir,—

La Var. My lor, you clown, you.

Tai. My lord, I ask your lordship's pardon, my lord. I hope my lord, your lordship will be pleased to own I have brought your lordship as accomplished a suit of clothes as ever peer of England wore; will your lordship please to view 'em now?

Lord F. Ay; but let my people dispose the glasses so that I may see myself before and behind; for I love to see myself all round.

Enter YOUNG FASHION and LORY.

Young F. Heyday! what the devil have we here? Sure my gentleman's gown a favourite at court, he has got so many people at his levee. (Apart.)

Lory. Sir, these people come in order to make him a favourite at court, they are to establish him with the ladies. (Apart.)

Young F. Good heaven! to what an ebb of taste are women fallen, that it should be in the power of a laced coat to recommend a gallant to them. (Apart.)

Lory. Sir, tailors and hair-dressers debauch all the women. (Apart.)

Young F. Thou say'st true. But now for my reception. (Apart.)

Lord F. (To Tailor.) Death, and eternal tortures! sir, I say the coat is too wide here by a foot.

Tai. My lord, if it had been tighter, 'twould neither have hooked nor buttoned.

Lord F. Rat the hooks and buttons, sir! Can any thing be worse than this? As Gad shall judge me, it hangs on my shoulders like a chairman's surtout. [fancy.

Tai. 'Tis not for me to dispute your lordship's Lory. There, sir, observe what respect does.

Young F. Respect! D—n him for a coxcomb, but let's accost him. (Apart.) Brother, I'm your humble servant.

Lord F. O Lard, Tam, I did not expect you in England. Brother, I'm glad to see you; but what has brought you to Scarborough, Tam? Look you sir, (To the Tailor.) I shall never be reconciled to this nauseous wrapping gown, therefore pray get me another suit with all possible expedition; for this is my eternal aversion. [Exit Tailor.] Well but, Tam, you don't tell me what has driven you to Scarborough. Mrs. Calico, are not you of my mind? [is pleased with your ruffles?

Semp. Directly, my lord. I hope your lordship

Lord F. In love with them, stab my vitals! Bring me my bill, you shall be paid to-morrow.

Semp. I humbly thank your lordship. [Exit.

Lord F. Hark thee, shoemaker, these shoes a'nt ugly, but they don't fit me.

Shoe. My lord, I think they fit you very well.

Lord F. They hurt me just below the instep.

Shoe. No, my lord, they don't hurt you there.

Lord F. I tell thee they pinch me execrably.

Shoe. Why then, my lord, if those shoes pinch you, I'll be d—. [me I cannot feel?

Lord F. Why wilt thou undertake to persuade Shoe. Your lordship may please to feel what you think fit, but that shoe does not hurt you; I think I understand my trade.

Lord F. Now, by all that's good and powerful, thou art an incomprehensive coxcomb, but thou makest good shoes, and so I'll bear with thee.

Shoe. My lord, I have worked for half the people of quality in this town these twenty years, and 'tis very hard I shouldn't know when a shoe hurts, and when it don't.

Lord F. Well, pr'ythee begone about thy business. [Exit Shoemaker.] Mr. Mendlegs, the calves of these stockings are thicken'd a little too much: they make my legs look like a porter's.

Mend. My lord, methinks they look mighty well.

Lord F. Ay, but you are not so good a judge of those things as I am, I have studied them all my life; therefore pray let the next be the thickness of a crown-piece less.

Mend. My lord, they are the same kind I had the honour to furnish your lordship with in town.

Lord F. Very possibly, Mr. Mendlegs; but that was in the beginning of the winter, and you should always remember, that if you make a nobleman's spring legs us robust as his autumnal calves, you commit a manstrous impropriety, and make no allowance for the fatigues of the winter. [Exit Hosier.

Jewel. I hope, my lord, those buckles have had the unspeakable satisfaction of being honoured with your lordship's approbation?

Lord F. Why, they are of a pretty fancy; but don't you think them rather of the smallest?

Jewel. My lord, they could not well be larger, to keep on your lordship's shoe.

Lord F. My good sir, you forget that these matters are not as they used to be: formerly, indeed, the buckle was a sort of machine, intended to keep on the shoe; but the case is now quite reversed, and the shoe is of no earthly use, but to keep on the buckle. Now give me my watches, (to Serv.) my chapeau,—my handkerchief,—my snuff box: there, now the business of the morning is pretty well over. [Exit Jeweller.]

Young F. Well, Lory, what dost think on't? a very friendly reception from a brother, after three years' absence! (Apart.)

Lory. Why, sir, 'tis your own fault, here you have stood ever since you came in, and have not commended one thing that belongs to him. (Apart.)

Young F. (Servants all go off.) Nor ever shall while they belong to a coxcomb. (Apart.) Now your people of business are gone, brother, I hope I may obtain a quarter of an hour's audience of you.

Lord F. Faith, Tam, I must beg you'll excuse me at this time, for I have an engagement which I would not break for the salvation of mankind. Eh! is my carriage at the door? Excuse me, brother.

Young F. Shall you be back to dinner?

Lord F. As Gad shall judge me, I can't tell; for it is possible I may dine with some friends at Donner's. [needs talk with you.]

Young F. Shall I meet you there? for I must

Lord F. That I'm afraid mayn't be quite so proper; for those I commonly eat with are a people of nice conversation; and you know, Tam, your education has been a little at large; but there are other ordinaries in town, very good beef ordinaries. I suppose, Tam, you can eat beef? However, dear Tam, I'm glad to see thee in England, stap my vitals! [Exit.]

Young F. 'Sdeath! Is this to be borne? But 'tis enough; I will now shew you the excess of my passion, by being very calm. Come, Lory, lay your loggerhead to mine, and, in cold blood, let us contrive his destruction.

Lory. Here comes a head, sir, would contrive it better than both our loggerheads, if she would but join in the confederacy.

Young F. By this light, Madam Coupler! she seems dissatisfied at something: let us observe her. (Retire.) Enter MRS. COUPLER.

Mrs. C. So! I am likely to be well rewarded for my services, truly; my suspicions I find, were but too just. What! refuse to advance me a petty sum, when I am upon the point of making him master of a galleon! But let him look to the consequences, an ungrateful, narrow-minded coxcomb.

Young F. (Comes forward.) So he is upon my soul, old lady; it must be my brother you speak of.

Mrs. C. Ha! stripling, how came you here? What, hast spent all, eh? And art thou come to dun his lordship for assistance?

Young F. No, I want somebody's assistance to cut his lordship's throat, without the risk of being hang'd for him.

Mrs. C. Egad, sirrah, I could help thee to do him almost as good a turn, without the danger of being burn'd in the hand for't.

Young F. How, how, old Mischief?

Mrs. C. Why, you must know I have done you the kindness to make up a match for your brother.

Young F. I'm very much beholden to you, truly!

Mrs. C. You may before the wedding-day: for Young F. Good. [your brother's a knave.]

Mrs. C. He has given me a bond of a thousand pounds for helping him to this lady, and has promised me as much more in ready money, upon the day of the marriage; which, I understand by a friend, he never designs to pay me; and his just now refusing to pay me a part is a proof of it. If therefore you will be a generous young rogue, and secure me five thousand pounds, I'll help you to the lady.

Young F. And how the devil wilt thou do that?

Mrs. C. Without his aid, I warrant thee. Thy brother's face not one of the family ever saw; the whole business has been managed by me, and all his letters go through my hands. Sir Tunbely Clumsy, my relation is apprised of his lordship's being down here, and expects him to-morrow to receive his daughter's hand, but the peer, I find, means to bait here a few days longer to recover the fatigue of his journey. Now you shall go to Mud-dymoot-hall in his place. I'll give you a letter of introduction: and if you don't marry the girl before sun-set, you deserve to be hanged before morning!

Young F. Agreed, agreed; and for thy reward—

Mrs. C. Well, well; though I warrant thou hast not a farthing of money in thy pocket now—

Young F. Not a souse by Jupiter.

Mrs. C. Must I advance then? Well, be at my lodgings, next door, this evening, and I'll see what may be done, we'll sign and seal, and when I have given thee some further instructions, thou shalt hoist sail and begone. [Exit.]

Young F. So, Lory, fortune, thou seest, at last takes care of merit.

Lory. Ay, sir, if the devil don't step between the cup and the lip, as he used to do.

Young F. Why, faith, he has played me many a sad trick; and, egad, I am almost afraid he's at work about it again now; but if I should tell thee how, thoud'st wonder at me.

Lory. Indeed, sir, I have wondered at you so often, I can wonder at you no more.

Young F. No! What wouldst thou say, if a qualm of conscience should spoil my design? [than ever.]

Lory. I would eat my words, and wonder more

Young F. Why faith, Lory, though I have played many a roguish trick, this is so full grown a cheat, I find I have scruples.

Lory. They are strong symptoms of death. If you find them increase, sir, pray make your will.

Young F. No, my conscience shan't starve me neither; but before I execute this project, I'll try my brother to the bottom. If he has yet so much humanity about him to assist me, though with a moderate aid, I'll drop my project at his feet, and shew him how I can do for him much more than what I'd ask he'd do for me. This one conclusive trial of him I resolve to make.

Succeed or fail, still vic'try is my lot;

If I subdue his heart, 'tis well,—if not,

I will subdue my conscience to my plot. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room.

Enter AMANDA and LOVELESS.

Aman. I am satisfied with every thing that pleases you, else I had not come to Scarborough at all.

Love. O! a little of the noise and folly of this place will sweeten the pleasures of our retreat.

Aman. That pleasing prospect will be my chiefest entertainment, whilst, much against my will, I engage in those empty pleasures which 'tis so much the fashion to be fond of.

Love. I own most of them are, indeed, but empty; yet there are delights which may divert an honest man, and be a harmless entertainment to a virtuous woman: good music is one: and truly (with some small allowance) the plays, I think, may be esteemed another.

Aman. Plays, I confess, have some small charms. What do you think of that you saw last night?

Love. To say truth, I did not mind it much, my attention was for some time taken off to admire the workmanship of nature, in the face of a young lady who sat some distance from me, she was so exquisitely handsome.

Aman. So exquisitely handsome!

Love. What, alarmed, Amanda? [danger.]

Aman. It is my duty to be so when you are in Love. You are too quick in apprehending for me. I viewed her with a world of admiration, but not one glance of love.

Aman. Take heed of trusting to such nice distinctions. But were your eyes the only things that were inquisitive? who was she, pray?

Love. Indeed I cannot tell.

Aman. You will not tell.

Love. Upon my honour then, I did not ask.

Aman. Do you know what company was with her?

Love. I do not. But why are you so earnest.

Aman. I thought I had cause.

Love. But you thought wrong, Amanda; for turn the case, and let it be your story,—

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, there is a lady at the door in a chair desires to know whether your ladyship sees company? her name is Berinthia.

Aman. Oh dear! 'tis a relation I have not seen these five years, pray her to walk in. [Exit Servant.] Here's another beauty for you; she was, when I saw her last, reckoned extremely handsome.

Love. Don't be jealous now; for I shall gaze upon her too.

Enter BERINTHIA.

Ha! by Heavens, the very woman! (Aside.)

Ber. Dear Amanda, I did not expect to meet you in Scarborough.

Aman. Sweet cousin, I'm overjoyed to see you. Mr. Loveless, here's a relation and a friend of mine, I desire you'll be better acquainted with.

Love. If my wife never desires a harder thing, madam, her request will be easily granted.

Re-enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, my Lord Foppington presents his humble service to you, and it be not inconvenient to you, he'll come and wait upon you.

Love. Give my compliments to his lordship, and I shall be glad to see him. [Exit Servant.] If you are not acquainted with his lordship, madam, you will be entertained with his character.

Aman. Now it moves my pity more than my mirth to see a man, whom nature has made no fool, be so very industrious to pass for an ass.

Love. Nay, Amanda; pity those whom nature abuses, never those who abuse nature.

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.

Lord F. Dear Loveless, I am your most humble servant.

Love. My lord, I'm yours. [slave.]

Lord F. Madam, your ladyship's very obedient

Love. My lord, this lady is a relation of my wife's.

Lord F. (Kisses her hand.) The beautifullest race of people upon earth, rat me! Dear Loveless, I am overjoyed that you think of continuing here. I am, stap my vitals! For gad's sake, madam, how has your ladyship been able to subsist thus long, under the fatigue of a country life? (To Amanda.)

Aman. My life has been very far from that, my lord, it has been a very quiet one.

Lord F. Why, that's the fatigue I speak of, madam; for 'tis impossible to be quiet, without thinking: now thinking is to me the greatest fatigue in the world.

Aman. Does not your lordship love reading, then?

Lord F. Oh, passionately, madam; but I never think of what I read. [ing?]

Ber. Why, can your lordship read without think-

Lord F. Oh, lud! can your ladyship pray without devotion? But, to say the truth, madam, let a man love reading never so well, when once he comes to know the town, he finds so many better ways of passing away the four-and-twenty hours, that 'twere ten thousand pities he should consume his time in that: for example, madam, my life is a perpetual stream of pleasure, that glides through with such a variety of entertainments, I believe the wisest of our ancestors never had the least conception of any of 'em. I rise, madam, when in tawn, about twelve o'clock. I don't rise sooner, because it is the worst thing in the world for the complexion: nat that I pretend to be a beau; but a man must endeavour to look decent, lest he make so odious a figure in the side-bax, the ladies should be compelled to turn their eyes upon the play. So, at twelve o'clock, I say, I rise. Naw, if I find it is a good day, I resolve to take the exercise of riding; so, drink my chocolate, and draw on my boots, by two. On my return, I dress; and after dinner, lounge, perhaps, to the opera.

Ber. Your lordship, I suppose, is fond of music?

Lord F. Oh, passionately! on Tuesdays and Saturdays; for then there is always the best company, and one is not expected to undergo the fatigue of listening. [the opera?]

Aman. Does your lordship think that the case at Lord F. Most certainly, madam. There is my Lady Tattle, my Lady Prate, my Lady Titter, my Lady Sneer, my Lady Giggie, and my Lady Grin; these have boxes in the front, and, while any favourite air is singing, are the prettiest company in the waurld, stap my vitals! Mayn't we hope for the honour to see you added to our society, madam?

Aman. Alas! I am the worst company in the world at a concert; I'm so apt to attend to the music.

Lord F. Why, madam, that is very pardonable in the country or at church, but a monstrous inattention in a polite assembly. I am afraid I tire the Love. Not at all. Pray go on. [company.]

Lord F. Why, then, ladies, there only remains to add, that I generally conclude the evening at one or other of the clubs; nat that I ever play deep; indeed, I have been for some time tied up from losing above five thousand paunds at a sitting.

Love. But isn't your lordship sometimes obliged to attend the weighty affairs of the nation?

Lord F. Sir, as to weighty affairs, I leave them to weighty heads; I never intend mine shall be a burden to my body. [state.]

Ber. Nay, my lord, but you are a pillar of the Lord F. An ornamental pillar, madam; for sooner than undergo any part of the fatigue, rat me, but the whole building should fall plump to the ground!

Aman. But, my lord, a fine gentleman spends a great deal of his time in his intrigues; you have given us no account of them yet.

Lord F. So! She would inquire into my amours! that's jealousy, poor soul! I see she's in love with me. (Aside.) O lord, madam! I had like to forgot a secret I must needs tell your ladyship. Ned, you must not be so jealous, now, as to listen.

Love. Not I, my lord; I am too fashionable a husband, to pry into the secrets of my wife.

Lord F. I am in love with you, to desperation, strike me speechless! (Apart.)

Aman. (Strikes him.) Then thus I return your passion, an impudent fool! [realm.]

Lord F. Gad's curse, madam! I am a peer of the Love. Eh! what, the devil, do you affront my wife, sir? nay, then—(Draws; they fight.)

Aman. What has my folly done? Help! murder! help! Part them, for heaven's sake!

Lord F. Ah! quite through the body, stap my vitals!

Enter Servant.

Love. (Runs to Lord Foppington.) I hope I ha'n't killed the fool, however. Bear him up; call a surgeon there! (A Servant crosses, and goes off.)

Lord F. Ay, pray make haste.

Love. This mischief you may thank yourself for.

Lord F. I may so; love's the devil, indeed, Ned!

Enter PROBE and Servant.

Serv. Mr. Probe, sir, was just going by the door.

Lord F. He's the welcomest man alive.

Probe. Stand by, stand by, stand by; pray, gentlemen, stand by. Lord have mercy upon us, did you never see a man run through the body before? Pray, stand by.

Lord F. Ah, Mr. Probe, I'm a dead man!

Probe. A dead man, and I by! I should laugh to see that, egad! [upon his wound.]

Love. Pr'ythee, don't stand prating, but look

Probe. Why, what if I won't look upon his wound this hour, sir.

Love. Why, then he'll bleed to death, sir.

Probe. Why, then I'll fetch him to life again, sir.

Love. 'Slife! he's run through the body, I tell thee.

Probe. I wish he was run through the heart, and I should get the more credit by his cure. Now, I hope, you are satisfied. Come, now let me come at him; now let me come at him. (Viewing his wound.) Oons! what a gash is here! Why, sir, a man may drive a coach and six horses into your body.

Lord F. Oh!

Probe. Why, what the devil! have you run the gentleman through with a scythe? A little scratch between the skin and the ribs, that's all. (Aside.)

Love. Let me see his wound.

Probe. Then you shall dress it, sir; for if any body looks upon it I won't. [saw.]

Love. Why, thou art the veriest coxcomb I ever

Probe. Sir, I am not master of my trade for no-

Lord F. Surgeon! [thing.]

Probe. Sir.

Lord F. Are there any hopes? [for a cure?]

Probe. I can't tell. What are you willing to give Lord F. Five hundred pounds, with pleasure.

Probe. Why, then, perhaps, there may be hopes; but we must avoid a further delay. Here, help the gentleman into a chair, and carry him to my house presently; that's the properest place—to bubble him out of his money. (Aside.) Come, come; there, in with him.

Lord F. Dear Loveless, adieu! if I die, I forgive thee; and, if I live, I hope thou wilt do as much by me. I am sorry you and I should quarrel, but I hope here's an end on't; for, if you are satisfied, I am.

Love. I shall hardly think it worth my prosecuting any further, so you may be at rest, sir.

Lord F. Thou art a generous fellow, strike me dumb! but thou hast an impertinent wife, stap my vitals! (Aside.)

Probe. So; carry him off, carry him off; we shall have him prate himself into a fever by-and-by; carry him off. [Exeunt, with Lord Foppington.]

Love. Nay, I saw his wound; 'tis nothing.

Enter COLONEL TOWNLY.

Col. T. So, so; I am glad to find you alive, and that you have corrected him without further mischief, or you might have deprived me of the pleasure of executing a plot against his lordship, which I have been contriving with an old acquaintance of yours.

Love. Explain.

Col. T. His brother, Tom Fashion, is come down here, and we have it in contemplation to save him the trouble of his intended wedding; but we want your assistance instantly. Tom would have called, but he is preparing for his enterprize, so I promised to bring you to him; so, if these ladies can spare you—

Love. I'll go with you, with all my heart;—(Aside.) though I could wish—how engaging she is! but what have I to do with beauty? I have already had my portion, and must not covet more.

Aman. Mr. Loveless, pray one word with you before you go.

Love. What would my dear?

Aman. Only a woman's foolish question, how do you like my cousin here?

Love. Why, I confess she's handsome: but you must not think I slight your kinswoman, if I own to you, of all the women who may claim that character, she is the last that would triumph in my

Aman. I am satisfied. [heart.]

Love. Now, tell me why you asked.

Aman. At night I will. Adieu.

Love. I'm your's. [Exeunt Love. and Col. T.]

Aman. I'm glad to find he does not like her, for I have a great mind to persuade her to come and live with me. (Aside.)

Ber. So! I find my colonel continues in his airs. (Aside.)

Aman. For heaven's sake, Berinthia, tell me what way I shall take to persuade you to come and live with me. [but one.]

Ber. Why, one way in the world there is, and Aman. And pray what is that?

Ber. It is to assure me I shall be very welcome.

Aman. If that be all, you shall e'en sleep here to-night. [will think me mad.]

Ber. To-night! Why, the people where I lodge

Aman. Let 'em think what they please.

Ber. Say you so, Amanda? Why, then, they shall think what they please; for I'm a young widow, and I care not what any body thinks. Ah, Amanda! it's a delicious thing to be a young widow.

Aman. You'll hardly make me think so.

Ber. Because you are in love with your husband.

Aman. Pray, 'tis with a world of innocence I would inquire, what is your opinion of Colonel Townly?

Ber. Why, I can assure you, there's not a man in town who has a better interest with the women, that are worth having an interest with.

Aman. He answers the opinion I had ever of him. I must acquaint you with a secret: 'tis not that fool Lord Foppington alone has talked to me of love, Townly has been tampering too.

Ber. So, so! here the mystery comes out. (Aside.) Colonel Townly! impossible, my dear.

Aman. 'Tis true, indeed; though he has done it in vain; nor do I think that all the merit of mankind combined, could shake the tender love I bear my husband: yet I will own to you, Berinthia, I did not start at his addresses, as when they came from one whom I contemned.

Ber. Oh! this is better and better! (Aside.) Well said, innocence! And you really think, my dear, that nothing could abate your constancy and attachment to your husband?

Aman. Nothing, I am convinced. [better?]

Ber. What if you found he lov'd another woman

Aman. Well?

Ber. Well! why, were I that thing they call a slighted wife, somebody should run the risk of being that thing they call, a husband. Don't I talk madly?

Aman. Madly, indeed!

Ber. Yet I'm very innocent.

Aman. That, I dare swear you are. I know how to make allowances for your humour: but you resolve, then, never to marry again?

Ber. Oh, no! I resolve I will.

Aman. How so?

Ber. That I never may.

Aman. You banter me.

Ber. Indeed, I don't; but a—heavens! I have business at home, and am half an hour too late!

Aman. As you are to return with me, I'll just give some orders, and walk with you.

Ber. Well, make haste, and we'll finish this subject as we go. [Exit Amanda.] Well, this discovery is lucky! Base Townly! at once, false to me, and treacherous to his friends! and my innocent and demure cousin too! I have it in my power to be revenged on her, however. Her husband, if I have any skill in countenance, would be as happy in my smiles, as Townly can hope to be in hers. I'll make the experiment, come what will on it. The woman who can forgive the being robbed of a favoured lover, must be either an idiot or something worse. [Exit.]

ACT II. SCENE I.—A Room.

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON and LA VAROLE.

Lord F. Fellow, let my vis-a-vis come to the door.

La Var. Will your lordship venture so soon to expose yourself to the weather?

Lord F. Sir, I will venture as soon as I can to expose myself to the ladies.

La Var. I wish your lordship would please to keep house a little longer; I'm afraid your honour does not well consider your wound.

Lord F. My wound! I would not be in eclipse another day, though I had as many wounds in my body as I have had in my heart. So mind, Varole, let these cards be left as directed; for this evening I shall wait on my future father-in-law, Sir Tunbelly, and I mean to commence my devoirs to the lady, by giving an entertainment at her father's expense; and hark thee, tell Mr. Loveless I request he and his company will honour me with their presence, or I shall think we are not friends.

La Var. I will be sure, milor. [Exit.]

Enter YOUNG FASHION.

Young F. Brother, your servant: how do you find yourself to-day?

Lord F. So well, that I have ordered my coach to the door; so there's no danger of death this baut,

Young F. I'm very glad of it. [Tam.]

Lord F. That I believe's alie! (Aside.) Pr'ythee, Tam, tell me one thing; did not your heart cut a caper up to your mauth, when you heard I was run through the bady?

Young F. Why do you think it should?

Lord F. Because I remember mine did so, when I heard my uncle was shot through the head.

Young F. It then did very ill.

Lord F. Pr'ythee, why so?

Young F. Because he used you very well.

Lord F. Well! Naw, strike me dumb, he starv'd me; he has let me want a thousand women, for want of a thousand paund.

Young F. Then he hinder'd you from making a great many ill bargains; for I think no woman worth money, that will take money. [so too.]

Lord F. If I were a younger brother I should think

Young F. Then you are seldom much in love?

Lord F. Never, stap my vitals! [Amanda?]

Young F. Why did you make all this bustle about

Lord F. Because she's a woman of insolent virtue, and I thought myself piqued, in honour, to attack her.

Young F. Very well. But now for business. (Aside.) Brother, though I know to talk of any business (especially of money) is a theme not quite so entertaining to you as that of the ladies, my necessities are such, I hope you'll have patience to hear me.

Lord F. The greatness of your necessities, Tam, is the waurst argument in the waurld for your being patiently heard. I do believe you are going to make a very good speech, but, strike me dumb! it has the worst beginning of any speech I have heard this twelvemonth.

Young F. I'm sorry you think you.

Lord F. I do believe thou art; but come, let's know the affair quickly.

Young F. Why, then, my case in a word is this: the necessary expenses of my travels have so much exceeded the wretched income of my annuity, that I have been forced to mortgage it for five hundred pounds, which is spent. So, unless you are so kind as to assist me in redeeming it, I know no remedy but to take a purse.

Lord F. Why, 'faith, Tam, to give you my sense of the thing, I do think taking a purse the best remedy in the waurld; for, if you succeed, you are relieved that way; if you are taken, (drawing his hand round his neck) you are relieved t'other.

Young F. I'm glad to see you are in so pleasant a humour; I hope I shall find the effects on't.

Lord F. Do you really think it a reasonable thing, that I should give you five hundred pawnds?

Young F. I do not ask it as a due, brother; I am willing to receive it as a favour.

Lord F. Then thou art willing to receive it any how, strike me speechless! But these are d—d times to give money in: taxes are so great, repairs so exorbitant, tenants such rogues, and boquets so dear, that the devil take me, I am reduced to that extremity in my cash, I have been forced to retrench in that one article of sweet powder, till I have brought it down to five guineas a maunth; now judge, Tam, whether I can spare you five hundred pawnds.

Young F. If you can't, I must starve, that's all. D—n him! (Aside.) [better husband.]

Lord F. All I can say is, you should have been a Young F. Ouns! If you can't live upon ten thousand a-year, how do you think I should do't upon two hundred?

Lord F. Don't be in a passion, Tam, for passion is the most unbecoming thing in the waurld, to the face. Look you, I don't love to say any thing to you to make you malancholy, but, upon this occasion, I must take leave to put you in mind, that a running horse does require more attendance than a coach horse. Nature has made some difference 'twixt you and me. [take her! (Aside.)]

Young F. Yes; she has made you older. Plague

Lord F. That is not all, Tam.

Young F. Why, what is there else?

Lord F. Ask the ladies.

Young F. Why, thou essence-bottle, thou musk-cat! dost thou then think thou hast any advantage over me, but what fortune has given thee?

Lord F. I do, stap my vitals!

Young F. Now, by all that's great and powerful, thou art the prince of coxcombs!

Lord F. Sir, I am proud of being at the head of so prevailing a party. [coward.]

Young F. Will nothing provoke thee? Draw,

Lord F. Look you, Tam, you know I have always taken you for a mighty dull fellow, and here is one of the foolishhest plats broke out that I have seen a lang time. Your poverty makes life so burdensome to you, you would provoke me to a quarrel, in hopes, either to slip through my lungs into my estate, or to get yourself run through the guts, to put an end to your pain, but I will disappoint you in both your designs; far, with the temper of a phylasapher, and the discretion of a statesman, I shall leave the room with my sword in the scabbard. [Exit.]

Young F. So! farewell, brother! and now, conscience, I defy thee. [Enter LORY.] Lory!

Lory. Sir.

Young F. Here is rare news, Lory; his lordship has given me a pill which has purged off all my scruples. So run away to the inn, get the chaise ready quickly, and bring it to Dame Coupler's without a moment's delay. [fortune.]

Lory. Then, sir, you are going straight about the Young F. I am: away! fly, Lory!

Lory. The happiest day I ever saw. I'm upon the wing already; now, I shall get my wages. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Garden.

Enter LOVELESS and Servant.

Love. Is my wife within?

Serv. No, sir; she has gone out this half hour.

Love. Well, leave me. [Exit Servant.] How strangely does my mind run on this widow! that my wife should pick out her, of all womankind, to be her playfellow. But what fate does, let fate answer for; I sought it not: so! by heavens! here she comes. Enter BERINTHIA.

Ber. What makes you look so thoughtful, sir? I hope you are not ill. [not.]

Love. I was debating, madam, whether I was or

Ber. Allow me to be your physician.

Love. Nay, I'll allow you to be so yet further; for I have reason to believe, should I put myself into your hands, you would increase my distemper.

Ber. How?

Love. Oh! you might betray me to my wife.

Ber. And so lose all my practice.

Love. Will you then keep my secret?

Ber. I will.

Love. Well, but swear it.

Ber. I swear, by woman!

Love. Nay, that's swearing by my deity; swear by your own, and I shall believe you.

Ber. Well, then, I swear by man!

Love. I'm satisfied. Now, hear my symptoms, and give me your advice. The first were these:—when I saw you at the play, a random glance you threw, at first alarmed me. I could not turn my eyes from whence the danger came; I gazed upon you till my heart began to pant; nay, even now, on your approaching me, my illness is so increased, that, if you do not help me, I shall, whilst you look on, consume to ashes.

Ber. O lord, let me go; 'tis the plague, and we shall be infected. (Breaking from him.)

Love. Then we'll die together, my charming angel.

Ber. O 'gad! the devil's in you. Lord! let me go; here's somebody coming. [Enter a Servant.]

Serv. Sir, my lady's come home, and desires to speak with you.

Love. Tell her I'm coming. [Exit Servant.] But before I go, one glass of nectar to drink her health. (To Berinthia.)

Ber. Stand off, or I shall hate you, by heavens!

Love. In matters of love, a woman's oath is no more to be minded than a man's. [Kisses her. Exit.]

Ber. Um! Enter COLONEL TOWNLY.

Col. T. So! what's here? Berinthia and Loveless—and in such close conversation! I cannot now wonder at her indifference in excusing herself to me. O, rare woman! Well, then, let Loveless look to his wife; it will be but the retort courteous, on both sides. Your servant, madam; I need not ask you how you do, you have got so good a colour.

Ber. I have been walking.

Col. T. Is that all? Pray was it Mr. Loveless went from here just now?

Ber. O, yes! he has been walking with me.

Col. T. He has!

Ber. Upon my word I think he is a very agreeable man; and there is certainly something particularly insinuating in his address.

Col. T. So, so! she has'n't even the modesty to dissemble. (Aside.) Pray, madam, did I not come to this place at your express desire, and for no purpose but the honour of meeting you? and after waiting a month in disappointment, have you condescended to explain, or in the slightest way apologize, for your conduct?

Ber. O heavens! Apologize for my conduct! apologize to you! Oh, you barbarian! But pray now, my good serious Colonel, have you anything more to add?

Col. T. Nothing, madam, but that, after such behaviour, it is not very wonderful that the woman who can trifle with the delicate addresses of an honourable lover, should be found coquetting with the husband of her friend.

Ber. Very true: no more wonderful than it was for this honourable lover to divert himself in the absence of this coquette, with endeavouring to seduce his friend's wife! O, Colonel, Colonel! don't talk of honour or your friend, for heaven's sake!

Col. T. 'Sdeath! how came she to suspect this? (Aside.) Really, madam, I don't understand you.

Ber. Nay, nay; you saw I did not pretend to misunderstand you. But here comes the lady: perhaps you would be glad to be left with her for an explanation.

Col. T. Oh! madam, this recrimination is a poor resource; and to convince you how much you are mistaken, I beg leave to decline the happiness you propose me. Madam, your servant.

Enter AMANDA, Colonel Townly whispers Amanda, and exit.

Ber. He carries it off well, however; upon my word, very well! how tenderly they part! (Aside.) So, cousin, I hope you have not been chiding your admirer for being with me; I assure you, we have been talking of you.

Aman. Fie, Berinthia! my admirer! Will you never learn to talk in earnest of anything?

Ber. Why, this shall be in earnest, if you please; for my part, I only tell you the matter of fact.

Aman. I'm sure there's so much jest and earnest in what you say to me on this subject, I scarce know how to take it. I have just parted with Mr. Loveless—perhaps it is fancy, but I think there is an alteration in his manner which alarms me.

Ber. Indeed, I think so too.

Aman. Do you, then, really think he's false to me? for I did not suspect him.

Ber. Think so! I am sure of it.

Aman. You are sure on't?

Ber. Positively! He fell in love at the play.

Aman. Right! the very same: but who could have told you this?

Ber. Um!—Oh!—Townly! I suppose your husband has made him his confidant. [say on't?]

Aman. Oh, base Loveless! And what did Townly

Ber. So, so! Why should she ask that? (Aside.)

Say! why, he abused Loveless extremely, and said all the tender things of you in the world.

Aman. Did he? Oh, my heart! I'm very ill—dear Berinthia, don't leave me a moment. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Outside of Sir Tunbelly's house.

Enter YOUNG FASHION and LORY.

Young F. So; here's our inheritance, Lory, if we can but get into possession; but, methinks, the seat of our family looks like Noah's ark, as if the chief part on't were designed for the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field.

Lory. Pray, sir, don't let your head run upon the orders of building here: get but the heiress, let the devil take the house.

Young F. Get but the house! let the devil take the heiress, I say: but, come, we have no time to squander, knock at that door. (Knocking.) What, the devil! have they got no ears in this house.

Lory. 'Egad! sir, this will prove some enchanted castle: we shall have the giant come out, by-and-by, with his club, and beat our brains out. (Knock-

Young F. Hush! they come. [ing.]

Serv. (Within.) Who is there? [try breeding?]

Lory. Open the door and see; is that your coun-

Serv. Ay, but two words to that bargain—Tummas, is the blunderbuss primed?

Young F. Ouns! give 'em good words, Lory, or we shall be shot here a fortune-catching.

Lory. Egad, sir! I think you're in the right on't. Ho! Mr. What-d'ye-call-um, will you please to let us in? or are we to be left to grow like willows by your moat-side? (Servant looks over the wall with a blunderbuss in his hand.)

Serv. Well, naw, what's ya're business?

Young F. Nothing, sir, but to wait upon Sir Tunbelly, with your leave.

Serv. To wait upon Sir Tunbelly? Why, you'll find that's just as Sir Tunbelly pleases.

Young F. But will you do me the favour, sir, to know whether Sir Tunbelly pleases or not?

Serv. Why, look you, d'ye see, with good words much may be done. Ralph, go thy ways, and ask Sir Tunbelly if he pleases to be waited upon; and, dost hear? call to nurse, that she may lock up Miss Hoyden before the gates open.

Young F. D'ye hear that, Lory? (Gates open.)

Enter SIR TUNBELLY CLUMSY, with servants, armed

Lory. Oh! (Runs behind his master.) O Lord, O Lord! we are both dead men!

Young F. Fool! thy fear will ruin us. (Apart.)

Lory. My fear, sir? 'Sdeath, sir! I fear nothing. (Apart.) Would I were well up to the chin in a horse-pond! (Aside.)

Sir T. Who is it here hath any business with me?

Young F. Sir, 'tis I, if your name be Sir Tunbelly Clumsy.

Sir T. Sir, my name is Sir Tunbelly Clumsy, whether you have any business with me or not. I am not ashamed of my name, nor my face either.

Young F. Sir, you have no cause, that I know of.

Sir T. Sir, if you have no cause either, I desire to know who you are; for, till I know your name, I sha'n't ask you to come into my house; and when I do know your name, 'tis six to four I don't ask you then.

Young F. Sir, I hope you'll find this letter an authentic passport. (Gives him a letter.)

Sir T. Cod's my life! from Mrs. Coupler! I ask your lordship's pardon ten thousand times. (To his Servant.) Here, run in a-doors quickly; get a Scotch-coal fire in the parlour, set all the Turkey-work chairs in their places, get the brass candlesticks out, and be sure stick the socket full of laurel, run. (Turns to Young F.) My lord, I ask your lordship's pardon. (To the Servant.) And, do you hear, run away to nurse, bid her let Miss Hoyden loose again. [Exit Servant.] I hope your honour will excuse the disorder of my family. We are not used to receive men of your lordship's great quality every day. Pray, where are your coaches and servants, my lord?

Young F. Sir, that I might give you and your daughter a proof how impatient I am to be nearer a-kin to you, I left my equipage to follow me, and came away post with only one servant.

Sir T. Your lordship does me too much honour: it was exposing your person to too much fatigue and danger, I protest it was; but my daughter shall endeavour to make you what amends she can; and though I say it, that should not say it, Hoyden has charms.

Young F. Sir, I am not a stranger to them, though I am to her: common fame has done her justice.

Sir T. My lord, I am common fame's very grateful, humble servant. My lord, my girl's young; Hoyden is young, my lord: but this I must say for her, what she wants in art, she has in breeding; and what's wanting in her age, is made good in her constitution. So, pray, my lord, walk in; pray, my lord, walk in.

Young F. Sir, I wait upon you.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—An Apartment in Sir Tunbelly's house.

Enter MISS HOYDEN.

Miss H. Sure, nobody was ever used as I am. I know well enough what other girls do, for all they think to make a fool o' me. It's well I have a husband a-coming, or, i'cod! I'd marry the baker, I would so. Nobody can knock at the gate, but presently I must be locked up; and here's the young greyhound can run loose about the house all the day long, so she can. 'Tis very well—

Nurse. (Without.) Miss Hoyden! Miss, Miss Hoyden! Enter Nurse.

Miss H. Well, what do you make such a noise for, ha? Why do you din a body's ears for? Can't one be at quiet for you?

Nurse. What do I din your ears for? Here's one come will din your ears for you.

Miss H. What care I who's come? I care not a fig who comes, or who goes, as long as I must be locked up like the ale-cellar.

Nurse. That, Miss, is for fear you should be drank before you are ripe.

Miss H. Oh! don't trouble your head about that; I'm as ripe as you, though not so mellow.

Nurse. Very well. Now I have a good mind to lock you up again, and not let you see my lord to-night.

Miss H. My lord! Why, is my husband come?

Nurse. Yes, marry, is he! and a goodly person too.

Miss H. Oh! my dear Nurse, forgive me this once, and I'll never misuse you again; no, if I do, you shall give me three thumps on the back, and a great pinch by the cheek.

Nurse. Ah, the poor thing! see now it melts; its as full of good-nature as an egg's full of meat.

Miss H. But, my dear nurse, don't lie now: is he come, by your troth?

Nurse. Yes, by my truly, is he.

Miss H. O Lord! I'll go and put on my laced tucker, though I'm locked up for a month for't.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Sir Tunbelly Clumsy's.

Enter MISS HOYDEN and Nurse.

Nurse. Well, Miss, how do you like your husband that is to be?

Miss H. O Lord! Nurse, I'm so overjoyed I can scarce contain myself.

Nurse. Oh! but you must have a care of being too fond; for men, now-a-days, hate a woman that loves 'em.

Miss H. Love him! Why, do you think I love him, nurse? Ecod! I would not care if he was hanged, so I were but once married to him. No, that which pleases me is, to think what work I'll make when I get to London. Ay, and I shall have money enough to do so too, nurse.

Nurse. Ah! there's no knowing that, Miss; for though these lords have a power of wealth indeed, yet, as I have heard say, they give it all to their sluts, who joggle it about in their coaches, with a murrain to 'em! whilst poor madam sits sighing and wishing, and has not a spare half-crown to buy her a "Practice of Piety."

Miss H. Oh! but for that, don't deceive yourself, nurse; for this I must say of my lord, he's as free as an open house at Christmas; for this very morning he told me I should have six hundred a year to buy pins. Now, if he gives me six hundred a year to buy pins, what do you think he'll give me to buy petticoats?

Nurse. Ah! my dearest, he deceives thee foully; and he's no better than a rogue for his pains. These Londoners have got a gibberish with 'em would confound a gipsy. That which they call pin-money, is to buy everything in the versal world, down to their very shoe-knots. But look, look, if his honour be not coming to you! Now, if I were sure you would behave yourself handsomely, and not disgrace me that have brought you up, I'd leave you alone together.

Miss H. That's my best nurse, do as you'd be done by. Trust us together this once, and if I don't shew my breeding, I wish I may never be married.

Nurse. Well, this once I'll venture you. But if you disparage me—

Miss H. Never fear.

[Exit Nurse.]

Enter YOUNG FASHION.

Young F. Your servant, madam, I'm glad to find you alone, for I have something of importance to speak to you about.

Miss H. Sir, (my lord, I meant,) you may speak to me about what you please, I shall give you a civil answer.

Young F. You give so obliging one, it encourages me to tell you your father has resolved to make me happy in being your husband; and I hope I may obtain your consent to perform what he desires.

Miss H. Sir, I never disobey my father in any thing but eating green gooseberries.

Young F. So good a daughter must needs be an admirable wife. I am, therefore, impatient till you are mine, and hope you will so far consider the violence of my love, that you won't have the cruelty to defer my happiness so long as your father designs it.

Miss H. My lord, how long is that? [week.]

Young F. Madam, a thousand years!—a whole

Miss H. Why, I thought it was to be to-morrow morning, as soon as I was up. I'm sure, nurse told me so. [you'll consent.]

Young F. And it shall be to-morrow morning, if

Miss H. If I'll consent? Why, I thought I was to obey you as my husband?

Young F. That's when we are married. Till then, I'm to obey you.

Miss H. Why, then, if we are to take it by turns, its the same thing. I'll obey you now, and when we are married, you shall obey me.

Young F. With all my heart. But I doubt we must get nurse on our side, or we shall hardly prevail with the chaplain.

Miss H. No more we sha'n't, indeed; for he loves her better than he loves his pulpit, and would always be a preaching to her by his good will.

Young F. Why, then, my dear, if you call her hither, we'll persuade her presently.

Miss H. O lud! I'll tell you a way how to persuade her to anything.

Young F. How's that?

Miss H. Why, tell her she's a handsome, comely woman, and give her half-a-crown.

Young F. Nay, if that will do, she shall have half a score of them.

Miss H. O gemini! for half that she'd marry you herself. I'll run and call her. [Exit.]

Young F. So! matters go on swimmingly. This is a rare girl, i'faith! I shall have a fine time on't with her at London. [Enter LORY, with a letter.]

So, Lory, what's the matter?
Lory. Here, sir; an intercepted packet from the enemy; your brother's postillion brought it. I knew the livery, pretended to be a servant of Sir Tunbelly's, and so got possession of the letter.

Young F. (Looks at the letter.) Ouns! he tells Sir Tunbelly here that he will be with him this evening, with a large party to supper. Egad! I must marry the girl directly.

Lory. Oh, zounds, sir! directly, to be sure! Here she comes. [Exit.]

Young F. And the old Jezabel with her.

Re-enter MISS HOYDEN and Nurse.

How do you do, good Mrs. Nurse? I desired your young lady would give me leave to see you, that I might thank you for your extraordinary care, and kind conduct in her education; pray accept of this small acknowledgment for it at present, and depend upon my further kindness, when I shall be that happy thing, her husband. (Gives her money.)

Nurse. Gold, by the maakins! (Aside.) Your honour's goodness is too great. Alas! all I can boast of is, I nursed her well, and so your honour would have said, an you had seen how the poor thing thrived; and how it would look up in my face; and crow and laugh, it would.

Miss H. (To Nurse.) Pray one word with you. Pr'ythee, nurse, don't stand ripping up old stories, to make one ashamed before one's love. Do you think such a fine proper gentlemen as he is, cares for a fiddle-come tale of a child? If you have a mind to make him have a good opinion of a woman, don't tell him what one did then, tell him what one can do now. (Goes to Fash.) I hope your honour will excuse my mis-manners to whisper before you; it was only to give some orders about the family.

Young F. Oh! everything, madam, is to give way to business; beside good housewifery is a very commendable quality in a young lady.

Miss H. Pray, sir, are young ladies good housewives at London-town? Do they darn their own linen? [not to save.]

Young F. Oh, no! they study how to spend money,

Miss H. Ecod! I don't know but that may be better sport, ha, nurse? [you come there.]

Young F. Well, you shall have your choice when

Miss H. Shall I? then, by my troth, I'll get there as fast as I can. His honour desires you'll be so kind as to let us be married to-morrow. (To Nurse.)

Nurse. To-morrow, my dear madam?

Young F. Ay, faith! nurse, you may well be surprised at Miss's wanting to put it off so long. To-morrow! no, no; 'tis now, this very hour, I would have the ceremony performed.

Miss H. Ecod! with all my heart.

Nurse. Oh, mercy! worse and worse!

Young F. Yes, nurse, now and privately; for all things being signed and sealed, why should Sir Tunbelly make us stay a week for a wedding-dinner?

Nurse. But if you should be married now, what will you do when Sir Tunbelly calls for you to be married?

Miss H. Why, then, we will be married again.

Nurse. What twice, my child? [ried, not I.]

Miss H. Ecod! I don't care how often I am mar-

Nurse. Well, I'm such a tender-hearted fool, I find I can refuse you nothing. So you shall e'en follow your own inventions. [the moon.]

Miss H. Shall I? O Lord! I could leap over

Young F. Dear nurse, this goodness of your's shall be still more rewarded. But now you must employ your power with the chaplain, that he may do his friendly office too, and then we shall be all happy. Do you think you can prevail with him? Let him know I have several fat livings in my gift, and that the first that falls shall be in your disposal.

Nurse. Nay, then, I'll make him marry more folks than one, I'll promise him.

Miss H. Faith! do, nurse, make him marry you too; I'm sure he'll do't for a fat living.

Young F. Well, nurse, while you go and settle matters with him, your lady and I will go and take a walk in the garden. [Exit Nurse.] Come, madam, dare you venture yourself alone with me?

Miss H. Oh dear! yes, sir; I don't think you'll do anything I need be afraid on. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Garden. Moonlight.

Enter LOVELESS.

Love. Now, does Berinthia mean to make a fool of me, or not? I sha'n't wait much longer, for my wife will soon be inquiring for me to set out on our supping-party. Suspense is at all times the devil! but of all modes of suspense, the watching for a loitering mistress is the worst. But let me accuse her no longer; she approaches with one smile, to o'erpay the anxieties of a year. [Enter BERINTHIA.] Oh, Berinthia! what a world of kindness are you in my debt! had you staid five minutes longer—

Ber. You would have gone, I suppose?

Love. Egad! she's right enough. (Aside.)

Ber. And, I assure you, 'twas ten to one that I came at all. In short, I begin to think you are too dangerous a being to trifle with; and as I shall, probably, only make a fool of you at last, I believe we had better let matters rest as they are.

Love. You cannot mean it, sure?

Ber. What more would you have me give to a married man? [fortunes!]

Love. How doubly cruel to remind me of my mis-

Ber. A misfortune to be married to so charming a woman as Amanda?

Love. I grant all her merit, but—'Sdeath! now see what you have done by talking of her; she's here, by all that's unlucky.

Ber. O Ged, we had better get out of the way; for I should feel as awkward to meet her as you.

Love. Ay, if I mistake not, I see Townly coming this way also. I must see a little into this matter. (Steps aside.)

Ber. Oh, if that's your intention, I am no woman, if I suffer myself to be outdone in curiosity.

Enter AMANDA.

Aman. Mr. Loveless come home, and walking on the lawn! I will not suffer him to walk so late, though perhaps it is to shew his neglect of me. Mr. Loveless, I must speak with you. Ha! Townly again! How I am persecuted!

Enter COLONEL TOWNLY.

Col. T. Madam, you seem disturbed.

Aman. Sir, I have reason.

Col. T. Whatever be the cause, I would to heaven it were in my power to bear the pain, or to remove the malady. [tress.]

Aman. Your interference can only add to my dis-

Col. T. Ah, madam, if it be the sting of unrequited love you suffer from, seek for your remedy in revenge: weigh well the strength and beauty of your charms, and rouse up that spirit a woman ought to bear. Disdain the false embraces of a husband. See at your feet a real lover; his zeal may give him title to your pity, although his merit cannot claim your love.

Love. So, so, very fine, i'faith. (Aside.)

Aman. Why do you presume to talk to me thus? Is this your friendship to Mr. Loveless? I perceive you will compel me at last to acquaint him with your treachery.

Col. T. He could not upbraid me if you were—he deserves it from me; for he has not been more false

Aman. To you? [to you, than faithless to me.]

Col. T. Yes, madam; the lady for whom he now deserts those charms which he was never worthy of, was mine by right; and I imagined too, by inclination. Yes, madam Berinthia, who now—

Aman. Berinthia! Impossible!

Col. T. 'Tis true, or may I never merit your attention. She is the deceitful sorceress who now holds your husband's heart in bondage.

Aman. I will not believe it.

Col. T. By the faith of a true lover, I speak from conviction. This very day I saw them together, and overheard—

Aman. Peace, sir, I will not even listen to such slander; this is a poor device to work on my resentment, to listen to your insidious addresses. No, sir, though Mr. Loveless may be capable of error, I am convinced I cannot be deceived so grossly in him, as to believe what you now report; and for Berinthia, you should have fixed on some more probable person for my rival, than she who is my relation and my friend; for while I am myself free from guilt, I will never believe that love can beget injury, or confidence create ingratitude.

Col. T. If I do not prove to you—

Aman. You never shall have an opportunity. From the artful manner in which you first shewed yourself to me, I might have been led, as far as virtue permitted, to have thought you less criminal than unhappy; but this last unmanly artifice merits at once my resentment and contempt. [Exit.]

Col. T. Sure there's divinity about her; and she has dispensed some portion of honour's light to me; yet can I bear to lose Berinthia without revenge or compensation? Perhaps she is not so culpable as I thought her. I was mistaken when I began to think lightly of Amanda's virtue, and may be in my censure of my Berinthia. Surely I love her still, for I feel I should be happy to find myself in the wrong. [Exit.]

Re-enter LOVELESS and BERINTHIA.

Ber. Your servant, Mr. Loveless.

Love. Your servant, madam.

Ber. Pray what do you think of this?

Love. Truly, I don't know what to say.

Ber. Don't you think we steal forth, two contemptible creatures?

Love. Why, tolerably so, I must confess.

Ber. And do you conceive it possible for you ever to give Amanda the least uneasiness again?

Love. No, I think we never should, indeed.

Ber. We! why, monster, you don't pretend that I ever entertained a thought?

Love. Why, then, sincerely and honestly, Berinthia, there is something in my wife's conduct which strikes me so forcibly, that if it were not for shame, and the fear of hurting you in her opinion, I swear I would follow her, confess my error, and trust to her generosity for forgiveness.

Ber. Nay, pr'ythee, don't let your respect for me prevent you; for as my object in trifling with you was nothing more than to pique Townly, and as I perceive he has been actuated by a similar motive, you may depend on't I shall make no mystery of the matter to him.

Love. By no means inform him; for though I may choose to pass by his conduct without resentment, how will he presume to look me in the face again? [face again?]

Ber. How will you presume to look him in the Love. He, who has dared to attempt the honour of my wife!

Ber. You, who have dared to attempt the honour of his mistress! Come, come, be ruled by me, who affect more levity than I have, and don't think of anger in this cause. A readiness to resent injuries, is a virtue only in those who are slow to injure.

Love. Then I will be ruled by you; and when you shall think proper to undeceive Townly, may your good qualities make as sincere a convert of him, as Amanda's have of me. When truth's extorted from us, then we own the robe of virtue is a sacred habit.

Could women but our secret counsels scan;

Could they but reach the deep reserve of man.

To keep our love they'd rate their virtue high,

They live together, and together die. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Sir Tunbelly Clumsy's House.

Enter MISS HOYDEN, Nurse, and YOUNG FASHION.

Young F. This quick despatch of the chaplain's I take so kindly, it shall give him claim to my favour as long as I live, I assure you.

Miss H. And to mine, too, I promise you.

Nurse. I most humbly thank your honours; and may your children swarm about you like bees about a honeycomb.

Miss H. Ecod, with all my heart; the more the merrier, I say—ha, Nurse? [Enter LORY.]

Lory. One word with you, for heaven's sake. (Taking Young F. hastily aside.)

Young F. What the devil's the matter?

Lory. Sir, your fortune's ruined if you are not married. Yonder's your brother arrived, with two coaches and six horses, twenty footmen, and a coat worth fourscore pounds; so judge what will become of your lady's heart.

Young F. Is he in the house yet?

Lory. No, they are capitulating with him at the gate. Sir Tunbelly luckily takes him for an impostor; and I have told him that we had heard of this plot before.

Young F. That's right. (Turning to Miss Hoyden.) My dear, here's a troublesome business my man tells me of, but don't be frightened, we shall be too hard for the rogue. Here's an impudent fellow at the gate (not knowing I was come hither incognito) has taken my name upon him, in hopes to run away with you.

Miss H. Oh, the varlet; it's well we are married, or may be we might never have been so.

Young F. 'Egad, like enough. (Aside.) Pr'ythee, Nurse, run to Sir Tunbelly, and stop him from going to the gate before I speak with him.

Nurse. An't please your honour, my lady and I had best lock ourselves up till the danger be over.

Young F. Do so, if you please.

Miss H. Not so fast; I won't be locked up any more, now I'm married. [seized this rascal.]

Young F. Yes, pray, my dear, do, till we have

Miss H. Nay, if you'll pray me, I'll do anything. [Exit Miss H. and Nurse.]

Young F. (To Lory.) Hark you, sirrah, things are better than you imagine. The wedding's over.

Lory. The devil it is, sir! (Capers about.)

Young F. Not a word—all's safe; but Sir Tunbelly don't know it, nor must not yet. So I am resolved to brazen the brunt of the business out, and have the pleasure of turning the impostor upon his lordship, which I believe may easily be done.

Enter SIR TUNBELLY CLUMSY.

Did you ever hear, sir, of so impudent an undertaking? [him, I'll warrant you.]

Sir T. Never, by the mass; but we'll tickle

Young F. They tell me, sir, he has a great many people with him, disguised like servants.

Sir T. Ay, ay, rogues enow, but we have mastered them. We only fired a few shot over their heads, and the regiment scoured in an instant. Here, Tummus, bring in your prisoner.

Young F. If you please, Sir Tunbelly, it will be best for me not to confront the fellow yet, till you have heard how far his impudence will carry him.

Sir T. 'Egad, your lordship is an ingenious person. Your lordship then will please to step aside.

Lory. 'Fore heaven, I applaud my master's modesty. [Exit with Young F.]

Enter Servants, with LORD FOPPINGTON, disarmed.

Sir T. Come, bring him along, bring him along.

Lord F. What do you mean, gentlemen? is it fair time, that you are all drunk before supper?

Sir T. Drunk, sirrah! here's an impudent rogue for you now. Drunk or sober, bully, I'm a justice o'the peace, and know how to deal with strollers.

Lord F. Strollers!

Sir T. Ay, strollers. Come, give an account of yourself. What's your name? where do you live? do you pay scot and lot? Come, are you a freeholder or a copyholder? [pertinent questions?]

Lord F. And why dost thou ask me so many im-

Sir T. Because I'll make you answer 'em, before I have done with you, you rascal you.

Lord F. Before Gad, all the answers I can make to them is, that you are a very extraordinary old fellow, stap my vitals!

Sir T. Nay, if thou art joking deputy lieutenants, we know how to deal with you. Here, draw a warrant for him immediately.

Lord F. A warrant! What the devil is't thou would'st be at, old gentleman?

Sir T. I would be at you, sirrah if my hands were not tied as a magistrate), and with these two double fists beat your teeth down your throat, you dog you. (Driving him.) [that rate?

Lord F. And why wouldst thou spoil my face at Sir T. For your design to rob me of my daughter, villain.

Lord F. Rab thee of thy daughter! Pr'ythee, old father, wilt thou give me leave to ask thee one question? [know what it is.

Sir T. I can't tell whether I will or not, till I

Lord F. Why then, it is, whether thou didst not write to my Lord Foppington, to come down and marry thy daughter?

Sir T. Yes, marry, did I, and my Lord Foppington is come down, and shall marry my daughter before she's a day older.

Lord F. Now, give me thy hand, old dad; I thought we should understand one another at last.

Sir T. The fellow's mad; here bind him hand and foot. (They bind him.)

Lord F. Nay, pr'ythee, knight, leave fooling; thy jest begins to grow dull.

Sir T. Bind him, I say; he's mad: bread and water, a dark room, and a whip, may bring him to his senses again.

Lord F. Pr'ythee, Sir Tunbelly, why should you take such an aversion to the freedom of my address, as to suffer the rascals thus to skewer down my arms like a rabbit?

Re-enter MISS HOYDEN and Nurse.

Miss H. (Going up to him.) Is this he that would have run—Fough, how he stinks of sweets! Pray father, let him be dragged through the horse-pond.

Lord F. This must be my wife, by her natural inclination to her husband. (Aside.)

Miss H. Pray, father, what do you intend to do with him—Hang him?

Sir T. That at least, child.

Nurse. Ay, and it's e'en too good for him too.

Lord F. Madame la gouvernante, I presume; hitherto this appears to me to be one of the most extraordinary families that ever man of quality marched into. (Aside.)

Sir T. What's become of my lord, daughter?

Miss H. He's just coming, sir.

Lord F. My lord, what does he mean by that now? (Aside.)

Re-enter YOUNG FASHION and LORY.

Stap my vitals, Tam, now the dream's out.

Young F. Is this the fellow, sir, that designed to trick me of your daughter?

Sir T. This is he, my lord; how do you like him? Is not he a pretty fellow to get a fortune?

Young F. I find by his dress, he thought your daughter might be taken with a beau.

Miss H. Oh, gemini! Is this a beau? Let me see him again. (Surveys him.) Ha! I find a beau is no such ugly thing, neither.

Young F. 'Egad, she'll be in love with him presently; I'll e'en have him sent away to gaol. (Aside.) Sir, though your undertaking shews you a person of no extraordinary modesty, I suppose you ha'n't confidence enough to expect much favour from me? (To Lord F.) [dent fellow.

Lord F. Strike me dumb, Tam, thou art an impu-

Nurse. Look, if the varlet has not the effrontery to call his lordship, plain Thomas.

Lord F. My Lord Foppington, shall I beg one word with your lordship?

Nurse. Ho, ho, it's my lord with him now. See how afflictions will humble folks.

Miss H. Pray, my lord, (To Young F.) don't let him whisper too close, lest he bite your ear off.

Lord F. I am not altogether so hungry as your ladyship is pleased to imagine. Look you, Tam, I am sensible, I have not been so kind to you as I ought, but I hope you'll forgive what's past, and accept of the five thousand pounds I offer; thou may'st live in extreme splendour with it, stap my vitals! (Apart to Young F.)

Young F. It's a much easier matter to prevent a disease than to cure it. A quarter of that sum would have secured your mistress, twice as much cannot redeem her. (Apart.)

Sir T. Well, what says he?

Young F. Only the rascal offered me a bribe to let him go. [lead on, constable.

Sir T. Ay, he shall go, with a plague to him; Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here is muster Loveless, and muster Colonel Townly, and some ladies to wait on you. (To Young F.)

Lory. So, sir, what will you do now? (Aside.)

Young F. Be quiet; they are in the plot. (Aside to Lory.) Only a few friends, Sir Tunbelly, whom I wished to introduce to you.

Lord F. Thou art the most impudent fellow, Tam, that ever nature yet brought into the world. Sir Tunbelly, strike me speechless, but these are my friends and acquaintances, and my guests, and they will soon inform thee whether I am the true Lord Foppington or not.

Enter LOVELESS, COLONEL TOWNLY, AMANDA, and BERINTHIA. Lord Foppington accosts them, but none answer him.

Young F. So, gentlemen, this is friendly; I rejoice to see you.

Col. T. My lord, we are fortunate to be the witnesses of your lordship's happiness.

Love. But your lordship will do us the honour to introduce us to Sir Tunbelly Clumsy?

Aman. And us to your lady.

Lord F. Gad take me, but they are all in a story.

Sir T. Gentlemen, you do me much honour; my Lord Foppington's friends will ever be welcome to me and mine. [ladies.

Young F. My love, let me introduce you to these

Miss H. By goles, they look so fine and so stiff, I am almost ashamed to come nigh 'em.

Aman. A most engaging lady, indeed!

Miss H. Thank ye, ma'am.

Ber. And I doubt not, will soon distinguish herself in the beau monde.

Miss H. Where is that?

Young F. You'll soon learn, my dear,

Love. But, Lord Foppington—

Lord F. Sir!

Love. Sir! I was not addressing myself to you, sir! Pray who is this gentleman? He seems rather in a singular predicament.

Col. T. For so well-dressed a person, a little oddly circumstanced, indeed.

Sir T. Ha, ha, ha! So, these are your friends and your guests, ha, my adventurer?

Lord F. I am struck dumb with their impudence, and cannot positively say whether I shall ever speak again or not.

Sir T. Why, sir, this modest gentleman wanted to pass himself upon me as Lord Foppington, and carry off my daughter.

Love. A likely plot to succeed, truly, ha, ha!

Lord F. As Gad shall judge me, Loveless, I did not expect this from thee. Come, pr'ythee confess the joke; tell Sir Tunbelly that I am the real Lord Foppington, who yesterday made love to thy wife; was honoured by her with a slap on the face, and afterwards pinked through the body by thee. [thus?

Sir T. A likely story, that a peer would behave

Love. A pretty fellow, indeed, that would scandalize the character he wants to assume; but what will you do with him, Sir Tunbelly?

Sir T. Commit him, certainly, unless the bride and bridegroom choose to pardon him.

Lord F. Bride and bridegroom! For Gad's sake, Sir Tunbelly, 'tis torture to me to hear you call 'em so.

Miss H. Why, you ugly thing, what, would you have him call us, dog and cat?

Lord F. By no means, Miss; for that sounds ten times more like man and wife than t'other.

Sir T. A precious rogue this to come a wooing.

Re-enter a Servant.

Serv. There are some gentlefolks below to wait upon Lord Foppington.

Col. T. 'Sdeath, Tom, what will you do now? (Apart to Young F.)

Lord F. Now, Sir Tunbelly, here are witnesses, who I believe are not corrupted.

Sir T. Peace, fellow! Would your lordship choose to have your guests shewn here, or shall they wait till we come to 'em?

Young F. I believe, Sir Tunbelly, we had better not have these visitors here yet. Egad, all must out. (Aside.)

Love. Confess, confess, we'll stand by you. (Apart to Young F.)

Lord F. Nay, Sir Tunbelly, I insist on your calling evidence on both sides; and if I do not prove that fellow an impostor—

Young F. Brother, I will save you the trouble, by now confessing that I am not what I have passed myself for. Sir Tunbelly, I am a gentleman, and I flatter myself a man of character; but 'tis with great pride I assure you I am not Lord Foppington.

Sir T. Ouns! what's this? an impostor? a cheat? fire and faggots, sir, if you are not Lord Foppington, who the devil are you?

Young F. Sir, the best of my condition is, I am your son-in-law; and the worst of it is, I am brother to that noble peer.

Lord F. Impudent to the last, Gad dem me.

Sir T. My son-in-law! Not yet I hope.

Young F. Pardon me, sir; thanks, to the goodness of your chaplain, and the kind offices of this old gentlewoman.

Lory. 'Tis true, indeed, sir; I gave your daughter away, and Mrs. Nurse, here, was clerk.

Sir T. Knock that rascal down! But speak, Jezabel, how's this?

Nurse. Alas! your honour, forgive me! I have been overreached in this business as well as you. Your worship knows, if the wedding-dinner had been ready, you would have given her away with your own hands. [quainting me?]

Sir T. But how durst you do this, without ac-

Nurse. Alas! if your worship had seen how the poor thing begged and prayed, and clung and twined about me like ivy round an old wall, you would say, I, who had nursed it, and reared it, must have had a heart like stone to refuse it.

Sir T. Ouns! I shall go mad! Unloose my lord, there, you scoundrels.

Lord F. Why, when these gentlemen are at leisure, I should be glad to congratulate you on your son-in-law, with a little more freedom of address.

Miss H. 'Egad, though, I don't see which is to be my husband, after all.

Love. Come, come, Sir Tunbelly, a man of your understanding must perceive, that an affair of this kind is not to be mended by anger and reproaches.

Col. T. Take my word for it, Sir Tunbelly, you are only tricked into a son-in-law you may be proud of; my friend, Tom Fashion, is as honest a fellow as ever breathed.

Love. That he is, depend on't; and will hunt or drink with you most affectionately; be generous, old boy, and forgive them.

Sir T. Never. The hussy! when I had set my heart on getting her a title.

Lord F. Now, Sir Tunbelly, that I am untrussed, give me leave to thank thee for the very extraordinary reception I have met with in thy d—d execrable mansion; and at the same time to assure you, that of all the bumpkins and blockheads I have had the misfortune to meet with, thou art the most obstinate and egregious, strike me ugly!

Sir T. What's this? I believe you are both rogues alike.

Lord F. No, Sir Tunbelly, thou wilt find, to thy unspeakable mortification, that I am the real Lord Foppington, who was to have disgraced myself by an alliance with a clod; and that thou hast matched thy girl to a beggarly younger brother of mine, whose title-deeds might be contained in thy tobacco-box.

Sir T. Puppy! puppy! I might prevent their being beggars, if I chose it; for I could give 'em as good a rent-roll as your lordship.

Lord F. Ay, old fellow, but you will not do that, for that would be acting like a Christian, and thou art a barbarian, stap my vitals.

Sir T. Udzoekers! Now six such words more, and I'll forgive them directly.

Love. 'Slife, Sir Tunbelly, you should do it, and bless yourself. Ladies, what say you?

Aman. Good Sir Tunbelly, you must consent.

Ber. You've been young yourself, Sir Tunbelly.

Sir T. Well, then, if I must, I must; but turn, turn that sneering lord out, however, and let me be revenged on somebody. But first look whether I am a barbarian or not; there, children, I join your hands; and when I'm in a better humour, I'll give you my blessing.

Love. Nobly done, Sir Tunbelly; and we shall see you dance at a grandson's christening yet.

Miss H. By goles though, I don't understand this. What, a'n't I to be a lady, after all? only plain Mrs.—What's my husband's name, Nurse?

Nurse. Squire Fashion. [nothing.]

Miss H. Squire, is he? Well, that's better than

Lord F. Now I will put on a philosophic air, and shew these people, that it is not possible to put a man of my quality out of countenance. (Aside.) Dear Tam, since things are fallen out, pr'ythee give me leave to wish thee joy; I do it de bon cœur, strike me dumb! You have married into a family of great politeness and uncommon elegance of manners, and your bride appears to be a lady beautiful in person, modest in her deportment, refined in her sentiments, and of nice morality, split my windpipe! [he calls me names.]

Miss H. By goles, husband, break his bones, if Young F. Your lordship may keep up your spirits with your grimace, if you please; I shall support mine, by Sir Tunbelly's favour, with this lady and three thousand pounds a-year.

Lord F. Well, adieu, Tam; ladies, I kiss your hands. Sir Tunbelly, I shall now quit this thy den, but while I retain the use of my arms, I shall ever remember thou art a demn'd horrid savage, Ged demn me. [Exit.]

Sir T. By the mass, 'tis well he's gone, for I should ha' been provoked, by-and-by, to ha' dun un a mischief. Well, if this is a lord, I think Hoyden has luck o'her side, in troth.

Col. T. She has indeed, Sir Tunbelly; but I hear the fiddles; his lordship, I know, had provided 'em.

Love. O, a dance and a bottle, Sir Tunbelly, by all means.

Sir T. I had forgot the company below; well—what—we must be merry then, ha? and dance and drink, ha? Well, 'fore George, you sha'n't say I do these things by halves. Son-in-law, thee looks a hearty rogue, so we'll have a night on't; and which of these ladies will be the old man's partner, ha? Ecod, I don't know how I came to be in so good a humour.

Ber. Well, Sir Tunbelly, my friend and I both will endeavour to keep you so; you have done a generous action, and are entitled to our attention. If you should be at a loss to divert your new guests, we will assist you to relate to them the plot of your daughter's marriage, and his lordship's deserved mortification; a subject which, perhaps may afford no bad evening's entertainment.

Sir T. Ecod, with all my heart; though I am a main bungler at a long story.

Ber. Never fear, we will assist you, if the tale is judged worth being repeated; but of this you may be assured, that while the intention is evidently to please, British auditors will ever be indulgent to the errors of the performance. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter Spirit.

Spi. Before the starry threshold of Jove's court
My mansion is, where those immortal shapes
Of bright aerial spirits live inspher'd
In regions wild, of calm and serene air,
Above the smoke and stir of this dim spot,
Which men call earth; and with low-thoughted care
Confin'd and pester'd to this pinfold here,
Strive to keep up a frail and feverish being,
Unmindful of the crown that virtue gives,
After this mortal change, to her true servants,
Amongst th' enthron'd gods on sainted seats.
But, to my task.

Bacchus, that first from out the purple grape
Crush'd the sweet poison of misused wine,
On Circe's island fell: this nymph had by him a son,
Much like his father, but his mother more,
Whom therefore she brought up, and Comus nam'd;
Who, in thick shelter of these shades embower'd,
Excels his mother at her mighty art,
Offering to ev'ry traveller

His orient liquor in a crystal glass.
Soon as the potion works, their human countenance
Is chang'd into some brutish form, and they
Not once perceive their foul disfigurement.
Therefore, when any favour'd of high Jove,
Chances to pass through this adventurous glade,
I shoot from heav'n, to give him safe convoy.
But first, I take the likeness of a swain,
And hark! I hear the tread of hateful steps. [Exit.]

Enter COMUS, with a rout of Men and Women, dressed as Bacchanals.

Com. The star, that bids the shepherd fold,
Now the top of heaven doth hold;

And the gilded car of day
His glowing axle doth allay
In the steep Atlantic stream;
And the slope sun his upward beam
Shoots against the dusky pole,
Pacing toward the other goal
Of his chamber in the east;
Meanwhile welcome joy and feast!

AIR.—By a Bacchanal.

Now Phoebus sinketh in the west,
Welcome song, and welcome jest,
Midnight shout and revelry,
Tipsy dance and jollity;
Braid your locks with rosy twine,
Dropping odours, dropping wine!

Rigour now is gone to bed,
And advice, with scrup'lous head,
Strict age, and sour severity,
With their grave saws to slumber lie.

Com. We that are of purer fire,
Imitate the starry choir;
Who, in their nightly watchful spheres,
Lead in swift round the months and years.
The sounds and seas, with all their finny drove,
Now to the moon in wav'ring morris move;
And on the tawny sands and shelves
Trip the pert fairies, and the dapper elves.

AIR.—By a Bacchante.

By dimpl'd brook, and fountain brim
The wood-nymphs, deck'd with daisies trim,
Their merry wakes and pastimes keep:
What has night to do with sleep?
Night has better sweets to prove,
Venus now wakes, and wakens love:
Come let us our rites begin;
'Tis only day-light that makes sin.

Com. Hail, goddess of nocturnal sport!
Stay thy cloudy ebon chair,
Wherein thou rid'st with Hecate, and befriend
Us, thy vow'd priests!
Till the nice morn on th' Indian steep
From her cabin loophole peep,
And to the tell-tale sun descry
Our conceal'd solemnity.

DUETT.—By a Man and Woman.
From tyrant laws and customs free,
We follow sweet variety;
By turns we drink, and dance, and sing,
Time for ever on the wing.

Why should niggard rules control
Transports of the jovial soul?
No dull stinting hour we own;
Pleasure counts our time alone.

Com. Come; knit hands and beat the ground
In a light fantastic round. (A Dance.)
Break off, break off: I feel the diff'rent pace
Of some chaste footing near about this ground,
Run to your shrouds, within these brakes and trees;
Our number may affright. [Exeunt all but Comus.

Some virgin sure
(For so I can distinguish by my art,)
Benighted in these woods. Now to my charms,
And to my wily trains! Thus I hurl
My spells into the air. When once her eye
Hath met the virtue of this magic dust,
I shall appear some harmless villager.
But see, she stops, and seems
As she'd address herself in song.

AIR.—By a Lady behind.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
Within thy airy cell,
By slow meander's margent green,
And in the violet-embroider'd vale,
Where the love-lorn nightingale
Nightly to thee her sad song mourneth well!
Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair,
That liketh thy Narcissus are?

O! if thou have
Hid them in some flow'ry cave,
Tell me but where,

Sweet queen of parly, daughter of the sphere;
So may'st thou be translated to the skies,
And give resounding grace to all heav'n's harmonies!

Com. Can any mortal mixture of earth's mould
Breathe such divine enchanting ravishment?
But see, she approaches; I step aside
And hearken, if I may her business hear.

Enter Lady.

Lady. This way the noise was, if mine ear be true,
My best guide now; methought it was the sound
Of riot and ill-manag'd mirth. I should be loth
To meet the rudeness, and swill'd insolence
Of such late rioters; yet O! where else
Shall I inform my unacquainted feet
In the blind mazes of this tangled wood?

Com. I'll ease her of that care, and be her guide.
(Aside.)

Lady. My brothers, when they saw me weary'd out,
Stepp'd, as they said, to the next thicket side,
To bring me berries, or such cooling fruit,
As the kind hospitable woods provide.
But where they are, and why they come not back,
Is now the labour of my thoughts; 'tis likeliest
They had engag'd their wand'ring steps too far:
I cannot halloo to my brothers, but
Such noise as I could make to be heard furthest
I have ventur'd; for my new enliven'd spirits
Prompt me: and they perhaps are not far off.

Com. Sure something holy lodges in that breast,
And with these raptures moves the vocal air
To testify his hidden residence:
How sweetly did they float upon the wings

Of silence, through the empty-vaulted night,
At ev'ry fall smoothing the raven down
Of darkness, till it smil'd; I have oft heard
My mother Circe, with the syrens three,
Who, as they sung, would take the prison'd soul,
And lap it in Elysium: Scylla wept,
And chid her barking waves into attention,
And fell Charybdis murmur'd soft applause;
Yet they in pleasing slumber lull'd the sense,
And sweet in madness robb'd it of itself.
But such a sacred and home-felt delight,
Such sober certainty of waking bliss,
I never heard till now. I'll speak to her,
And she shall be my queen. (Aside.) Hail, foreign wonder,

Whom certain these rough shades did never breed,
Unless the goddess that in rural shrine
Dwell'st here with Pan or Silvan, by bless'd song
Forbidding ev'ry bleak, unkindly fog
To touch the prosp'rous growth of this tall wood.

Lady. Nay, gentle shepherd, ill is lost that praise,
That is address'd to unattending ears:
Not any boast of skill, but extreme shift
How to regain my sever'd company,
Compell'd me to awake the courteous Echo,
To give me answer from her mossy couch.

Com. What chance, good lady, hath bereft you
thus?

Lady. Dim darkness and this leafy labyrinth.

Com. Could that divide you from near ush'ring guides?

Lady. They left me weary on a grassy turf,
To seek i'th' valley some cool friendly spring.

Com. And left your fair side all unguarded, lady?

Lady. They were but twain, and purpos'd quick return.

Com. Imports their loss, beside the present need?

Lady. No less than if I should my brothers lose.

Com. Were they of manly prime, or youthful bloom?

Lady. As smooth as Hebe's their unrazor'd lips.

Com. Two such I saw, what time the labour'd ox
In his loose traces from the furrows came,
And the swink't hedger at his supper sat;
I saw them under a green mantling vine,
That crawls along the side of yon small hill,
Plucking ripe clusters from the tender shoots;
Their port was more than human; as they stood,
I took it for a fairy vision
Of some gay creatures of the element,
That in the colours of the rainbow live,
And play i'th' plaited clouds. I was awe struck,
And as I pass'd, I worshipp'd: if those you seek,
It were a journey like the path to heav'n,
To help you find them.

Lady. Gentle villager, what readiest way would Me to that place? [bring]

Com. I know each lane, and ev'ry alley green,
Dingle, or bushy dell of this wild wood.
My daily walks and ancient neighbourhood;
And if your stray attendance be yet lodg'd,
Or shroud within these limits, I shall know
Ere morrow wake, or the low roosted lark
From her thatch'd pillow rouse; or grant it other-
I can conduct you, lady, to a low, [wise,
But loyal cottage, where you may be safe till further quest.

Lady. Shepherd, I take thy word,
And trust thy offer'd service. In a place
Less warranted than this, or less secure,
I cannot be, that I should fear to change it.
Eye me, bless'd Providence, and square my trial
To my proportion'd strength! Shepherd, lead on.
[Exeunt.]

Enter Comus's Crew from behind the trees.

AIR.—By a Man.

Fly swiftly, ye minutes, till Comus receive
The nameless soft transports that beauty can give;

*The bowl's frolic joys let him teach her to prove,
And she in return yield the raptures of love!
Without love and wine, wit, and beauty are vain,
All grandeur insipid, and riches a pain;
The most splendid palace grows dark as the grave;
Love and wine give, ye gods, or take back what you gave.*

Cho. *Away, away, away,
To Comus' court repair;
There night outshines the day,
There yields the melting fair.* [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Wood.

Enter the Two Brothers.

E. Bro. Unmuffle, ye faint stars; and thou, fair moon,
That wou'st to love the trav'ler's benison,
Stoop thy pale visage through an amber cloud,
And disinherit chaos, that reigns here
In double night of darkness and of shades.

Y. Bro. Or, if our eyes
Be barr'd that happiness, might we but know
The sound of past'ral reed with oaten stops,
Or whistle from the lodge, or village cock,
'Twould be some solace yet, some little cheering,
In this close dungeon of innum'rous boughs.
But O, that hapless virgin, our lost sister!
Perhaps some cold bank is her bolster now,
Or 'gainst the rugged bark of some broad elm,
Leans her unpillow'd head, fraught with sad fears;
Or, while we speak, within the direful grasp
Of savage hunger, or of savage heat.

E. Bro. Peace, brother; be not over exquisite,
To cast the fashion of uncertain evils:
For grant they be so, while they rest unknown,
What need a man forestal his date of grief,
And run to meet what he would most avoid?
Virtue could see to do what virtue would,
By her own radiant light, though sun and moon
Were in the flat sea sunk: and wisdom's self
Oft seeks to sweet retired solitude,
Where, with her best nurse, contemplation,
She plumes her feathers, and lets grow her wings.
He that has light within his own clear breast,
May sit i'th' centre, and enjoy bright day:
But he that hides a dark soul and foul thoughts,
Benighted walks under the mid-day sun,
Himself is his own dungeon.

Y. Bro. 'Tis most true,
That musing meditation most affects
The pensive secrecy of desert cell,
Far from the cheerful haunt of men and herds,
And sits as safe as in a senate house;
But beauty, like the fair Hesperian tree,
Laden with blooming gold, had need the guard
Of dragon watch, with unenchanted eye,
To save her blossoms and defend her fruit
From the rash hand of bold incontinence.

E. Bro. My sister is not so defenceless left
As you imagine; she has a hidden strength,
Which you remember not.

Y. Bro. What hidden strength?

E. Bro. 'Tis chastity, my brother, chastity;
She that has that is clad in complete steel,
And like a quiver'd nymph, with arrows keen
May trace huge forests, and unharbour'd heaths,
Infamous hills, and sandy perilous wilds.
So dear to heav'n is saintly chastity,
That when a soul is found sincerely so,
A thousand liveried angels lackey her,
Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt,
And turns it by degrees to the soul's essence,
Till all be made immortal. (A halloo heard.)

List, list; I hear
Some far-off halloo break the silent air.

Y. Bro. Methought so too; what should it be?

E. Bro. Either some one like us night-founder'd
here,

Or else some neighbour woodman, or at worst,
Some roving robber calling to his fellows.

Y. Bro. Heav'n keep my sister! (Halloo.)

Again! again! and near!

Best draw, and stand upon our guard.

E. Bro. I'll halloo;

If he be friendly, he comes well; if not,
Defence is a good cause, and heav'n be for us.

Enter the Spirit, habited like a Shepherd.

Y. Bro. That halloo I should know—What are you? speak. [again.]

Spi. What voice is that? My young lord? Speak

Y. Bro. O brother, 'tis my father's shepherd, sure.

Spi. O, my lov'd master's heir, and his next joy,
Where is my virgin lady? where is she?

How chance she is not in your company? [blame,

E. Bro. To tell thee sadly, shepherd, without
Or our neglect, we lost her as we came.

Spi. Ah me unhappy! then my fears are true.

E. Bro. What fears, good Thyrus? pr'ythee, briefly shew.

Spi. Within the bosom of this hideous wood,
Immur'd in cypress shades, a sorcerer dwells,
Of Bacchus and of Circe born; great Comus,
Deep skill'd in all his mother's witcheries,
And wanton as his father. This I learn'd
Tending my flocks hard by; whence, night by night,
He and his monstrous rout are heard to howl;
Yet have they many baits and guileful spells,
T'inveigle and invite th' unwary sense.

(A loud laugh.)

But hark! the beaten timbrel's jarring sound,
And wild tumultuous mirth, proclaim their presence
Onward they move; and this way guide their steps.
Let us withdraw awhile! (They retire.)

Enter Comus's Crew, revelling; the Elder Brother advances and speaks.

E. Bro. What are you? speak! that thus in wanton riot

And midnight revelry, like drunken bacchanals,
Invade the silence of these lonely shades?

1 Wom. Ye godlike youths,
Bless the propitious star that led you to us;
We are the happiest of the race of mortals;
Of freedom, mirth, and joy the only heirs;
But you shall share them with us; for this cup,
This nectar'd cup, the sweet assurance gives
Of present, and the pledge of future bliss.

AIR.—By a Man.

*By the gayly circling glass
We can see how minutes pass;
By the hollow cask are told
How the waning night grows old.
Soon, too soon, the busy day
Drives us from our sport and play.
What have we with day to do?
Sons of care, 'twas made for you.*

(A female offers the cup, which they both put by.)

E. Bro. Forbear, nor offer us the poison'd sweets.

1 Wom. Oh! how unseemly shews in blooming youth

Such grey severity! But come with us;
We to the bow'r of bliss will guide your steps.

AIR.

*Would you taste the noontide air?
To yon fragrant bow'r repair,
Where, woven with the poplar bough,
The mantling vine will shelter you.
Down each side a fountain flows,
Tinkling, murm'ring, as it goes
Lightly o'er the mossy ground,
Sultry Phæbus scorching round.
Round the languid herds and sheep
Stretch'd o'er sunny hillocks sleep,*

*While on the hyacinth and rose
The fair does all alone repose.
All alone—and in her arms
Your breast may beat to love's alarms,
Till, bless'd and blessing, you shall own
The joys of love are joys alone.*

Y. Bro. How low sinks beauty when by vice debas'd!

Fair were that form, if virtue dwelt within;
But from the wanton advocate of shame
To me the warbled song harsh discord sounds.

2 Wom. No more; these formal maxims misbecome you,
They only suit suspicious shrivell'd age.

TRIO.—By a Man and two Women.

*Live and love, enjoy the fair,
Banish sorrow, banish care;
Mind not what old dotards say!
Age has had his share of play;
But youth's sport begins to-day.
From the fruits of sweet delight
Let not scarecrow virtue fright!
Here in pleasure's vineyard we
Rove, like birds, from tree to tree,
Careless, airy, gay, and free.*

E. Bro. How can your impious tongues profane the name

Of sacred virtue, and yet promise pleasure
In lying songs of vanity and vice?

1 Wom. Turn not away, but listen to our strain,
That shall in pleasing slumber lull the sense,
And sweet in madness rob it of itself.

DUETT.—First Man and Woman.

Wom. O, thou wert born to please me,

Man. My life, my only love!

Wom. Through all the woods I'll praise thee,

Man. My rural queen of love.

Wom. Thus happy, never

Man. Jealous,

Wom. Can any harm

Man. Assail us?

Wom. Can any harm assail us, my shepherd of the grove? [love?

Man. Can any harm assail us, my rural queen of Wom. Feel how my heart is beating, my shepherd of the grove. [of love.

Man. The pulse of life retreating, my rural queen
The pulse of life retreating,

Wom. My shepherd of the grove.

Man. Thus love's sweet poison drinking,

Wom. Dear idol of my love.

E. Bro. From virtue sever'd, pleasure frenzy
And always flies at reason's cool return. [grows,

But we forget; who hears the voice of truth,

In noisy riot and intemp'rance drown'd?

Thyrsis, be thou our guide! We'll follow thee;

And some good angel bear a shield before us!

[Exeunt Brothers and Spirit.

1 Wom. Come, come, my friends, and partners of my joys,

Leave to yon pedant youths their bookish dreams;

A beardless Cynic is the shame of nature,

Beyond the cure of this inspiring cup;

Away, nor waste a moment more about 'em.

CHORUS.

Away, away, away,

To Comus' court repair;

There night outshines the day,

There yields the melting fair. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A gay Pavilion.

COMUS and Attendants on each side of the Lady, who is seated in an enchanted chair.

Com. Come, thou goddess fair and free,
In heav'n yclep'd Euphrosyne,

And by men heart-easing mirth,
Whom lovely Venus at a birth,
With two sister graces more,
To ivy-crowned Bacchus bore!
Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee
Jest, and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;
Sport, that wrinkled care derides;
And laughter, holding both his sides!
Come, and trip it as you go,
On the light fantastic toe:
And in thy right hand lead with thee,
The mountain nymph, sweet liberty.

AIR.—By a Man.

*Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee,
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;
Sport, that wrinkled care derides;
And laughter, holding both his sides!*

Cho. Haste thee, nymph, &c.

Enter EUPHROSINE.

AIR.—EUPHROSINE.

*Come, come, bid adieu to fear!
Love and harmony reign here.
No domestic, jealous jars,
Buzzing slanders, wordy wars,
In our presence will appear;
Love and harmony reign here.
Sighs to am'rous sighs returning,
Pulses beating, bosoms burning;
Bosoms with warm wishes panting,
Words to speak those wishes wanting,
Are the only tumults here,
All the woes you need to fear;
Love and harmony reign here.*

Lady. How long must I, by magic fetters chain'd
To this detested seat, hear odious strains
Of shameless folly which my soul abhors?

Com. Now softly slow sweet Lydian airs attune,
And breathe the pleasing pangs of gentle love.

(A Pastoral Nymph advances slowly, with a melancholy and desponding air, and repeats, by way of soliloquy, the first six lines, and then sings the Ballad. She is observed by Euphrosyne, who, by her gestures, expresses her different sentiments of the subject of her complaint, suitably to the character of their several Songs.

RECITATIVE.—Pastoral Nymph.

*How gentle was my Damon's air!
Like sunny beams his golden hair;
His voice was like the nightingale's,
More sweet his breath than flow'ry vales,
How hard such beauties to resign!
And yet that cruel task is mine.*

AIR.

*On ev'ry hill, in ev'ry grove,
Along the margin of each stream,
Dear conscious scenes of formal love,
I mourn, and Damon is my theme.
The hills, the groves, the streams remain,
But Damon there I seek in vain.*

*From hill, from dale, each charm is fled;
Groves, flocks, and fountains please no more;
Each flower in pity droops its head,
All nature does my loss deplore.
All, all reproach the faithless swain,
Yet Damon still I seek in vain.*

RECITATIVE.—EUPHROSINE.

Love, the greatest bliss below,
How to taste few women know;
Fewer still the way have hit
How a fickle swain to quit.
Simple nymph, then learn of me
How to treat inconstancy.

AIR.

The wanton god, that pierces hearts,
Dips in gall his pointed darts:
But the nymph disdains to pine,
Who bathes the wound with rosy wine.

Farewell lovers when they're cloy'd;
If I am scorn'd because enjoy'd,
Sure the squeamish fops are free
To rid me of dull company.

They have charms, whilst mine can please;
I love them much, but more my ease;
Nor jealous fears my love molest,
Nor faithless vows shall break my rest.

Why should they ever give me pain,
Who to give me joy disdain?
All I ask of mortal man,
Is love to me, whilst he can.

[Exeunt Euphrosyne and Pastoral Nymph.]

Com. Cast thine eyes around, and see
How from every element
Nature's sweets are cull'd from thee,
And her choicest blessings sent.
Hither summer, autumn, spring,
Hither all your tributes bring;
All on bended knee be seen,
Paying homage to your queen!

(The Lady attempts to rise.)

Nay, lady, sit; if I but wave this wand,
Your nerves are all bound up in alabaster,
And you a statue.

Lady. Fool, do not boast;
Thou canst not touch the freedom of my mind
With all thy charms, although this corp'ral rind
Thou hast immanacled, while heaven sees good.

Com. Why are you vex'd, lady? why do you frown?
Here dwell no frowns nor anger; from these gates
Sorrow flies far. See, here be all the pleasures
That fancy can beget on youthful thoughts:
And first behold this cordial julap here,
That flames and dances in his crystal bounds!

Lady. Know, base deluder, that I will not taste it.
Keep thy detested gifts for such as these.

(Points to his crew.)

Com. Why should you be so cruel to yourself,
And to those dainty limbs, which nature lent
For gentle usage and soft delicacy;
That have been tir'd all day without repast,
And timely rest have wanted? But, fair virgin,
This will restore all soon.

Lady. 'Twill not, false traitor!
'Twill not restore the truth and honesty
That thou hast banish'd from thy tongue with lies.
Was this the cottage, and the safe abode [ments!
Thou told'st me of? Hence with thy brew'd enchant-
Were it a draught for Juno when she banquets
I would not taste thy treas'rous offer. None,
But such as are good men, can give good things;
And that which is not good is not delicious
To a well-govern'd and wise appetite.
Shall I go on, or have I said enough?

Com. Enough to shew
That you are cheated by the lying boasts
Of starving pedants, that affect a fame
From scorning pleasures which they cannot reach.

AIR.—By a Bacchante.

Preach not to me your musty rules,
Ye drones that mould in idle cell!
The heart is wiser than the schools,
The senses always reason well.

If short my span, I less can spare
To pass a single pleasure by;
An hour is long, if lost in care;
They only live who life enjoy.

Com. List, lady; be not coy, and be not cozen'd
With that same vaunted name, virginity.
What need a vermeil tinctur'd lip for that,
Love darting eyes, or tresses like the mora?
There was another meaning in these gifts;
Think what, and be advis'd; you are but young yet;
This will inform you soon. One sip of this
Will bathe the drooping spirits in delight,
Beyond the bliss of dreams. Be wise and taste.

Enter the Brothers, with their swords drawn, who wrest the glass out of Comus's hand, and break it against the ground; he and his rout are all driven out: after which the Spirit enters.

Spi. What, have you let the false enchanter 'scape?
O, ye mistook! you should have snatch'd his wand,
And bound him fast; without his rod revers'd,
We cannot free the lady, that sits here
In stony fetters fix'd, and motionless.
Yet stay, be not disturb'd; now I bethink me,
There is a gentle nymph not far from hence,
Sabrina is her name, a virgin pure,
That sways the Severn stream: she can unlock
The clasp charm, and thaw the numbing spell,
If she be right invok'd in warbling song.
Sabrina, goddess dear!
We implore thy powerful aid
To undo the charmed band
Of true virgin here distress'd,
Through the force and through the will
Of unblest enchanter vile.

SABRINA rises.

RECITATIVE.—SABRINA.

Shepherd, 'tis my office best
To help ensnared chastity;
Brightest lady, look on me.
Thus I sprinkle on thy breast
Drops, that from my fountain pure
I have kept of precious cure;
Thrice upon thy finger's tip,
Thrice upon thy rubied lip;
Next this marble venom'd seat,
Smear'd with gums of glut'nous heat,
I touch with chaste palms, moist and cold:
Now the spell hath lost its hold;
And I must haste, ere morning hour,
To wait in Amphitrite's bower.

(Sabrina descends, and the Lady rises out of her seat; the Brothers embrace her tenderly.)

E. Bro. Inform us, Thyrsis, if for this thine aid
We aught can pay, that equals thy desert.

Spi. (Discovering himself.) Pay it to heaven!
There my mansion is.

RECITATIVE.—Spirit.

Now my task is smoothly done,
I can fly, or I can run
Quickly to the green earth's end,
Where the bow'd welkin slow doth bend;
And from thence can soar as soon,
To the corners of the moon.

AIR.

Mortals, that would happy be,
Love virtue; she alone is free:
She can teach you how to climb
Higher than the sphery chime;
Or, if virtue feeble were,
Heaven itself would stoop to her.

Enter Spirits.

CHORUS.

Taught by virtue, you may climb
Higher than the sphery chime;
Or, if virtue feeble were,
Heaven itself would stoop to her. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Outside of Thomaso's house.

Enter STURMWALD, GUZMAN, ANNA, ISABELLA, and THERESA.

TRIO.—ANNA, ISABELLA, and GUZMAN.

Now the sun so faintly glancing
O'er the western hills his ray;
Ev'ning shadows, quick advancing,
Triumph o'er the fading day.

DUETT.—ANNA and ISABELLA.

Timorous love, at day affrighted,
Blushing, courts the silver moon;

Sturm. Bacchus' sons are now delighted,
Night's the jolly fellow's noon.

TRIO.

Ev'ning thus our joys uniting,
To her power due homage pay;
Mirth to dance and song inviting,
Bids us hail the close of day.

Enter THOMASO.

Tho. What, moping yet, my friend Guzman?
For shame, you a sailor, and carry sorrow aboard?
Zounds! if I had lost a mistress, nay, had it been
The. Well, sir? [my wife—

Tho. I think I could have comforted myself.
Ah, Captain, how far preferable are the charms of peace and a country life, to all the bustle and danger of a campaign.

Stur. It may be so to you, Signor Thomaso, who slumber in the inglorious lap of peace; but war is my element; glory is my mistress; and I have courted her amid the cannon's thunder.

Tho. Many men of many minds, Captain; for my part, I always preferred a more quiet kind of courtship; but you are a man of true gallantry, to remain so partial to your mistress, after having lost the use of a leg and an eye in her service.

Stur. A leg and an eye! Psha, trifles! while my honour, a soldier's vital spark, has escaped unhurt.
You may be a very good apothecary, Signor Thomaso, and may understand lotions and potions; but as to a soldier's honour—

The. Ah, very true, Captain. He is a most provoking man, though he is my husband. For shame, after our good friend, Captain Sturmwald, has come all the way from Germany to marry our daughter Anna.

Tho. Nay, I'm sure, the Captain knows I mean no harm. Anna, come hither, child. (Aside to Anna.) Why don't you smile upon your husband that is to be? [cruel solicitation.

Anna. Do not, my dear father, persist in this

Tho. (Aside to Anna.) Psha! how can you be so obstinate! though the Captain is not very handsome, he is very rich. 'Tis true, he is rather old;
but then you know you have the better chance of being a widow soon; and as to his having but one eye, it ought to be his recommendation, for you'll have no trouble in discovering his blind side.

The. Lookye, Anna, you know my way of arguing, and so does your father. It is my pleasure that you marry Captain Sturmwald; and have him you shall. [madam.

Guz. Have a little patience with her, my dear

Anna. Then you are resolved to render me miserable!

AIR.—ANNA.

On Love's blest altar burns the flame
Whence Hymen's torch should kindle bright
To bliss, which boasts fair virtue's name;
It casts its pure and radiant light.
But, ah! should avarice interpose,
With sordid and unhallow'd fires,
The prospect which their light bestows,
Repentance and despair inspires.

[Exeunt Anna, Isabella, and Guzman.]

The. Anna's reluctance is certainly owing to that impertinent slut, her cousin. I'm sure she does not inherit her obstinacy from me. When my mother proposed a husband to me, I gave my consent without a moment's hesitation. Didn't I, my dear?

Tho. True, my love; but then I had not lost any of my limbs in pursuit of glory, like the Captain. (Aside to her.)

Stur. I was thinking whether I had not better talk to the young lady myself.

The. To be sure; how the deuce else are you to gain her consent?

Stur. I'faith, I will. She'll find me very entertaining. I'll breakfast with her to-morrow, and give her the history of my last campaign. I'll come early in the morning, that I may finish the story before dinner.

The. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exit.]

Tho. Well, Captain, now my wife is gone, I want to have a little talk with you about my new-invented miraculous drops, as I call them, that cure all disorders.

Stur. Do they cure gun-shot wounds?

Tho. Everything.

Stur. I wish then I had had a bottle in that engagement where I was wounded by a French dragoon in the shoulder. I'll tell you how it happened.

Tho. Unfortunate man that I am! He'll talk like my wife. (Aside.)

Stur. We were fording a river, and I was about the middle of the stream—

[half hour.]

Tho. (Aside.) He won't be out of the water this

Stur. A scoundrel French dragoon upon a black

Tho. A grey horse.

[horse—]

Stur. Black, black as jet.

Tho. I beg your pardon, Captain, it was a grey horse. I have heard you tell the story twenty times, and you always said the horse was grey. So much for that. Now you must know, my drops—

Stur. You have heard me tell the story, then?

Tho. Often. So my drops—

Stur. And what d'ye think of it?

Tho. One of the best stories I ever heard in my life. So—

[another.]

Stur. I'm very glad you like it. I'll tell you

Tho. Curse his stories. (Aside.) To-morrow, Captain, I shall be happy to hear it.

Stur. Well; if you are tired of my company, I'll go and get a bottle of good wine, to make me sleep soundly; and so adieu, my dear father-in-law.

Tho. Adieu, my dear son-in-law. (Aside.) What a cursed bore he is for talking.

[Exit.]

Stur. A good kind of a man enough; but can't bear to hear anybody talk, except himself. [Exit.]

Enter CARLOS.

Carlos. When wilt thou cease, thou pleasing pain,
With cruel sway to rend my heart?

Yet, though of torment I complain,

Alas! I fear to cure the smart.

Enter JUAN, with a guitar.

Juan. Sighing never gains a maid!

I'll tell you what is better far;

Call good humour to your aid,

And play the lass a tune upon the sweet guitar.

If a heart has nature dealt her,

Music's charms will surely melt her;

But should the gipsy answer, "No,"

Sing tol de rol, and let her go.

Car. (Aside.) Zounds! I see some one at the door. A rival, perhaps! (Perceives it to be Juan.) Juan!

Juan. Carlos! my dear boy, how d'ye do?

Car. I'm heartily glad to see you—no, i'faith, now I think again, I am not glad to see you, till I know what brought you hither.

Juan. I was going to tell you, I have an appointment with a very pretty girl in this house—

Car. Ah! my fears. (Aside.)

Juan. So I am sure you will be complaisant enough to wish me a good night.

Car. Faith, I am sorry to deny you. But I happen to have an assignation here myself. You perceive a light in that window?

Juan. That light is my signal.

Car. Egad, 'tis my signal too! So I'm sure you will be complaisant enough to wish me a good

Juan. Sir, this insult—

[night.]

Car. Insult, sir! (Laying their hands on their swords.)

Juan. Though now I recollect myself, perhaps we are going to cut throats without any cause. There are two fair damsels in that house. What is the name of your mistress?

Car. Anna, the daughter of old Thomaso, the apothecary; and your mistress is—

Juan. Isabella! her laughing little cousin.

Car. Then I am glad to see you, after all; and yet I am an unlucky dog, Juan. They are going to marry my dear Anna to old Sturmwald, the German Captain. I dare not acquaint my father of my passion for her; you know he and Thomaso are the bitterest enemies. The only resource left, is to carry her off; and I have, for this week past, in vain sought an opportunity of seeing her.

Juan. Oh, the devil! Old Thomaso's man, to shut the shop up. Stand aside—(Thomaso's man shuts up the shop, while they talk aside.) Give me your hand, Carlos; you shall see Anna, speak to her, and carry her off this night. [plished?]

Car. My dear Juan, how is this to be accom-

Juan. The first thing is to get the old fellow out of the house.

Car. And how is that to be managed?

Juan. Very easily—as thus: I'll act an old woman, and bring him down, I'll warrant you. (Knocks.) Say nothing, and stand aside. (Thomaso opens the window and looks out.)

Tho. What the devil is all that noise for?

Juan. (In a feigned voice.) Pray, is this Signor Thomaso's?

[maso, good woman?]

Tho. Why, what do you want with Signor Tho-

Juan. The sick gentleman, signor, at the next inn, is much worse.

Tho. I'm sorry for it; I wish the gentleman had been much worse an hour ago; because then I could have attended him; but at present I'm going to bed.

Juan. Dear signor, you won't leave the poor man to the mercy of an ignorant physician?

Tho. Why, who attends him?

Juan. Dr. Bilioso.

Tho. Then I give him over. Good night to you, good woman. (Shuts the window.)

Car. Our plot is ruined.

Juan. Not yet Carlos. (Knocks again, loud.)

Tho. (Again opens the window.) Zounds! what's the matter with the woman? Go about your business.

Juan. The sick man has heard wonders related of your famous drops, Signor.

Tho. Eh! what!—Oh ho! he has heard of my drops. Well, madam?

Juan. And he wishes you would come to him directly, and bring a bottle in your pocket.

Tho. Ay, that I will—poor soul! poor soul! I'll cure him in spite of his physician. (Calls within.) Hallo! Pedro! (To Juan.) I'll go with you, good woman, and as we walk, I'll tell you some of the cures I have performed. I'll wait on you instantly. (Shuts the window.)

Car. This is a prosperous beginning, Juan.

Juan. Hush, not a word; we must retire. (They retire.)

Enter THOMASO, from the house.

Tho. And so, good woman, you say—Heyday, she is gone! The poor gentleman's case is urgent, I suppose, so I'll lose no time. What a pleasure it is to attend sensible patients; I dare say, he is a shrewd fellow, by his wishing to try my drops.

[Exit.]

Juan. Ha, ha! The old fox is fairly unkenneled.

Car. But how are we to get into the house?

Juan. The door is fast. Eh! i'faith this shutter is unbolted. (Opens part of the shutter.) So we will e'en get in at the shop window.

Car. My best friend! (Going to climb in at the window.)

Juan. Hold! let me reconnoitre first. I know every part of the house. Follow me.

Car. Kind Cupid light us on our way!

Juan. Psha! Zounds! a lantern would light us much better. So, rot your heroics, and follow me. (They get in at the window.)

Enter STURMWALD, drunk.

Stur. Tol de rol, de rol—halt! Stand to your arms, Captain Sturmwald. Do my eyes deceive me, or have the enemy besieged my father-in-law's house, and made a practicable breach in the shop-window? Who the devil are they? Thieves! No, i'faith, that can't be; who'd think of stealing anything out of an apothecary's shop! Perhaps they are gallants; have at you, my boys, I must enter and defend my father-in-law. (Going to climb in at the window; he stops.) But hold! a prudent general should know what force he has to contend with; besides, I forget, old Bolus is not at home, I remember I met him just now; egad, I'll go and fetch him, and we'll surprise the enemy together. How lucky it is that I am sober? If I had taken the other bottle, my senses might have been confused; but now I am cool and collected. Ah! there is nothing like drinking in moderation. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Inside of Thomaso's shop.

Enter JUAN and CARLOS.

Car. Hush! tread softly for your life.

Juan. Why, what are you afraid of? [happ—

Car. If Thomaso should return! and then, per-

Juan. Perhaps what? Why your whole conversation is composed of ifs, buts, perhapses, and supposes; a mere vocabulary of doubts.

Car. Hark! I hear Anna's voice, the sound transports me. Oh, Juan, I scarcely know where I am!

Juan. Why, then, I'll tell you. This is an apothecary's shop; it is dark, and you are surrounded with phials; therefore, take care you break none. Those are stairs before us, and lead to the room where our dear girls are. I shall go up first, and you may follow, unless you prefer staying here. I have now given you full information, and so come along. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room in Thomaso's house.

DUETT.—ANNA and ISABELLA.

*Two maidens sat complaining,
And mourn'd their hapless lot,
The pangs of absence paining,
Each by her love forgot.*

*On every former token
Of love, while fancy hung,
Of vows so sweet, yet broken,
They, deeply sighing, sung.*

*At ev'ry sound they hear,
With fond alarm they start;
Alternate hope and fear,
Now joy, now pain, impart.*

*But by each sound misguided,
Alas! they only find
Their tears, their sighs, derided,
By mocking rain and wind.*

Anna. Isabella, 'tis a whole week since I saw my Carlos. How can he say he loves me, and yet suffer them to marry me to this hateful German officer. [chamber, child?

The. (Within.) Anna, why don't you go to your

Isa. Heavens! your mother is not gone to bed yet.

Anna. And do you think my Carlos has really forsaken me? My Carlos! did I say? yes, I will repeat it. My heart yields to the fond delusion of my tongue; and I think I love him better every time I call him mine. [Exit.]

Isa. Poor Anna! I love her sincerely, and yet I am not sorry she is gone. I think Juan must be here soon, and—and, perhaps, our conversation would be very uninteresting to her.

Re-enter ANNA.

Anna. Oh! Isabella, I'm frightened out of my wits. Two men have got into the house; and I think it is our lover and mine. [ing in all that?

Isa. Well, my dear, and what is there so alarm-

Enter CARLOS and JUAN.

Car. My dear Anna!

Anna. Ah! (Screams.)

Juan. My dear Isabella!

Isa. Hush! you'll wake your mother. (Carlos shews Anna a marriage contract.)

The. (Within.) Anna! what's the matter, child?

Isa. My cousin was frightened at something; but I am sure there was no reason to be afraid.

Anna. Do you know, Isabella, this unreasonable creature has brought me a marriage-contract, and would have me seize this moment to elope with him!

Car. (To Isabella.) And do you know, madam, this unreasonable creature hesitates, though she promised me long ago to elope, whenever I could find an opportunity.

Juan. Psha! Marry first, and dispute afterwards; that would be much more in the common order of things. Come, my dear Isabella, let us set them a good example; leave dissimulation to knaves and coquettes, and lead up the dance of Hymen as first couple. [to change partners—

Isa. Why, if I were sure you would never wish

Car. Consider, my dear Anna, the moments fly.

Isa. (Peeping through the key-hole.) I vow, your mother is not in bed yet. (To Anna.) Away, away, instantly, and leave me to keep her quiet; I'll follow you directly. [Exeunt Anna, Carlos, and Juan.] I'll sing, that she may suspect nothing.

AIR.—ISABELLA.

*Ye hours that part my love and me,
And slow with envy creep,
The dawn of bliss obscured by clouds
Of doubt, in vain ye keep:
Still I through Sorrow's tedious night,
Hope's friendly star discern;
On that I fix my anxious eye
Until my love return.
By Jealousy's pernicious power,
Untainted are my sighs;
Confiding in my Juan's truth,
My fondest wishes rise.*

Still I through Sorrow's, &c.

Tho. (Without.) Hey, Guzman! Pedro! where the devil are you?

Re-enter CARLOS, JUAN, and ANNA.

Anna. Oh, Isabella, my father is come home! all the doors are locked.

Car. And our retreat cut off.

Isa. Then we are lost.

Juan. No, faith, I'm afraid we are all found. Where can we hide ourselves?

Isa. Go into our chamber.

Anna. My father is now at the chamber-door.

Car. In here, then. (Going into Theresa's chamber.)

Anna. That's my mother's room.

Isa. We are in luck. My uncle, in his hurry to visit his patient, has left the door of his study open. In, in, directly. [Exeunt Carlos and Juan into the closet.] Here comes your father.

Enter THOMASO and STURMWALD.

Tho. Anna! Theresa! Isabella! there are thieves in the house.

Anna. Thieves! bless me, sir, what shall we do?

Stur. Take 'em, to be sure; take 'em, dead or alive. Enter THERESA.

The. What's that you say? Thieves in our house?

Tho. The Captain saw them get in: he'll tell you the whole story.

Stur. That I will, with a great deal of pleasure. As I was coming from the tavern, where I had been drinking a glass in moderation, as sober as I am now, I saw two men getting into my father-in-law's house. What's to be done, thought I; for this was enough to stagger me, you may suppose.

Tho. Oh! certainly. (Aside.) That you had enough to stagger you, I believe.

The. (Taking the contract from Anna's pocket.) Yes, and here is enough to stagger us all. This paper explains to me, that these thieves are of Cupid's gang; gentlemen who commit sentimental robberies on the hearts of young ladies. There, Thomaso, read that! (Gives the contract.)

Tho. What do I see! a contract of marriage between my daughter and Carlos?

Stur. Carlos! What the devil! the enemy surprise us in our own camp! Egad, we'll hold a council of war immediately; I have something in my head. [to have.]

Tho. (Aside.) Yes, rather more than you ought

The. I am sure young Carlos is in the house.

Stur. Is he? Why, then, we'll break up the council. Bella! horrida bella! is our resolve; and so let us search for the enemy. (Going to open Theresa's chamber-door.)

The. Bless me, Captain Sturmwald, do you know that is my chamber?

Stur. Well, my dear mother-in-law, and is not a lady's chamber the most likely place to find a man of gallantry? However, I'll wheel to the right about, if you please. (Goes to Thomaso's door.)

Tho. Stop, Captain; no person ever enters that closet but myself; 'tis there where I compose my miraculous drops. [pocus shop.]

Stur. Ay, ay, I understand you; 'tis your hocus

Tho. No, sir, 'tis my miracle shop.

Stur. Your magazine for the destructive amunition of physic.

Tho. My laboratory for the arcana of the materia medica. 'Tis the Temple of Health; and the rosy goddess herself presides over my pestle and mortar.

Stur. A small room for the Temple of Health, I think, and rather dark. Suppose, instead of confining the poor goddess of Health to her room, you were to let her visit some of your patients?

Tho. You may sneer as you please, Captain Sturmwald; I have the key of that closet in my pocket, and there it shall remain; so let us finish a foolish adventure, by wishing each other a good night.

Tho. I shall take you with me, young ladies, to prevent further accidents. Captain Sturmwald, where will you sleep?

Stur. No where, madam; I suspect the enemy is in ambuscade. I will be the centinel of the night; rest securely, while I guard you. Here I take my post, and shall be on the watch, in case the enemy should make a sally.

Tho. Well, Captain, I have no objection. Here is the key of the house, in case you choose to refresh yourself with a walk in the morning.

QUINTET.—ANNA, ISABELLA, THERESA, STURMWALD, and GUZMAN.

*But see the moon, ascending high,
Reigns the empress of the sky;
And in the zenith of her power,
Presides o'er midnight's solemn hour.*

The. You must bid adieu— (To Anna.)
Yes, miss, so must you— (To Isabella.)

Anna & Isa. Must we bid adieu?
*Wherefore should we part?
Spare my aching heart.*

Tho. Come, let's go to bed;
Spare my aching head.

Stur. Let him go to bed;
Spare his aching head.

All. Bid adieu! [Exeunt all but Sturmwald, who places himself on a couch before Thomaso's closet-door.]

AIR.—STURMWALD.

*Come on, my boys, now I'm commander,
Though you're as brave as Alexander,
Heigho!* (Yawning.)

*You lie,
On my guard here am I.*

*I fear no ambush, no entrapping;
No one shall catch old Sturmwald napping.
(Falls asleep.)*

JUAN and CARLOS come out of the closet.

Car. Softly, softly! First let us secure the key of the shop-door, to let ourselves out. (Takes the key.)

Juan. That this old remnant of mortality should think of rivalling a young fellow, with his five senses in perfection!

Car. But to our plot, good Juan; our plot. We have no time to lose.

Juan. Faith! that's very true. So in you must go, my old commander. (They wheel the couch into Thomaso's closet.)

AIR.—CARLOS.

*Bacchus now his nap is taking;
But his power can ne'er subdue
Watchful Love, who, ever waking,
Bids the sleeping sot adieu.*

*Bacchus should, on Venus waiting,
Hold the cup with bended knee;
None but fools, his worth o'er-rating,
With the servant make too free.*

(Juan comes out of the closet, and brings with him Sturmwald's cloak, hat, and patch.)

DUETT.—CARLOS and JUAN.

*Bacchus now his nap is taking;
But his power can ne'er subdue
Watchful Love, who, ever waking,
Bids the sleeping sot adieu.*

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Outside of Dr. Bilioso's house.

Enter GUZMAN and PEREZ.

Guz. But pray, Perez, is Doctor Bilioso informed of his son's attachment to my cousin Anna?

Per. Oh, dear, no! My old master hates Signor Thomaso to that degree, that he would rather see his son hanged than married into the family.

Guz. Though unacquainted with poor Carlos, I sympathise with him. Had my Leonora lived—

Per. Ah! but she is gone; and your honour has been doleful and dumpish, as one may say, ever since you came home from sea. Oh! I love to hear you talk of old stories: you make me so melancholy and so happy, that I cry by the hour together.

Guz. Poor fellow!

Per. And pray, good Signor Guzman, when you was voyaging about on the stormy main, and fighting the Algerines, was not you now and then frightened too much to think of your love?

Guz. No, Perez! true love purifies the soul from every base alloy.

AIR.—GUZMAN.

*Let angry Ocean to the sky,
In proud despite, his billows roll;
Let thunders to his threats reply,
Fear is a stranger to my soul.
Within the heart which Love illumines,
And blesses with his sacred rays,
If meaner passion e'er presumes,
It fades before the hallowed blaze.*

*Though War with sullen aspect lower,
And crimson o'er the troubled wave,
And emulate the lightning's power,
The dangers of the fight I brave.*

Within the heart, &c. [Exit.]

Per. Here comes my master, and as cross as usual.

Enter DOCTOR BILIOSO.

Dr. Bil. What a cursed neighbourhood is this for a physician to live in! No such thing as an asthma, or a fit of the gout to be met with from year's end to year's end. All the villagers are such a set of d—d, vulgar, healthy dogs; never have the pleasure of seeing a meagre, bilious, gentleman-like man within ten miles of the place. How comfortable it would be to live at Constantinople, where the plague rages all the year! And then people laugh more here than in all Spain besides. Ah! I don't like laughing. Well, Perez, anybody ill this morning?

Per. (Sighing.) No, sir; all well.

Dr. Bil. Ay! and will remain so as long as this plaguy fine weather lasts: no chance of another influenza. I, who am the physician, am the only sick man in the parish.

Per. Yes, your worship seems stuck up here by way of a medical scarecrow, to frighten away sickness.

Dr. Bil. Or, rather, like an electrical conductor, I save the neighbourhood from danger, by attracting it to myself. Ah! I lost the only good patient I had, in my friend Alvarez; as fine a corpulent, inactive subject as a physician would wish for. What with repletion, and want of exercise, the good soul was always ailing. I had great expectations from him; but he grew stingy as he grew rich; avarice produced abstinence, and he starved away the only hopes I had left.

Per. There's the traveller who was taken ill at the next inn.

Dr. Bil. Ay! the only person I have at present under my care, and he is a foreigner; no native would have behaved so civilly as to be taken ill. Not got well, I hope?

Per. Yes, so they say; the apothecary, Thomaso, was sent for to him last night.

Dr. Bil. What! send for my enemy, my antagonist, Thomaso, the apothecary? A man of honour would have sooner died under his physician's hands, than have played him such a trick. [dicine.]

Per. And he took some of Thomaso's quack medicine.

Dr. Bil. Oh, curse his quack medicine! I hate all violent remedies; they make an end of a business so soon. They either kill or cure; and then, either way, one loses the patient.

Per. And so, Thomaso—

Dr. Bil. Oh, rot him! I'll go to the rascally quack directly; my patients are my property; and shall I tamely suffer my property to be taken from me? I'll trounce the dog. No, no; if a doctor's patients are permitted to slip through his fingers, and get well by stealth, there's an end to all law and justice. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Thomaso's house.

Enter THOMASO.

Tho. Ah, ah! the Captain off already. I didn't expect he had shaken off the effects of last night's dose quite so soon. I can hardly reconcile it to myself to sacrifice poor Anna to such a sot. My conscience revolts against it, and whispers—ay! but then my wife talks so much louder than my conscience; and so there's an end of the matter.

Enter JUAN (behind) disguised as Sturmwald, and CARLOS, disguised as a notary, who listens.

Juan. (In a hoarse voice.) Father-in-law, good morning to you.

Tho. Eh! what! bless my soul! son-in-law, how do ye do? There seems to be a wonderful change in your voice.

Juan. All the effects of last night.

Tho. I suppose so: a violent cold, no doubt; my drops are remarkably good for the voice.

Juan. No, no; never mind. I'll tell you a story—

Tho. I'd rather you'd let it alone. Come, now; one spoonfull will be enough. 'Tis a most wonderful remedy. I have it here in this closet.

Juan. Curse your drops! I am sure the lovers of your daughter and niece are now in the house.

Tho. Well, Captain, perhaps you know best; but, upon my soul, I don't believe a word of the matter. Now, let me fetch a bottle of drops.

Juan. My jealousy is alarm'd, sir; and I must be your son-in-law this morning, or not at all. No reply! I have brought this gentleman with me; he is my notary, and has drawn up a marriage-contract. So call your wife and the bride; let us sign and seal, and then to church immediately.

Tho. Well, but Captain—

Juan. I'm commanding officer to-day; so no more words, father-in-law. [Exit Thomaso.] Ha, ha, ha! Well, Carlos, how have I imitated the old German captain? [half as well.]

Car. To a miracle. I wish I may play my part

Juan. Psha! what difficulty is there in it? The old folks will take you for the notary who has prepared the contract of marriage between Anna and Sturmwald; instead of that, you will substitute the other contract, in which your own name is inserted. But here they come.

Enter THOMASO, THERESA, and ANNA.

Anne. No, nothing shall shake my constancy; every obstacle you raise, serves but to increase my affection.

AIR.—ANNA.

*The summer heats, bestowing
Their influence on the rose,
Perfect its charms when blowing,
And every sweet disclose.*

*Yet summer suns denying
The zephyr and the shower;
Their fervid glow applying,
Destroy their fav'rite flower.*

*The love-sick heart requiring
The sunshine of success;
Continual bliss desiring,
Yet sickens with excess.*

*The fond, the secret tear,
Soft passion keeps alive;
The breath of doubt and fear,
Like zephyrs, bids it thrive.*

Juan. Well, Signor Thomaso, have you looked over the contract?

Tho. I have; and find it perfectly right.

Juan. Very well; but where's Isabella?

The. Oh! I'll call her. Isabella!—but I assure you I would not trust her with anybody else.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. My dear Juan, what means—

Juan. (Aside to her.) Hush, my love! ask no questions; persuade Anna to sign that paper, it is a contract of marriage between her and Carlos, who, you see, personates the notary. (Carlos offers the contract to Anna, who puts it aside.)

Anna. No, nothing shall induce me to sign this hated paper. Oh! Carlos, why are you not here to snatch me from impending ruin?

Tho. Daughter, do not oblige me to exert my authority. [much greater.]

The. Let her beware of my authority, which is

Juan. Psha, psha! persuasion is better than authority. Let her cousin talk to her. (Isabella whispers Anna.) These girls know the way to each other's hearts; there, mother-in-law, you see, she hangs out a smile of truce already.

The. My dear daughter, you transport me!

Juan. Come, sign your consent to the marriage.

The. Sign it! ay, that I will! Come, husband. (Anna and Theresa sign the contract.)

Tho. Egad! Captain, I don't understand that notary's whispering my daughter; I—

Juan. 'Tis his way: come, sign your name.

Tho. No, sir! (To Carlos.) I insist upon knowing what you mean?

Car. What I mean!

Juan. If you put him in a passion, take care of yourself; he is the most choleric fellow—you had better sign at once.

AIR.—CARLOS.

*This marriage article, (To Thomaso.)
In every particle,
Is free from flaw, sir;
I know what's law, sir.*

*Zounds! sir, my character none shall accuse.
Behold this artifice, true love's devising, (To Anna.)
Your Carlos thus to all but you disguising;*

*Witness—Thomaso my skill dares abuse. (To Juan.)
My only chance, I see, is pique pretending; (To Anna.)
On that alone success is now depending.*

*Throughout this nation, (To Thomaso.)
High my reputation,
For law precision is,
And expedition is,*

In bonds, conveyances, d'ye mind?

And instruments of any kind.

*Kind fortune, see, at length, our prayers heeding,
Relenting, gives us promise of succeeding. (To Anna.)*

In this transaction (To Thomaso.)

The law is my friend;

I'll bring my action,

Which you must defend.

(Thomaso, frightened, signs the contract.)

Juan. Come, come, now all's finished, let us away to church.

The. Well, I'll be with you in a moment. [Exit.

Car. (Aside to Juan.) For heaven's sake! Juan, let us be gone. If Sturmwald should wake, we are ruined.

Juan. (Aloud.) I beg your pardon for detaining you, Mr. Notary, conduct these ladies to my house, and I'll follow you immediately.

[Exeunt Anna, Isabella, and Carlos.]

Tho. Stop; stay. What! without my wife's leave? [where am I?

Stur. (In the closet.) Halloo! death and fury!

Tho. Eh! what's that?

Stur. Thieves! thieves!

Tho. I'm lost in amazement.

Juan. Did not I tell you one of the rogues was hid there? I'll run and fetch an alguazil.

Tho. You run! why, you forget you are lame.

Juan. (In his natural voice.) Egad, so I do! but I am so interested in this business.

Tho. And you have recovered your voice too!

Juan. (Resuming his hoarse voice.) No, faith, I think I'm as hoarse as ever.

Stur. Thomaso! Signor Thomaso!

Tho. 'Tis the Captain's voice. Egad, I'll fetch an alguazil myself, and make sure of one of ye. [Exit.

Stur. Signor Thomaso!

Juan. Have a little patience. (Aside.) What's to be done? If I attempt the door, I meet the alguazil. I must e'en try this chamber window. (Pulls off his disguise, throws it down at the closet-door, and then goes into Theresa's chamber.)

Re-enter THOMASO.

Tho. An alguazil will be here presently, and then, Mr. Scoundrel—(Sees the cloak and patch.) Hey-day! what's all this?

Stur. (In the closet.) Will nobody hear me?

Tho. It is Sturmwald! Oh! my mind misgives me. (He hears a noise in the closet, and rushes in.)

Re-enter THOMASO and STURMWALD.

Tho. All my phials of drops broken! Let me tell you, Captain Sturmwald—

Stur. Zounds! sir, you shall tell me nothing but what I desire to know. I say, sir, how did I come in that closet?

Tho. That's the very question I want to ask you: and, if we both ask the same question, how the devil are we to get an answer?

Stur. Why, you dirty scrap of an apothecary, how dare you laugh at me thus?

Tho. I laugh? Look at the bottles you've broken! I believe I shall never laugh again.

Stur. You are all in the plot; 'tis a trick to abuse me; but I'll be revenged. 'Sblood and thunder! to make a jest of me, who have fought in sixteen different battles! Did you know that?

Tho. Yes, you have often told me the names of them all. But, do you hear me, Captain?—

Stur. I'll hear nothing but revenge. To cram me up in a dark closet, among pickled snakes and stuffed alligators! me, who have lived amidst fire and smoke; who have fought for every prince in Europe by turns, and always had the honour to be wounded! Who, to this hour, bear the trophies of war in every limb, and rejoice in the aches, the cramps, and the twinges of glory!

THERESA enters, and Thomaso explains to her, in dumb shew, what has passed.

The. I am sure, Captain, I don't wonder at your being angry at my husband; he's a poor blundering creature, as I often tell him.

Tho. Nay, the Captain knows I never mean to offend him. I have done all I can.

The. Psha! so you always say. Go, get an alguazil, and seek for the rogues that have stolen our two girls, do. [Exit Thomaso.] Come, Captain, suppose you and I follow him? For my sake, be patient. The brave never refuse the requests of the fair.

Stur. Never; and to prove it, I'll tell you a story of what happened when I was in Germany. [Exeunt.]

Enter JUAN, in woman's clothes.

Juan. This confounded window is too closely barred even for a mouse to creep through. However, in this disguise, I shink I shall get off undiscovered; or, if I should be questioned, I'll pass for a patient come to ask Thomaso's advice.

Dr. Bil. (Speaking to a Servant as he comes on.) Don't tell me; I say he is at home, and I will see him.

Juan. Who comes here? Dr. Bilioso himself!

Enter DR. BILIOSO. (Seeing Juan.)

Dr. Bil. But I beg pardon; you want advice, I presume; let me feel your pulse. (Attempting to take Juan's hand.)

Juan. (Struggling.) Zounds! I shall be discovered. (Aside.) Dear sir, pray let me alone; my nerves are so weak, and you agitate me so.

Dr. Bil. Why, really, madam, you have rather agitated me. I think I never yet met with a lady so strong in the arm. Pray, what is your complaint ma'am?

Juan. My complaint is against Thomaso, who has killed a poor friend of mine.

Dr. Bil. Oh, he has done worse than that; he has taken a patient away from me, after I had given him over. So, if he recovers the man, he ruins my reputation. There's an unfeeling scoundrel for you!

Juan. Ah! you and I mean the same person; the poor gentleman at the next inn: but Thomaso's drops have done for him; my poor friend is no more.

Dr. Bil. I'm heartily glad of it; very sorry for it, I mean. I thank you for the news, however. Now I have that rogue Thomaso in my gripe.

Juan. Lose no time, sir, but get an officer immediately, and secure Thomaso.

Dr. Bil. That I will. Ay, ay. (Going.)

Juan. Surely, sir, you will have the gallantry to conduct me safe out of this house, if I should be insulted.

Dr. Bil. Insulted! Lord, ma'am, there's no danger of that. Nature has furnished you with such powers of defence; united the charms of your sex to the strength of our's. You are a glass of nature's choicest cordial, madam; sweet and strong at the same time. [Exit, leading Juan off.]

SCENE III.—A Wood.

Enter ANNA and CARLOS.

Car. Consider, my dear Anna, we have your father's signature to our contract of marriage.

Anna. But will he give his voluntary consent to what has been procured by artifice?

Car. Fear nothing, my dear; trust to me.

AIR.—CARLOS.

*Am I beloved? Can you refuse?
Alas! my heart for pity sues.
That heart whose constancy you've known;
That heart you've fondly call'd your own.
Every moment, as it flies,
Warns us where our danger lies.
Ah! there's ruin in delay;
Lovely Anna, let's away.*

Enter ISABELLA.

Car. Well, Isabella, any news of Juan?

Isa. Alas! none. Every human being that passed at a distance, did my pliant fancy conjure up into a likeness of Juan.

Car. The rising ground, on the left hand, commands a prospect of the road. Let me try whether friendship cannot see more clearly than love.

Anna. Are not we a couple of wild girls, Isabella?

Isa. Not incorrigible, my dear cousin, however; we have pursued a very effectual mode of taming ourselves, by getting married.

Anna. To be sure, we have uttered the fatal yes.

Isa. The fatal yes! Why, my dear, do you think our lovers are such fools, as to think the better or the worse of our affection for them, because we have said yes?

AIR.—ISABELLA.

*How mistaken is the lover,
Who on words builds hopes of bliss!
And fondly thinks we love discover,
If, perchance, we answer "Yes."
Prompted often by discretion
Is the seeming kind expression,
When the tongue, the heart belying,
Dares not venture on denying;
But, in spite of discontent,
Gives the semblance of consent.
How mistaken, &c.*

*Ah! how vain is art's profession,
Though the faltering tongue comply!
What avails the cold confession,
If the averted eyes deny?
Happier far, the experienced swain
Knows he triumph must attain,
When in vain successful trial,
Language gives the faint denial;
While the eyes betray the fiction
In delightful contradiction;
And the cheeks with blushes glow,
And the tongue still falters "No."
How mistaken, &c.*

Enter CARLOS.

Car. Here is Juan. So all we have to do, is to mount our horses, and gallop off.

Enter JUAN.

Juan. Hold; you're mistaken. You've something else to do, I assure you. We have certainly been traced from the village. Dr. Bilioso and Signor Thomaso are both coming up the hill different ways, and will most likely meet at this spot. But they are here. (Anna, Isabella, Carlos, and Juan, retire.)

Enter DR. BILIOSO and THOMASO, meeting, each with an Alguazil.

Dr. Bil. Oh! you vile quack! Where's my patient?

Tho. Where is my daughter, you old rogue! You have assisted your son to run away with her. Lay hold on him, Alguazil.

Dr. Bil. What! why, I brought an officer to seize you. Here, do your duty. (To the Alguazil.)

Juan. (Coming forward.) Dear gentlemen, what's the matter?

Dr. Bil. Why, sir, that fellow is a quack, and has killed one of my patients.

Tho. That's impossible; for, though he calls himself a physician, he has no patients to kill.

Dr. Bil. What! do you forget the poor gentleman at the inn? [over.]

Tho. Well, he was fair game. You had given him

Dr. Bil. Zounds, sir! what does that signify? I have given over fifty people in my time, who have recovered afterwards.

Juan. (Aside.) My plot has taken, I perceive; they believe him dead yet. (To Thomaso.) I faith, this is a serious affair. You had better compound this business.

Tho. He won't agree to it; he hates me so.

Juan. (Aside to Thomaso.) Let me talk to him. (Aside to Bilioso.) Sir, when I see so valuable a life as your's in danger—

Dr. Bil. My life in danger!

Juan. From that bloody-minded apothecary. I find your son has eloped with his daughter, and he is resolved to be revenged, by assassinating you and your whole family. See, how he looks at you!

Dr. Bil. Ratsbane and arsenic in his countenance!

Juan. (Aside to Thomaso.) Did you ever see such a determined dog? He is resolved to hang you.

Tho. I dare say he has the rope in his pocket. Pray, mollify him.

Dr. Bil. (Aside to Juan.) I faith, I don't half like him. Tell him, I'll forgive him.

Juan. Dismiss your alguazils. [Exeunt Alguazils.] You bind yourselves to stand by my determination?

Dr. Bil. & Tho. We do.

Juan. Then, I believe all parties are satisfied. Appear, appear. (Anna, Carlos, and Isabella, come forward.)

Anna. My dear father!

Tho. Zounds, what is all this?

Enter THERESA, STURMWALD, and GUZMAN.

Stur. A general muster of the whole corps, egad! deserters, and all. You are my prisoner, madam. (To Anna.)

Car. No, sir; not while I can defend her.

Anna (To Stur.) Oh, sir, hear me! the brave are ever generous: do not attempt a life so dear to me.

Stur. Bullets and gunpowder! why, don't you love me, then? I thought you told me, mother-in-law, it was all maiden coyness in her.

The. Stuff and nonsense! Take her, Captain Sturmwald; she is your's. Defend your honour.

Stur. And that my honour may be worth defending, I'll take care it shall not be tarnished by an unjust action. Anna, your mother says you are mine. If so, I dispose of what is mine, thus. (Giving her hand to Carlos.) Come, come, we have by mistake opposed the union of hearts on their march to form a junction, and we are defeated. So much the better: who would wish to conquer in a bad cause? You must consent to unite these turtles. (To Thomaso.)

Tho. Has my wife any objection?

The. I'll have nothing to do with it; so, act as you please.

Tho. Why, then, give me your hand, Doctor, (to Dr. Bilioso.) and here's an end of old quarrels. Take my daughter, young man, (to Carlos.) and you take my niece, (to Juan.) and you (to Sturmwald.) take my wife, if you will. Egad, I am in such a good humour, I could give away anything.

FINALE.

*'Tis joy inspires the vocal lay,
And animates the choral song:
Of love we sing the gentle sway,
May constancy the theme prolong!
Old Time, with joys unceasing,
Shall add to Hymen's store;
Our friendship still increasing,
When youth shall be no more. [Exeunt.]*

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Palace.

Enter OTHMAN and a Slave.

Oth. A stranger, say'st thou, that enquires of Othman?

Slave. He does, and waits admittance.

Oth. Did he tell
His name and quality?

Slave. That he declin'd:
But call'd himself thy friend.

Oth. Where didst thou see him?

Slave. Ev'n now, while twilight clos'd the day,
I spied him

Musing amid the ruins of yon tower
That overhangs the flood.

Oth. What can this mean?

Conduct the stranger to me.

Perhaps some worthy citizen return'd
From voluntary exile to Algiers,
Once known in happier days.

[Exit Slave.]

Enter SADI.

Ah, Sadi here!

My honour'd friend!

Sadi. Stand off; pollute me not:
These honest arms, tho' worn with want, disdain
Thy gorgeous trappings, earn'd by foul dishonour.

Oth. Forbear thy rash reproaches: for beneath
This habit, which to thy mistaken eye
Confirms my guilt, I wear a heart as true
As Sadi's to my king.

Sadi. Why then beneath
This cursed roof, this black usurper's palace,
Dar'st thou to draw infected air, and live

The slave of insolence?

O shame! to dwell

With murder, lust, and rapine! did he not Come from the depths of Barca's solitude,
With fair pretence of faith and firm alliance?
Did not our grateful king, with open arms,
Receive him as his guest? O fatal hour!
Did he not then with hot, adult'rous eye,
Gaze on the Queen Zaphira? yes, 'twas lust,
Lust gave th' infernal whisper to his soul,
And bade him murder, if he would enjoy!
Yet thou, pernicious traitor, unabash'd
Canst wear the murd'rer's badge,

Oth. Mistaken man!

Yet still I love thee:

Still unprovok'd by thy intemperate zeal,
Could passion prompt me to licentious speech,
Bethink thee; might I not reproach thy flight
With the foul names of fear and perfidy?
Didst thou not fly when Barbarossa's sword
Reek'd with the blood of thy brave countrymen?
What then did I? Beneath this hated roof,
In pity to my widow'd queen—

Sadi. In pity?

[me.]

Oth. Yes, Sadi; heav'n is witness, pity sway'd
With honest guile I did inroll my name
In the black list of Barbarossa's friends:
In hope that some propitious hour might rise,
When heav'n would dash the murd'rer from his throne,

And give young Selim to his orphan'd people.

Sadi. Indeed! canst thou be true?

Oth. By heav'n, I am.

Sadi. Why then dissemble thus?

Oth. Have I not told thee?

I held it vain, to stem the tyrant's pow'r,
By the weak efforts of an ill-tim'd rage.

Sadi. I find thee honest: and with pride
Will join thy counsels.
Can aught, my friend, be done?
Can aught be dar'd?

Oth. We groan beneath the scourge.
This very morn, on false pretence of vengeance
For the foul murder of our honour'd king,
Five guiltless wretches perish'd on the rack.

Sadi. O my devoted country! [her.
But say, the widow'd queen; my heart bleeds for

Oth. If pain be life, she lives: but in such woe,
As want and slavery might view with pity,
And bless their happier lot.

Hemm'd round by terrors,
Within this cruel palace, once the seat
Of ev'ry joy, thro' seven long tedious years,
She mourns her murder'd lord, her exil'd son,
Her people fall'n: the murd'rer of her lord,
Returning now from conquest o'er the Moors,
Tempts her to marriage; but, with noble firmness,
Surpassing female, she rejects his vows,
Scorning the horrid union. Meantime, he,
With ceaseless hate, pursues her exil'd son;
Ere this, perhaps, he bleeds. A murd'ring ruffian
Is sent to watch his steps, and plunge the dagger
Into his guiltless breast.

Sadi. Is this thy faith?
Tamely to witness to such deeds of horror!
Give me thy poignard; lead me to the tyrant.
What tho' surrounding guards—

Oth. Repress thy rage.
Thou wilt alarm the palace, wilt involve
Thyself, thy friend, in ruin. Haste thee hence;
Haste to the remnant of our loyal friends,
And let maturer councils rule thy zeal.

Sadi. Yet let us ne'er forget our prince's wrongs.
Remember, Othman, (and let vengeance rise)
How in the pangs of death, and in his gore
Welt'ring, we found our prince!
His royal blood,
The life-blood of his people, o'er the bath
Ran purple! Oh, remember! and revenge!

Oth. Doubt not my zeal. But haste, and seek our friends.

Near to the western port Almanzor dwells,
Yet uneduc'd by Barbarossa's power.
He will disclose to thee, if aught be heard
Of Selim's safety, or (what more I dread)
Of Selim's death. Thence best may our resolves
Be drawn hereafter.

Sadi. I obey thee.
Near to the western port, thou say'st?

Oth. Ev'n there.
Close by the blasted palm-tree, where the mosque
O'erlooks the city. Haste thee hence, my friend.
I would not have thee found within these walls.

(Flourish.)
And hark—these warlike sounds proclaim th' approach
Of the proud Barbarossa, with his train.
Begone.

Sadi. May dire disease and pestilence
Hang o'er his steps! Farewell. Remember, Oth-
man,
Thy queen's, thy prince's, and thy country's wrong.

[Exit Sadi.]
Oth. When I forget them, be contempt my lot!
Yet for the love I bear them, I must wrap
My deep resentments in the specious guise
Of smiles, and fair deportment.

Enter BARBAROSSA, Guards, &c.

Bar. Valiant Othman,
Are those vile slaves impal'd?

Oth. My lord, they are.

Bar. Did not the rack extort confession from them?

Oth. They died obdurate: while the melting
Wept at their groans and anguish. [crowd

Bar. Curse on their womanish hearts!
But why sits that sadness on thy brow,
While joy for my return,
My sword victorious, and the Moors o'erthrown,
Resounds through all my palace?

Oth. Mighty warrior!
The soul, intent on offices of love,
Will oft neglect or scorn the weaker proof
Which smiles or speech can give.

Bar. Well: Be it so.
To guard Algiers from anarchy's misrule
I sway the regal sceptre.
But 'tis strange
That, when with open arms, I would receive
Young Selim, would restore the crown which death
Reft from his father's head, he scorns my bounty,
And proudly kindles war in foreign climes
Against my power, who sav'd his bleeding country.

Enter ALADIN.

Aladin. Brave prince, I bring thee tidings
Of high concernment to Algiers and thee.
Young Selim is no more.

Oth. Selim no more!

Bar. Why that astonishment?
He was our bitterest foe.

Oth. So perish all thy causeless enemies!

Bar. How died the prince, and where?

Aladin. The rumour tells,
That, flying to Oran, he there begg'd succours
From Ferdinand of Spain, t'invade Algiers.

Bar. From Christian dogs!

Oth. How! league with infidels!

Aladin. And there held council with the haughty
Spaniard,

To conquer and dethrone thee; but in vain:
For in a dark encounter with two slaves,
Wherein the one fell by his youthful arm,
Selim at length was slain.

Bar. Ungrateful boy!
Oft have I courted him to meet my kindness,
But still in vain; he shunn'd me like a pestilence:
Nor could I e'er behold him, since the down
Cover'd his manly cheek. How many years
Number'd he?

Oth. I think, scarce thirteen when his father died,
And now some twenty.

Bar. Othman, now for proof
Of undissembled service. Well I know,
Thy long experienc'd faith hath plac'd thee high
In the queen's confidence:

Othman, she must be won.
Plead thou my cause of love:
Make her but mine,
And such reward shall crown thy zeal,
As shall outsoar thy wishes.

Oth. Mighty king,
Where duty bids, I go.

Bar. Then haste thee, Othman,
Ere yet the rumour of her son's decease
Hath reach'd her ear;
Tell her, I come, borne on the wings of love!
Haste, fly, I follow thee. [Exit Othman.]
Now Aladin,

Now fortune bears us to the wish'd-for port.
This was the rock I dreaded. Dost not think
Th' attempt was greatly daring?

Aladin. Bold as needful.
What boot'd it to cut the old serpent off,
While the young adder nested in his place?

Bar. True: Algiers is mine
Without a rival.
Yet I wonder much,
Omar returns not: Omar, whom I sent
On this high trust. I fear, 'tis he hath fall'n.
Didst thou not say two slaves encounter'd Selim?
Aladin. Ay, two; 'tis rumour'd so.

Bar. And that one fell?

Aladin. By Selim's hand; while his companion
Planted his happier steel in Selim's heart.

Bar. Omar, I fear, is fall'n. From my right hand

I gave my signet to the trusty slave;
And bade him send it, as the certain pledge
Of Selim's death, if sickness or captivity
Or wayward fate, should thwart his quick return.

Aladin. The rumour yet is young; perhaps foreruns

The trusty slave's approach.

Bar. We'll wait th' event.
Meantime give out, that now the widow'd queen
Hath dried her tears, prepar'd to crown my love
By marriage rites; spread wide the flatt'ring tale:
For if persuasion win not her consent,
Pow'r shall compel.

This night my will devotes to feast and joy,
For conquest o'er the Moor. Hence, Aladin;
And see the night-watch close the palace round.

[Exit Aladin.]

Now to the queen. My heart expands with hope.
Let high ambition flourish; in Selim's blood
Its root is struck: from this, the rising stem
Proudly shall branch o'er Afric's continent,
And stretch from shore to shore.

Enter IRENE.

My wayward daughter; still will thy folly thwart
Each purpose of my soul? When pleasures spring
Beneath our feet, thou spurn'st the proffer'd boon
To dwell with sorrow. Why these sullen tears?

Irene. Let not these tears offend my father's eye;
They are the tears of pity. From the queen
I come, thy suppliant.

Bar. What would'st thou urge?

Irene. Thy dread return from war,
And proffer'd love, have open'd ev'ry wound
The soft and lenient hand of time had clos'd.
If ever gentle pity touch'd thy heart,
Urge not thy command

To see her; her distracted soul is bent
To mourn in solitude. She asks no more.

Bar. She mocks my love. How many tedious years

Have I endur'd her coyness! Had not war,
And great ambition, call'd me from Algiers
Ere this my pow'r had reach'd what she denies.
But there's a cause which touches on my peace,
And bids me brook no more her false delays.

Irene. Oh, frown not thus!
But look more kindly on me,
Let thy consenting pity mix with mine,
And heal the woes of weeping majesty.
Unhappy queen!

Bar. What means that gushing tear?

Irene. Oh never shall Irene taste of peace,
While poor Zaphira mourns.

Bar. Is this my child?
Perverse and stubborn! as thou lov'st thy peace,
Dry up thy tears. What! damp the general
triumph,

That echoes through Algiers! which now shall
The vaulted heav'n, as soon as fame shall spread
Young Selim's death, my empire's bitt' rest foe.

Irene. O generous Selim! (Weeps.)

Bar. Ah! there's more in this.
Tell me, Irene, on thy duty tell me,
Why, at this detested name of Selim,
Afresh thy sorrow streams?

Irene. Yes, I will tell thee,
For he is gone, and dreads thy hate no more;
My father knows, that scarce five moons are past
Since the Moors seiz'd, and sold me at Oran,
A hopeless captive in a foreign clime.

Bar. Too well I know, and rue the fatal day.
But what of this?

Irene. Oft have I told thee,

How, midst the throng, a youth appear'd: his eye
Bright as the morning star.

Bar. And was it Selim?

Did he redeem thee?

Irene. With unsparing hand
He paid th' allotted ransom; at his feet I wept,
Dissolv'd in tears of gratitude and joy.
But when I told my quality and birth,
He started at the name of Barbarossa;

Yet with recovery mild,
"Go to Algiers," he cried; "protect my mother,
And be to her what Selim is to thee."

Ev'n such, my father, was the gen'rous youth,
Who, by the hands of bloody, bloody men,
Lies number'd with the dead.

Bar. Amazement chills me!
Was this thy unknown friend conceal'd from me?
False, faithless child!

Irene. Could gratitude do less?
He said thy wrath pursu'd him; thence conjur'd me
Not to reveal his name.

Bar. Thou treacherous maid!
To stoop to freedom from thy father's foe!

Irene. Alas! my father,
He never was thy foe.

Bar. What! plead for Selim!
O, coward! trait'ress to thy father's glory!
Thou should'st have liv'd a slave, been sold to shame,
Been banish'd to the depths of howling deserts,
Been aught but what thou art, rather than blot
A father's honour by a deed so vile.
Hence from my sight! hence, thou unthankful child!
Beware thee; shun the queen: nor taint her ear
With Selim's fate. Yes, she shall crown my love;
Or, by our prophet! she shall dread my pow'r.

[Exit.]

Irene. Unhappy queen!
To what new scenes of horror art thou doom'd!
She but entreats to die
In her dear father's tent; thither, good queen,
My care shall speed thee, while suspicion sleeps.
What tho' my frowning father pour his rage
On my defenceless head; yet innocence
Shall yield her firm support, and conscious virtue
Gild all my days. Could I but save Zaphira,
Let the storm beat; I'll weep and pray till she,
And heav'n, forget my father e'er was cruel. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Another Apartment.

ZAPHIRA discovered.

Zaph. When shall I be at peace? O, righteous
heav'n,
Strengthen my fainting soul, which fain would rise
To confidence in thee! but woes on woes
O'erwhelm me! first my husband, now my son!
Both dead! both slaughter'd by the bloody hand
Of Barbarossa! what infernal power
Unchain'd thee from thy native depth of hell
To stalk the earth with thy destructive train,
Murder and lust, to wake domestic peace
And every heart-felt joy!

Enter OTHMAN.

O faithful Othman!
Our fears were true;—my Selim is no more!
Oth. Has then the fatal secret reach'd thine ear?
Inhuman tyrant!

Zaph. Strike him, heav'n, with thunder!
Nor let Zaphira doubt thy providence. [high will,]

Oth. 'Twas what we fear'd. Oppose not heav'n's
Nor struggle with the ten-fold chain of fate
That links thee to thy woes. Oh, rather yield,
And wait the happier hour, when innocence
Shall weep no more. Rest in that pleasing hope,
And yield thyself to heaven, my honour'd queen,
The king—

Zaph. Whom styl'st thou king?

Oth. 'Tis Barbarossa.

Zaph. Does he assume the name of king?

Oth. He does.

Zaph. O title vilely purchas'd! by the blood
Of innocence! by treachery and murder! [him;
May heav'n, incens'd, pour down its vengeance on Blast all his joys, and turn them into horror,
Till phrensy rise, and bid him curse the hour
That gave his crimes their birth! My faithful Oth-

man,
My sole surviving prop! can'st thou devise
No secret means, by which I may escape
This hated palace? With undaunted step
I'd roam the waste, to reach my father's vales
Of dear Mutija. Can no means be found
To fly these black'ning horrors that surround me?

Oth. That hope is vain; the tyrant knows thy hate.

Hence, day and night, his guards environ thee.
Rouse not then his anger;
Let soft persuasion and mild eloquence
Redeem that liberty, which stern rebuke
Would rob thee of for ever.

Zaph. An injur'd queen
To kneel for liberty! and, oh! to whom?
Ev'n to the murd'rer of her lord and son!
O, perish first, Zaphira! yes, I'll die;
For what is life to me? my dear, dear, lord!
My hapless child!—yes, I will follow you.

Oth. Wilt thou not see him, then?

Zaph. I will not, Othman;
Or if I do, with better imprecation,
More keen than poison shot from serpents' tongues
I'll pour my curses on him!

Oth. Will Zaphira
Thus meanly sink in woman's fruitless rage,
When she should wake revenge?

Zaph. Revenge?—O tell me—
Tell me but how? what can a helpless woman?

Oth. Gain but the tyrant's leave, and reach thy father:

Pour thy complaints before him: let thy wrongs
Kindle his indignation, to pursue:
This vile usurper, till unceasing war
Blast his ill-gotten pow'r.

Zaph. Ah! say'st thou, Othman?
Thy words have shot like lightning thro' my frame;
And all my soul's on fire!—Thou faithful friend!
Yes, with more gentle speech I'll soothe his pride;
Regain my freedom; reach my father's tents;
There paint my countless woes. His kindling rage
Shall wake the yallies into honest vengeance:
The sudden storm shall pour on Barbarossa,
And ev'ry glowing warrior steep his shaft
In deadlier poison, to revenge my wrongs.

Oth. There spoke the queen. But as thou lov'st thy freedom,
Touch not on Selim's death. Thy soul will kindle,
And passion mount in flames that will consume thee.

Zaph. My murdered son!—Yes, to revenge thy death,
I'll speak a language which my heart disdains.

Oth. Peace, peace! the tyrant comes: Now, in-jur'd queen,
Plead for thy freedom, hope for just revenge,
And check each rising passion. [Exit.

Enter BARBAROSSA.

Bar. Hail, sovereign fair! in whom
Beauty and majesty conspire to charm!
Behold the conqu'ror.

Zaph. O Barbarossa!
No more the pride of conquest e'er can charm
My widow'd heart! With my departed lord
My love lies bury'd!
Then turn thee to some happier fair, whose heart
May crown thy growing love with love sincere;
For I have none to give.

Bar. Love ne'er should die:

'Tis the soul's cordial; 'tis the fount of life;
Therefore should spring eternal in the breast:
One object lost, another should succeed,
And all our life be love. [equal hope

Zaph. Urge me no more:—Thou might'st with Woo the cold marble, weeping o'er a tomb,
To meet thy wishes! But if gen'rous love
Dwell in thy breast, vouchsafe me proof sincere:
Give me safe convoy to the native vales
Of dear Mutija, where my father reigns.

Bar. Oh, blind to proffer'd bliss! what, fondly quit
This pomp
Of empire, for an Arab's wand'ring tent!
Where the mock chieftain leads his vagrant tribes
From plain to plain, and faintly shadows out
The majesty of kings!—Far other joys
Here shall attend thy call.
Submissive realms
Shall bow the neck; and swarthy kings and queens,
From the far distant Niger and the Nile,
Drawn captive at my conqu'ring chariot wheels,
Shall kneel before thee.

Zaph. Pomp and pow'r are toys,
Which ev'n the mind at ease may well disdain;
But, ah! what mockery is the tinsel pride
Of splendour, when the mind
Lies desolate within!—Such, such, is mine!
O'erwhelm'd with ills, and dead to every joy:
Envy me not this last request, to die
In my dear father's tents!

Bar. Thy suit is vain—

Zaph. Thus kneeling at thy feet,—

Bar. Thou thankless fair!

Thus to repay the labours of my love,
Had I not seiz'd the throne when Selim died,
Ere this, thy foes had laid Algiers in ruin:
I check'd the warring pow'rs, and gave you peace.
Make thee but mine,
I will descend the throne, and call thy son
From banishment to empire.

Zaph. Oh, my heart!
Can I bear this?—
Inhuman tyrant! Curses on thy head!
May dire remorse and anguish haunt thy throne,
And gender in thy bosom fell despair!
Despair as deep as mine!

Bar. What means Zaphira?
What means this burst of grief?

Zaph. Thou fell destroyer!
Had not guilt steel'd thy heart, awak'ning conscience
Would flash conviction on thee, and each look,
Shot from these eyes, be arm'd with serpent horrors,
To turn thee into stones!—Relentless man!
Who did the bloody deed? Oh, tremble, guilt,
Where'er thou art!—Look on me; tell me, tyrant!
Who slew my blameless son?

Bar. What envious tongue
Hath dar'd to taint my name with slander?
Thy Selim lives: Nay, more, he soon shall reign,
If thou consent to bless me.

Zaph. Never! Oh, never—Sooner would I roam
An unknown exile through the torrid climes
Of Africk, sooner dwell with wolves and tigers,
Than mount with thee my murder'd Selim's throne!

Bar. Rash queen, forbear! think on thy captive state;

Remember, that within these palace walls
I am omnipotent:—Yield thee then:
Avert the gath'ring horrors that surround thee,
And dread my pow'r incens'd. [ear

Zaph. Dares thy licentious tongue pollute mine
With that foul menace!—Tyrant! Dread'st thou not
Th' all seeing eye of heav'n, its lifted thunder,
And all the redd'ning vengeance which it stores
For crimes like thine?—Yet know, Zaphira scorns
thee.

Tho' robb'd by thee of every dear support,
No tyrant's threat can awe the free born soul,
That greatly dares to die. [Exit,

Bar. Where should she learn the tale of Selim's death?
 Could Othman dare to tell it? If he did,
 My rage shall sweep him, swifter than the whirlwind,
 To instant death!

Enter ALADIN.

O Aladin!
 Timely thou com'st, to ease my lab'ring thought,
 That swells with indignation and despair.
 This stubborn woman—

Aladin. What, unconquer'd still?

Bar. The news of Selim's fate hath reach'd her ear.
 Whence could this come?

Aladin. I can resolve the doubt.
 A female slave, attendant on Zaphira,
 O'erheard the messenger who brought the tale,
 And gave it to her ear.

Bar. Perdition seize her!
 Nor threats can move, nor promise now allure
 Her haughty soul: Nay, she defies my pow'r;
 And talks of death, as if her female form
 Inshrin'd some hero's spirit.

Aladin. Let her rage foam.
 I bring thee tidings that will ease thy pain.

Bar. Say'st thou?—Speak on. O give me quick relief!

Aladin. The gallant youth is come, who slew her

Bar. Who, Omar?

Aladin. No; unhappy Omar fell
 By Selim's hand. But Achmet, whom he join'd
 His brave associate, so the youth bids tell thee,
 Reveng'd his death by Selim's.

Bar. Gallant youth!
 Bears he the signet?

Aladin. Ay.

Bar. That speaks him true. Conduct him, Aladin.

[Exit Aladin.]

This is beyond my hope. The secret pledge
 Restor'd, prevents suspicion of the deed,
 While it confirms it done.

Enter SELIM disguised as Achmet, and ALADIN.

Selim. Hail, mighty Barbarossa! As the pledge

[Kneels.]

Of Selim's death, behold thy ring restor'd:—
 That pledge will speak the rest.

Bar. Rise, valiant youth;
 But first, no more a slave—I give thee freedom.
 Thou art the youth, whom Omar (now no more)
 Join'd his companion in this brave attempt?

Selim. I am.

Bar. Then tell me how you sped. Where found ye
 That insolent?

Selim. We found him at Oran,
 Plotting deep mischief to thy throne and people.

Bar. Well ye repaid the traitor.

Selim. As we ought.

While night drew on, we leapt upon our prey.
 Full at his heart brave Omar aim'd the poignard,
 Which Selim shunning, wrench'd it from his hand,
 Then plung'd it in his breast. I hasted on,
 Too late to save, yet I reveng'd my friend:
 My thirsty dagger with repeated blows
 Search'd every artery: They fell together,
 Gasping in folds of mortal enmity:
 And thus in frowns expired.

Bar. Well hast thou sped:
 The dagger did its office, faithful Achmet!
 And high reward shall wait thee.—One thing more—
 Be the thought fortunate! Go, seek the queen.
 For know, the rumour of her Selim's death
 Hath reach'd her ear: Hence dark suspicions rise,
 Glancing at me. Go, tell her, that thou saw'st
 Her son expire; that with his dying breath,
 He did conjure her to receive my vows,
 And give her country peace.

Enter OTHMAN.

Most welcome Othman,

Behold this gallant stranger. He hath done
 The state good service. Let some high reward
 Await him, such as may o'erpay his zeal.
 Conduct him to the queen; for he hath news,
 Worthy her ear, from her departed son,
 Such as may win her love. Come, Aladin;
 The banquet waits our presence; festal joy
 Laughs in the mantling goblet; and the night,
 Illumin'd by the taper's dazzling beam,
 Rivals departed day.

[Exeunt Barbarossa and Aladin.]

Selim. What anxious thought
 Rolls in thine eye, and heaves thy lab'ring breast?
 Why join'st thou not the loud excess of joy
 That riots thro' the palace?

Oth. Dar'st thou tell me
 On what dark errand thou art here?

Selim. I dare.
 Dost thou not perceive the savage lines of blood
 Deform my visage? Read'st not in my eye
 Remorseless fury?—I am Selim's murd'rer.

Oth. Selim's murd'rer!

Selim. Start not from me.
 My dagger thirsts not but for regal blood—
 Why this amazement?

Oth. Amazement! No; 'tis well: 'tis as it should
 He was indeed a foe to Barbarossa.

Selim. And therefore to Algiers:—Was it not so?
 Why dost thou pause: What passion shakes thy frame?

Oth. Fate, do thy worst! I can no more dis-
 Can I unmov'd behold the murd'ring ruffian,
 Smear'd with my prince's blood! Go, tell the tyrant,
 Othman defies his pow'r; that, tir'd with life,
 He dares his bloody hand, and pleads to die.

Selim. What, didst thou love this Selim?

Oth. All men lov'd him.
 He was of such unmix'd and blameless quality,
 That envy, at his praise stood mute, nor dar'd
 To sully his fair name. Remorseless tyrant!

Selim. I do commend thy faith. And since thou lov'st him,

I'll whisper to thee, that with honest guile
 I have deceiv'd this tyrant Barbarossa.
 Selim is yet alive.

Oth. Alive!

Selim. Nay, more—
 Selim is in Algiers.

Oth. Impossible! [straight.]

Selim. Nay, if thou doubt'st, I'll bring him hither,
Oth. Not for an empire!

Thou might'st as well bring the devoted lamb
 Into the tiger's den.

Selim. But I'll bring him
 Hid in such deep disguise, as shall deride
 Suspicion, tho' she wear the lynx's eyes.
 Not even thyself could'st know him.

Oth. Yes, sure: too sure to hazard such an awful trial.

Selim. Yet seven revolving years, worn out
 In tedious exile, may have wrought such change
 Of voice and feature, in the state of youth,
 As might elude thine eye.

Oth. No time can blot
 The mem'ry of his sweet majestic mien,
 The lustre of his eye! besides, he wears
 A mark indelible, a beauteous scar,
 Made on his forehead by a furious pard,
 Which, rushing on his mother, Selim slew.

Selim. A scar!

Oth. Ay, on his forehead.

Selim. What, like this? (Lifting his turban.)

Oth. Whom do I see? am I awake? my prince
(Kneels.)

My honour'd, honour'd king.

Selim. Rise, faithful Othman:
 Thus let me thank thy truth! (Embraces him.)

Oth. O happy hour!

Selim. Why dost thou tremble thus? Why grasp my hand?

And why that ardent gaze? Thou can'st not doubt me?

Oth. Ah, no! I see thy sire in ev'ry line.

How did my prince escape the murd'rer's hand?

Selim. I wrench'd the dagger from him; and gave back

That death he meant to bring. The ruffian wore The tyrant's signet: "Take this ring," he cried, "The sole return my dying hand can make thee For its accurst attempt; this pledge restor'd, Will prove thee slain: Safe may'st thou see Algiers, Unknown to all." This said, th' assassin died.

Oth. But how to gain admittance, thus unknown?

Selim. Disguis'd as Selim's murderer I come: Th' accomplice of the deed: the ring restor'd, Gain'd credence to my words.

Oth. Yet ere thou cam'st, thy death was rumour'd here. [ther;

Selim. I spread the flatt'ring tale, and sent it hi- That babbling rumour, like a lying dream, Might make belief more easy. Tell me, Othman, And yet I tremble to approach the theme, How fares my mother? does she still retain Her native greatness?

Oth. Still:—in vain the tyrant Tempts her to marriage, tho' with impious threats Of death or violation.

Selim. May kind heav'n Strengthen her virtue, and by me reward it! When shall I see her, Othman?

Oth. Yet, my prince, I tremble for thy presence.

Selim. Let not fear Sully thy virtue: 'tis the lot of guilt To tremble. What hath innocence to do with fear?

Oth. Still my heart Forebodes some dire event: O, quit these walls!

Selim. Not till a deed be done, which ev'ry tyrant Shall tremble when he hears.

Oth. What means my prince?

Selim. To take just vengeance for a father's blood, A mother's sufferings, and a people's groans.

Oth. Alas, my prince! thy single arm is weak To combat multitudes.

Selim. Therefore, I come, Clad in this murd'rer's guise—Ere morning shines, This, Othman, this! shall drink the tyrant's blood. (Shews a dagger.)

Oth. Heav'n shield thy life! Let caution rule Thy zeal!

Selim. Nay, think not that I come Blindly impell'd by fury or despair; For I have seen our friends, and parted now From Sadi and Almanzor.

Oth. Say, what hope? My soul is all attention.

Selim. Mark me, then; A chosen band of citizens this night Will storm the palace: while the glutt'd troops Lie drench'd in surfeit, the confed'rate city, Bold thro' despair, have sworn to break their chain By one wide slaughter. I, meantime, have gain'd The palace, and will wait th' appointed hour, To guard Zaphira from the tyrant's rage Amid the deathful uproar.

Oth. Heav'n protect thee!

Tis dreadful! What's the hour?

Selim. I left our friends In secret council. Ere the dead of night, Brave Sadi will report their last resolves. Now lead me to the queen.

Oth. Brave prince, beware! Her joy's or fear's excess would sure betray thee. Thou shalt not see her till the tyrant perish.

Selim. I must. I feel some secret impulse urge me.

Who knows that 'tis not the last parting interview We ever shall obtain?

Oth. Then, on thy life, Do not reveal thyself. Assume the name Of Selim's friend; sent to confirm her virtue, And warn her that he lives.

Selim. It shall be so. I yield me to thy will.

Oth. Thou greatly daring youth! May angels watch,

And guard thy upright purpose! That Algiers May reap the blessings of a virtuous reign, And all thy godlike father shine in thee!

Selim. Oh! thou hast rous'd a thought, on which revenge

Mounts with redoubled fire! Yes, here, even here, Beneath this very roof, my honour'd father Shed round his blessings, till accursed treach'ry Stole on his peaceful hour. O, blessed shade!

(Kneels.)

If yet thou hover'st o'er thy once lov'd clime, Now aid me to redress thy bleeding wrongs! Infuse thy mighty spirit into my breast, Thy firm and dauntless fortitude, unaw'd By peril, pain, or death! that, undismay'd, I may pursue the just intent, and dare Or bravely to revenge, or bravely die. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter IRENE.

Irene. Can air-drawn visions mock the waking Sure, 'twas his image! [eye?

This way, sure he mov'd.

But, oh! how chang'd! he wears no gentle smiles, But terror in his frown. He comes! 'tis he; For Othman points him thither, and departs. Disguis'd, he seeks the queen; secure, perhaps, And heedless of the ruin that surrounds him.

O, generous Selim! can I see thee thus; And not forewarn such virtue of its fate? Forbid it gratitude!

Enter SELIM.

Selim. Be still, ye sighs! Ye struggling tears of filial love, be still. Down, down, fond heart!

Irene. Why, stranger, dost thou wander here?

Selim. Oh, ruin! (Shunning her.)

Irene. Bless'd is Irene! blest if Selim lives!

Selim. Am I betray'd?

Irene. Betray'd to whom? to her [thee! Whose grateful heart would rush on death to save Selim. It was my hope That time had veil'd all semblance of my youth. Am I then known?

Irene. To none, but love and me. To me, who late beheld thee at Oran; Who saw thee here, beset with unseen peril, And flew to save the guardian of my honour.

Selim. Thou sum of ev'ry worth! thou heav'n of sweetness!

How could I pour forth all my soul before thee, In vows of endless truth! it must not be: This is my destin'd goal! the mansion drear, Where grief and anguish dwell; where bitter tears, And sighs and lamentations choke the voice, And quench the flame of love.

Irene. Yet, virtuous prince, Though love be silent, gratitude may speak. Hear, then, her voice, which warns thee from these walls.

Mine be the grateful task, to tell the queen, Her Selim lives. Ruin and death inclose thee. O, speed thee hence, while yet destruction sleeps.

Selim. Would it were possible!

Irene. What can prevent it?

Selim. Justice; fate, and justice: A murder'd father's wrongs!

Irene. Justice, said'st thou?

That word hath struck me, like a peal of thunder!
Thine eye, which wont to melt with gentle love,
Now glares with terror; thy approach by night,
Thy dark disguise, thy looks and fierce demeanour,
Yes, all conspire to tell me, I am lost.
Ah! prince, take heed! I have a father too!
Think, Selim, what Irene must endure,
Should she be guilty of a father's blood!

Selim. Come on, then. Lead me to him. Glut thine eye
With Selim's blood.

Irene. Was e'er distress like mine?
O, Selim! can I see my father perish?
Heav'n will ordain some gentler, happier means,
To heal thy woes. Thy dark attempt is big
With horror and destruction. Generous prince!
Resign thy dreadful purpose, and depart.

Selim. May not I see Zaphira, ere I go?
Thy gentle pity will not, sure, deny us
The mournful pleasure of a parting tear? [walls,

Irene. Go, then, and give her peace. But fly these
As soon as morning shines: else, though despair
Drives me to madness; yet, to save a father—
O, Selim! spare my tongue the horrid sentence.
Fly, ere destruction seize thee! [Exit.

Selim. Death and ruin!
Must I then fly? What! coward-like, betray
My father, mother, friends? Vain terrors, hence!
Danger looks big to fear's deluded eye:
But, courage, on the heights and steepes of fate,
Dares snatch her glorious purpose from the edge
Of peril. Now to the queen.
How shall I dare to meet her thus unknown?
How stifle the warm transports of my heart,
That pants at her approach? Who waits the queen?
Who waits Zaphira?

Enter SEMIRA.

Selim. Tell the queen, I come
On message from her dear, departed son;
And bring his last request. [Exit Semira.
O, ill-dissembling heart! my ev'ry limb
Trembles with grateful terror.
Some look, or starting tear,
Will sure betray me. Honest guile, assist
My falt'ring tongue!

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Zaph. Where is this pious stranger?
Say, generous youth, whose pity leads thee thus
To seek the weeping mansions of distress,
Didst thou behold in death my hapless son?
Did he remember me?

Selim. Most honour'd queen!
Thy son—forgive these gushing tears that flow
To see distress like thine.

Zaph. I thank thy pity.
'Tis generous thus to feel for others' woe.
What of my son? say, didst thou see him die?

Selim. By Barbarossa's dread command I come,
To tell thee that these eyes alone beheld
Thy son expire.

Zaph. Relentless fate! that I should be denied
The mournful privilege to see him die!
To clasp him in the agony of death,
And catch his parting soul. Oh! tell me all,
All that he said and look'd; deep in my heart,
That I may treasure ev'ry parting word,
Each dying whisper of my dear, dear son!

Selim. Let not my words offend. What if he said,
Go, tell my hapless mother, that her tears
Have stream'd too long: then bid her weep no more:
Bid her forget the husband and the son,
In Barbarossa's arms?

Zaph. O basely false!
Thou art some creeping slave to Barbarossa,
Sent to surprise my unsuspecting heart!
Vile slave, begone! my son betray me thus!
Could he have e'er conceiv'd so base a purpose,

My griefs for him should end in great disdain.
But he was brave, and scorn'd a thought so vile.
Wretched Zaphira! how art thou become
The sport of slaves!

[woes
Selim. Yet hope for peace, unhappy queen! thy May yet have end.

Zaph. Why weep'st thou, crocodile?
Thy treacherous tears are vain.

Selim. My tears are honest.
I am not what thou think'st.

Zaph. What art thou then? [Selim's

Selim. Oh, my full heart! I am thy friend, and
I come not to insult, but heal thy woes: [thee,
Now check thy heart's wild tumult, while I tell
Perhaps, thy son yet lives.

Zaph. Lives! Oh, gracious heaven!
Do I not dream? Say, stranger, didst thou tell me,
Perhaps my Selim lives? What do I ask?

Wild, wild and fruitless hope! What mortal pow'r
Can e'er reanimate his mangled corse,
Shoot life into the cold and silent tomb,
Or bid the ruthless grave give up its dead?

Selim. O, pow'rful nature! thou wilt sure betray me! [Aside.)

Thy Selim lives: for since his rumour'd death,
I saw him at Oran.

Zaph. O, generous youth! who art thou?

Selim. A friendless youth, self-banish'd with thy son;

Long his companion in distress and danger:
One who rever'd thy worth in prosp'rous days,
And more reveres thy virtue in distress.

Zaph. O, gentle stranger! mock not my woes,
But tell me truly, does my Selim live?

Selim. He does, by heav'n! [pay'st

Zaph. O, generous heav'n! thou, at length, o'er-
My bitterest pangs, if my dear Selim lives.
And does he still remember

His father's wrongs, and mine?

Selim. He bade me tell thee,
That in his heart indelibly are stamp'd
His father's wrongs, and thine: that he but waits
Till awful justice may unsheath her sword.
That, till the arrival of that happy hour,
Deep in his soul the hidden fire shall glow,
And his breast labour with the great revenge.

Zaph. Eternal blessings crown my virtuous son!

Selim. Much honour'd queen, farewell!

Zaph. Not yet, not yet; indulge a mother's love.
In thee, the kind companion of his griefs,
Methinks I see my Selim stand before me.
Depart not yet. A thousand fond requests
Crowd on my mind. Wishes, and pray'rs, and tears,
Are all I have to give. O, bear him these!

Selim. Take comfort then; for, know, thy son, o'erjoy'd

To rescue thee, would bleed at ev'ry vein.

"Bid her," he said, "yet hope we may be bless'd.

Bid her remember that the ways of heav'n,
Though dark, are just: that oft some guardian pow'r
Attends, unseen, to save the innocent.

But if high heaven decrees our fall, oh! bid her
Firmly to wait the stroke, prepar'd alike
To live or die." And then he wept as I do.

Zaph. O, righteous heaven!

Protect his tender years!

Be thou his guide through dangers and distress;

Soften the rigours of his cruel exile,

And lead him to his throne! [Exit.

Selim. Now, swelling heart,

Indulge the luxury of grief; flow tears;

And rain down transports in the shape of sorrow.

Yes, I have sooth'd her woes; have found her noble;

And, to have giv'n this respite to her pangs,

O'erpays all pain and peril. Pow'rful virtue!

How infinite thy joys, when even thy griefs

Are pleasing! thou, superior to the frowns

Of fate, canst pour thy sunshine o'er the soul,

And brighten woe to rapture.

Enter OTHMAN and SADI.

Honour'd friends!

How goes the night?

Sadi. 'Tis well nigh midnight.

Oth. What! in tears, my prince?

Selim. But tears of joy: for I have seen Zaphira,
And pour'd the balm of peace into her breast:
Think not these tears unnerve me, valiant friends;
They have but harmoniz'd my soul; and wak'd
All that is man within me, to disdain
Peril or death. What tidings from the city?

Sadi. All, all is ready. Our confed'rate friends
Burn with impatience till the hour arrive.

Selim. What is the signal of th' appointed hour?

Sadi. The midnight watch gives signal of our meeting:

And when the second watch of night is rung,
The work of death begins.

Selim. Speed, speed, ye minutes!

Now let the rising whirlwind shake Algiers,
And justice guide the storm.

Let your zeal hasten on the great event:
The tyrant's daughter found, and knew me here,
And half suspects the cause.

Oth. Too daring prince,
Retire with us; her fears will sure betray thee.

Selim. What! leave my helpless mother here a prey
To cruelty and lust? I'll perish first!
This very night the tyrant threatens violence;
I'll watch his steps; I'll haunt him through the palace;

And, should he meditate a deed so vile,
I'll hover o'er him like an unseen pestilence,
And blast him in his guilt!

Sadi. Intrepid prince!

Worthy of empire! Yet accept my life,
My worthless life; do thou retire with Othman;
I will protect Zaphira.

Selim. Think'st thou, Sadi,
That when the trying hour of peril comes,
Selim will shrink into a common man?
Worthless were he to rule who dares not claim
Pre-eminence in danger. Urge no more:
Here shall my station be; and if I fall,
O, friends, let me have vengeance! Tell me now,
Where is the tyrant?

Oth. Revelling at the banquet.

Selim. 'Tis good. Now tell me how our pow'rs are destin'd?

Sadi. Near ev'ry port a secret band is posted;
By these the watchful centinels must perish;
The rest is easy; for the glutt'd troops
Lie drown'd in sleep; the dagger's cheapest prey.
Almanzor with his friends, will circle round
The avenues of the palace. Othman and I
Will join our brave confederates (all sworn To conquer or to die,) and burst the gates
Of this foul den. Then tremble, Barbarossa.

Selim. Oh! how the approach of this great hour
Fires all my soul; but, valiant friends, I charge you,
Reserve the murd'rer to my just revenge;
My poignard claims his blood.

Oth. Forgive me, prince;

Forgive my doubts; think, should the fair Irene—Selim. Thy doubts are vain. I would not spare the tyrant,

Though the sweet maid lay weeping at my feet;
Nay, should he fall by any hand but mine,
By heav'n! I'd think my honour'd father's blood
Scarce half reveng'd: my love, indeed, is strong;
But love shall yield to justice.

Sadi. Gallant prince!

Bravely resolv'd.

Selim. But is the city quiet? [streets,

Sadi. All, all is hush'd. Throughout the empty
Nor voice, nor sound; as if the inhabitants,
Like the presaging herds, that seek the covert
Ere the loud thunder rolls, had inly felt
And shunn'd th' impending uproar.

Oth. There is a solemn horror in the night, too,
That pleases me; a general pause through nature;
The winds are hush'd—

Sadi. And as I pass'd the beach,
The lazy billow scarce could lash the shore;
No star peeps through the firmament of heav'n—

Selim. And, lo! where eastward, o'er the sullen wave,

The waning moon, depriv'd of half her orb,
Rises in blood; her beam, well nigh extinct
Faintly contends with darkness— (Bell tolls.)
Hark!—what meant

That tolling bell?

Oth. It sounds the midnight watch.

Sadi. This was the signal—

Come, Othman, we are call'd; the passing minutes
Chide our delay; brave Othman, let us hence.

Selim. One last embrace!—nor doubt, but crown'd with glory,

We soon shall meet again. But, oh, remember—
Amid the tumult's rage, remember mercy;
Stain not a righteous cause with guiltless blood;
Warn our brave friends, that we unsheath the sword,

Not to destroy, but save—nor let blind zeal,
Or wanton cruelty, e'er turn its edge
On age or innocence; or bid us strike
Where the most pitying angel in the skies,
That now looks on us from his bless'd abode,
Would wish that we should spare.

Oth. So may we prosper,
As mercy shall direct us!

Selim. Farewell, friends!

Sadi. Intrepid prince, farewell!

[Exeunt Othman and Sadi.]

Selim. Now sleep and silence
Brood o'er the city.—The devoted centinel
Now takes his lonely stand, and idly dreams
Of that to-morrow he shall never see.
In this dread interval, O busy thought,
From outward things descend into thyself—
Search deep my heart; bring with thee awful conscience,

And firm resolve; that, in th' approaching hour
Of blood and horror, I may stand unmov'd;
Nor fear to strike where justice calls, nor dare
To strike where she forbids.
Witness, ye pow'rs of heav'n,
That not from you, but from the murd'rer's eye,
I wrap myself in night.—To you I stand
Reveal'd in noon-tide day.—Oh, could I arm
My hand with power! then, like to you, array'd
In storm and fire, my swift-avenging thunder
Should blast this tyrant. But since fate denies That privilege, I'll seize on what it gives;
Like the deep-cavern'd earthquake, burst beneath
him,

And whelm his throne, his empire, and himself,
In one prodigious ruin. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the palace.

Enter IRENE and ALADIN.

Irene. But didst thou tell him, Aladin, my fears
Brook no delay.

Aladin. I did.

Irene. Why comes he not?

Oh, what a dreadful dream!—'tis surely more
Than troubled fancy; never was my soul
Shook with such hideous phantoms. Still he lingers!
Return, return; and tell him, that his daughter
Dies, till she warn him of his threat'ning ruin.

Aladin. Behold, he comes. [Exit.]

Enter BARBAROSSA and Guards.

Bar. Thou bane of all my joys!
Some gloomy planet surely rul'd thy birth.
Ev'n now thy ill-tim'd fear suspends the banquet,
And damps the festal hour.

Irene. Forgive my fear. [thy brain?

Bar. What fear, what phantom hath possess'd

Irene. Oh, guard thee from the terrors of this
For terrors lurk unseen. [night;

Bar. What terror? speak.

Say what thou dread'st, and why! I have a soul
To meet the blackest dangers undismay'd.

Irene. Let not my father check, with stern rebuke,

The warning voice of nature. For ev'n now,
Retir'd to rest, soon as I clos'd mine eyes,
A horrid vision rose—methought I saw
Young Selim rising from the silent tomb:
Dreadful he shook a dagger in his hand.
By some mysterious pow'r he rose in air;
When, lo! at his command, this yawning roof
Was cleft in twain, and gave the phantom entrance.
Swift he descended with terrific brow,
Rush'd on my guardless father at the banquet,
And plung'd his furious dagger in thy breast.

Bar. Wouldst thou appal me by a brain-sick
Get thee to rest. [vision?

Irene. Yet hear me, dearest father.

Bar. Provoke me not.

Irene. Merciful heav'n, instruct me what to do!

Enter ALADIN.

Bar. What means thy looks? why dost thou gaze so wildly?

Aladin. I hasted to inform thee, that ev'n now,
Rounding the watch, I met the brave Abdalla,
Breathless with tidings of a rumour dark,
That young Selim is yet alive.

Bar. May plagues consume the tongue
That broach'd the falsehood! 'tis not possible—
What did he tell thee further?

Aladin. More he said not:
Save only, that the spreading rumour wak'd
A spirit of revolt.

Irene. O gracious father! [fears

Bar. The rumour's false, and yet, your coward
Infect me—what! shall I be terrified
By midnight visions? I'll not believe it.

Aladin. But this gathering rumour—
Think but on that, my lord.

Bar. Infernal darkness
Swallow the slave that rais'd it!—hark thee, Aladin
See that the watch be doubled;
Find out this stranger, Achmet; and forthwith
Let him be brought before me. [Exeunt two Guards.

Irene. O my father!

I do conjure thee, as thou lov'st thy life,
Retire, and trust thee to thy faithful guards—
See not this Achmet. [fore me;

Bar. Not see him! Forthwith bring the slave be-
If he prove false, if hated Selim live,
I'll heap such vengeance on him—

Irene. Mercy! mercy!

Bar. Mercy! to whom?

Irene. To me; and to thyself;
To him—to all.—Thou think'st I rave; yet true
My visions are, as ever prophet utter'd
When heaven inspires his tongue. [with dreams

Bar. Ne'er did the moon-struck madman rave
More wild than thine. Get thee to rest; ere yet
Thy folly wakes my rage. Call Achmet hither.

Irene. Thus prostrate on my knees:—O see him not,

Selim is dead: indeed the rumour's false,
There is no danger near; Or, if there be,
Achmet is innocent.

Bar. Off, frantic wretch!

This idiot dream hath turn'd her brain to madness.
Hence to thy chamber, till returning morning
Hath calm'd this tempest—on thy duty, hence!

Irene. Yet hear the voice of caution. Cruel fate!
What have I done! heav'n shield my dearest father!
Heaven shield the innocent undone Irene!

Whate'er the event, thy doom is misery. [Exit.

Bar. Her words are wrapt in darkness. Aladin,
Forthwith send Achmet hither. Then with speed,
Double the centinels. [Exit Aladin.

Infernal guilt!

How dost thou rise in ev'ry hideous shape,
Of rage and doubt, suspicion and despair,
To rend my soul. Why did I not
Repent, while yet my crimes were delible;
Ere they had struck their colours thro' my soul,
As black as night or hell, 'tis now too late.
Take me all,
Unfeeling guilt! oh, banish, if thou canst,
This fell remorse, and ev'ry fruitless fear.

Enter SELIM and two Guards.

Come hither, slave;

Hear me, and tremble. Art thou what thou seem'st?

Selim. Ha! [founded.

Bar. Dost thou pause? by hell, the slave's con-

Selim. That Barbarossa should suspect my truth.

Bar. Take heed! for by the hov'ring pow'rs of vengeance,

If I do find thee treach'rous, I will doom thee
To death and torment, such as human thought Ne'er yet conceiv'd. Thou com'st beneath the guise

Of Selim's murderer. Now tell me: is not
That Selim yet alive?

Selim. Selim alive!

Bar. Perdition on thee! dost thou echo me?
Answer me quick, or die! (Draws his dagger.)

Selim. Yes, freely strike;
Already hast thou given the fatal wound,
And pierc'd my heart with thy unkind suspicion;
Oh, could my dagger find a tongue to tell
How deep it drank his blood! but since thy doubt
Thus wrongs my zeal, behold my breast, strike
here,

For bold is innocence.

Bar. I scorn the task, (Puts up his dagger.)
Time shall decide thy doom:—guards, mark me
well.

See that ye watch the motions of this slave;
And if he meditates t' escape your eye,
Let your good sabres cleave him to the chine.

Selim. I yield me to thy will, and when thou
know'st

That Selim lives, or see'st his hated face,
Then wreak thy vengeance on me.

Bar. Bear him hence.

Yet, on your lives, await me within call.

[Exeunt Selim and Guards.

Call Zaphira. [Exit a Slave.

If Selim lives, then what is Barbarossa?

My throne's a bubble, that but floats in air,
Till marriage rites declare Zaphira mine.

I will not brook delay. By love and vengeance,
This hour decides her fate.

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Well, haughty fair!

Hath reason yet subdu'd thee? Wilt thou hear
The voice of love?

Zaph. Why dost thou vainly urge me?
Thou know'st my fix'd resolve.

Bar. Can aught but phrensy
Rush on perdition?

Zaph. Therefore shall no pow'r
E'er make me thine.

Bar. Nay, sport not with my rage:
Know, that thy final hour of choice is come.

Zaph. I have no choice. Think'st thou I e'er will wed

The murderer of my lord?

Bar. Take heed, rash queen!

Tell me thy last resolve.

Zaph. Then hear me, heav'n!

Hear, all ye pow'rs, that watch o'er innocence!
Angels of light! And thou dear honour'd shade

Of my departed lord: attend, while here
I ratify with vows my last resolve.
If e'er I wed this tyrant murderer,
If I pollute me with this horrid union,
May ye, the ministers of heav'n, depart,
Nor shed your influence on the guilty scene!
May horror blacken all our days and nights!
May discord light the nuptial torch! and rising fiends in triumph howl
Around th' accursed bed!

Bar. Begone, remorse!

Guards do your office: Drag her to the altar,
Heed not her tears or cries.

(Guards go to seize Zaphira.)

Zaph. O spare me! Heav'n protect me! O
my son,
Wert thou but here, to save thy helpless mother!
What shall I do? Undone, undone Zaphira!

Enter SELIM, and Guards.

Selim. Who call'd on Achmet? Did not Barbarossa

Require me here?

Bar. Officious slave, retire!

I call'd thee not.

Zaph. O kind and gen'rous stranger, lend thy aid!
O rescue me from these impending horrors!
Heav'n will reward thy pity!

Selim. Pity her woes, O mighty Barbarossa!

Bar. Rouse not my vengeance, slave!

Selim. O hear me, hear me! (Kneels.)

Bar. Curse on thy forward zeal!

Selim. Yet, yet have mercy.

(Lays hold of Barbarossa's garment.)

Bar. Presuming slave, begone! (Strikes Selim.)

Selim. Nay, then,—die, tyrant!

(Rises and aims to stab Barbarossa, who wrests his dagger from him.)

Bar. Ah, traitor! have I caught thee?

Hold—forbear. (To the Slaves, who offer to kill Selim.)

Kill him not yet—I will have greater vengeance.
Perfidious wretch, who art thou?—Bring the rack:
Let that extort the secrets of his heart.

Selim. Thy impious threats are lost! I know, that death

And torments are my doom. Yet, ere I die,
I'll strike thy soul with horror. Off, vile habit!
If thou dar'st, [voice]
Now view me! Hear me, tyrant! while, with
More terrible than thunder, I proclaim,
That he, who aim'd the dagger at thy heart,
Is Selim!

Zaph. O heav'n! my son! my son! (Faints.)

Selim. Unhappy mother! (Runs to embrace her.)

Bar. Tear them asunder. (Guards separate them.)

Selim. Barb'rous, barb'rous ruffians!

Bar. Slaves, seize the traitor.

(They offer to seize him.)

Selim. Off, ye vile slaves! I am your king! Retire,

And tremble at my frowns! That is the traitor—
That is the murd'rer—tyrant ravisher! Seize him,
And do your country right.

Bar. Ah, coward dogs!

Start ye at words?—or seize him, or by hell,
This dagger sends you all— (They seize him.)

Selim. Dost thou revive, unhappy queen!
Now arm my soul with patience.

Zaph. My dear son!

Do I then live, once more to see my Selim.
But oh—to see thee thus!

Selim. Canst thou behold

Her speechless agonies, and not relent?

Bar. At length revenge is mine! slaves, force her hence! [quer'd!]

Selim. Lo, Barbarossa! thou at length hast con-
Behold a hapless prince, o'erwhelm'd with woes,
(Kneels.)

Prostrate before thy feet! not for myself
I plead. Yes, plunge the dagger in my breast!
Tear, tear me piecemeal! But, oh, spare Zaphira!
Yet—yet relent! force not her matron honour!
Reproach not heav'n.

Bar. Have I then bent thy pride?

Why, this is conquest ev'n beyond my hope!—

Lie there, thou slave! lie till Zaphira's cries

Arouse thee from thy posture! [wretch!]

Selim. Dost thou insult my griefs? unmanly

Curse on the fear, that could betray my limbs, (Rising.)

My coward limbs, to this dishonest posture.

Long have I scorn'd, I now defy, thy pow'r.

Bar. I'll put thy boasted virtue to the trial.

Slaves, bear him to the rack.

Zaph. O spare my son!

Sure filial virtue never was a crime.

Save but my son! I yield me to thy wish.

What do I say? The marriage vow—O horror!

This hour shall make me thine!

Selim. What! doom thyself

The guilty partner of a murd'rer's bed,

Whose hands yet reek with thy dear husband's blood!

To be the mother of destructive tyrants—

The curses of mankind! by heav'n, I swear,

The guilty hour, that gives thee to the arms

Of that detested murderer, shall end

This hated life!

Bar. Or yield thee, or he dies! [greatness;]

Zaph. The conflict's past. I will resume my We'll bravely die, as we have liv'd,—with honour!

(Embracing.)

Selim. Now, tyrant, pour thy fiercest fury on us.

Now see, despairing guilt, that virtue still

Shall conquer, tho' in ruin.

Bar. Drag them hence:

Her to the altar:—Selim to his fate.

(Guards seize them.)

Selim. One last embrace!

Farewell, farewell for ever!

(Guards struggle with them.)

Zaph. One moment yet!—Pity a mother's pangs!
O Selim!

Selim. O my mother!

[Exeunt Selim, Zaphira, and Guards.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter BARBAROSSA, ALADIN, and Guards.

Bar. Is the watch doubled? Are the gates secur'd Against surprise?

Aladin. They are, and mock th' attempt
Of force or treachery.

Bar. This whisper'd rumour
Of dark conspiracy

Seems but a false alarm. Our spies, sent out,
Affirm, that sleep

Has wrapp'd the city.

Aladin. But while Selim lives,
Destruction lurks within the palace walls.

Bar. Right, Aladin. His hour of fate approaches.
How goes the night?

Aladin. The second watch is near.

Bar. 'Tis well: whene'er it rings, the traitor dies;

So hath my will ordain'd. I'll seize the occasion

While I may fairly plead my life's defence.

Yet first the rack shall rend

Each secret from his heart.

Haste, seek out Othman:

Go, tell him, that destruction and the sword

Hang o'er young Selim's head, if swift compliance

Plead not his pardon.

[Exit Aladin.]

Stubborn fortitude!

Had he not interposed, success had crown'd

My love, now hopeless. Then let vengeance seize him.

Enter IRENE.

Irene. O, night of horror! Hear me, honour'd
If e'er Irene's peace was dear to thee, [father!
Now hear me!

Bar. Impious! dar'st thou disobey?
Did not my sacred will ordain thee hence?
Get thee to rest; for death is stirring here.

Irene. O fatal words! By ev'ry sacred tie,
Recal the dire decree.

Bar. What would'st thou say?
Whom plead for?

Irene. For a brave unhappy prince,
Sentenc'd to die.

Bar. And justly. But this hour
The traitor half fulfill'd thy dream, and aim'd
His dagger at my heart. [fortitude

Irene. Wouldst thou not love the child, whose Should hazard life for thee? Oh, think on that!
The noble mind hates not a virtuous foe:
His gen'rous purpose was to save a mother.

Bar. Damn'd was his purpose; and accurst art thou,

Whose perfidy would save the dark assassin,
Who sought thy father's life. Hence! from my sight.

Irene. Oh, never, till thy mercy spare my Selim!

Bar. Thy Selim? Thine?

Irene. Thou know'st, by gratitude [me,
He's mine. Had not his generous hand redeem'd
What, then, had been Irene? Oh! but spare the gen'rous youth,
Who sav'd me from dishonour.

Bar. By the pow'rs
Of great revenge, thy fond entreaties seal
His instant death. In him I'll punish thee.
Away! [fears

Irene. O Selim! gen'rous youth! how have my Betray'd thee to destruction!
Inhuman father! Gen'rous, injur'd prince!
Methinks I see thee stretch'd upon the rack,
Hear thy expiring groans: O, horror! horror!
What shall I do to save him? Vain, alas!
Vain are my tears and pray'rs: At least, I'll die.
Death shall unite us yet. [Exit Irene.

Bar. O torment! torment!
Ev'n in the midst of pow'r! the vilest slave
More happy far than I: the very child,
Whom my love cherish'd from her infant years,
Conspires to blast my peace. O, false ambition!
Whither hast thou lur'd me?
Ev'n to this giddy height; where now I stand,
Forsaken, comfortless, with not a friend,
In whom my soul can trust.

Enter ALADIN.

Now, Aladin,
Hast thou seen Othman?
He will not, sure, conspire against my peace.

Aladin. He's fled, my lord. I dread some lurking ruin.

The centinel on watch says, that he pass'd
The gate, since midnight, with an unknown friend:
And, as they pass'd, Othman in whisper said,
Now farewell, bloody tyrant!

Bar. Slave, thou liest.
He did not dare to say it; or, if he did,
Why dost thou wound my ear
By the foul repetition?
What's to be done? Some mischief lurks unseen.

Aladin. Prevent it then.

Bar. By Selim's instant death.

Is the rack prepar'd?

Aladin. 'Tis ready.

Along the ground he lies, o'erwhelm'd with chains;
The ministers of death stand round, and wait
Thy last command.

Bar. Once more I'll try to bend
His stubborn soul: Conduct me forthwith to him;
And, if he now refuse my proffer'd kindness,
Destruction swallows him. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Prison in the palace.

SELIM discovered in Chains, Executioners, Officers, &c. and rack.

Selim. I pray you, friends,
When I am dead, let not indignity
Insult these poor remains; see them interr'd
Close by my father's tomb. I ask no more.

Offi. They shall.

Selim. How goes the night?

Offi. Thy hour of fate,
The second watch, is near.

Selim. Let it come on:
I am prepar'd.

Enter BARBAROSSA.

Bar. So; raise him from the ground.

(They raise him.)

Perfidious boy! behold the just rewards
Of guilt and treachery. Didst thou not give Thy forfeit life, whene'er I should behold
Selim's detested face?

Selim. Then take it, tyrant.

Bar. Didst thou not aim a dagger at my heart?

Selim. I did.

Bar. Yet heav'n defeated thy intent;
And sav'd me from the dagger.

Selim. 'Tis not ours
To question heav'n. Th' intent, and not the deed
Is in our pow'r; and, therefore, who dares greatly,
Does greatly.

Bar. Yet bethink thee, stubborn boy,
What horrors now surround thee.

Selim. Think'st thou, tyrant,
I came so ill prepar'd?
He who can bravely dare, can bravely suffer.

Bar. Yet, lo, I come, by pity led, to spare thee.
Relent, and save Zaphira; for the bell
Ev'n now expects the centinel to toll
The signal of thy death.

Selim. Let guilt like thine
Tremble at death: I scorn its darkest frown.
Hence, tyrant! nor profane my dying hour.

Bar. Then take thy wish, (Bell tolls.)
There goes the fatal knell.

Thy fate is seal'd. Not all thy mother's tears,
Nor pray'rs, nor eloquence of grief, shall save thee
From instant death.

Yet, ere the assassin die,
Let torment wring each secret from his heart.

The traitor, Othman, is fled: conspiracy
Lurks in the womb of night, and threatens ruin.
Spare not the rack, nor cease, till it extort
The lurking treason. [Exit Barbarossa.

Selim. Come on, then. (They bind him.)

Begin the work of death. What! bound with cords,
Like a vile criminal? O, valiant friends,
When will ye give me vengeance?

Enter IRENE.

Irene. Stop! O, stop!
Hold your accursed hands! on me, on me,
Pour all your torments. How shall I approach thee?

Selim. These are thy father's gifts; yet thou art guiltless:

Then let me take thee to my heart, thou best,
Most amiable of women!

Irene. Rather curse me,
As the betrayer of thy virtue.

Selim. Ah!

Irene. 'Twas I; my fears, my frantic fears, betray'd thee.

Thus, falling at thy feet, may I but hope
For pardon ere I die!

Selim. Hence! to thy father!

Irene. Never! O, never! Crawling in the dust,
I'll clasp thy feet, and bathe them with my tears;
Tread me to earth: I never will complain;
But my last breath shall bless thee.

Selim. Lov'd Irene!
What hath my fury done?

Irene. Canst thou, then,
Forgive and pity me?

Selim. I do, I do.

Irene. On my knees
Thus let me thank thee, generous, injur'd prince!
O, earth and heaven! that such unequall'd worth
Should meet so hard a fate! that I—that I,
Whom his love rescu'd from the depth of woe,
Should be th' accurst destroyer! strike, in pity,
And end this hated life.

Selim. Cease, dear Irene.
Submit to heaven's high will. I charge thee, live;
And, to thy utmost pow'r, protect from wrong
My helpless, friendless mother.

Irene. With my life
I'll shield her from each wrong. That hope alone
Can tempt me to prolong a life of woe.

Selim. O, my ungovern'd rage! to frown on thee!
Thus let me expiate the cruel wrong, (Embracing.)
And mingle rapture with the pains of death.

Offi. No more: prepare the rack.

Irene. Stand off, ye fiends! here will I cling.
No pow'r on earth shall part us,
Till I have sav'd my Selim.

(A shout. Clashing of swords.)

Offi. Hark! What noise
Strikes on mine ear! (Shouts.)

Selim. Again!

Aladin. (Without.) Arm, arm! Treach'ry and murder! (Executioners go to seize Selim.)

Selim. Off, slaves! or I will turn my chains to
And dash you piece-meal. [arms,

Enter ALADIN.

Aladin. Where is the king?
The foe pours in.

Offi. Death and ruin!
Follow me, slaves, and save him.

[Exeunt Aladin, Officer, and Guards.

Selim. Now, bloody tyrant! Now, thy hour is come!

Irene. Whom dost thou mean? my father?

Selim. Yes: thy father,
Who murder'd mine.

Irene. Is there no room for mercy?
Must he, then, die?
Let me but see my father ere he perish:
Let me but pay my parting duty to him.

(Clash of swords.)

Hark! 'twas the clash of swords: heav'n save my father!

O, cruel, cruel Selim! [Exit Irene.

Selim. Curse on this servile chain, that binds me
In pow'rless ignominy; while my sword [fast
Should haunt its prey, and cleave the tyrant down.

Oth. (Without.) Where is the prince?

Selim. Here, Othman, bound to earth:
Set me but free. O, cursed, cursed chain?

Enter OTHMAN and Party, who free Selim.

Oth. O, my brave prince! heav'n favours our design. (Embraces him.)
Take that: I need not bid thee use it nobly.

(Giving him a sword.)

Selim. Now, Barbarossa, let my arm meet thine:
'Tis all I ask of heav'n. [Exit Selim.

Oth. Guard ye the prince: [Part go out.
Pursue his steps. Now this way let us turn,
And seek the tyrant. [Exeunt Othman, &c.

SCENE III.—A Court in the palace.

Enter BARBAROSSA.

Bar. Empire is lost, and life: yet brave revenge
Shall close my life in glory.

Enter OTHMAN.

Have I found thee,
Dissembling traitor? Die! (They fight. Barb. falls.)

Enter SELIM and SADI.

Selim. The foe gives way: sure this way went the storm.

Where is the tiger fled? What do I see?

Sadi. Algiers is free.

Oth. This sabre did the deed.

Selim. I envy thee the blow: yet valour scorns
To wound the fallen. But if life remain,
I will speak daggers to his guilty soul.
Hoa! Barbarossa! tyrant! murderer!
'Tis Selim, Selim calls thee!

Bar. Off, ye fiends!

Torment me not. O, Selim, art thou there?
Swallow me, earth!

Oh, that I ne'er had wrong'd thee!

Selim. Dost thou, then,
Repent thee of thy crimes? He does, he does!
He grasps my hand: see, the repentant tear
Starts from his eye. Dost thou indeed repent?
Why, then, I do forgive thee: from my soul
I freely do forgive thee: and if crimes,
Abhor'd as thine, dare plead to heav'n for mercy,
May heav'n have mercy on thee.

Bar. Gen'rous Selim!

Too good. I have a daughter: oh, protect her!
Let not my crimes— (Dies.)

Oth. There fled the guilty soul! [ter.

Selim. Haste to the city; stop the rage of slaugh-
Tell my brave people, that Algiers is free;
And tyranny no more. [Exeunt Guards.

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Zaph. What mean these horrors? wheresoe'er I turn

My trembling steps, I find some dying wretch,
Welt'ring in gore. And dost thou live, my Selim?

Selim. Lo, there he lies!

Zaph. The tyrant slain! O, righteous heaven!

Selim. Behold thy valiant friends,
Whose faith and courage have o'erwhelm'd the pow'r
Of Barbarossa. Here, once more, thy virtues
Shall dignify the throne, and bless thy people.

Zaph. Just are thy ways, O, heav'n! vain terrors, hence!

Once more Zaphira's bless'd: my virtuous son,
How shall I e'er repay thy boundless love?
Thus let me snatch thee to my longing arms,
And on thy bosom weep my griefs away.

Selim. O, happy hope! happy, beyond the flight,
Ev'n of my ardent hour! look down, blest shade,
From the bright realms of bliss! behold thy queen
Unspotted, uneduc'd, unmov'd in virtue.

Behold the tyrant prostrate at my feet!
And to the mem'ry of thy bleeding wrongs,
Accept this sacrifice.

Zaph. My generous Selim!

Selim. Where is Irene? [mien,

Sadi. With looks of wildness, and distracted
She sought her father where the tumult rag'd.
She pass'd me, while the coward Aladin
Fled from my sword; and as I cleft him down,
She fainted at the sight.

Oth. But soon recover'd;
Zamor, our trusty friend, at my command,
Convey'd the weeping fair one to her chamber.

Selim. Thanks to thy generous care: come, let Th' afflicted maid. [us seek

Zaph. Her virtues might atone
For all her father's guilt! Thy throne be her's:
She merits all thy love.

Selim. Then haste and find her. O'er her father's crimes

Pity shall draw her veil; nay, half absolve them,
When she beholds the virtues of his child.

Now let us thank th' eternal pow'r, convinc'd,
That heaven but tries our virtues by affliction;
That oft the cloud, which wraps the present hour,
Serves but to brighten all our future days!

[Exeunt.

THE HAUNTED TOWER;

A COMIC OPERA, IN THREE ACTS.—BY JAMES COBB.

Act III. Scene 4.

CHARACTERS.

LORD WILLIAM
BARON OF OAKLAND
DE COURCY

ROBERT
EDWARD

CHARLES
LEWIS

LADY ELINOR
ADELA
CICELY

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Sea, Dover Cliffs and Castle.
Thunder and lightning.

LEWIS and several Attendants of LADY ELINOR appear in a boat; they land; then enter Fishermen and Peasants, male and female, who sing the following

CHORUS.

*To Albion's genius raise the strain,
Whose power has aw'd the angry main,
And gives us shelter on the coast
Of this blest isle, old Ocean's boast.
See, retiring o'er the deep
Distant lightnings harmless sweep;
The storm condemn'd to lose its prey,
In hollow murmurs dies away.*

[Exeunt Fishermen and Peasants.]

LADY ELINOR and CICELY appear in a boat, and land.

Cice. Now, madam, give me leave to congratulate you on your safe arrival on the English coast.

Lady E. Ah, Cicely, if the storm that opposed our landing had fulfilled its threats, it would have relieved me from a world of misery.

Cice. Are you, then, resolved to obey your father, and become the victim of his ambition, by marrying the young Baron of Oakland, whom you have never seen?

Lady E. I am; at least, I think I am.

Cice. Oh, madam! how can you determine to forget Sir Palamede? he, who loves you so.

Lady E. Poor Palamede! yet, why was he absent when I left my father's court? why did he not bid me adieu?

Enter LEWIS and MAUD.

Lewis. Madam, most of your attendants are come ashore, but it's a great way to Oakland Castle, and it's very cold.

Lady E. Where are they?

Lewis. Why, madam, at this good old lady's cottage, where there is a charming fire; and I would advise you, madam, to go there and warm yourself, for I am sure you must be very cold.

[Exit Lady E. and Maud.]

Cice. (To Lewis, who offers to follow.) Where are you going, sot? Stay here, and wait for the rest of Lady Elinor's attendants; and do you hear, the next voyage you take, I would advise you to keep yourself sober.

[Exit.]

Lewis. Why, that's very pretty, indeed: so, I am to stay here, freezing by way of a direction post; I got tipsey and lost my money in France, and began to come to myself, when I was about half seas over; and now, when I thought I should be comfortable by a good fire, I must remain freezing here, in all the horrors of sobriety. It is the fate of genius to make discoveries by which other people profit. Why, who have we here? Sure, it can't be! yes, it is: what! my dear master, Sir Palamede?

Enter LORD WILLIAM.

Lord W. Is that Lewis?

Lewis. Yes, sir; I was Lewis, till I was froze into an icicle: how did you come over from Normandy?

Lord W. In the same ship with you, though concealed from the knowledge of Lady Elinor.

Lew. I guess the rest. Ah! you are a happy man; you are in love: I wish I was in love or in liquor, then I should have warmth enough in me to brave the weather.

[gone?]

Lord W. I saw your lady land, whither is she

Lew. Why, sir, to a cottage hard by, where is such a delightful fire-side: Oh, I wish, I dared follow her.

Lord W. Go thither, instantly; and say, I intreat permission to fulfil my duty in attending her.

Lew. I'll be there immediately; but, may I say I came by your orders?

Lord W. Yes; begone! [Exit Lewis.] To what a wayward fate am I subjected! To love without hope, and to pursue disappointment.

AIR.—LORD WILLIAM.

*From Hope's fond dream tho' reason wake,
In vain she points with warning hand;
I dread advice I cannot take,
Love's powerful spells my steps command.*

*The bird, thus fascination binds,
When darting from the serpent's eyes,
The fatal charm too late he finds,
He struggles, and, admiring, dies.*

SCENE II.—The inside of Maud's Cottage.

Enter LADY ELINOR, CICELY, and LEWIS.

L. Eli. How, Lewis! Sir Palamede in the same ship with us, and coming here immediately!

Lew. Yes, madam, if he is not frozen by the way.

L. Eli. (Aside to Cicely.) Oh, Cicely! assist me to conceal my joy. What can Sir Palamede mean, by surprising me thus agreeably?—oh, heavens! he is here. [Exit Lewis.]

Enter LORD WILLIAM.

Lord W. Pardon my intrusion, madam! an humble dependant on the Lord de Courcy may well dread his presumption.

Lady E. Sir, the clandestine manner in which you quitted my father's court, renders it impossible for me to consider you as his friend.

Lord W. Oh! forgive me! long I adored you in secret, and should have fallen a silent sacrifice to my presumptuous love.

Lady E. Was it well done to take advantage of my father's friendship for you, and watch an opportunity to triumph over the weakness of his daughter? not that you ever will triumph over her weakness; but, why did you follow me?

Cice. Ah, sir! why did you follow my lady?

Lord W. Destiny compelled me hither; compelled me to land where my footsteps are forbidden, where my presence is a treason, where my life is proscribed.

Lady E. Good heaven! what have you to fear?

Lord W. Nothing: for I have lost you.

Lady E. I must not trust myself to pity him; yet, how can I avoid it, in seeing him unhappy?

AIR.—LADY ELINOR.

*Tho' pity I cannot deny,
Ah! what will that avail you?
Alas! I dare not hope supply,
For hope too sure would fail you.
Think when the flatterer shall deceive,
In vain you will repent you;
Yet should you hope without my leave,
'Tis true I can't prevent you.*

*My hand directed to bestow,
In England here I'm landed;
And daughters always act, you know,
Just as they are commanded.
Then let not flattering hope deceive,
Or else you will repent you,
Yet should you hope without my leave,
'Tis true I can't prevent you.*

[Exit Lady E. and Cicely.]

Enter MAUD and MARTIN.

Maud. Sir; I beg your honour's pardon for my boldness, but do you accompany the lady, because my grandson, Martin here, will be your guide to the Baron of Oakland's castle.

Lord W. Why, do you know the Baron of Oakland?

Maud. Ay, sir! I knew him before he was a great man.

Mar. Yes, sir, so did I; for all he holds his head so high now, and quite forgets when he was plain Edmund, the ploughman. [lord?]

Lord W. What d'ye say? Why, then, who is this

Maud. Ah, sir! it does not become poor folks to speak ill of people behind their backs, for then it might get to their ears again.

Mar. No, sir; as my grandmother says, it don't become poor folks to say—

Lord W. Psha! it becomes every one to speak the truth: torment my curiosity no longer.

Maud. Why, then, sir, you must know that about ten years ago, the old baron, Lord William, was accused of being in a plot, and conspiring against the life of our good King William, the Conqueror, and was banished.

Lord W. I remember it.

Maud. He took with him his only son, a fine youth, about twelve years of age; but, alas, sir! he has not been heard of since.

Lord W. I am all impatience!

Maud. Now, sir, about a year ago, Lord William's wicked accuser died, and declared the good baron

Lord W. Alas! [innocent.]

Maud. The king, willing to make reparation for the wrongs he had done him, endeavoured to find him, but all in vain; therefore, his lands and estates have been in possession of a distant relation of the family: then, sir, there is a young baron, the present heir to—

Enter CICELY.

Cice. Ay, and a pretty fellow he is too! you may go in, good woman; we have no further occasion for you, I believe.

Maud. Good woman! Marry, come up, I say! have I lived all these years to be called good woman, by a lady's waiting-maid? Come along, Martin:—a good woman, indeed! [Exit.]

Mar. Good woman, indeed! [Exit.]

Cice. I have heard the whole story, Palamede.

Lord W. Oh, Cicely!—

Cice. Oh, Cicely!—Ah! you may spare your long speeches. Poor Palamede! you are in a sad dilemma, truly, and haven't wit enough to extricate yourself, but want me to help you; I pity you, to be sure, but I can't help laughing at you.

Lord W. I have now still stronger motives for wishing to accompany Lady Elinor to the castle; motives you cannot guess at.

Cice. Well, well; so you shall; leave the management of the affair to me, and don't you appear till we are setting off.

Lord W. I want words to thank you.

Cice. I am very glad of it, for words would take up too much of our time at present; but, away, and wait till I send for you. [Exit Lord W.] Well! I would we were at our journey to Oakland Castle! I wish to see this Baron's son. Dear curiosity, how I long to gratify you!

AIR.—CICELY.

*Nature to woman still so kind,
Amongst her best boons bestowing;
What every female sure must find,
A wondrous desire to be knowing.*

*Man, the proud and envious elf,
So jealous of our discerning;
Describes in us, what he prides in himself,
The wish for whatever's worth learning. [Exit.]*

SCENE III.—A rural prospect. A Cottage.

Enter ROBERT, and Huntsmen.

AIR.—ROBERT, and Chorus.

*Hark! the sweet horn proclaims afar,
Against the stag the mimic war:*

*While future heroes' hearts rebound,
And pant to hear the trumpet sound,
The warlike genius of our isle,
Who on the hunter deigns to smile,
In echoes gives the chase applause,
Which strings the nerve for glory's cause:
Where'er the devious chase may bend,
Still freedom shall our steps attend;
And bid us, as her pleasures rise,
Defend the blessings which we prize.*

[Exeunt Huntsmen.]

Edw. (Without.) How are ye, my lads? how are ye? [Edward.]

Rob. Oh! here comes our young master, Lord

Enter EDWARD.

Rob. Does your lordship hunt to-day?

Edw. (Sees Adela at the cottage-window, and makes signs to her.) No, Robert, not this morning.

Rob. What, sir! do you give up the chase when the game's in view? (Points to Adela's window.)

Edw. Hush! that's my dear Adela, whom I told you of; she arrived here yesterday evening, unknown to anybody: if you betray the secret—

Rob. I, sir! no, no; I am your father's butler, the post, of all others, which I love; and while I have the management of the wine-cellar, it is quite indifferent to me how the world wags; so, I shall follow the huntsmen.

Edw. But, harkye, Robert, not a word about the haunted tower, or you will frighten her out of her wits.

Rob. No, no, sir. [Exit.]

Edw. Here comes father, strutting along; ecod! he did not strut so when he followed the plough.

Enter BARON, and Servants.

Bar. Heyday! how dare you appear abroad without your servants with you? Why are you walking alone?

Edw. Why, father, if one must always move in a crowd, one might as well be bell-wether to a flock of sheep.

Bar. Sirrah, sirrah! don't put me in a passion: you have been civil to those rascals, I know you have; why don't you frown at them as I do? How often have I told you, there's nothing supports dignity like ill-humour; but you have no ambition.

Edw. Not much, indeed.

Bar. Why haven't you more pride, eh? If you are not proud, you dog, I'll break your bones.

Edw. Why, I can't help nature, father.

Bar. Nature! why, look at me; do you see anything like nature about me? no, no! yet I, myself, am as vulgarly and naturally pleased as anybody, but I'll not shew it; I'll defy the best friend I have to say I have given him a civil word since I have been Baron of Oakland: an't I the terror of the neighbourhood?

Edw. Yes, that you are; especially since you imprisoned the poor fellow for catching a hare; and it is proved since that he is innocent.

Bar. Innocent? I am very sorry for it; that is, I should be sorry, if I was not a baron. Give him this money; (Gives Edw. money.) but don't let him know it comes from me, but tell him I have the power to hang him; for I will have no man dare to think I am in the wrong; justice holds her seat in my breast, and is to all parties equal and indifferent.

Edw. Very indifferent indeed.

Bar. What's that you say? If I desired you to behave ill to other people, I didn't mean you should to me; do you know who I am? that I am the Baron of Oakland, and that all dignity flows from me?

Edw. Yes, it flows from you pretty fast, I think; none seems to stay with you.

Bar. Don't you grumble, sirrah. But, do you hear? prepare to receive the Lord de Courcy's daughter, whom I intend for your wife. I expect her arrival every day.

Edw. But perhaps I may not like her, father.

Bar. That may be, but you shall marry her for all that; I insist on it; ay, and love her, too.—No, I don't know that I may insist upon that.

Serv. Ha, ha, ha!

Bar. Why, you impudent scoundrels, how dare you laugh so? I'll have no persons to attend upon me that haven't a proper respect for my dignity.—Follow me, you rascals. [Exit with Servants.]

Edw. I hope I shall be too sharp for you, though, father, for I am determined to marry nobody but Adela. (Knocks at the cottage door.) Adela! Adela! (Retires.)

Enter ADELA from the cottage, looks surprised at not seeing Edward.

AIR.—ADELA.

Whither, my love! ah! whither art thou gone!

Let not thy absence cloud this happy dawn.

Say—by thy heart, can falsehood e'er be known?

Ah! no, no, I judge it by my own.

The heart he gave with so much care,

Which treasur'd in my breast I wear;

Still for its master beats alone,

I'm sure the selfish thing's his own.

(Edward appears after the song.)

Adela. Oh, my dear Edward? I am glad you are here; I have got a thousand questions to ask you; is the Lady Elinor de Courcy arrived yet?

Edw. She is not, so all you have to do is, to dress yourself in the clothes I gave you, and to pass upon father for her.

Adela. Egad, and so I will; I always longed to be a fine lady, but how shall I manage to behave like one?

Edw. Faith, I can't tell you; however, it don't signify, anything will pass upon father.

Adela. But are you sure now, Edward, he has not much dignity; if he has, I shall only be confounded and look foolish; but is he much like a great gentleman?

Edw. Ha, ha, ha! heaven bless you, father is no more like a gentleman than I am.

Adela. I am glad of it, for the presence of our great quality folks always takes my breath away, and though I cough and hem, for an hour, the deuce a word can I get out.

Edw. 'Tis just the same with me, though I am a Baron's son; for my part, I never feel myself so much like a great man, as when I am with the servants; I hate talking to my betters.

Adela. I am pleased to hear you say so; I was afraid you would have forgot poor Adela, for the rich Lady de Courcy.

Ed. What, marry a woman of quality! Oh! I shall be a lost man; I should never be able to make free with her; should she use me ever so ill, I could never venture to scold her.

Adela. But when you marry me—

Ed. Oh! I love you so much, that I could scold you with the greatest satisfaction.

Adela. But won't marriage—

Ed. Never fear, Adela, love has hitherto been our constant attendants; I'll warrant you he'll follow us to church.

Adela. Ay, but they say, he has a sad knack of leaving married couples at the church door.

Ed. Psha! love and marriage are better friends than you think for. [distance.]

Adela. Yes, perhaps they are best friends at a

Ed. No, no, like true friends, love and marriage must meet together, to perfect the happiness of both. Oh! Adela, when I come to the title and estate, and you are my lady,— [long.]

Adela. Oh, we shall be as happy as the day is

Ed. Ay, and the night into the bargain.

Adela. Then such dancing—
Ed. And such tilting and cudgel playing.
Adela. And such fine talking and singing—
Ed. And then such eating and drinking.
Adela. And such fine company, and then—

DUETT.

Adela. Will great lords and ladies,
 Drest up on gay days,
 Come to visit you and I?
Ed. All smiling, bowing,
 Great friendship vowing,
 While we hold our heads so high.
Adela. But should the fine gentry smoke us,
 Lud, how they'll joke us;
 How they'll laugh at silly me.
Ed. Psha! we shall be ever
 Reckon'd vastly clever,
 While our pocket's full, d'ye see.
Adela. Then every day
Ed. New joy shall bring,
Adela. And ever gay,
Ed. We'll dance and sing,
Both. Fall lal de ral,
 How merry shall we be.
Adela. Of great fortune vaunting,
 Low people taunting,
 Dignity we must support.
Ed. 'Mong high barons bouncing,
 Fine ladies flouncing,
 We may chance to go to court,
Adela. Well, 'fegs, I care not,
 Court tho' we share not,
 If at home we happy be.
Ed. Soon I may be bold
 To hope that I shall hold
 A little baron on my knee.
Adela. Then every day
Ed. New joy shall bring,
Adela. And ever gay,
Ed. We'll dance and sing,
Both. Fal lal de ral,
 How merry shall we be. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Field.

Enter DE COURCY and Attendants.

De Cour. Here let us remain, till I gain some intelligence of the object of our search. I am sure my sister and her attendants must have been on board that very ship, which we saw at a distance in the late storm.

Enter CHARLES.

De Cour. Well, Charles; what news of my sister?

Char. My lord, I learn that the Lady de Courcy is on her road to the Baron of Oakland's castle, which is at no great distance.

De Cour. And Sir Palamede?

Char. My lord, I am sorry to say he is with her.

De Cour. Infamy and dishonour! but I will pursue her, and revenge the wrongs of my family; go forward, Charles, and procure every intelligence you can gain; I shall wait for you within a mile of the Baron's castle. [Exit, with Attendants.]

Char. I will, because it is my duty; but would I were in Normandy again; nothing should induce me to quit it, except my regard for so good a master.

AIR.—CHARLES.

*My native land I bade adieu,
 And calmly Friendship's joys resign'd;
 But ah! how keen my sorrows grew,
 When my true love I left behind.*

*Yet should her truth feel no decay,
 Should absence prove my charmer kind,
 Then shall I not lament the day,
 When my true love I left behind.* [Exit.]

SCENE V.—The Inside of Maud's cottage.

Enter LORD WILLIAM, LADY ELINOR, and CICELY

Lady E. Well, Palamede! I will frankly own to you, that the account, I hear of the Baron of Oakland's son, is far from pleasing me; and though I dare not disobey my father, yet I will do every thing in my power to delay the marriage.

Cice. In short, sir, my lady agrees to my scheme of visiting the castle as Lady Elinor's attendant, till she hears further from the Baron, her father.

Lord W. Transporting tidings!

TRIO.—LORD WILLIAM, CICELY, and LADY ELINOR.

*Against the shaft of cruel fate,
 Why cannot virtue prove a charm,
 And of her blind misguided hate,
 Capricious destiny disarm?*

*Yet who, engag'd in Virtue's cause,
 To tread her paths would fear confess,
 And on the road reluctant pause,
 Because it leads not to success.* [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Castle.

Enter HUGO and ROBERT.

Hugo. Well, Robert.

Rob. Make yourself perfectly easy, friend Hugo, everything shall be in perfect order to receive Lady Elinor.

Hugo. Ay, I hope so, for the honour of the family. It is near three score years since I was first a servant in Oakland castle, and have seen three possessions of it; I have come down from father to son, with the rest of the old furniture.

Rob. And a fine tough piece of English oak you are.

Hugo. I remember the death of Edmund Ironside, and the restoration of Canute; I remember the Harolds and Hardicanute, and the good king, Edward the Confessor; and I remember the good Baron, who now haunts the old tower.

Rob. Hush! no more of that.

Hugo. Ah, Robert, if you were old enough to remember what I can!

Rob. I am just as well pleased as it is.

Hugo. We shall have music and dancing enough at the wedding, I hope, Robert, for the honour of Lord Edward.

Rob. Yes, yes, when a man is desperate to attack matrimony, the more noise and bustle the better; like trumpets in a battle, it drowns reflection and prevents cowardice.

Hugo. Are all the pikes and javelins burnished up, and the armoury put in order, and the large stag's horns in the hall dusted?

Rob. Horns are most ominous wedding decorations; no, no, friend Hugo, I have ordered the horns to be taken down.

Hugo. Bless my soul! why I remember 'em in the family these fifty years. [to see them.]

Rob. For which reason, the young lady ought not

Hugo. Then is the Lady Elinor very beauteous, Robert? [beauty yet?]

Rob. Why do you ask, Hugo, do you admire

Hugo. Oh yes, Robert; I never could yet behold a beauteous woman without admiration; the setting sun may surely cheer my sight though it cannot warm my heart. [Exit.]

Rob. I hope Adela has got her fine clothes on to pass for Lady Elinor.—O, here she comes.

Enter ADELA.

Adela. Well, here I am at last, ready dressed, to pass for a fine lady; but how long shall I remain so? [cess.]

Rob. Why, you are now in the high road to suc-

Adela. Ay, but there are so many turnings and windings, that one is never sure of being right.

Rob. What, madam! with such a guide as merit.

Adela. Yes, merit is often apt to lead one astray. Oh dear! I do think the old Baron is coming.—Eh! O no! he isn't. O, I wish the meeting was over. [a woman of quality.]

Rob. You have no idea, how much you look like

Adela. Indeed! [lady.]

Rob. Nature certainly intended you for a fine

Adela. Then indeed she was very much mistaken; for I never in all my life could tell a lie, without blushing; so I am sure I shall never do for a fine lady.

Rob. But I hope you have your lesson by heart.

Adela. O ay, let me see; I am come over from Normandy, from my friends, and arrived here to-day, didn't I, sir?

Rob. You did, madam.

Adela. And anxious to pay my respects to the Baron of Oakland, left my servants on the road?

Rob. Yes, madam.

Adela. O, but there's one material circumstance I have forgot, I don't know who my father is.

Rob. That may happen in the best regulated families; however, I'll tell you, your father is the Baron de Courcy of Normandy, a great favourite of our good king, William, and you will remember that the king wrote to your father, recommending this marriage.

Adela. Well, I'll endeavour to recollect if I can, but you know it is not very strange I should forget what never happened.

Rob. Well, madam; I will go and acquaint my lady of your arrival; and pray be careful in what you say.

Adela. You may depend on it, sir, I'll not speak truth if I can possibly help it. [Exit Robert.] These gay trappings hang very much in my way, I shall make a sad fine lady I fear; I wish I could fancy myself in my every-day clothes again. When I think where I am and on what occasion, I wonder at my own confidence. Nothing but love could have inspired it, and to gain my dear Edward, I would attempt a thousand times as much.

AIR.—ADELA.

*Be mine, tender passion, soother of care,
Life's choicest blessing, shield from despair;
Do not deceive me, ah! never leave me,
Still may my bosom thy power declare.*

*In vain thy influence fools may revile,
Constancy ever gains thy smile.
And of their destiny can those complain,
Whose falsehood dares thy laws profane?*

*Resolv'd I brave all danger, to every fear a stranger;
Thy sweet rewards, oh, Love! to gain,
Then let me combat not in vain;
But in my triumph share,
Thy smiles, for which I bravely dare.*

O, here he comes; ah, it is all over, I shall never be able to get through.

Enter BARON and ROBERT.

Bar. Ah! there she is sure enough; she seems very pretty, what a fine eye she has! [Aside to Robert.]

Adela. My courage fails me, 'twill never do, I find. [Aside.]

Bar. Her coming so suddenly is so cursed unlucky, I don't know what to say to her, I have not got my speech in my pocket; she turns her back upon me; I believe she is very proud. [To Robert.]

Adela. Ay, now he is laughing at my awkwardness; I wish he'd speak first. [Aside.]

Bar. Well, come, if I must speak, here goes;—My lady, the joy—I say, my lady, the joy;—that is, joy, my lady, creates happiness; and is—is—joy my lady, which joy, I say, my lady, is—I hope your ladyship is pretty well.

Adela. Yes, pure well, I humbly thank your lordship. O lord! I am glad its over, the first word is a great matter. [Aside.]

Bar. She's wondrous condescending, Robert, considering her high blood. [Aside to Robert.] Well my lady, as you have been in such a hurry as to leave your servants on the road, and only to come here on a hop, as a body may say; I hope your ladyship will have the goodness to excuse all faults.

Adela. O yes, my lord, I'll excuse all your faults with a good deal of pleasure.

Bar. All my faults? Ay she has found me out already. [Aside.] Why, to be sure, my lady we all have faults; but if one is of a good family, you know my lady, it doesn't so much signify.

Adela. O, to be sure not, for though some people are a little awkward and bashful before company, yet I don't think they are a bit the worse for that.

Bar. No, no, that's a hit at me. [Aside.]

Adela. For you know, my lord, if one is not used to strange company, one's very apt to look like a fool.

Bar. Ye—e—s, so one is, my lady. Yes, she means me. [Aside.] But come, my lady, let's talk of something else; how does the lord, your father? I respect a man of his great family.

Adela. Ay, my lord, a great family indeed.

Bar. Oh, she's proud enough of her high blood, though. [Aside.] Well, my lady, no offence, but I fancy I may venture to say, my family is equal to his.

Adela. Why, I thought Edward told me, he was his only child. [Aside.] Indeed, my lord!

Bar. Ay, indeed, my lady; now my blood is up, I can talk to her. [Aside.] And give me leave to assure your ladyship, whatever notions you have formed of a great family, you'll not be disappointed.

Adela. Ha, ha, ha!

Bar. Ha, ha, ha! [Mimicks her.] What the devil does she mean? [Aside.]

Adela. I declare your lordship makes me laugh, ha, ha, ha!

Bar. Yes, I see I do; but I think your ladyship need not be so polite as to tell me so.

Adela. Nay, now your lordship looks angry.

Bar. Haven't I reason? What did your ladyship mean by affronting me, in telling me of your father's great family?

Adela. Why so he has, there are eleven of us, boys and girls.

Bar. [Surprised.] Eh! What?

Adela. [Aside.] O what have I said!

Bar. [Aside.] O, I suppose this is some quality joke, and that's the reason I don't understand it.

Enter EDWARD.

Bar. Come here, sirrah; there's the Lady Elinor de Courcy! go and talk to her, bid her welcome; and do you hear, don't be bashful, and dishonour your family; but attack her with your whole stock of impudence.

Edw. I bashful! no I thank you, we people of fashion know what's what. [Dancing up to Adela.] Tol de rol, I am prodigiously happy to see your ladyship; hope you left all friends in Normandy well, all right and tight, had good weather and a good ship, no sea-sickness; even we people of fashion are subject to it sometimes, as well as other people, are't we, father, eh!

Bar. Why, the boy's assurance astonishes me. Oh! he has touched her hand and caught it of her. [Adela whispers to Edward.]

Edw. [Aside to Adela.] Never mind, I'll bring you off with the old fellow. Ha, ha, ha! a monstrous good joke indeed, very well faith, very well, ha, ha, ha!

Adela. Ha, ha, ha!

Bar. (Surprised, and laughs.) Ha, ha, ha!

Edw. My dear father, Lady Elinor tells me she has joked a little with you, as we people of fashion do, without meaning anything, ha, ha, ha!

Bar. Ay, we people of fashion do, ha, ha, ha! I beg your ladyship wouldn't think of it.

Edw. Zounds, father, don't be bashful; (To Adela.) why don't you bounce a little as I do.

Bar. Well, my lady, I am now going to my great hall, where I'll receive you in form, and I believe I shall trouble your ladyship with a bit of a speech on the occasion. Come, my lady; no, no, you must not go before me; I am a baron you know, consider my dignity! [Exit.]

Edw. I say, Robert, I think we shall be too cunning for old dignity, though. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A View near the castle.

Enter LORD WILLIAM and LADY ELINOR.

Lord W. We are at length arrived at Oakland castle. Continue your disguise, madam, but a little longer.

Lady E. And do you, Palamede, recommend disguise, you, who pretend to be a lover?

AIR.—LADY ELINOR.

Hush, hush; such counsels do not give,

A lover's name prophaning;

And can her heart deceit advise,

Where mighty love is reigning?

Dissimulation's path you've trod

Too oft to go astray,

And whilst to me you point the road,

Your footsteps mark the way.

Enter CICELY.

Cice. Oh! madam, here comes the old Baron; but pray think of something melancholy, or you will certainly laugh; nature and art have made him such a strange animal, that he seems only made to be laughed at; but here he is.

Lord W. And this is the representative of our family, degrading thought! but I must dissemble. (Aside.)

Enter the BARON.

Bar. (To Cicely.) So you are an attendant on Lady Elinor de Courcy, hey! But who's that, (Pointing to Lady E.)

Cice. Oh! that's my lady's own waiting woman, and a very great favourite of my lady's, sir, I assure you.

Bar. She must be a great favourite of every body's, for she's a monstrous pretty girl; and pray who is that gentleman, is he a favourite of your lady? (Pointing to Lord W.)

Cice. O no! that is,—that is Sir Palamede, the Baron's jester.

Lord W. A curious character she has assigned me, but I must carry it on. (Aside.)

Bar. Why, jesting is a very pleasant employment to be sure, though not a very profitable one, I should think. Hark'ye friend, don't you sometimes get a bone cracked?

Lord W. You are mistaken, my lord, we jesters are privileged people; we anatomize vice and folly.

Bar. Ay, that is you cut up people by way of amusement.

Lord W. Improvement, my lord; satire well applied is the medicine of the mind.

Bar. That may be, but I don't take physic, so you may spare your trouble: and so the baron pays you for jesting, hey? that's one way of enjoying a jest, at his own expense; but I should think now, so good-natured as the world is, that he might contrive to get laughed at, gratis.

Lord W. Your lordship finds it so, I have no doubt. Now as a specimen,—

AIR.—LORD WILLIAM.

*Tho' time has from your lordship's face
Made free to steal each youthful grace,*

Yet why should you despair?

Old busts oft please the connoisseurs,

So folks of taste perhaps like yours,

And that removes your care.

'Tis true that silly girls believe

In joys that youth alone can give,

But why should you despair?

'Tis folly governs youth, you know,

And so far young you soon may grow,

So that removes your care.

Whate'er your faults, in person, mind,

(However gross) you chance to find,

Yet why should you despair?

Of flattery you must buy advice,

You're rich enough to pay the price,

So that removes your care.

Bar. Ah! that's another hit at me, but I dare not resent it. (Aside.) Well, but if you are attendants on the Lady Elinor de Courcy, where have you been all this while? [the road.]

Cice. Oh! sir, we have left my lady behind on

Bar. Your lady has left you behind, you mean; why she's here in the castle.

Lord W. Indeed!

Bar. Yes, indeed, Mr. Jest-hunter, and, I am going to give her ladyship audience in my great hall, and if we want any body to laugh at, we'll send for you; there I hit him I think. [Exit.]

Lady E. What can he mean? Give me your advice, Palamede.

Cice. Ah, madam! you forgot that Sir Palamede is a lover, and consequently advice is a commodity he doesn't deal in: but if you will take my opinion, ma'am?

Lord W. Well?

Cice. It is plain some impostor has assumed your ladyship's name, for what purpose we must endeavour to find out; therefore suppose we continue our disguise, wait on the mock lady Elinor, overturn her with respect and confound her with courtesy.

Lord W. Admirable!

Enter LEWIS, with letters for LORD WILLIAM.

Lew. Sir, the messenger is returned and brought these letters.—Ay, madam, your shadow is here before you, I find.

Lady E. Hush! not a word, I charge you; from whom are those letters? (Aside to Lewis.)

Lew. That's what I want to know. I wish you would ask Sir Palamede the question?

Lord W. Lady Elinor, every moment furnishes additional reasons for requesting you will be guided by Cicely's advice. [Exit, with Lady Elinor.]

Lew. Ah! Cicely, there they go, a pair of as true turtles as ever billed. Oh! what a fine thing mutual love is, if you would but let us follow their example, and fall in love with me in a strange place, now!—

Cice. Oh! you may spare your rhetoric, I promise you. I prize my liberty too much to be talked out of it.

AIR.—CICELY.

What blest hours, untainted by sorrow,

Does the maiden prove,

Untainted by love,

So merrily she sings thro' the day;

Dull sorrow shall threaten in vain,

The delight of art to restrain,

While from Cupid free,

Blest in liberty,

Not a sigh she blends with the strain."

As she gaily carols along,

Let me join sweet freedom's song,

*O may my heart
Ever bear a part,
In the envied jocund lay,
While merry the happy maid,
So blithely sings through the day.* [Exit.]

SCENE III.—An Apartment in the Castle.

Enter EDWARD.

Edw. Where the deuce is Adela? If we can but get married before she is discovered? but, why is she absent, she for whose sake Oakland Castle resounds with jollity, till the old walls crack to their foundations,—

AIR.—EDWARD.

*Now all in preparation,
For the nuptial celebration,
Each maiden on th' occasion,
Feels her heart in palpitation;
Now a blush, and now a sigh,
Trembling too, she knows not why,
While every lad with expectation
Finds his heart beat high.*

Enter ADELA, hastily.

Adela. Ah! it's all over, there's an end of our scheme.

Edw. How?Adela. I knew how it would happen.Edw. Did you? I wish then you told me so before.Adela. Well, it's all a scheme of your own.Edw. Mine! why you know it was your scheme.Adela. Why, didn't you first propose it?Edw. Yes, because I was sure you first thought of it.Adela. Why did I ever leave my spinning wheel for fine clothes? why did I quit my father's cottage!Edw. Because I got you a better situation, to be sure; you won't deny that I sent you to a relation's house in Sussex, six months ago, where you lived like a lady, and had nothing to learn, to read all the day long.Adela. So much the worse, improving the mind as they call it, only serves to make one lazy; in my father's cottage, industry took up all our time, wealth never came near our door.Edw. If he had, you would have been glad to have asked him in. [were our guests.]Adela. No sir! there innocence, and happiness*Edw.* 'Twas lucky they didn't take up much room, or the house wouldn't have been big enough to hold them. I fancy all the spare corners were occupied by birds and beasts.Adela. Well, I own it; we did all sleep under one roof; the family, the pigs, and poultry, all in harmony, peace and friendship.Edw. Except now and then, when you ate some of your company for dinner.Adela. (Sobbing.) Oh, oh!Edw. Why look'ye there, now that's always your way, if one says anything to you, you fall a crying!Adela. You want to break my heart! I see that.Edw. No, I don't.Adela. Yes, you do.

Enter ROBERT.

Rob. Why, what signifies quarrelling now, my lord. [rel I think.]Edw. Why, I don't know Robert, she will quar-Adela. No it, is you.Rob. Come be friends, I say, we are all in a pretty hobble to be sure.Adela. Yes, and I believe you brought us in it.Edw. 'Tis my opinion he did.Rob. Me!Adela. Yes, I am sure Edward wouldn't have thought of such a thing, if you hadn't put it into his head.Edw. No, that I shouldn't.Rob. You are both very entertaining, and so I shall leave you to yourselves.Edw. Nay, but, Robert, don't desert us.Rob. Faith I shall make my peace with your father, by falling on my knees, and asking pardon immediately.Adela. Hadn't we better do the same, Edward? for consider we are all in the same boat, and if we pull different ways we shall certainly go to the bottom. [our pilot.]Edw. That is very true, so Robert you shall be*Rob.* Well! then we must even meet the old Baron in the hall of audience, at any rate. How wonderfully does common interest beget friendship! [Exit.]Edw. Adela—Adela. Well.Edw. You forget you have been quarrelling: kiss and friends, you know. [Kiss and Exeunt.]

AIR.—EDWARD.

*While swords and shields are clashing,
Archers aiming, cudgels thrashing,
The ale to none denying,
Flaggons far and wide supplying,
With tilters fencing, wrestlers boasting,
Bonfires blazing, oxen roasting:
And all the vassals flock around,
What pleasures now abound!
Now all is preparation,
For the nuptial celebration.*

SCENE IV.—An Antique Hall.

Enter LORD WILLIAM, LADY ELINOR, CICELY, LEWIS, MARTIN and CHARLES.

Cice. Well, Charles, how did you come over from Normandy?Cha. Why, Cupid lent me his wings, and I hovered over your ship; come, come, Cicely, you know as well as I, there were more lovers aboard than the captain knew of. [tions.]Cice. I believe I had better ask no more ques-Lord W. Lewis, come hither, you are sure that not a whisper has escaped you, likely to discover Lady Elinor.Lew. Lord, sir! I have done nothing but eat and drink since I have been here, so that I have no time for talking. [to Martin.]Lord W. And our honest guide here,—(Pointing*Lew.* Oh, no sir, he has been so taken up between hunger and wonder, that he has not thought of secrets. [to do, Cicely?]Lady E. You are certain the servants know what*Cice.* Oh yes, madam, I have given them all their lessons, and you'll see them receive the mock Lady Elinor, as you could wish. But see, she comes!

Enter ADELA, EDWARD, and LADY ELINOR.

Cice. Now, madam, to complete their astonishment!

SESTETTO.

LORD WILLIAM, CICELY, and LADY ELINOR.

*By mutual love delighted,
Here fortune's fav'rites see,
In Hymen's bonds united,
How happy must they be.*

Adela. Whom can they mean? not me.Edward. Nor me.Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you for me.Charles. What grace! what an air!Lord W. A face so fair.Ci. & Ch. Born to command the happy pair.

LORD WILLIAM, CICELY, and LADY ELINOR.

*By mutual love delighted,
Here fortune's fav'rites see, &c.
In Hymen's bonds united,
How happy must they be.*

Edward. Egad, the joke we'll humour;
 Adela. With all my heart, say I.
 Edward. Who for success can do more,
Than every chance to try.
 Charles. Her courage falters, mark her eyes;
See from her cheek the colour flies.
 Cicely. Poor girl, I pity her distress,
Yet mischief says we can't do less.
 Robert. You tremble! courage: come, go on.
 Adela. Ah me! my boasted spirit's gone;
Alas! why didst thou, hapless maid,
By silly vanity betray'd,
Expose thy peace of mind to gain,
A prize, thou never canst obtain.

Enter BARON, who sits down with great ceremony, then rises, and speaks; his hat in his hand with a speech in it, which he occasionally looks at.

Bar. Hem! my Lady Elinor de Courcy; now some men in my situation would make you a set speech on the occasion; but I shall give your ladyship a touch off hand; as to your great family, my lady, all the world knows that, and as to your beauty, why that speaks for itself, as a body may say; but I say, when I consider, my lady; I say, when I consider how vain it would be to number your numberless qualifications, and when I think of your goodness, in conferring this visit, I want words, (Edward takes the speech slyly out of his father's hat.) I say, my Lady Elinor, I want words to— (Misses the speech.) Hey! egad, I do want words! I say, madam, my ladyship I, I, I, want words!

Edw. If my father had not wanted words, madam, he would have attempted to express his inexpressible satisfaction, but 'tis just as well as it is, the less that's said, the more there is to guess at.

Enter Servant.

Ser. My lord! a gentleman wishes to speak with you immediately.

Bar. I come to him, [Exit Servant.] I declare, my lady! I am quite ashamed that I—

Adela. O, pray my lord make no apologies! you know you want words, and it is quite time to have done, when one hasn't any more to say.

Bar. Ay, my lady, but I had a great deal more to say, if I hadn't lost my speech. [Aside and exit.]

Adela. (To Edward.) I can't make out the meaning of all this, I don't understand the jest!

Edw. Nor I, upon my soul, but I'll try to find it out, for my part I think we are in a dream.

Adela. I am sure it is a very pleasant one, I haven't the least desire to be waked from it.

LORD WILLIAM, CICELY, LADY ELINOR, CHARLES and ROBERT.

Alas! behold the silly maid,
By pride, by vanity betray'd:
Expose her peace of mind, to gain
A prize she never can obtain. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Room in the Castle.

Enter BARON and DE COURCY.

Bar. This way, my lord, this way; I am glad to see your lordship.

De Cour. Hush, my lord! remember that I am here in disguise; I must depend on your friendship, to conceal me from my sister's attendants, till I am revenged on Sir Palamede.

Bar. And so this Sir Palamede—

De Cour. He has long privately loved my sister, but the mean advantage he has now taken of our confidence in him,—

Bar. O! hang him, an abusive sneering knave, to pass on me for your lordship's jester: I wish I had known this.

De Cour. But we must be cautious. (Laughing within.) Hark! what noise is that?

Bar. Only my vassals carousing, in consequence of this marriage of your sister's in our family.

De Cour. The sounds of festivity but ill accord with my feelings; a more retired apartment might suit our purpose better.

Bar. Certainly, my lord, private concerns must give way to public justice. [Exit.]

SCENE VI.—The kitchen, tenants and servants discovered at different tables.

AIR.—ROBERT.

Now mighty roast beef is the Englishman's food,
It ennobles our veins, and enriches our blood,
Our soldiers are brave, and our barons are good,
Oh! the roast beef of Old England, and Oh! the Old English roast beef.

Our barons, my boys, are robust, stout and strong,
And keep open house with good cheer all day long,
Which make their plump tenants rejoice in this song,
Oh! the roast beef, &c.

Enter LORD WILLIAM, LADY ELINOR and CICELY.

Rob. Come, my lads and lasses, at this feast every one must contribute to the common-stock of merriment, that is the only reckoning we have to pay.

FINALE.—LADY ELINOR and CICELY.

Love's sweet voice to Hymen speaking,
Breathing through the dulcet flute;
List'ning joy the accents speaking,
Bids complaining care be mute.

Chorus. High above dull sorrow's level,
Now the tide of joy display;
Love and Hymen bid us revel,
Bid us hail this happy day.

Lord W. Let the vine's enlivening treasure,
Rising kiss the goblet's brim,
Till we see exulting pleasure,
On the smiling surface swim.

Chorus. High above dull sorrow's level,
Now the generous tide display;
'Tis gay Bacchus bids us revel,
Bids us hail this happy day.

Cicely. While the merry bells resounding,
Shall in pleasure's chorus chime,
From the trembling floor rebounding,
Let the varied dance beat time.

Chorus. High above dull sorrow's level,
Now the tide of joy display;
Love and Hymen bid us revel,
Bid us hail this happy day.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in the Castle.

Enter DE COURCY and CHARLES.

De Cour. You are sure that the soldiers are placed at every avenue to the castle?

Char. My lord, it is impossible Sir Palamede should escape.

De Cour. And you say, you observed him this evening?

Char. I did, my lord; and, notwithstanding he appeared to join the general festivity, yet, at times, he sighed so piteously, that I could not help saying to myself, your honour could never find in your heart to kill so brave a gentleman.

De Cour. Leave me, and be ready at the time appointed. And shall this slave boast a virtue to which I am a stranger; shall his rugged heart feel compassion for wretchedness, whilst I, unmoved, doom to destruction, him, who has been my companion, my friend, my brother! (Aside.) Poor Palamede! I will see him and converse with him: perhaps he is not so guilty as he appears; at least, let me remember that he is unfortunate. [Exit.]

Char. There spoke the generous feeling of De Courcy.

AIR.—CHARLES.

*Where'er true valour can its power display,
There meek-ey'd pity, anxious still to bless,
With jealous honour holds divided sway,
And from avenging anger shields distress.
Ne'er shall the sword of honour dare invade
The spell-bound spot where pity drops a tear;
For where misfortune casts her sacred shade,
There deepest injury must disappear.*

Enter DE COURCY and BARON.

Bar. Oh, my Lord de Courcy, I am glad I have found you; I have strange news to tell you; only think, my lord, when I thought my vassals had retired fatigued, and gone dutifully drunk to bed, the whole village is up and scouring their old helmets and armour; I am sure there's mischief in the wind when these rascals are so industrious.

De Cour. Compose yourself, my lord; you seem quite alarmed.

Bar. Alarmed, my lord? Why, though I am naturally as brave as a lion, yet, I do not like to be taken thus by surprise; it is that which alarms me; and Sir Palamede, I am sure, is at the bottom of this.

De Cour. Perhaps, then, he has heard of my arrival, and finding himself discovered, means to oppose force by force.

Bar. You are right, my lord; he has been sending and receiving letters and messages all night in a continual ebb and flow of mischief.

De Cour. Sdeath! can he descend so low as to mislead the rabble into revolt? The traitor shall perish: but where is my sister?

Bar. I don't know, my lord, but here comes my son, I dare say he'll tell you.

De Cour. Do not discover me yet, even to him.

Bar. Why, my lord, as he is shortly to be related to your lordship, I can't see that it signifies; but it shall be as you please: harkye, sirrah! come here, where is Lady Elinor?

Enter EDWARD.

Edw. In her own room; I took her a cup of wine just now, but the dear creature preferred ale: she seems prodigiously fond of ale.

De Cour. Who? Lady Elinor, sir?

Edw. Yes, sir; Lady Elinor, my wife that is to be; what have you to say to that, sir?

De Cour. Pardon me, sir, but are you assured of the lady's affections?

Bar. Ay, sirrah! are you sure that she is fond of you? [me!]

Edw. Fond of me? Ha, ha, ha! D—me, look at De Cour. I believe she was once attached to another, one Sir Palamede.

Edw. I believe not friend; and my reason for thinking so, is that the dear little wench never saw Sir Palamede in all her life.

De Cour. Sir, when you name that lady, you should remember the respect due to her family.

Edw. (Snaps his finger.) That for her family! she is a bud of beauty, which I have gathered to wear next my heart, and the devil may take the rest of the family tree for me: here she comes, i'faith!

Enter ADELA.

Ah! my dear Lady Elinor!

De Cour. Astonishment! This must be some plot of Palamede's. (Aside.)

Bar. Why, my lord, your sister does not seem to know you: ah! this is another quality joke, now, I'll be sworn.

De Cour. He is deceived too. (Aside.)

Bar. Why, my lord, I think there's a very strong family likeness between you.

De Cour. I perceive, my lord, you are imposed on, but you shall soon be avenged. [Exit.]

Bar. How imposed on? Oh! he means they have been joking on me; ay! but he was serious; egad! I believe I should be angry, but, then, if I should be in the wrong—I'll e'en go after him and ask whether I ought to be in a passion or not. [Exit.]

Adela. Why, I say, Edward, the Lady Elinor's attendants did call me their lady for the joke's sake; yet it must be soon out that I am myself.

Edw. That's not unlikely.

Adela. And if Lady Elinor should be as handsome as we have heard, and your father should be very pressing—

Edw. Then, you think, I should desert you.

Adela. Your deserting me would then be called by another name, for fine folks have fine names for bad actions, to make them seem like good ones.

Edw. Why, lookye, my dear Adela, I was always a blundering fellow at a fine speech; (ecod! I am like my father for that,) but if I thought my being a nobleman would make me love you a jot the less, deuce take me if I had not rather remain a ploughman all my life! Now do you believe me?

Adela. I do.

AIR.—ADELA.

*Love from the heart, all its danger concealing,
Reason, they say, the fond spell can remove;
But bliss kindly stealing,
Still the delusion so sweet may I prove!*

*For should you betray me, your falsehood perceiving,
Too well do I love you, the peril to shun:
So, if you must cheat me, still further deceiving,
Oh! blinded by hope, to the last leads me on.*

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Sea and a light-house.

Enter LADY ELINOR.

Lady E. Why did I not insist on Sir Palamede explaining this mystery? (Retires.)

Enter LORD WILLIAM.

Lord W. Welcome, thrice welcome, ye scenes which remind me of happier days; every step I take, every object of remembrance, warms me with new incitements to assert my birthright. (Lady Elinor comes forward.) How? Lady Elinor!

Lady E. Oh, Palamede! for heaven's sake, why this mystery?

Lord W. Spare me the explanation of what is yet improper for you to know; shew me esteem by confiding in my honour: he who is beloved by you cannot act unworthily.

Lady E. I am uneasy only on your account; therefore, do not flatter me, or keep me longer in suspense.

Lord W. To-night is the crisis of my fate; and to-morrow's sun shall dispel the cloud of mystery in which it is involved.

DUETT.—LORD WILLIAM and LADY ELINOR.

Lady E. Dangers unknown impending, Doubt multiplies my fears,

Lord W. *Laurels my steps attending,
Shall spring from beauty's tears.*

Lady E. Thus in suspense to leave thee,

Lord W. Think'st thou I can deceive thee?

Lady E. To leave thee.

Lord W. To leave thee.

Both. Say, wilt thou still prove true?

Yes, I will still prove true.

And must we bid adieu? [Exit Lady E.]

Lord W. Cruel concealment! yet it must be so; one only have I trusted in this castle, and he is here.

Enter HUGO.

Hugo. Ah! my dear young master, what pleasure does your old servant feel, in seeing you once more in your native land! Heaven help us! what strange events have happened since the good baron, your father quitted England. I long to hear your adventures in France.

Lord W. It is a long story, my friend.

Hugo. So much the better, I like long stories; I often tell long stories myself: remembrance forms the old man's banquet, and let the viands be ever so ordinary, memory cooks them to his liking.

Lord W. Hugo, this is no time for words, I must support my claim to the honors of my ancestors, Hugo. What, my lord? [and this hour—

Lord W. Hear me! I have written to an old and allied friend of my father's, a powerful nobleman, and near the king's person; he has assured me of my sovereign's favour, and I expect hourly letters from the king, acknowledging me Baron of Oak-

Hugo. Well, my lord. [land.

Lord W. In the meantime my zealous friend has advised me to surprise the castle without delay, to mar all resistance to the king's commands.

Hugo. Surprise the castle! Why, my lord, I'll fight as long as I can, (draws his sword) but here are only two of us.

Lord W. Good old man! I shall not need your assistance: a guard of a hundred chosen troops sent by the good lord Hubert, entered the village in the dusk of the evening; the news of my return is received by the vassals with transport, and they are this moment arming in my cause.

Hugo. Then, why do we stay here? I'll go and get on my armour.

Lord W. It is not yet time; the tolling of the curfew will give me notice when all is ready; but tell me, Hugo, was not my father's armour kept in an apartment in that tower?

Hugo. Yes, my lord, in that very apartment over the wine-cellar. [from thence?

Lord W. And has the armour ever been removed Hugo. Never, I'll answer for that; the room has been shut up these ten years past to my knowledge. I have still preserved my key to the door which leads to it through the long gallery.

Lord W. Give it me: (Hugo gives a key) now let us be gone.

Hugo. Excuse me, my lord; I'll follow you to battle, but not into that apartment.

Lord W. Why not?

Hugo. Ah, my lord! I tremble at the thoughts of it; no living soul has entered that room for these ten years; voices have been heard and lights seen; in short, it is haunted; and though I loved your worthy father when he was alive, I—I—I—

Lord W. By heavens! a light appears through the casement at this moment. [be rash.

Hugo. And so there does: my dear master, don't

Lord W. Hark! I hear a noise from the tower: wait for me here, (draws) and beware your fears do not betray you. [Unlocks the door and exit.

Hugo. My lord, my dear lord William, don't leave me alone. He's gone. Oh! that cursed haunted chamber! I can't stay near it; I—I find the only means of preserving my courage is to carry it along with me. [Exit.

Enter BARON.

Bar. Why, sure, that was old Hugo; yes, and with his sword drawn. Oh! he's in the plot. O lord, O lord! there's the spirit playing his illumination tricks in the haunted chamber. Oh! how I long to attack this old rogue, Hugo! because I am sure I could beat him; ay! but then I dare not venture alone: valour with me is of a companionable nature, and don't like solitude; my courage is something like the vine, to produce good fruit it must be well supported. Hey! sure I hear somebody coming out of my wine-cellar! Egad! I'll step aside; I may make some discoveries here. (Retires.)

Enter ROBERT and MARTIN from the cellar-door.

Rob. Well, my boy, now I have made you free of our cellar.

Mar. Give me your hand, give me your hand, Master Robert; I'll live and die with you; of all the inventions that ever were thought of there's none to my mind like good eating and drinking.

Rob. And for that, Martin, I'll match all Kent. I know the privilege of a diligent butler too well to suffer my master to taste wine till I have approved

Bar. (Aside.) Oh, the villain! [of it.

Mar. That's right, that's right; give me your hand again. O Master Robert, what a happy dog you are to have the command of such a wine-cellar.

Rob. Ay, Martin! there I sit, absolute monarch of all the prostrate bottles.

Bar. (Aside.) Mighty well! but I'll be even with you, rascals. [Exit into the cellar.

Enter Servant.

Rob. Well, can you find friend Lewis in the gar-

Serv. No, Master Robert. [den?

Rob. He has certainly lost his way; let us go in search of him, Martin.

Mar. Ay, Master Robert! do you go one way, and I'll go the other.

Rob. And, to prevent accidents, I'll lock the cellar-door for the present, we'll soon return and finish the evening. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Room in the Castle.

Enter LADY ELINOR and CICELY.

Lady E. And so the mock Lady Elinor is coming, Cicely? Yet, how can I trifle thus, while Palamede's fate is in suspense?

AIR.—LADY ELINOR.

*Dread parent of despair,
Thou tyrant of my mind,
Who ling'ring seem'st to spare,
To point the worst behind.*

*At once complete my woe
Display thy ills in store,
Ah! quickly strike the blow!
'Tis all that I implore.*

Cice. Ah, madam! it must be a sad thing to be of a good family. Thank heaven, I, who have no noble blood in my veins, have the dearest of all privileges, that of chusing a husband for myself.

AIR.—CICELY.

*From high birth and all its fetters,
My kind stars my lot remove;
I shall envy not my betters,
Give me but the youth I love.*

*Love's the riches of the poor,
A prize that wealth can ne'er procure;
My rich mistress fain would be,
Just as poor as Cicely.
From high birth, &c.*

Enter ADELA and ROBERT.

Adela. These waiting maids pester me to death with questions: here they are again.

Cice. (Aside to Lady Elinor.) Now, madam, to throw her off her guard, endeavour to provoke her, and gratify your curiosity.

Lady E. Why, I should like it, but she looks as if she could beat me; pray, madam, would your ladyship please to go to bed?

Adela. No, my ladyship does not please to go to bed. [bed.

Rob. No, her ladyship does not please to go to Lady E. It is my duty to wait on your ladyship.

Adela. Well, wait in another room then.

Lady E. Pray my lady forgive me.

Adela. No, I will not forgive you! I can't bear it. (Aside.) Begone, I discharge you my service.

DUETT.—ELINOR and ADELA.

Adela. Begone; I discharge you! away from my sight!

In my presence appear never after this night.

Lady E. Your ladyship's orders with grief I obey;
Yet ere I depart a few words may I say?

Adela. I'll try to keep my passion under,
And treat the flirt with silent scorn.

Lady E. You're too poor to move my rage.

Adela. Prithce now this wrath assuage.

Lady E. How the saucy creature stares!

Adela. Tell me, madam, why these airs.

Both. Tho' pride and folly should intrude,
They can't good breeding pain;
Their silly jests so bold and rude,
Raise laughter and disdain.

Of rank and education,
What wretched imitation;
Contempt must sure befall you,
You vain—what shall I call you?
Tho' at scolding so alert,
I fancy now she's really hurt. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber in the Tower.

Enter LORD WILLIAM.

Lord Wil. Now to the object of my search.
(Opens the doors and discovers his father's armour.)
Kind fortune, I thank thee! sacred to the defence of a just cause, the shield of the father shall protect his son, fighting for the rights of an illustrious family.

AIR.—LORD WILLIAM.

Spirit of my sainted sire,
With success my soul inspire,
Deeds of glory done by thee
In mem'ry's mirror now I see.
Let the great examples raise
Valour's purest brightest blaze,
Till the prowess of my arm
The eye of fickle conquest charm.
And fame shall, when the battle's won,
Declare that I am all thy son.
Spirit of my sainted sire,
With success my soul inspire.
The inspiration now I feel,
The ardent glow of patriot zeal,
Brighter prospects now arise,
The voice of conquest rend the skies. [Exit.]

Enter ROBERT and LEWIS.

Rob. Well, Lewis; since we have met with you at last, I'll give you a specimen of English hospitality: we have plenty of liquor in the cellar underneath, and, egad, we'll make a night of it.

Lew. That's right, Master Robert, and I love good eating and drinking, so I'll drink with you if it is only to shew you I like your company.

Mar. But you have not told me yet about this haunted tower.

Lew. Well, I declare I'm glad of it for your sake, for I am sure you must be dry after telling such a long story.

Rob. Come, my boys, lend me a hand. (They bring in a table with wine and ale.)

Lew. What have we got here?

Rob. Some of the best wine in Christendom, my lad; ay, and some of the best ale too, which to me, is the best of all liquors; the scurvy old knave, my master, who I dare say is a-bed and asleep, little thinks the honour we are doing to his cellar.

Lew. and Mar. Ha, ha, ha!

Rob. Now for it, my boys; here's to ye.

CATCH.—ROBERT, &c. &c.

As now we're met, a jolly set,
A fig for sack or sherry;
Our ale we'll drink,
And our cans we'll clink,
And we'll be wond'rous merry.

Merry, my hearts—merry, my boys,
We'll sing with a hey down derry,
The baron himself knows no such joys,
We are so wond'rous merry.

Rob. Come, drink about, (sings.) "And we'll be wond'rous merry."

Lord W. (Behind.) "And we'll be wond'rous
merry."

Rob. Hey day! what's that?

Lew. That? oh! that's an echo, I suppose.

Rob. An echo! I never observed one here, I—

Mar. O Master Robert, isn't this the chamber you said was haunted?

Lew. Egad then, it is haunted by a jolly spirit;
so here's to the ghost! (sings) "And we'll be wond'rous merry."

Lord W. (Behind.) "And we'll be wond'rous
merry." (A noise underneath.)

Rob. What think you now?

Lew. Why I think there's a damned noise in the cellar. (The trap door that Robert had pointed to is thrown open and knocks down the table, which they had placed on it, and the Baron appears coming through it.)

Bar. Gentlemen, your most obedient; pray don't let me disturb you; pray go on; my butler here, sets you a good example; so pray make free with my property: upon my life, this is a very pretty chamber to be haunted; the ghost has an excellent choice, but I never knew that your troubled spirits were such consumers of ale and wine before. (A knocking at the door.) Pray who is that? Is it any friend of your's, gentlemen?

Mar. Yes, please your worshipful honour, it is only Hubert with the supper.

Bar. O! Hubert with the supper, is it? desire him to walk in. (The Baron opens the door. Enter Hubert with some beef and bread.) Come in, Hubert, here are none but friends. O never mind me, come, put the supper on the table. (Hubert puts it on the table, and exit.) And now, gentlemen, sit down and eat heartily.

Lew. I am much obliged to your honour, but I am not hungry now.

Rob. If but your honour would but hear me.

Baron. O! with a great deal of pleasure, honest Robert. I was but ill situated in the cellar to hear that catch you sung just now. Rogues! rascals! robbers! whose only sign of fear is, you can't bear your own consciences, so you are afraid of spirits; where's the echo you conjur'd up just now?

Rob. Indeed, my lord, we heard an echo.

Bar. Did you? well, sing again then, and let me hear it. I'll shew you a pattern of resolution, you rascallions.

Rob. Now mark, my lord. (Sings.) "And we'll be wond'rous merry."

Lord W. (Behind in Robert's voice.) "And we'll be wond'rous merry."

Bar. (Alarmed.) Egad, but it's an odd sort of an echo.

Lew. Suppose your honour was to speak to it, perhaps it would answer you civilly.

Bar. O! I dare say it will have a proper respect for my dignity; what are you, ghost or spirit?

Lord W. (In the Baron's voice.) "Ghost or spirit."

Bar. (Very much frightened.) O lord! O lord!
why, why, don't some of you speak to me? what —what—are you afraid of? Robert, what makes you look so pale? For my part—I—I—I don't believe in apparitions: do you, friend? (To Lew.)

Hugo. (Behind.) Lord William, my dear master, Lord William!

Rob. Hark, my lord; there's a voice.

Bar. Oh! I am a lost man; but—why do you all tremble so? (A bell tolls.) Oh lord! there's the curfew going at this hour.

(Lord William throws open the doors, and walks with great solemnity in his father's armour, and exit.)

Bar. O, dear me, it is the old Baron's ghost! I have seen him wear that shield and helmet a thousand times.

Lew. (Looking after Lord W.) O, my lord; here's more miracles! the spirit has met some armed men, and they are all fighting: that's right, that's right; well done, my boys; d— they have kill'd the ghost, huzza.

All. Huzza! huzza!

Bar. Egad, that's rare news; come, let's go and see what it's all about. I'll lead the way, do you follow me—hey—no, Robert, you shall go first; no, no, stop, come back; we'll all go together, and then we can take care of one another.

[Exeunt, alarmed.]

SCENE V.—An Apartment in the Castle.

Enter EDWARD and ADELA.

Adela. O Edward! I am frightened to death! it was an unlucky day for us when I turned fine lady, and nothing but unlucky days have we had ever since.

Edw. Lucky or unlucky, I fancy there's an end of them now. Bad as the days were, I wish they were to come over again.

Enter BARON.

Bar. O dear, O dear, they are all at it.

Edw. What! what are they at?

Bar. Why fighting. O my lady Elinor, why don't you order your soldiers to fall on? O how I hate a man that will not fight.

Adela. What, is anybody killed, my lord?

Bar. Killed, why we shall all be killed, men, women and children.

Enter LADY ELINOR.

Lady E. For shame, my lord; why do you stand idle here? your soldiers call on you to head them; where's my brother?

Bar. Your brother, why what signifies your brother: why they are thirty thousand strong.

Lady E. I mean the lord de Courcy. [Exit.]

Bar. The lord de Courcy? why an't you—

Adela. O, no, indeed, my lord, I am not; I am quite sick of passing for a fine lady.

Enter Servant.

Ser. My lord, you must come immediately, they are forcing the castle gates! [Exit.]

Bar. Forcing the castle gates! O lord, I shall die of a fright! and never live to to be kill'd.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—A Hall.

Enter EDWARD and ADELA,

Edw. They have gained the citadel, and we shall be put to the sword.

Enter DE COURCY, LORD WILLIAM, and Knights.

De Cour. Once more, my noble friend, I congratulate you on your success.

Enter LADY ELINOR, CICELY, and CHARLES.

Lady E. My brother!

De Cour. My father contracted you in marriage to the young Baron of Oakland; I present him to you, I deemed him my enemy till I knew him: it is now my pride to call him my friend.

Lord W. This is a more valuable present, my lord, than the life you gave me, when overpowered by your soldiers in the garden you still thought me your enemy.

Enter the BARON, between two armed men.

Bar. O dear, spare my life, and I'll agree to any terms.

Adela. (To Lord William.) Then, sir, begging your pardon for my boldness, I suppose you are the ghost we heard of?

Bar. Yes, and you, I suppose are the sham lady Elinor we have heard of; egad, now I find how things are, I have reason to be in a passion.

Lord W. You, sir, (to the Baron,) have a right to an explanation; I scorn to owe my title to force. I am confirmed by my sovereign in the dignity and estates of my father: be assured, however, that I shall be ambitious to prove myself your friend.

Bar. And that's an ambition I shall be very glad to gratify you in.

Lord W. (To Edw. and Adela.) As for this young couple, I hope I shall have the satisfaction of adding to their store of Hymen's comforts.

Edw. Thank you, my lord; I begin to be much less inclined to nobility after the bustle I have seen to-night, and I'm fain to comfort myself with the old remark, "that a title cannot bestow happiness."

Adela. Yes, but I can though; there is a title for which I'd give up all others, it is the wife of my Edward.

Lady E. My fluttering heart cannot express the joy it feels at your triumph. (To Lord William.)

Lord W. A triumph crowned by the possession of that heart which now approves it.

FINALE.

*The banished ills of heretofore
At happy distance viewing;
Of the past we'll think no more,
While future bliss pursuing.*

*When engaged in pleasure's chase,
Never look behind you;
Back if you should turn your face,
Misfortune's dust may blind you.*

LORD WILLIAM and LADY ELINOR.

*Here let the titled wedded pair,
A lesson take from humble life;
Nor in the lady and the lord,
Forget the husband, and the wife.
Ne'er shall th' example us reprove,
Whose proudest boast shall be our love.*

SESTETTO.

*The present hour is ever ready,
To assume a smiling face;
If to wisdom's counsels steady,
Pleasure's precepts you embrace.*

Edward. Tho' no more I am a lord,
Give my love but this reward,
Rank and title I forego.

Adela. No, my Edward, say not so.

CHORUS.

The banished ills, &c.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter CHARLOTTE WELDON, in man's clothes, following LUCY.

Lucy. What will this come to? what can it end in? You have persuaded me to leave dear England, and dearer London, the place of the world most worthy living in, to follow you, a husband-hunting, into America: I thought husbands grew in these plantations.

Char. Why, so they do, as thick as oranges ripening one under another. Week after week they drop into some woman's mouth. 'Tis but a little patience, spreading your apron in expectation, and one of them will fall into your lap at last.

Lucy. Ay, say you so, indeed?

Char. But you have left dear London, you say; pray, what have you left in London that was very dear to you, that had not left you before?

Lucy. Speak for yourself, sister.

Char. Nay, I'll keep you in countenance. The young fellows, you know, the dearest part of the town, and without whom London had been a wilderness to you and me, had forsaken us a great while.

Lucy. Forsaken us! I don't know that ever they Char. Forsaken us the worst way, child; that is, did not think us worth having: they neglected us, no longer designed upon us, they were tired of us. Women in London are like the rich silks, they are out of fashion a great while before they wear out.

Lucy. The devil take the fashion, I say.

Char. You may tumble them over and over at their first coming up, and never disparage their price; but they fall upon wearing immediately, lower and lower in their value, till they come to the broker at last. To prevent which, with what youth and beauty were left, some experience, and the small remainder of fifteen hundred pounds a piece, which amounted to bare two hundred between us both, I persuaded you to bring your person for a venture to the Indies. Everything has succeeded in our voyage: I pass for your brother; one of the richest planters here happening to die just as we landed, I have claimed kindred with him; so without making his will, he has left us the credit of his relation to trade upon: we pass for his cousins, coming here to Surinam chiefly upon his invitation: we live in reputation; have the best acquaintance in the place; and we shall see our account in't, I warrant you.

Lucy. I must rely upon you.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT.

Widow L. Mr. Weldon, your servant. Your servant, Mrs. Lucy: I am an ill visitor, but 'tis not too late, I hope, to bid you welcome to this side of the world. (Salutes Lucy.)

Char. 'Gadso! I beg your pardon, widow, I should have done the civilities of my house before; but, as you say, 'tis not too late, I hope. (Going to kiss her.)

Widow L. What, you think now this was a civil way of begging a kiss; and by my troth, if it were, I see no harm in't: 'tis a pitiful favour indeed that is not worth asking for; though I have known a woman speak plainer before now, and not understood neither.

Char. Not under my roof. Have at you widow.

Widow L. Why, that's well said; spoke like a younger brother, that deserves to have a widow. (Char. kisses her.) You're a younger brother, I know by your kissing.

Char. How so, pray?

Widow L. Why, you kiss as if you expected to be paid for't. You stick so close, there's no getting rid of you.

Char. I am akin to a younger brother.

Widow L. So much the better: we widows are commonly the better for younger brothers.

Lucy. Better or worse, most of you. But you won't be much the better for him, I can tell you. (Aside.)

Char. I was a younger brother; but an uncle of my mother's has maliciously left me an estate, and I'm afraid, spoiled my fortune.

Widow L. No, no; an estate will never spoil your fortune; I have a good estate myself, thank heaven and a kind husband that left it behind him.

Char. Thank heaven that took him away from it, widow, and left you behind him.

Widow L. Nay, heaven's will must be done; he's in a better place.

Char. A better place for you, no doubt on't. Now you may look about you; choose for yourself, Mrs. Lackitt, that's your business; for I know you design to marry again.

Widow L. Nay, I'll do nothing rashly; I'll resolve against nothing. The devil, they say, is very busy upon these occasions, especially with the widows. But, if I am to be tempted, it must be with a young man, I promise you. Mrs. Lucy, your brother is a very pleasant gentleman; I came about business to him, but he turns everything into merriment.

Char. Business, Mrs. Lackitt? Then I know you would have me to yourself. Pray, leave us together, sister. [Exit Lucy.] What am I drawing upon myself here? (Aside.)

Widow L. You have taken a very pretty house here; everything so neat about you already. I hear you are laying out for a plantation.

Char. Why, yes, truly, I like the country, and would buy a plantation, if I could reasonably.

Widow L. Oh! by all means, reasonably.

Char. If I could have one to my mind, I would think of settling among you.

Widow L. Oh! you can't do better. Indeed, we can't pretend to have so good company for you as you had in England; but we shall make very much of you. For my own part, I assure you, I shall think myself very happy to be more particularly known to you.

Char. Dear Mrs. Lackitt, you do me too much honour.

Widow L. Then as to a plantation, Mr. Weldon, you know I have several to dispose of. Mr. Lackitt, I thank him, has left, though I say it, the richest widow upon the place; therefore, I may afford to use you better than other people can. You shall have one upon any reasonable terms, Mr. Weldon. Well, I like that name of your's exceedingly, Mr. Weldon.

Char. My name?

Widow L. Oh, exceedingly! If anything could persuade me to alter my own name, I verily believe nothing in the world would do it so soon as to be called Mrs. Weldon.

Char. I'm glad you like my name.

Widow L. Of all things. But then there's the misfortune, one cannot change one's name without changing one's condition.

Char. You hardly think it worth that, I believe.

Widow L. Think it worth what, sir? changing my condition? indeed, sir, I think it worth everything. But, alas! Mr. Weldon, I have buried my poor dear husband but six weeks; poor dear creature! I loved him sincerely: 'tis too soon to think of changing one's condition yet; indeed it is: pray don't desire it of me; not but that you may persuade me to anything sooner than any person in the world—

Char. Who, I, Mrs. Lackitt?

Widow L. Indeed you may, Mr. Weldon, sooner than any man living. Lord! there's a great deal in saving a decency; I never minded it before. Well, I am glad you spoke first, to excuse my modesty. Now I will own to you (but I won't confess neither,) I have had a great respect for you a great while. I beg your pardon, sir; and I must declare to you, indeed I must, if you desire to dispose of all I have in the world, in an honourable way, my fortune and person, (if you won't understand me without telling you so,) are both at your service. 'Gadso! another time—

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. So, Mrs. Lackitt, your widowhood's weaning apace; I see which way 'tis going. Weldon, you're a happy man. The women and their favours come home to you.

Widow L. A fiddle of favour, Mr. Stanmore; I am a lone woman, you know it, left in a great deal of business, and business must be followed or lost. I have several stocks and plantations upon my hands, and other things to dispose of, which Mr. Weldon may have occasion for.

Char. We were just upon the brink of a bargain as you came in.

Stan. Let me drive it on for you.

Char. So you must, I believe, you or somebody for me.

Stan. I'll stand by you: I understand more of this business than you can pretend to.

Char. I don't pretend to it; 'tis quite out of my way, indeed.

Stan. If the widow gets you to herself, she will certainly be too hard for you: I know her of old; she has no conscience in a corner; a very Jew in a bargain.

Char. Is this true, widow?

Widow L. Speak as you find, Mr. Weldon; I have offered you very fair; think upon't, and let me hear of you; the sooner the better, Mr. Weldon.

[Exit.]

Stan. I assure you, my friend, she'll cheat you if she can.

Char. I don't know that, but I can cheat her if I will.

Stan. Cheat her! How?

Char. I can marry her; and then I am sure I have it in my power to cheat her.

Stan. Can you marry her?

Char. Yes, faith! so she says: her pretty person and fortune (which, one with the other, you know, are not contemptible,) are both at my service.

Stan. Contemptible! very considerable, egad! very desirable; why, she's worth twenty thousand pounds, man; a clear estate; no charge upon't, but a boobily son. He, indeed, was to have half; but his father begot him, and she breeds him up not to know or have more than she has a mind to.

Char. There's a great deal to be made of this. (Musing.)

Stan. A handsome fortune may be made on't; and I advise you to't by all means.

Char. To marry her! an old wanton witch! I hate her.

Stan. No matter for that; let her go to the devil for you. She'll cheat her son of a good estate for you: that's a perquisite of a widow's portion always.

Char. I have a design, and will follow her at least, till I have a pennyworth of the plantation.

Stan. I speak as a friend when I advise you to marry her, for 'tis directly against the interest of my own family. My cousin Jack has belaboured her a good while that way.

Char. What! honest Jack? I'll not hinder him. I'll give over the thoughts of her.

Stan. He'll make nothing on't; she does not care for him. I'm glad you have her in your power.

Char. I may be able to serve him.

Stan. Here's a ship come into the river; I was in hopes it had been from England.

Char. From England?

Stan. No; I was disappointed; I long to see this handsome cousin of your's: the picture you gave me of her has charmed me.

Char. You'll see whether it has flattered her or no, in a little time. If she be recovered of that illness that was the reason of her staying behind us, I know she will come with the first opportunity. We shall see her, or hear of her death.

Stan. We'll hope the best. The ships from England are expected every day.

Char. What ship is this?

Stan. A rover, a buccaneer, a trader in slaves: that's the commodity we deal in, you know. If you have a curiosity to see our manner of marketing, I'll wait upon you.

Char. We'll take my sister with us. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An open Place.

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR and BLANDFORD.

Lieut. There's no resisting your fortune, Blandford; you draw all the prizes.

Bland. I draw for our lord governor; you know his fortune favours me.

Lieut. I grudge him nothing this time; but if fortune had favoured me in the last sale, the fair slave had been mine; Clemene had been mine.

Bland. Are you still in love with her?

Lieut. Every day more in love with her.

Enter CAPTAIN DRIVER, teased and pulled about by WIDOW LACKITT and several Planters, at one door; at another, CHARLOTTE WELDON, dressed in man's clothes, LUCY, STANMORE, and JACK STANMORE.

Widow L. Here have I six slaves in my lot, and not a man among them; all women and children; what can I do with 'em, Captain?

1 Plan. I have all men in mine. Pray, Captain, let the men and women be mingled together, for the good of the plantation.

2 Plan. Ay, ay; a man and a woman, Captain, for the good of the plantation.

Capt. D. Let them mingle together, and be d—d; what care I. Would you have me a pimp for the good of the plantation?

1 Plan. I am a constant customer, Captain.

Widow L. I am always ready money to you, Captain.

1 Plan. For that matter, mistress, my money is as ready as your's.

Widow L. Pray hear me, Captain.

Capt. D. Look you, I have done my part by you; I have brought the number of slaves I bargained for; if your lots have not pleased you, you must draw again among yourselves.

3 Plan. I am contented with my lot.

4 Plan. I am very well satisfied.

3 Plan. We'll have no drawing again.

Widow L. Ay, but—

Capt. D. Do you hear, mistress? you may hold your tongue; for my part, I expect my money.

Widow L. Captain, nobody questions or scruples the payment; but I won't hold my tongue; 'tis too much to pray and pay too; one may speak for one's own, I hope.

Capt. D. Well, what would you say?

Widow L. I say no more than I can make out.

Capt. D. Out with it then.

Widow L. I say things have not been so fair carried as they might have been. How do I know but you have juggled together in my absence? You drew the lots before I came, I'm sure.

Capt. D. That's your own fault, mistress; you might have come sooner.

Widow L. Then here's a prince, as they say, among the slaves, and you set him down to go as a common man.

Capt. D. I'll warrant you.

Widow L. Sir, you're a scurvy fellow, to talk at this rate to me. If my husband were alive, gads-bodikins! you would not use me so. Marry come up here, who are you, I trow? You begin to think yourself a captain, forsooth, because we call you so. You forget yourself as fast as you can; but I remember you; I know you for a pitiful, paltry fellow as you are, an upstart to prosperity; one that is but just come acquainted with cleanliness, and that never saw five shillings of your own without deserving to be hanged for them.

Lieut. She has given you a broadside, Captain; you'll stand up to her.

Capt. D. Hang her! I'll come no nearer.

Widow L. By this good light, it would make a woman do a thing she never designed; marry again, though she were sure to repent it, and be revenged of such a—

[serve you?]

Jack S. What's the matter, Mrs. Lackitt? can I

Widow L. No, no; you can't serve me: you are for serving yourself, I'm sure. Pray go about your business. Lord! how can you be so troublesome; nay, so unconscionable, to think that every rich widow must throw herself away upon a young fellow that has nothing?

Stan. Jack, you are answered, I suppose.

Jack S. I'll have another pluck at her.

Widow L. Mr. Weldon, I am a little disconcerted; but pray bring your sister to dine with me. 'Gad's my life! I'm out of all patience with that pitiful fellow. My flesh rises at him; I can't stay in the place where he is. [Exit.]

Bland. Captain, you have used the widow very familiarly.

Capt. D. This is my way; I have no design, and therefore am not over civil. If she had ever a handsome daughter to wheedle her out of, or if I could make anything of her booby son—

Char. I may improve that hint, and make something of him. (Aside.)

Lieut. She's very rich.

Capt. D. I'm rich myself. She has nothing that I want; I have no leaks to stop. Old women are fortune-menders. I have made a good voyage, and would reap the fruits of my labour. We plough the deep, my masters; but our harvest is on shore. I am for a young woman.

Stan. Look about, Captain; there's one ripe, and ready for the sickle.

Capt. D. A woman, indeed: I will be acquainted with her. Who is she?

Char. My sister, sir.

Capt. D. Would I were akin to her: if she were my sister, she should never go out of the family. What say you, mistress? You expect I should marry you, I suppose?

Lucy. I sha'n't be disappointed, if you don't. (Turns away.)

Char. She won't break her heart, sir.

Capt. D. But I mean—(Follows Lucy.)

Char. And I mean—(goes between Capt. D. and Lucy) that you must not think of her without marrying.

Capt. D. I mean so, too.

Char. Why, then, your meaning's out.

Capt. D. You're very short.

Char. I will grow, and be taller for you.

Capt. D. I shall grow angry and swear.

Char. You'll catch no fish, then.

Capt. D. I don't well know whether he designs to affront me or no.

Stan. No, no; he's a little familiar; 'tis his way.

Capt. D. Say you so? I can be as familiar as he, if that be it. Well, sir, look upon me full. How do you like me for a brother-in-law?

Char. Why yes, you'll do my business, (turning him about) if we can agree about my sister's.

Capt. D. I don't know whether your sister will like me or not: I can't say much to her; but I have money enough; and if you are her brother, as you seem to be akin to her, I know that will recommend me to you.

Char. This is your market for slaves; my sister is a free woman, and must not be disposed of in public. You shall be welcome to my house, if you please; and, upon better acquaintance, if my sister likes you, and I like your offers—

Capt. D. Very well, sir, I'll come and see her.

Lieut. Where are the slaves, Captain? they are long a-coming.

Bland. And who is this prince that's fallen to my lot for the lord-governor? Let me know something of him, that I may treat him accordingly.—Who is he?

Capt. D. He's the devil of a fellow, I can tell you; a prince every inch of him: you have paid dear enough for him for all the good he'll do you: I was forced to clap him in irons, and did not think the ship safe neither. You are in hostility with the Indians, they say; they threaten you daily: you had best have an eye upon him.

Bland. But who is he?

Lieut. And how do you know him to be a prince?

Capt. D. He is son and heir to the great king of Angola, a mischievous monarch in those parts; who, by his good will, would never let any of his neighbours be in quiet. This son was his general, a plaguy fighting fellow. I have formerly had dealings with him for slaves, which he took prisoners, and have got pretty roundly by him. But the wars being at an end, and nothing more to be got by the trade of that country, I made bold to bring the prince along with me.

Lieut. How could you do that?

Bland. What! steal a prince out of his own country? Impossible!

Capt. D. 'Twas hard indeed; but I did it. You must know this Oroonoko—

Bland. Is that his name?

Capt. D. Ay, Oroonoko.

Lieut. Oroonoko.

Capt. D. Is naturally inquisitive about the men and manners of the white nations. Because I could give him some account of the other parts of the world, I grew very much into his favour: in return of so great an honour, you know, I could do no less, upon my coming away, than invite him on board me. Never having been in a ship, he appointed his time, and I prepared my entertainment. He came the next evening, as private as he could, with about some twenty along with him. The punch went round; and as many of his attendants as would be dangerous, I sent dead drunk on shore; the rest we secured; and so you have the Prince Oroonoko.

Bland. Unheard of villany!

Stan. Barbarous treachery!

Lieut. But, Captain, methinks you have taken a great deal of pains for this Prince Oroonoko; why did you part with him at the common rate of slaves?

Capt. D. Why, Lieutenant-Governor, I'll tell you: I did design to carry him to England, to have shewed him there; but I found him troublesome upon my hands, and I'm glad I'm rid of him. Oh, oh! hark! they come.

Enter black Slaves, Men, Women, and Children; ABOAN and others of Oroonoko's attendants, and OROONOKO in chains.

Lucy. Are all these wretches slaves?

Stan. All sold, they and their posterity, all slaves.

Lucy. O miserable fortune!

Bland. Most of them know no better; they were born so, and only change their masters. But a prince, born only to command, betrayed and sold, my heart drops blood for him.

Capt. D. Now, governor, here he comes; pray observe him.

Oroo. So, sir, you have kept your word with me. (To Capt. D.)

Capt. D. I am a better Christian, I thank you, than to keep it with a heathen.

Oroo. You are a Christian; be a Christian still. If you have any god that teaches you

To break your word, I need not curse you more:

Let him cheat you, as you are false to me.

You faithful followers of my better fortune,

We have been fellow-soldiers in the field;

(Embracing his Friends.)

Now we are fellow-slaves. This last farewell.

Be sure of one thing that will comfort us,

Whatever world we are next thrown upon

Cannot be worse than this.

[All the Slaves go off but Oroonoko.]

Capt. D. You see what a horrible Pagan he is, governor: but I took care that none of his followers should be in the same lot with him, for fear they should undertake some desperate action, to the danger of the colony.

Oroo. Live still in fear; it is the villain's curse, And will revenge my chains; fear even me,

Who have no power to hurt thee. Nature abhors,

And drives thee out from the society

And commerce of mankind, for breach of faith.

Men live and prosper but in mutual trust,

A confidence of one another's truth;

That thou hast violated. I have done;

I know my fortune, and submit to it.

Lieut. Sir, I am sorry for your fortune, and would help it if I could.

Bland. Take off his chains. You know your condition; but you are fallen into honourable hands: you are the lord-governor's slave, who will use you nobly; in his absence, it shall be my care to serve you. (Blandford applying to him.)

Oroo. I hear you, but I can believe no more.

Lieut. Captain, I'm afraid the world won't speak so honourably of this action of your's, as you would have them.

Capt. D. I have the money; let the world speak and be d—d; I care not.

Oroo. I would forget myself. Be satisfied.

(To Bland.)

I am above the rank of common slaves:

Let that content you. The Christian here that knows me,

For his own sake will not discover more.

Capt. D. I have other matters to mind. You have him, and much good may do you with your prince. [Exit.]

(The Planters pulling and staring at Oroonoko.)

Bland. What would you have there? You stare as if you never saw a man before. Stand further off. (Turns them away.)

Oroo. Let them stare on.

I am unfortunate, but not ashamed

Of being so. No, let the guilty blush:

The white man that betray'd me. Honest black

Disdains to change its colour. I am ready;

Where must I go? Dispose me as you please.

I am not well acquainted with my fortune,

But must learn to know it better: so, I know, you say,

Degrees make all things easy.

Bland. All things shall be easy.

Oroo. Tear off this pomp, and let me know myself;

The slavish habit best becomes me now.

Hard fate, and whips, and chains may overpower

The frailer flesh, and bow my body down:

But there's another, nobler part of me,

Out of your reach, which you can never tame.

Bland. You shall find nothing of this wretchedness

You apprehend. We are not monsters all.

You seem unwilling to disclose yourself;

Therefore, for fear the mentioning your name

Should give you new disquiets, I presume

To call you Cæsar.

Oroo. I am myself; but call me what you please.

Stan. A very good name Cæsar.

Lieut. And very fit for his character.

Oroo. Was Cæsar then a slave?

Lieut. I think he was; to pirates too. He was a great conqueror, but unfortunate in his friends—

Oroo. His friends were Christians?

Bland. No.

Oroo. No! that's strange.

Lieut. And murder'd by them.

Oroo. I would be Cæsar then. Yet I will live.

Bland. Live to be happier.

Oroo. Do what you will with me.

Bland. I will wait upon you, attend, and serve you. [Exit with Oroonoko.]

Lucy. Well, if the Captain had brought this prince's country along with him, and would make me queen of it, I would not have him, after doing so base a thing.

Char. He's a man to thrive in the world, sister; he'll make you the better jointure.

Lucy. Hang him, nothing can prosper with him.

Stan. Inquire into the great estates, and you'll find most of them depend upon the same title of honesty: the men who raise them first are much of the Captain's principles.

Char. Ay, ay, as you say, let him be damned for the good of his family. Come, sister, we are invited to dinner.

Lieut. Stanmore, you dine with me. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Widow Lackitt's House.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT, and CHARLOTTE WELDON, in man's clothes.

Char. This is so great a favour, I don't know how to receive it.

Widow L. O, dear sir! you know how to receive and how to return a favour as well as anybody, I don't doubt it; 'tis not the first you have had from our sex, I suppose.

Char. But this is so unexpected.

Widow L. Lord, how can you say so, Mr. Weldon? I won't believe you. Don't I know you handsome gentlemen expect everything a woman can do for you? and by my troth, you're in the right on't. I think one can't do too much for a handsome gentleman; and so you shall find it.

Char. I shall never have such an offer again, that's certain. What shall I do? I am mightily divided. (Pretending a concern.)

Widow L. Divided! O dear, I hope not so, sir. If I marry, truly, I expect to have you to myself.

Char. There's no danger of that, Mrs. Lackitt: I am divided in my thoughts; my father upon his death-bed obliged me to see my sister disposed of, before I married myself. 'Tis that sticks upon me.

Widow L. Is that all?

Char. All in all to me. The commands of a dying father, you know, ought to be obeyed.

Widow L. And so they may.

Char. Impossible, to do me any good.

Widow L. They sha'n't be your hindrance. You would have a husband for your sister, you say: he must be very well to pass too in the world, I suppose.

Char. I would not throw her away.

Widow L. Then marry her out of hand to the sea-captain you were speaking of.

Char. I was thinking of him, but 'tis to no purpose; she hates him.

Widow L. Does she hate him? nay, 'tis no matter, an impudent rascal as he is; I would not advise her to marry him.

Char. Can you think of nobody else?

Widow L. Let me see. Well, if I thought you would like of it, I have a husband for her. What do you think of my son?

Char. You don't think of it yourself.

Widow L. I protest but I do: I am in earnest, if you are: he shall marry her within this half hour, if you'll give your consent to it.

Char. I give my consent! I'll answer for my sister, she shall have him; you may be sure I shall be glad to get over the difficulty.

Widow L. No more to be said then, that difficulty is over; but I vow and swear you frightened me, Mr. Weldon. If I had not had a son now for your sister, what must I have done, do you think? Were not you an ill-natured thing to boggle at a promise? I could break twenty for you.

Char. I am the more obliged to you; but this son will save all.

Widow L. He's in the house; I'll go and bring him myself. (Going.) You would do well to break the business to your sister. She's within, I'll send her to you. (Going, returns.)

Char. Pray do.

Widow L. But, d'you hear? perhaps she may stand upon her maidenly behaviour, and blush, and play the fool, and delay; but don't be answered so. What! she is not a girl at these years. Shew your authority, and tell her roundly, she must be married immediately. I'll manage my son, I warrant you. [Exit hastily.]

Char. The widow's in haste, I see; I thought I had laid a rub in the road, about my sister; but she has stepp'd over that. She's making way for herself as fast as she can; but little thinks where she is going. I could tell her she is going to play the fool; but people don't love to hear of their faults; besides that is not my business at present.

Enter LUCY.

So, sister, I have a husband for you.

Lucy. With all my heart. I don't know what confinement marriage may be to the men, but I'm sure the women have no liberty without it. I'm for anything that will deliver me from the care of a reputation, which I begin to find impossible to preserve.

Char. I'll ease you of that care. You must be married immediately.

Lucy. The sooner the better; for I'm quite tired of setting up for a husband. The widow's foolish son is the man, I suppose?

Char. I considered your constitution, sister; and, finding you would have occasion for a fool, I have provided accordingly.

Lucy. I don't know what occasion I may have for a fool when I'm married; but I find none but fools have occasion to marry.

Char. Since he is to be a fool, then, I thought it better for you to have one of his mother's making than your own; 'twill save you the trouble.

Lucy. I thank you; you take a great deal of pains for me; but pray tell me what you are doing for yourself all this while?

Char. You are never true to your own secrets, and therefore I won't trust you with mine. Only remember this, I am your eldest sister, and consequently, laying my breeches aside, have as much occasion for a husband as you can have. I have a man in my eye, be satisfied.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT, with her Son DANIEL.

Widow L. Come, Daniel, hold up thy head, child; look like a man; you must not take it as you have done. 'Gads my life! there's nothing to be done with twirling your hat, man.

Dan. Why, mother, what's to be done then?

Widow L. Why, look me in the face, and mind what I say to you.

Dan. Marry, who's the fool then? What shall I get by minding what you say to me?

Widow L. Mrs. Lucy, the boy is bashful, don't discourage him: pray come a little forward, and let him salute you. (Going between Lucy and Daniel.)

Lucy. A fine husband I am to have, truly. (To Char.)

Widow L. Come, Daniel, you must be acquainted with this gentlewoman.

Dan. Nay, I'm not proud, that is not my fault: I am presently acquainted when I know the company; but this gentlewoman is a stranger to me.

Widow L. She is your mistress: I have spoke a good word for you; make her a bow, and go and kiss her.

Dan. Kiss her! have a care what you say; I warrant she scorns your words. Such fine folks are not used to be slopped and kissed. Do you think I don't know that, mother?

Widow L. Try her, try her, man. (Daniel bows, she thrusts him forward.) Why that's well done; go nearer to her.

Dan. Is the devil in the woman? Why, so I can go nearer her, if you would let a body alone. (To his Mother.) Cry your mercy, forsooth; my mother is always shaming one before company; she would have me as unmannerly as herself, and offer to kiss you. (To Lucy.)

Char. Why won't you kiss her?

Dan. Why, pray may I?

Char. Kiss her, kiss her, man.

Dan. Marry, and I will. (Kisses her.) Gad-zooks, she kisses rarely! An' please you, mistress, and seeing my mother will have it so, I don't much care if I kiss you again, forsooth. (Kisses her again.)

Lucy. Well, how do you like me now?

Dan. Like you? marry, I don't know; you have bewitched me, I think: I was never so in my born days before.

Widow L. You must marry this fine woman, Daniel.

Dan. Heyday! marry her! I was never married in all my life. What must I do with her then, mother!

Widow L. You must live with her, eat and drink with her, and sleep with her.

Dan. Nay marry, I shall never sleep, that's certain; she'll break of my rest, quite and clean, I tell you before-hand. As for eating and drinking with her, why I have a good stomach, and can play my part in any company. But how do you think I can go to bed to a woman I don't know?

Char. You shall know her better.

Dan. Say you so, sir?

Char. Kiss her again. (Kisses her again.)

Dan. Nay, kissing I find will make us presently acquainted. We'll steal into a corner to practice a little, and then I shall be able to do anything.

Char. The young man mends apace.

Dan. Mother, mother, if you'll stay in the room by me, and promise not to leave me, I don't care for once if I venture to go to bed with her.

Widow L. There's a good child, go in and put on thy best clothes; pluck up a spirit; I'll stay in the room by thee. She won't hurt thee, I warrant thee.

Dan. Nay, as to that matter, I am not afraid of her. I'll give her as good as she brings. I have a Rowland for her Oliver, and so thou may tell her. [Exit.]

Widow L. Mrs. Lucy, we sha'n't stay for you; you are in readiness I suppose?

Char. She is always ready to do what I would have her, I must say that for my sister.

Widow L. 'Twill be her own another day, Mr. Weldon; we'll marry 'em out of hand, and then—

Char. And then, Mrs. Lackitt, look to yourself. [Exeunt.]

Enter OROONOKO and BLANDFORD.

Oroo. You know my story, and you say you are a friend to my misfortunes: that's a name Will teach you what you owe yourself and me.

Bland. I'll study to deserve to be your friend. When once our noble governor arrives, With him you will not need my interest: He is too generous not to feel your wrongs. But be assur'd I will employ my pow'r, And find the means to send you home again.

Oroo. I thank you, sir. My honest, wretched friends! (Sighing.)

Their chains are heavy; they have hardly found So kind a master. May I ask you, sir, What is become of them? Perhaps I should not. You will forgive a stranger.

Bland. I'll inquire; And use my best endeavours, where they are, To have 'em gently us'd.

Oroo. Once more I thank you. You offer every cordial that can keep My hopes alive, to wait a better day. What friendly care can do, you have apply'd: But oh! I have a grief admits no cure.

Bland. You do not know, sir—

Oroo. Can you raise the dead? Pursue and overtake the wings of time? And bring about again the hours, the days, The years that made me happy?

Bland. That is not to be done

Oroo. No, there is nothing to be done for me. (Kneels and kisses the earth.)

Thou God ador'd! thou ever-glorious sun! If she be yet on earth, send me a beam Of thy all-seeing pow'r to light me to her: Or, if thy sister goddess has preferr'd Her beauty to the skies, to be a star, O, tell me where she shines, that I may stand Whole nights, and gaze upon her.

Bland. I am rude, and interrupt you.

Oroo. I am troublesome: But pray give me your pardon. My swoln heart Bursts out its passage, and I must complain, (O! can you think of nothing dearer to me; Dearer than liberty, my country, friends, Much dearer than my life?) that I have lost The tend'rest, best belov'd, and loving wife.

Bland. Alas! I pity you.

Oroo. Do pity me: Pity's akin to love; and every thought, Of that soft kind, is welcome to my soul. I would be pity'd here.

Bland. I dare not ask More than you please to tell me: but if you Think it convenient to let me know Your story, I dare promise you to bear A part in your distress, if not assist you.

Oroo. Thou honest-hearted man! I wanted such, Just such a friend as thou art, that would sit, Still as the night, and let me talk whole days Of my Imoinda. O! I'll tell thee all, From first to last; and pray observe me well.

Bland. I will most heedfully.

Oroo. There was a stranger in my father's court, Valu'd and honour'd much: he was a white, The first I ever saw of your complexion. He chang'd his god for ours, and so grew great; Of many virtues, and so fam'd in arms, He still commanded all my father's wars: I was bred under him. One fatal day, The armies joining, he before me stepp'd, Receiving in his breast a poison'd dart Levell'd at me: he dy'd within my arms. I've tir'd you already.

Bland. Pray go on.

Oroo. He left an only daughter, whom he brought An infant to Angola. When I came Back to the court, a happy conqueror, Humanity oblig'd me to condole With this sad virgin for a father's loss, Lost for my safety. I presented her With all the slaves of battle, to atone Her father's ghost. But, when I saw her face, And heard her speak, I offer'd up myself To be the sacrifice. She bow'd and blush'd; I wonder'd and ador'd. The sacred pow'r, That hath subdu'd me, then inspir'd my tongue, Inclined her heart, and all our talk was love.

Bland. Then you were happy.

Oroo. Oh! I was too happy.

I marry'd her: and, though my country's custom
Indulg'd the privilege of many wives,
I swore myself never to know but her.
O, my Imoinda! But it could not last.
Her fatal beauty reach'd my father's ears:
He sent for her to court, where, cursed court!
No woman comes but for his amorous use.
He raging to possess her, she was forc'd
To own herself my wife. The furious king
Started at incest; but, grown desperate,
Not daring to enjoy what he desir'd,
In mad revenge (which I could never learn)
He poison'd her, or sent her far, far off,
Far from my hopes ever to see her more.

Bland. Most barbarous of fathers! the sad tale
Has struck me dumb with wonder.

Oroo. I have done.
I'll trouble you no further: now and then,
A sigh will have its way: that shall be all.

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. Blandford, the Lieutenant-governor is gone to your plantation. He desires you would bring the royal slave with you. The sight of his fair mistress, he says, is an entertainment for a prince. He would have his opinion of her.

Oroo. Is he a lover?

Bland. So he says himself. He flatters a beautiful slave that I have, and calls her mistress.

Oroo. Must he then flatter her to call her mistress?

I pity the proud man, who thinks himself
Above being in love. What, though she be a slave,
She may deserve him.

Bland. You shall judge of that when you see her, sir.

Oroo. I go with you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Plantation.

Enter IMOINDA, followed by the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

Lieut. I have disturb'd you. I confess my faults,
My fair Clemene; but begin again,
And I will listen to your mournful song,
Sweet as the soft complaining nightingale's.
Sing, sing again,
And let me wonder at the many ways
You have to ravish me.

Imo. Oh! I can weep

Enough for you and me, if that will please you.

Lieut. You must not weep: I come to dry your tears,

And raise you from your sorrow. I may take
This pretty hand: I know your modesty
Would draw it back; but you would take it ill
If I should let it go.

*(She struggles, and gets her hand from him;
then he offers to kiss her.)*

Nay, if you struggle with me, I must take—

Imo. You may my life, that I can part with freely. [Exit.]

Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and OROONOKO.

Bland. So, governor, we don't disturb you, I hope?

Your mistress has left you. You were making love:
She's thankful for the honour, I suppose.

Lieut. Quite insensible to all I say and do.

When I speak to her, she sighs, or weeps,
But never answers me as I would have her.

Stan. There's something nearer than her slavery, that touches her.

Bland. What do her fellow-slaves say of her?
Can't they find out the cause?

Lieut. Some of them, who pretend to be wiser than the rest, and hate her, I suppose, for being used better than they are, will needs have it that she is with child.

Bland. Poor wretch! if it be so, I pity her.

She has lost a husband, that perhaps was dear
To her, and then you cannot blame her.

Oroo. If it be so, indeed you cannot blame her.
(Sighing.)

Lieut. No, no; it is not so. If it be so,
I must still love her; and, desiring still,
I must enjoy her.

Bland. Try what you can do with fair means, and welcome.

Lieut. I'll give you ten slaves for her.

Bland. You know she is our lord governor's:
but, if I could dispose of her, I would not now, especially to you.

Lieut. Why not to me?

Bland. I mean against her will. You are in love with her;

And we all know what your desires would have.
Love stops at nothing but possession.

Where she within your power, you do not know
How soon you would be tempted to forget
The nature of the deed; and, may be, act
A violence you after would repent.

Oroo. 'Tis godlike in you to protect the weak.

Lieut. Fie, fie! I would not force her. Though she be

A slave, her mind is free, and should consent.

Oroo. Such honour will engage her to consent:
And then, if you're in love, she's worth the having.
Shall we not see the wonder?

Lieut. Have a care;
You have a heart, and she has conqu'ring eyes.

Oroo. I have a heart; but, if it could be false
To my first vows, ever to love again,
These honest hands should tear it from my breast,
And throw the traitor from me. O, Imoinda!
Living or dead, I can be only thine. [Exit.]

Bland. Imoinda was his wife: she's either dead,
Or living, dead to him; forc'd from his arms
By an inhuman father. Another time
I'll tell you all. [To Lieut. and Stan. Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Slaves, Men, Women, and Children, discovered upon the ground; some rise and dance.

During the entertainment, enter the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and ORONOKO, as spectators; that ended, enter
CAPTAIN DRIVER, JACK STANMORE, and several Planters, with their swords drawn. Drum beats.

Capt. D. Where are you, governor? Make what haste you can

To save yourself and the whole colony.

I bid 'em ring the bell.

Lieut. What's the matter?

Jack S. The Indians are come down upon us;
they have plundered some of the plantations already,
and are marching this way as fast as they can.

Lieut. What can we do against them?

Bland. We shall be able to make a stand till more planters come in to us.

Jack S. There are a great many more without,
if you would shew yourself, and put us in order.

Lieut. There's no danger of the white slaves, they'll not stir. Blandford and Stanmore, come you along with me. Some of you stay here to look after the black slaves.

[All go out but the Captain and six Planters, who all at once seize Oroonoko.]

1 Plan. Ay, ay, let us alone.

Capt. D. In the first place, we secure you, sir, as an enemy to the government.

Oroo. Are you there, sir? You are my constant friend.

1 Plan. You will be able to do a great deal of mischief.

Capt. D. But we shall prevent you: bring the irons hither. He has the malice of a slave in him, and would be glad to be cutting his masters' throats.
I know him. Chain his hands and feet, that he may not run over to 'em. If they have him, they'll carry him on their backs, that I can tell 'em.

As they are chaining him, re-enter BLANDFORD, who runs to them.

Bland. What are you doing there?

Capt. D. Securing the main chance: this is a bosom enemy.

Bland. Away, you brutes! I'll answer with my life for his behaviour; so tell the governor.

Capt. D. & Plan. Well, sir, so we will.

[Exeunt Capt. D. and Planters.]

Oroo. Give me a sword, and I'll deserve your trust.

A party of Indians enter, hurrying IMOINDA among the slaves; another party of Indians sustains them retreating, followed at a distance by the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, with the Planters: Blandford and Oroonoko join them.

Bland. Hell and the devil! they drive away our slaves before our faces. Governor, can you stand tamely by, and suffer this? Clemene, sir, your mistress, is among 'em.

Lieut. We throw ourselves away in the attempt to rescue them.

Oroo. A lover cannot fall more glorious, Than in the cause of love. He that deserves His mistress' favour, wo' not stay behind: I'll lead you on; be bold, and follow me.

[Oroonoko at the head of the Planters, falls upon the Indians with a great shout, and beats them off.]

Enter IMOINDA.

Imo. I'm tost about by my tempestuous fate,
And no where must have rest. Indians or English:
Whoever has me, I am still a slave.
No matter whose I am, since I'm no more
My royal master's; since I'm his no more.
O, I was happy! nay, I will be happy
In the dear thought that I am still his wife,
Though far divided from him. (Retires.)

Re-enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, OROONOKO, BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and Planters.

Lieut. Thou glorious man! thou something greater sure

Than Cæsar ever was! that single arm
Has sav'd us all: accept our gen'ral thanks.

(All bow to Oroonoko.)

And what we can do more to recompense
Such noble services, you shall command.
Clemene, too, shall thank you—she is safe—
Look up, and bless your brave deliverer.

(Brings Imoinda forward, looking downwards.)

Oroo. Bless me indeed!

Bland. You start!

Oroo. O, all you gods,
Who govern this great world, and bring about Things strange and unexpected! Can it be?

Lieut. What is't you stare at so?

Oroo. Answer me some of you, you who have pow'r,
And have your senses free: or are you all
Struck through with wonder too?

(Looking still fixedly on Imoinda.)

Bland. What would you know?

Oroo. My soul steals from my body through my eyes;
All that is left of life I'll gaze away,
And die upon the pleasure.

Lieut. This is strange!

Oroo. If you but mock me with her image
here:

If she be not Imoinda—

(She looks upon him and falls into a swoon; he runs to her.)

Ha! She faints!

Nay, then, it must be she: it is Imoinda!
My heart confesses her, and leaps for joy,
To welcome her to her own empire here.

(Kisses her.)

Imoinda! Oh! thy Oroonoko calls.

Imo. (Recovering.) My Oroonoko! Oh! I can't believe

What any man can say. But if I am
To be deceiv'd, there's something in that name,
That voice, that face— (Stares at him.)
Oh! if I know myself, I cannot be mistaken.
(Embraces him.)

Oroo. Never here:

You cannot be mistaken: I am your's,
Your Oroonoko, all that you would have,
Your tender, loving husband.

Imo. All, indeed,

That I would have: my husband! then I am
Alive, and waking to the joys I feel:
They were so great, I could not think 'em true;
But I believe all that you say to me:
For truth itself, and everlasting love,
Grows in this breast, and pleasure in these arms.

Oroo. Take, take me all: inquire into my heart,
(You know the way to ev'ry secret there,)
My heart, the sacred treasury of love:
And if, in absence, I have misemploy'd
A mite from the rich store; if I have spent
A wish, a sigh, but what I sent to you;
May I be curs'd to wish and sigh in vain,
And you not pity me.

Imo. Oh! I believe,
And know you by myself. If these sad eyes,
Since last we parted, have beheld the face
Of any comfort, or once wish'd to see
The light of any other heav'n but you,
May I be struck this moment blind, and lose
Your blessed sight, never to find you more.

Oroo. Imoinda! Oh! this separation
Has made you dearer, if it can be so,
Than you were ever to me. You appear
Like a kind star to my benighted steps,
To guide me on my way to happiness:
I cannot miss it now. Governor, friend,
You think me mad: but let me bless you all,
Who any ways have been the instruments
Of finding her again. Imoinda's found!
And ev'ry thing that I would have in her.

(Embraces her.)

Stan. Where's your mistress now, governor?

Lieut. Why, where most men's mistresses are forced to be sometimes—with her husband, it seems.
But I won't lose her so. (Aside.)

Stan. He has fought lustily for her, and deserves her; I'll say that for him.

Bland. Sir, we congratulate your happiness; I do most heartily.

Lieut. And all of us: but how it comes to pass—

Oroo. That will require
More precious time than I can spare you now.
I have a thousand things to ask of her,
And she as many more to know of me.
But you have made me happier, I confess,
Acknowledge it, much happier than I
Have words or pow'r to tell you. Captain, you,
Ev'n you, who most have wrong'd me, I forgive.
I wo'not say you have betray'd me now:
I'll think you but the minister of fate,
To bring me to my lov'd Imoinda here.

Imo. How, how shall I receive you? how be worthy
Of such endearments, all this tenderness?
These are the transports of prosperity,
When fortune smiles upon us.

Oroo. Let the fools

Who follow fortune, live upon her smiles;
All our prosperity is plac'd in love,
We have enough of that to make us happy.
This little spot of earth you stand upon,
Is more to me than the extended plains
Of my great father's kingdom. Here I reign
In full delights, in joys to pow'r unknown;
Your love my empire, and your heart my throne.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter ABOAN, with several Slaves, and HOTMAN.

Hot. What! to be slaves to cowards! slaves to rogues, who can't defend themselves!

Aboan. Who is this fellow? He talks as if he were acquainted with our design: is he one of us? (Aside to his own gang.)

I Slave. Not yet; but he will be glad to make one, I believe.

Aboan. He makes a mighty noise.

Hot. Go, sneak in corners, whisper out your griefs,

For fear your masters hear you; cringe and crouch Under the bloody whip, like beaten curs, That lick their wounds, and know no other cure.

All, wretches all! you feel their cruelty, As much as I can feel, but dare not groan. For my part, while I have a life and tongue, I'll curse the authors of my slavery.

Aboan. Have you been long a slave?

Hot. Yes, many years.

Aboan. And do you only curse?

Hot. Curse! only curse! I cannot conjure, To raise the spirits up of other men: I am but one. Oh! for a soul of fire, To warm and animate our common cause, And make a body of us; then I would Do something more than curse.

Aboan. That body set on foot, you would be one, A limb, to lend it motion?

Hot. I would be The heart of it; the head, the hand, the heart: Would I could see the day!

Aboan. You will do all yourself.

Hot. I would do more Than I shall speak; but I may find a time—

Aboan. The time may come to you; be ready for't. Methinks he talks too much; I'll know him more Before I trust him further. (Aside.)

I Slave. If he dares Half what he says, he'll be of use to us.

Enter BLANDFORD.

Bland. If there be any one among you here That did belong to Oroonoko, speak; I come to him.

Aboan. I did belong to him; Aboan my name.

Bland. You are the man I want; pray come with me. [Exeunt.]

Enter OROONOKO and IMOINDA.

Oroo. I do not blame my father for his love; But when I think on his barbarity, That could expose you to so many wrongs; Driving you out to wretched slavery, Only for being mine; then I confess, I wish I could forget the name of son, That I might curse the tyrant.

Imo. I will bless him, For I have found you here: heaven only knows What is reserv'd for us; but if we guess The future by the past, our fortune must Be wonderful; it must be in extremes; Extremely happy, or extremely wretched.

Oroo. 'Tis in our power to make it happy now.

Imo. But not to keep it so.

Re-enter BLANDFORD with ABOAN.

Bland. My royal lord, I have a present for you.

Oroo. Aboan!

Aboan. Your lowest slave.

Oroo. My tried and valued friend! (To Bland.) This worthy man always prevents my wants: I only wish'd, and he has brought thee to me. Thou art surpris'd; carry thy duty there, (Aboan goes to Imoinda, and falls at her feet.) While I acknowledge mine. How shall I thank you? (To Blandford.)

Bland. Believe me honest to your interest, And I am more than paid. I have secur'd That all your foll'wers shall be gently us'd, Shall wait upon your person, while you stay Among us.

Oroo. I owe everything to you.

Bland. You must not think you are in slavery.

Oroo. I do not find I am.

Bland. Kind heaven has miraculously sent Those comforts, that may teach you to expect Its further care, in your deliverance.

Oroo. I sometimes think myself heav'n is concern'd For my deliverance.

Bland. It will be soon; You may expect it. Pray, in the mean time, Appear as cheerful as you can among us. You have some enemies, that represent You dangerous, and would be glad to find A reason, in your discontent, to fear. They watch your looks. But there are honest men Who are your friends; you are secur'd in them.

Oroo. I thank you for your caution.

Bland. I will leave you; And be assur'd, I wish your liberty. [Exit.]

Aboan. He speaks you very fair.

Oroo. He means me fair.

Aboan. If he should not, my lord?

Oroo. If he should not? I'll not suspect his truth; but if I did, What shall I get by doubting?

Aboan. You secure Not to be disappointed: but, besides, There's this advantage in suspecting him: When you put off the hopes of other men, You will rely upon your godlike self; And then you may be sure of liberty.

Oroo. Be sure of liberty? what dost thou mean, Advising to rely upon myself? I think I may be sure on't: we must wait; 'Tis worth a little patience. (Turning to Imoinda.)

Aboan. Oh, my lord!

Oroo. What dost thou drive at?

Aboan. Sir, another time You would have found it sooner; but I see Love has your heart, and takes up all your thoughts.

Oroo. And canst thou blame me?

Aboan. Sir, I must not blame you. But, as our fortune stands, there is a passion (Your pardon, royal mistress, I must speak) That would become you better than your love: A brave resentment; which, inspir'd by you, Might kindle and diffuse a gen'rous rage Among the slaves, to rouse and shake our chains, And struggle to be free.

Oroo. How can we help ourselves?

Aboan. I knew you when you would have found a way.

How help ourselves? the very Indians teach us. We need but to attempt our liberty, And we carry it. We have hands sufficient, Double the number of our masters' force, Ready to be employ'd. We want but you, To head our enterprise, and bid us strike.

Oroo. What would you do?

Aboan. Cut our oppressors' throats.

Oroo. And you would have me join in your design Of murder?

Aboan. It deserves a better name: But be it what it will, 'tis justify'd By self-defence, and natural liberty.

Oroo. I'll hear no more on't.

Aboan. I'm sorry for't.

Oroo. Nor shall you think of it.

Aboan. Not think of it?

Oroo. No, I command you not.

Aboan. Remember, sir, You are a slave yourself, and to command Is now another's right. Not think of it? Since the first moment they put on my chains,

I've thought of nothing but the weight of 'em,
And how to throw 'em off. Can your's sit easy?

Oroo. I have a sense of my condition,
As painful and as quick as your's can be.
I feel for my Imoinda and myself;
Imoinda! much the tend'rest part of me.
But though I languish for my liberty,
I would not buy it at the Christian price
Of black ingratitude; they sha' not say
That we deserv'd our fortune by our crimes.
Murder the innocent!

Aboan. The innocent!

Oroo. These men are so, whom you would rise against.

If we are slaves, they did not make us slaves;
But bought us in an honest way of trade;
As we have done before 'em, bought and sold
Many a wretch, and never thought it wrong.
They paid our price for us, and we are now
Their property, a part of their estate,
To manage as they please. Mistake me not,
I do not tamely say that we should bear
All they could lay upon us; but we find
The load so light, so little to be felt (Considering they have us in their pow'r,
And may inflict what grievances they please,)
We ought not to complain.

Aboan. My royal lord,
You do not know the heavy grievances,
The toils, the labours, weary drudgeries,
Which they impose; burdens more fit for beasts,
For senseless beasts to bear, than thinking men.
Then if you saw the bloody cruelties
They execute on ev'ry slight offence;
Nay, sometimes in their proud, insulting sport,
How worse than dogs they lash their fellow creatures, [know
Your heart would bleed for 'em. Oh! could you
How many wretches lift their hands and eyes
To you for their relief!

Oroo. I pity 'em,
And wish I could with honesty do more.

Aboan. You must do more, and may, with honesty.
O, royal sir, remember who you are,
A prince, born for the good of other men;
Whose godlike office is to draw the sword
Against oppression, and set free mankind:
And this I'm sure you think oppression now.
What though you have not felt these miseries,
Never believe you are oblig'd to them;
They have their selfish reasons, may be, now,
For using of you well; but there will come
A time, when you must have your share of 'em.

Oroo. You see how little cause I have to think so:
Favour'd in my own person, in my friends;
Indulg'd in all that can concern my care,
In my Imoinda's soft society. (Embraces her.)

Aboan. And, therefore, would you lie contented down

In the forgetfulness and arms of love,
To get young princes for 'em?

Oroo. Say'st thou? ha!

Aboan. Princes, the heirs of empire, and the last
Of your illustrious lineage, to be born
To pamper up their pride, and be their slaves?

Oroo. Imoinda! save me, save me from that thought.

Aboan. I know you are persuaded to believe
The governor's arrival will prevent
These mischiefs, and bestow your liberty;
But who is sure of that? I rather fear
More mischiefs from his coming. He is young,
Luxurious, passionate, and amorous.
Such a complexion, and made bold by pow'r,
To countenance all he is prone to do,
Will know no bounds, no law against his lusts.
If, in a fit of his intemperance,
With a strong hand he shall resolve to seize,
And force my royal mistress from your arms,
How can you help yourself?

Oroo. Ha! thou hast rous'd
The lion in his den; he stalks abroad,
And the wide forest trembles at his roar.
I find the danger now. My spirits start
At the alarm, and from all quarters come
To man my heart, the citadel of love.
Is there a pow'r on earth to force you from me,
And shall I not resist it, nor strike first,
To keep, to save you, to prevent that curse?
This is your cause; and shall it not prevail?
Oh! you were born always to conquer me.
Now I am fashion'd to thy purpose; speak,
What combination, what conspiracy,
Wouldst thou engage me in? I'll undertake
All thou wouldst have me now for liberty,
For the great cause of love and liberty.

Aboan. Now, my great master, you appear yourself;

And, since we have you join'd in our design,
It cannot fail us. I have muster'd up
The choicest slaves, men who are sensible
Of their condition, and seem most resolv'd:
They have their several parties.

Oroo. Summon 'em,
Assemble 'em; I will come forth and shew
Myself among 'em: if they are resolv'd,
I'll lead their foremost resolutions.

Aboan. I have provided those will follow you.

Oroo. With this reserve in our proceedings still,
The means that lead us to our liberty
Must not be bloody.

Aboan. You command in all.

We shall expect you, sir.

Oroo. You sha' not long.

[Exeunt Oroonoko, Imoinda, and Aboan.]

Enter CHARLOTTE WELDON, dressed in man's clothes, followed by WIDOW LACKITT.

Widow L. These unmannerly Indians were something unreasonable to disturb us just in the nick,
Mr. Weldon; but I have the parson within call still,
to do us the good turn.

Char. We had best stay a little, I think, to see things settled again, had not we? Marriage is a serious thing, you know.

Widow L. What do you talk of a serious thing,
Mr. Weldon? I think you have found me sufficiently serious: I have married my son to your sister, to pleasure you; and now I come to claim your promise to me, you tell me marriage is a serious thing.

Char. Why, is it not?

Widow L. Fiddle faddle, I know what it is: 'tis not the first time I have been married, I hope; but I shall begin to think you don't design to do fairly by me, so I shall.

Char. Why, indeed, Mrs. Lackitt, I'm afraid I can't do so fairly as I would by you. 'Tis what you must know first or last; and I should be the worst man in the world to conceal it any longer;
therefore I must own to you that I am married already.

Widow L. Married! You don't say so, I hope?
How have you the conscience to tell me such a thing to my face? I would have you to know I understand better things than to ruin my son without a valuable consideration. If I can't have you,
I can keep my money. Your sister sha'n't have the catch of him she expected: I won't part with a shilling to 'em.

Char. You made the match yourself, you know;
you can't blame me.

Widow L. Yes, yes, I can, and do blame you:
you might have told me before, you were married.

Char. I would not have told you now, but you followed me so close, I was forced to it: indeed, I am married in England; but 'tis as if I were not;
for I have been parted from my wife a great while;
and, to do reason on both sides, we hate one another heartily. Now I did design, and will marry you still, if you'll have a little patience.

Widow L. A likely business, truly.

Char. I have a friend in England that I will write to, to poison my wife, and then I can marry you with a good conscience.

Widow L. And will he do it, do you think?

Char. At the first word, or he is not the man I take him to be.

Widow L. Well, you are a dear devil, Mr. Weldon: and would you poison your wife for me?

Char. I would do anything for you.

Widow L. Well, I am mightily obliged to you. But 'twill be a great while before you can have an answer of your letter.

Char. 'Twill be a great while, indeed.

Widow L. In the meantime, Mr. Weldon—

Char. Why, in the meantime—here's company. We'll settle that within; I'll follow you.

[Exit Widow Lackitt.]

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. So, sir, you carry on your business swimmingly: you have stolen a wedding, I hear.

Char. Ay, my sister is married; and I am very near being run away with myself.

Stan. The widow will have you then?

Char. You come very seasonably to my rescue. Jack Stanmore is to be had, I hope?

Stan. At half an hour's warning.

Char. I must advise with you. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT, and CHARLOTTE WELDON, dressed in man's clothes.

Char. Now, Mrs. Lackitt.

Widow L. Well, well; Lackitt, or what you will now; now I am married to you; I am very well pleased with what I have done, I assure you. Mr. Weldon, what must I call you? I must have some pretty fond name or other for you; it looks negligent, and is the fashion, you know.

Char. To be negligent of their husbands, it is indeed.

Widow L. Nay, then, I won't be in the fashion; for I can never be negligent of dear Mr. Weldon; and, to convince you, here's something to encourage you not to be negligent of me. (Gives a purse and a little casket.) Five hundred pounds in gold in this; and jewels to the value of five hundred pounds more in this.

Char. (Opens the casket.) Ay, marry, this will encourage me, indeed.

Widow L. There are comforts in marrying an elderly woman, Mr. Weldon. Now a young woman would have fancied she had paid you with her person, or had done you the favour.

Char. What do you talk of young women? you are as young as any of 'em, in everything but their folly and ignorance.

Widow L. And do you think me so? But I have reason to suspect you. Was not I seen at your house this morning, do you think?

Char. You may venture again: you'll come at night, I suppose?

Widow L. O dear! at night? so soon?

Char. Nay, if you think it too soon—

Widow L. Oh, no! 'tis not for that, Mr. Weldon; but—I will come to please you.

Char. To please yourself; own it.

Widow L. Well, well, to please myself, then. You're the strangest man in the world, nothing can escape you.

Enter DANIEL, followed by LUCY.

Dan. What would you have? What do you follow me for?

Lucy. Why, mayn't I follow you? I must follow you now all the world over.

Dan. Hold you, hold you, there; not so far by a mile or two; I have enough of your company already, by'r lady, and something to spare: you may go home to your brother, an' you will; I have no further to do with you.

Widow L. Why, Daniel, child, thou art not out of thy wits, sure, art thou?

Dan. Nay, marry, I don't know; but I am very near, I believe: I am altered for the worse mightily since you saw me; and she has been the cause of it there.

Widow L. How so, child?

Dan. I told you before what would come on't of putting me to bed to a strange woman; but you would not be said nay.

Widow L. She is your wife now, child; you must love her.

Dan. Why, so I did at first.

Widow L. But you must love her always.

Dan. Always! I loved her as I could, mother, and as long as loving was good, I believe; for I find now I don't care a fig for her.

Lucy. Why, you lubberly, slovenly blockhead—I see all good nature is thrown away upon you—

Widow L. It was so with his father before him. He takes after him.

Lucy. And therefore I will use you as you deserve, you tony.

Widow L. Indeed he deserves bad enough; but don't call him out of his name: his name is Daniel, you know.

Dan. Let her call me what she pleases, mother, 'tis not her tongue that I'm afraid of.

Lucy. I will make such a beast of thee!

Widow L. O, pray no, I hope; do nothing rashly, Mrs. Lucy.

Dan. I had rather be a beast than what you would make of me in a week, I'm sure; I have no more manhood left in me already, than there is in one of my mother's old under-petticoats.

Widow L. Sirrah, sirrah, meddle with your wife's petticoats, and let your mother's alone, you ungracious bird, you. (Beats him.)

Dan. Why, is the devil in the woman? What have I said now? Do you know if you were ask'd, I trow? But you are all of a bundle; e'en hang together: he that unties you, makes a rod for himself; and so he will find it that has anything to do with you.

Widow L. Ay, rogue enough, you shall find it; I have a rod for you still.

Dan. No wife, and I care not.

Widow L. I'll swinge you into better manners, you booby. [Beats him off, and exit.]

Char. You have consummated our project upon him.

Lucy. Nay, if I have a limb of the fortune, I care not who has the whole body of the fool.

Char. That you shall, and a large one, I promise you.

Lucy. Have you heard the news? They talk of an English ship in the river.

Char. I have heard on't, and am preparing to receive it as fast as I can.

Lucy. There's something the matter too with the slaves, some disturbance or other; I don't know what it is.

Char. So much the better still; we fish in troubled waters; we shall have fewer eyes upon us. Pray go you home, and be ready to assist me in your part of the design.

Lucy. I can't fail in mine. [Exit.]

Char. The widow has furnish'd me, I thank her, to carry it on. Now I have got a wife, 'tis high time to think of getting a husband. I carry my fortune about me—a thousand pounds in gold and jewels. Let me see, 'twill be a considerable trust; and I think I shall lay it out to advantage.

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. So, Weldon, Jack has told me his success; and his hopes of marrying the widow by your means.

Char. I have strained a point, Stanmore, upon your account, to be serviceable to your family.

Stan. I take it upon my account; and am very much obliged to you. But here we are all in an uproar.

Char. So they say. What's the matter?

Stan. A mutiny among the slaves. Oroonoko is at the head of 'em. Our governor is gone out with his rascally militia against them. What it may come to nobody knows.

Char. For my part, I shall do as well as the rest; but I'm concerned for my sister and cousin, whom I expect in the ship from England.

Stan. There's no danger of them.

Char. I have a thousand pounds here, in gold and jewels, for my cousin's use, that I would more particularly take care of; 'tis too great a sum to venture at home; and I would not have her wrong'd of it; therefore, to secure it, I think my best way will be to put it into your own keeping.

Stan. You have a very good opinion of my honesty. (Takes the purse and casket.)

Char. I have indeed. If anything should happen to me in this bustle, as nobody is secure of accidents, I know you will take my cousin into your protection and care. Pray see her married as soon as you can.

Stan. If she be as handsome as her picture, I can promise her a husband.

Char. If you like her when you see her, I wish nothing so much as to have you marry her yourself; for I always thought you worth making a friend.

Stan. You sha'n't find your good opinion thrown away upon me: I am in your debt, and shall think so as long as I live. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Country.

Enter OROONOKO, ABOAN, and Slaves; IMOINDA with a bow and quiver; the Women, some leading, others carrying their Children upon their backs.

Oroo. The women with their children fall behind. Imoinda, you must not expose yourself.

Retire, my love; I almost fear for you.

Imo. I fear no danger; life or death I will enjoy with you.

Oroo. My person is your guard.

Aboan. Now, sir, blame yourself; if you had not prevented my cutting his throat, that coward there had not discovered us. He comes now to upbraid you.

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, talking to HOTMAN, with his Rabble.

Lieut. This is the very thing I would have wish'd. Your honest service to the government

(To Hotman.)

Shall be rewarded with your liberty.

Aboan. His honest service! call it what it is, His villany, the service of his fear.

If he pretends to honest services, Let him stand out, and meet me like a man.

(Advances.)

Oroo. Hold, you! and you who come against us, hold!

I charge you in a general good to all;
And wish I could command you, to prevent
The bloody havoc of the murd'ring sword.
I would not urge destruction uncompell'd:
But if you follow fate, you find it here.
The bounds are set, the limits of our lives;
Between us lies the gaping gulf of death,
To swallow all. Who first advances dies.

Enter CAPTAIN DRIVER, with his Crew.

Capt. D. Here, here, here they are, governor. What, seize upon my ship!

Come, boys, fall on—

(Advancing first, Oroonoko kills him.)

Oroo. Thou art fall'n indeed;
Thy own blood be upon thee.

Lieut. Rest it there;

He did deserve his death. Take him away.

(The body is removed.)

You see, sir, you and those mistaken men
Must be our witnesses, we do not come
As enemies, and thirsting for your blood.
If we desir'd your ruin, the revenge
Of our companion's death had push'd it on.
But that we overlook, in a regard
To common safety and the public good.

Oroo. Regard that public good; draw off your men,

And leave us to our fortune;—we're resolv'd.

Lieut. Resolv'd! on what? your resolutions
Are broken, overturn'd, prevented, lost:
You see our numbers could with ease compel
What we request; and what do we request?
Only to save yourselves.

(The Women with their Children gather about the Men.)

Oroo. I'll hear no more.

Lieut. To those poor wretches, who have been seduc'd

And led away; to all, and ev'ry one,

We offer a full pardon—

Oroo. Then fall on. (Preparing to engage.)

Lieut. Lay hold upon't, before it be too late:
Pardon and mercy.

(The Women clinging about the Men, they leave Oroonoko, and fall upon their faces, crying out for pardon.)

Slaves. Pardon, mercy, pardon.

Oroo. Let them go all. Now, governor, I see,
I own the folly of my enterprise,
The rashness of this action, and must blush,
Quite through this veil of night, a whitely shame,
To think I could design to make those free,
Who were by nature slaves; wretches design'd
To be their masters' dogs, and lick their feet.
I would not live on the same earth with creatures,
That only have the faces of their kind.

Why should they look like men, who are not so,
When they put off their noble natures, for
The grov'ling qualities of downcast beasts?
We were too few before for victory;
We're still enow to die. (To Imoinda and Aboan.)

Enter BLANDFORD.

Lieut. Live, royal sir:

Live, and be happy long on your own terms;

Only consent to yield, and you shall have

What terms you can propose for you and your's.

Oroo. Consent to yield! shall I betray myself?
(Blandford comes forward.)

Bland. I'm glad you have proceeded by fair means. (To Lieutenant-Governor.)

I came to be a mediator.

Lieut. Try what you can to work upon him.

Oroo. Are you come against me too?

Bland. Is this to come against you?

(Offering his sword to Oroonoko.)

Unarm'd to put myself into your hands?

I come, I hope, to serve you.

Oroo. You have serv'd me;

I thank you for't; and I am pleas'd to think

You were my friend while I had need of one:

But now 'tis past; this farewell, and be gone.

(Embraces him.)

Bland. It is not past, and I must serve you still.

Oroo. I know what I have done, and I should be
A child to think they ever can forgive.

Forgive! were there but that, I would not live

To be forgiven: is there a power on earth,

That I can ever need forgiveness from?

Bland. You sha' not need it.

Oroo. No, I wo' not need it.

Bland. You see he offers you your own conditions,

For you and your's.

Oroo. Must I capitulate?

Precariously compound, on stinted terms,
To save my life?

Bland. Sir, he imposes none.

You make 'em for your own security.

Lieut. He will rely on what you say to him.

(To Bland.)

Offer him what you can; I will confirm
And make all good. Be you my pledge of trust.

Bland. I'll answer with my life for all he says.

Lieut. Ay, do, and pay the forfeit if you please.

(Aside.)

Bland. Consider, sir, can you consent to throw
That blessing from you, you so hardly found,
And so much valued once?

Oroo. Imoinda! oh!

'Tis she that holds me on this argument
Of tedious life! I could resolve it soon,
Were this curs'd being only in debate.
But my Imoinda struggles in my soul;
She makes a coward of me, I confess;
I am afraid to part with her in death;
And more afraid of life to lose her here.

Bland. This way you must lose her. Think upon
The weakness of her sex, made yet more weak
With her condition, requiring rest,
And soft indulging ease, to nurse your hope,
And make you a glad father.

Oroo. There I feel

A father's fondness, and a husband's love.
They seize upon my heart, strain all its strings,
To pull me to 'em from my stern resolve.
Husband and father! all the melting art
Of eloquence lives in those soft'ning names.
Methinks I see the babe, with infant hands,
Pleading for life, and begging to be born.
Shall I forbid its birth, deny him light,
The heav'nly comforts of all-cheering light,
And make the womb the dungeon of his death,
His bleeding mother his sad monument?
These are the calls of nature, that call loud;
They will be heard, and conquer in their cause:
He must not be a man who can resist 'em.
No, my Imoinda! I will venture all
To save thee and that little innocent.
The world may be a better friend to him
Than I have found it. Now I yield myself:

(Gives up his sword.)

The conflict's past, and we are in your hands.

(Several Men get about Oroonoko and Aboan, and seize them.)

Lieut. So you shall find you are. Dispose of them as I commanded you.

Bland. Good heav'n forbid! you cannot mean—

Lieut. This is not your concern.

(To Blandford, who goes to Oroonoko.)

I must take care of you.

(To Imoinda.)

Imo. I'm at the end

Of all my care: here will I die with him.

(Holding Oroonoko.)

Oroo. You shall not force her from me.

(Holds her.)

Lieut. Then I must (They force her from him.)
Try other means, and conquer force by force:
Break, cut off his hold, bring her away.

Imo. I do not ask to live, kill me but here.

Oroo. O, bloody dogs! inhuman murderers!

[Imoinda is forced out at one door by the Lieutenant-Governor and others; Oroonoko and Aboan hurried out another. Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Enter STANMORE, CHARLOTTE WELDON, and LUCY.

Char. If I should consent to the fine things you can say to me, how would you look at last, to find them thrown away on an old acquaintance?

Stan. An old acquaintance!

Char. Lord, how easily are you men to be imposed upon! I am no cousin newly arrived from England, not I; but the very Weldon you wot of.

Stan. Weldon!

Char. Not murdered, nor made away, as my sister would have you believe; but am, in very good health, your old friend in breeches that was,
and now your humble servant in petticoats.

Stan. I am glad we have you again. But what service can you do me in petticoats, pray?

Char. Can't you tell what?

Stan. Not I, by my troth. I have found my mistress, it seems; which I did not expect from your petticoats.

Char. Come, come, you have had a friend of your mistress long enough; 'tis high time now to have a mistress of your friend.

Stan. What do you say?

Char. I am a woman, sir.

Stan. A woman?

Char. As arrant a woman as you would have had me but now, I assure you.

Stan. And at my service?

Char. If you have any for me in petticoats.

Stan. Yes, yes, I shall find you employment.

Char. I need not tell you I made that little plot, and carried it on only for this opportunity. I was resolved to see whether you liked me as a woman, or not; if I had found you indifferent, I would have endeavoured to have been so too; but you say you like me, and therefore I have ventured to discover the truth.

Stan. Like you! I like you so well, that I am afraid you won't think marriage a proof on't: shall
I give you any other?

Char. No, no, I'm inclined to believe you, and that shall convince me. At more leisure, I'll satisfy you how I came to be in man's clothes; for no ill, I assure you, though I have happened to play the rogue in them. They have assisted me in marrying my sister, and have gone a great way in befriending your cousin Jack with the widow. Can you forgive me for pimping for your family?

Enter JACK STANMORE.

Stan. So, Jack, what news with you?

Jack S. I am the forepart of the widow you know; she's coming after with the body of the family, the young squire in her hand, my son-in-law that is to be, with the help of Mr. Weldon.

Char. Say you so, sir? (To Jack S.)

Enter WIDOW LACKITT and her Son DANIEL.

Widow L. So, Mrs. Lucy, I have brought him about again; I have chastised him. Will you ever rebel again? will you, sirrah? But come, come, down on your marrow-bones, and ask her forgiveness. (Daniel kneels.) Say after me, Pray forsooth, wife.

Dan. Pray forsooth, wife.

Lucy. Well, well, this is a day of good nature, and so I take you into favour; but first take the oath of allegiance. (He kisses her hand, and rises.)
If ever you do so again— [on't.

Dan. Nay, marry if I do, I shall have the worst

Lucy. Here's a stranger, forsooth, would be glad to be known to you, a sister of mine; pray salute
her. (Starts at Charlotte.)

Widow L. Your sister, Mrs. Lucy! What do you mean? This is your brother, Mr. Weldon.
Do you think I do not know Mr. Weldon?

Lucy. Have a care what you say; this gentleman's about marrying her: you may spoil all.

Widow L. Fiddle-faddle; what! you would put a trick upon me.

Char. No, faith, widow, the trick is over; it has taken sufficiently; and now I will teach you the trick, to prevent your being cheated another time.

Widow L. How! cheated, Mr. Weldon?

Char. Why ay, you will always take things by the wrong handle; I see you will have me Mr.
Weldon; I grant you I was Mr. Weldon a little while, to please you or so; but Mr. Stanmore here has persuaded me into a woman again.

Widow L. A woman! pray let me speak with you. (Draws her aside.) You are not in earnest, I hope, a woman?

Char. Really a woman.

Widow L. 'Gads my life! I could not be cheated in everything. I know a man from a woman at these years, or the devil is in't. Pray did not you marry me?

Char. You would have it so.

Widow L. And did not I give you a thousand pounds this morning?

Char. Yes, indeed, 'twas more than I deserved; but you had your pennyworth for your penny, I suppose; you seemed to be pleased with your bargain.

Widow L. A rare bargain I have made on't, truly. I have laid out my money to a fine purpose upon a woman.

Char. You would have a husband, and I provided for you as well as I could.

Widow L. Yes, yes, you have provided for me.

Char. And you have paid me very well for't; I thank you.

Widow L. 'Tis very well: I may be with child too, for aught I know, and may go look for the father.

Char. Nay, if you think so, 'tis time to look about you, indeed. For my part, Mrs. Lackitt, your thousand pounds will engage me not to laugh at you. Then my sister is married to your son; he is to have half your estate, I know; and indeed they may live upon it very comfortably to themselves, and very creditably to you.

Widow L. Nay, I can blame nobody but myself.

Char. You have enough for a husband still, and that you may bestow upon honest Jack Stanmore.

Widow L. Is he the man, then?

Char. He is the man you are obliged to.

Jack S. Yes, faith, widow, I am the man.

Widow L. Well, well, I see you will have me; even marry me, and make an end of the business.

Stan. Why, that's well said; now we are all agreed, and all well provided for.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. (To Stanmore.) Sir, Mr. Blandford desires you to come to him, and bring as many of your friends as you can with you.

Stan. I come to him. You shall all go along with me. Come, young gentleman, marriage is the fashion, you see; you must like it now.

Dan. If I dont, how shall I help myself?

Lucy. Nay, you may hang yourself in the noose, if you please, but you'll never get out on't with struggling.

Dan. Come, then, let's e'en jog on in the old road.

Cuckold, or worse, I must now be contented; I'm not the first has married and repented.

[Exeunt.]

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, BLANDFORD, and Planters.

Bland. Have you no reverence for future fame? No awe upon your actions, from the tongues, The cens'ring tongues of men, that will be free?

Re-enter STANMORE, JACK STANMORE, CHARLOTTE WELDON, LUCY, WIDOW LACKITT, and DANIEL.

So, Stanmore, you, I know, the women too, Will join with me: 'tis Oroonoko's cause, A lover's cause, a wretched woman's cause, That will become your intercession.

(To the Women.)

Stan. So far from further wrong, that 'tis a shame

He should be where he is. Good governor, Order his liberty; he yielded up Himself, his all, at your discretion.

Bland. Discretion! no; he yielded on your word; And I am made the cautionary pledge,

The gage and hostage of your keeping it.

Remember, sir, he yielded on your word; Your word; which honest men will think should be The last resort of truth and trust on earth: There's no appeal beyond it but to heaven.

Stan. He's out of all power of doing any harm, now, if he were disposed to it.

Char. But he is not disposed to it. [soon]

Bland. To keep him where he is, will make him Find out some desp'rate way to liberty: He'll hang himself, or dash out his mad brains.

Char. Pray try him by gentle means; we'll all be sureties for him.

Omnes. All, all.

Lucy. We will all answer for him now.

Lieut. Well, you will have it so; do what you please, just what you will with him; I give you leave. [Exit.]

Bland. We thank you, sir; this way, pray come with me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Discovers OROONOKO upon his back, his legs and arms stretched out, and chained to the ground.

Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, &c.

Bland. O miserable sight! help, ev'ry one, Assist me all to free him from his chains.

(They help him up, and bring him forward.)

Most injured prince! how shall we clear ourselves?

Oroo. If you would have me think you are not Confederates, all accessory to [all]

The base injustice of your governor;

If you would have me live, as you appear

Concern'd for me; if you would have me live

To thank and bless you, there is yet a way

To tie me ever to your honest love;

Bring my Imoinda to me; give me her,

To charm my sorrows, and, if possible,

I'll sit down with my wrongs, never to rise

Against my fate, or think of vengeance more.

Bland. Be satisfy'd, you may depend on us;

We'll bring her safe to you, and suddenly.

Char. We will not leave you in so good a work.

Widow L. No, no, we'll go with you.

Bland. In the meantime, Endeavour to forget, sir, and forgive; And hope a better fortune.

[Exeunt all but Oroonoko.]

Oroo. Forget! forgive! I must indeed forget When I forgive; but while I am a man, In flesh, that bears the living marks of shame, The print of his dishonourable chains, My memory still rousing up my wrongs, I never can forgive this governor, This villain; the disgrace of trust and place, And just contempt of delegated pow'r. What shall I do? If I declare myself, I know him, he will sneak behind his guard Of followers, and brave me in his fears; Else, lion-like, with my devouring rage, I would rush on him, fasten on his throat, Tear a wide passage to his treach'rous heart, And that way lay him open to the world. (Pauses.) If I should turn his Christian arts on him, Promise him, speak him fair, flatter, and creep With fawning steps, to get within his faith, I could betray him then, as he has me. But am I sure by that to right myself? Lying's a certain mark of cowardice: And, when the tongue forgets its honesty, The heart and hand may drop their functions too, And nothing worthy be resolv'd or done. Let me but find out

An honest remedy, I have the hand, A minist'ring hand, that will apply it home. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Lieutenant-Governor's House.

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

Lieut. I would not have her tell me she consents; In favour of the sex's modesty—

Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, JACK STANMORE, DANIEL, CHARLOTTE WELDON, and LUCY.

What's the matter?

Char. Nay, nothing extraordinary. But one good action draws on another. You have given the prince his freedom: now we come a begging for his wife: you won't refuse us.

Lieut. Refuse you? No, no, what have I to do to refuse you? I send her to him! You do very well; 'tis kindly done of you; even carry her to him, with all my heart.

Lucy. You must tell us where she is.

Lieut. I tell you! why, don't you know?

Bland. Your servant says she's in the house.

Lieut. No, no; I brought her home at first indeed; but I thought it would not look well to keep her here; I removed her in the hurry only to take care of her. What! she belongs to you; I have nothing to do with her.

Char. But where is she now, sir?

Lieut. Why, faith, I can't say, certainly; you'll hear of her at Parham-house, I suppose; there or thereabouts; I think I sent her there.

Bland. I'll have an eye on him. (Aside.)

[Exeunt all but Lieutenant-Governor.]

Lieut. I have lied myself into a little time, And must employ it; they'll be here again; But I must be before 'em.

(Going out, he meets IMOINDA, and seizes her.)

Are you come?

I'll court no longer for a happiness

That is in my own keeping; you may still

Refuse to grant, so I have power to take.

The man that asks deserves to be deny'd.

(She disengages one hand, and draws his sword from his side upon him; Governor starts and retires. BLANDFORD enters behind him.)

Imo. He does indeed, that asks unworthily.

Bland. You hear her, sir—that asks unworthily.

Lieut. You are no judge.

Bland. I am of my own slave.

Lieut. Be gone, and leave us.

Bland. When you let her go.

Lieut. To fasten upon you.

Bland. I must defend myself.

(Imoinda retreats towards the door, favoured by Blandford; when they are closed, she throws down the sword and runs out. Governor takes up his sword, they fight, close, and fall. Servants enter and part them.)

Lieut. She sha'n't escape me so; I've gone too far,

Not to go further. Curse on my delay;

But yet she is, and shall be in my power.

Bland. Nay, then it is the war of honesty; I know you, and will save you from yourself.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.

Enter OROONOKO.

Oroo. To honour bound! and yet a slave to love! I am distracted by their rival powers, And both will be obey'd. O great revenge! Thou raiser and restorer of fall'n fame! Let me not be unworthy of thy aid, For stopping in thy course. I still am thine; But can't forget I am Imoinda's too. She calls me from my wrongs to rescue her. No man condemn me, who has never felt A woman's power, or try'd the force of love; To run his glorious race of light anew, And carry on the world. Love, love will be My first ambition, and my fame the next.

Enter ABOAN, bleeding.

My eyes are turn'd against me, and combine With my sworn enemies, to represent This spectacle of horror. Aboan!

Aboan. I have no name That can distinguish me from the vile earth, To which I'm going: a poor abject worm,

That crawl'd awhile upon the bustling world, And now am trampled to my dust again.

Oroo. I see thee gash'd and mangled!

Aboan. Spare my shame,

To tell how they have us'd me; but believe The hangman's hand would have been merciful. Do not you scorn me, sir, to think I can Intend to live under this infamy?

I do not come for pity, to complain.

I've spent an honourable life with you;

The earliest servant of your rising fame,

And would attend it with my latest care:

My life was your's, and so shall be my death.

You must not live,

Bending and sinking; I have dragg'd my steps

Thus far, to tell you that you cannot live:

To warn you of those ignominious wrongs,

Whips, rods, and all the instruments of death

Which I have felt, and are prepared for you.

This was the duty that I had to pay.

'Tis done, and now I beg to be discharg'd.

Oroo. What shall I do for thee?

Aboan. My body tires,

And wo' not bear me off to liberty:

I shall again be taken, made a slave,

A sword, a dagger, yet would rescue me.

I have not strength to go and find out death,

You must direct him to me.

Oroo. Here he is, (Gives him a dagger.)

The only present I can make thee now:

And, next the honourable means of life,

I would bestow the honest means of death.

Aboan. I cannot stay to thank you. If there is

A being after this, I shall be your's

In the next world, your faithful slave again.

This is to try. (Stabs himself.) I had a living sense

Of all your royal favours, but this last

Strikes through my heart. I wo' not say farewell,

For you must follow me. (Dies.)

Oroo. In life and death,

The guardian of my honour. Follow thee!

I should have gone before thee: then, perhaps,

Thy fate had been prevented. All his care

Was to preserve me from the barbarous rage

That worry'd him, only for being mine.

Why, why, ye gods! why am I so accurs'd,

That it must be a reason of your wrath,

A guilt, a crime sufficient to the fate

Of any one, but to belong to me?

My friend has found it out, and my wife will soon:

My wife! the very fear's too much for life.

I can't support it. Where's Imoinda! Oh!

(Going out, he meets IMOINDA, who runs into his arms.)

Thou bosom softness! Down of all my cares!

I could recline my thoughts upon this breast

To a forgetfulness of all my griefs,

And yet be happy; but it wo' not be.

Thou art disorder'd, pale, and out of breath!

If fate pursues thee, find a shelter here.

What is it thou wouldst tell me?

Imo. 'Tis in vain to call him villain.

Oroo. Call him governor; is it not so?

Imo. There's not another, sure.

Oroo. Villain's the common name of mankind here,

But his most properly. What? what of him?

I fear to be resolv'd, and must inquire.

He had thee in his power.

Imo. I blush to think it.

Oroo. Blush! to think what?

Imo. That I was in his power.

Oroo. He could not use it?

Imo. What can't such men do?

Oroo. But did he? durst he?

Imo. What he could he dar'd.

Oroo. His own gods damn him, then! For ours have none,

No punishment for such unheard of crime.

Imo. This monster, cunning in his flatteries,

When he had weary'd all his useless arts,
Leap'd out, fierce as a beast of prey, to seize me.
I trembled, fear'd.

Oroo. I fear and tremble now.

What could preserve thee? What deliver thee?

Imo. That worthy man, you us'd to call your friend—

Oroo. Blandford?

Imo. Came in, and sav'd me from his rage.

Oroo. He was a friend, indeed, to rescue thee!
And, for his sake, I'll think it possible
A Christian may be yet an honest man.

Imo. O did you know what I have struggled through,
To save me your's, sure you would promise me
Never to see me forc'd from you again.

Oroo. To promise thee! O! do I need to promise?

But there is now no further use of words.

Death is security for all our fears.

(Shews Aboan's body on the floor.)

And yet I cannot trust him.

Imo. Aboan!

Oroo. Mangled and torn, resolv'd to give me time
To fit myself out for what I must expect,
Groan'd out a warning to me, and expir'd.

Imo. For what you must expect?

Oroo. Would that were all!

Imo. What, to be butcher'd thus—

Oroo. Just as thou seest.

Imo. By barb'rous hands, to fall at last their prey?

Oroo. I have run the race with honour, shall I now

Lag, and be overtaken at the goal?

Imo. No.

Oroo. I must look back to thee. (Tenderly.)

Imo. You sha' not need.

I am always present to your purpose; say,

Which way would you dispose me?

This dagger will instruct you. (Gives it him.)

Oroo. Ha! this dagger!

Like fate, it points me to the horrid deed.

Imo. Strike, strike it home, and bravely save us both.

There is no other safety.

Oroo. It must be—

But first a dying kiss—

This last embrace— (Kisses her.)

And now—

Imo. I'm ready.

Oroo. O, where shall I strike?

Is there the smallest grain of that lov'd body
That is not dearer to me than my eyes,
My bosom'd heart, and all the life blood there?
Bid me cut off these limbs, hew off these hands,
Dig out these eyes, though I would keep them last
To gaze upon thee; but to murder thee!
The joy, and charm of ev'ry ravish'd sense,
My wife! forbid it, nature.

Imo. 'Tis your wife,

Who on her knees conjures you. O! in time,
Prevent those mischiefs that are falling on us.
You may be hurry'd to a shameful death,
And I too dragg'd to the vile governor;
Then I may cry aloud. When you are gone,
Where shall I find a friend again to save me?

Oroo. It will be so. Thou unexampled virtue!
Thy resolution has recover'd mine:
And now prepare thee.

Imo. Thus, with open arms,
I welcome you and death.

(He drops the dagger as he looks on her, and throws himself on the ground.)

Oroo. I cannot bear it.

O let me dash against the rock of fate,
Dig up this earth, and tear her bowels out,
To make a grave, deep as the centre down,
To swallow wide and bury us together!
It wo't be. O! then some pitying god
(If there be one a friend to innocence)

Find yet a way to lay her beauties down
Gently in death, and save me from her blood.

Imo. O rise, 'tis more than death to see you thus.

I'll ease your love, and do the deed myself—

(She takes up the dagger, he rises in haste to take it from her.)

Oroo. O! hold, I charge thee, hold!

Imo. Though I must own

It would be nobler for us both from you.

Oroo. O! for a whirlwind's wing to hurry us
To yonder cliff, which frowns upon the flood;
That in embraces lock'd we might plunge in,
And perish thus in one another's arms. (Shouts.)

Imo. Alas! what shout is that?

Oroo. I see 'em coming.

They shall not overtake us. This last kiss,
And now farewell.

Imo. Farewell, farewell for ever.

Oroo. I'll turn my face away, and do it so.

Now, are you ready?

Imo. Now. But do not grudge me
The pleasure, in my death, of a last look;
Pray look upon me.—Now I'm satisfied.

Oroo. So fate must be by this.

(Going to stab her, he stops short; she lays her hand on his, in order to give the blow.)

Imo. Nay, then, I must assist you.

And, since it is the common cause of both,
'Tis just that both should be employ'd in it.

Thus, thus 'tis finish'd, and I bless my fate,
(Stabs herself.)

That, where I liv'd, I die in these lov'd arms. (Dies.)

Oroo. She's gone. And now all's at an end with me.

Soft, lay her down: O we will part no more.

(Throws himself by her.)

But let me pay the tribute of my grief,

A few sad tears to thy lov'd memory,

And then I follow— (Weeps over her. Shouts.)

But I stay too long. (A noise again.)

The noise comes nearer. Hold! before I go,
There's something would be done. It shall be so,
And then, Imoinda, I'll come all to thee. (Rises.)

Enter BLANDFORD and his party, and the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR and his party. Swords drawn.

Lieut. You strive in vain to save him, he shall die. [lives.]

Bland. Not while we can defend him with our sword.

Lieut. Where is he?

Oroo. Here is the wretch whom you would have.
Put up your swords, and let not civil broils
Engage you in the cursed cause of one
Who cannot live, and now entreats to die.
This object will convince you.

Bland. 'Tis his wife. (They gather about the body.)
Alas! there was no other remedy.

Lieut. Who did the bloody deed?

Oroo. The deed was mine:

Bloody I know it is, and I expect
Your laws should tell me so. Thus, self-condemn'd,
I do resign myself into your hands,
The hands of justice—But I hold the sword
For you—and for myself.

(Stabs the Governor and himself, then throws himself by Imoinda's body.)

'Tis as it should be now, I have sent his ghost
To be a witness of that happiness
In the next world, which he deny'd us here. (Dies.)

Bland. I hope there is a place of happiness
In the next world for such exalted virtue.
Pagan or unbeliever, yet he liv'd
To all he knew: and, if he went astray,
There's mercy still above to set him right.
But Christians, guided by the heav'nly ray,
Have no excuse if they mistake their way. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall in the castle.

Enter MR. FRANK.

Frank. To what humiliation has my bad fortune reduced me, when it brings me here an humble suppliant to my base oppressor!

Enter SNACKS.

Snacks. A letter for me by express! What can it be about? Something of great consequence from my lord, I suppose. Frank here! What the devil can he want?—Come a begging, though, I dare say. (Aside.)

Frank. Good morning to you, Mr. Snacks.

Snacks. (Coldly.) Good morning.

Frank. I'm come, sir, to—I say, sir, I'm come to—

Snacks. Well, sir, I see you are come; and what then? What are you come for, sir?

Frank. The termination of the law-suit which you have so long carried on against me, owing to my entire inability to prosecute it any further, has thrown me into difficulties which I cannot surmount without your kind assistance.

Snacks. Very pretty, indeed! You are a very modest man, Mr. Frank; you've spent your last shilling in quarrelling with me, and now you want me to help you.

Frank. The farm called Hundred Acres is at present untenanted—I wish to rent it.

Snacks. You wish to rent it, do you? And pray, sir, where's your money? And what do you know about farming?

Frank. I have studied agriculture; and, with care, have no doubt of being able to pay my rent regularly.

Snacks. But I have a great doubt about it. No, no, sir; do you think I'm so unmindful of his lordship's interest as to let his land to a poor novice like you? It won't do, Mr. Frank; I can't think of it.—Good day, friend; good day. (Shewing him the door.)

Frank. My necessities, sir—

Snacks. I have nothing to do with your necessities, sir; I have other business. Good day. There's the door.

Frank. Unfeeling wretch!

Snacks. What!

Frank. But what could I expect? I think not, thou sordid man, 'tis for myself I sue—my wife, my children—'tis for them I ask your aid, or else my pride had never stooped so low! my honest poverty is no disgrace: your ill-gotten gold gives you no advantage over me; for I had rather feel my heart beat freely, as it does now, than know that I possessed your wealth, and load it with the crimes entailed upon it. [Exit.]

Snacks. A mighty fine speech, truly! I think I'll try if I can't lower your tone a little, my fine, blustering fellow: I'll have you laid by the heels before night for this. Proud as you are, you'll have time to reflect in a gaol, and bring down your spirit a little. But come, let me see what my letter says. What a deal of time I've lost with that beggar. (Reads.) "Sir,—This is to inform you that my Lord Lackwit died—an heir to his estate—his lordship never acknowledged her as his wife—son called Robin Roughhead—Robin is the legal heir to the estate—to put him in immediate possession, according to his lordship's last will and testament."

Your's to command,

"KIT CODICIL, Attorney at Law."

Here's a catastrophe! Robin Roughhead a lord! My stewardship has done pretty well for me already, but I think I shall make it do better now. I know this Robin very well; he's devilish cunning, I'm afraid; but I'll tickle him. He shall marry my daughter—then I can do as I please. To be sure, I have given my promise to Rattle; but what of that? he hasn't got it under my hand. I think I had better tell Robin this news at once; it will make him mad—and then I shall do as I please with him. Ay, ay, I'll go. How unfortunate that I did not make friends with him before! He has no great reason to like me; I never gave him anything but hard words. (Rattle sings without.) Confound it, here's that fellow Rattle coming.

Enter RATTLE.

Rat. Ah, my old daddy! how are you? What! have you got the mumps? can't you speak?

Snacks. I wish you had the mumps, and could not speak. What do you old daddy me for?

Rat. Why, father-in-law! curse me, but you are most conceitedly crusty to-day; what's the matter with you? why you are as melancholy as a lame duck.

Snacks. The matter is—that I am sick.

Rat. What's your disorder?

Snacks. A surfeit: I've had too much of you.

Rat. Oh! you'll soon get the better of that; for when I've married your daughter, curse me if I shall trouble you much with my company.

Snacks. But you hav'n't married her yet.

Rat. Oh! but I shall soon; I have got your promise, you know.

Snacks. Can't remember any such thing.

Rat. No? Your memory's very short, then.

Snacks. A short memory's very convenient, sometimes.

Rat. And so is a short stick; and I've a great mind to try the utility of it now. I tell you what, Snacks, I always thought you was a d—d old rascal, but now I'm sure of it. It's no matter, though: I'll marry your daughter, notwithstanding.

Snacks. You will, will you?

Rat. Yes, Snacks, I will; for I love her. I wonder how the devil such a pretty girl ever came to have such a queer, little, shrivelled, old mop-stick as you for a father. Snacks, your wife must certainly have made a cuckold of you; it could not be else.

Snacks. Impudent rascal!

Rat. But it signifies not who her father is; Miss Nancy is lovely, and I'll marry her. Let me see; five thousand pounds you promised; yes, you shall give her that on the wedding-day. You have been steward a long time; that sum must be a mere flea-bite to you.

Snacks. I rather think I shall never give her a farthing if she marries such a paltry fellow as you.

Rat. Why lookye; I'm a lively spark, with a good deal of fire in me, and it is not a little matter that will put me out: where others sink, I rise: and this opposition of your's will only serve to blow me into a blaze that will burn you up to a cinder. I'm up to your gossip; I'm not to be had.

Snacks. No, nor my daughter's not to be had, Mr. Banker's Clerk; so I sha'n't waste any more time with you: go, and take in the flats in Lombard-street; it won't do here. [Exit.]

Rat. Oh! what, he has mizzled, has he? I fancy you'll find me the most troublesome blade you ever settled an account with, old Raise-rent. I'll astonish you, somehow or other. I wonder what has changed him so!

Enter MISS NANCY.

Ah, my sweet, little, rural angel! How fares it with you? You smile like a May morning.

Nan. The pleasure of seeing you always makes me.

Rat. Indeed! give me a kiss, then. I love you well enough to marry you without a farthing; but I think I may as well have the five thousand pounds, if it's only to tease old Long-purse.

Nan. Oh! you know you have his promise for that.

Rat. Yes, but he says he has forgot all about that, though it was no longer ago than yesterday; and he says I sha'n't have you.

Nan. Does he, indeed?

Rat. Yes; but never mind that.

Nan. I thought you said you loved me?

Rat. And so I do, better than all the gold in Lombard-street.

Nan. Then, why are you not sorry that my father won't give his consent?

Rat. His consent! I have got your's and my own, and I'll soon manage him. Don't you remember how I frightened him one night, when I came to visit you by stealth, dressed like a ghost, which he thinks haunts the castle? Oh! I'll turn that to account. I know he's very superstitious, and easily frightened into anything. Come, let's take a walk, and plot how I, your knight-errant, shall deliver you from this haunted castle.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Corn-field.

ROBIN ROUGHHEAD discovered, binding up a sheaf.

Rob. Ah! work, work, work, all day long, and no such thing as stopping a moment to rest; for there's old Snacks, the steward, always upon the look out; and if he sees one, slap he has it down in his book, and then there's sixpence gone plump. (Comes forward.) I do hate that old chap, and that's the truth on't. Now, if I was lord of this place, I'd make one rule—there should be no such thing as work; it should be one long holyday all the year round. Your great folks have strange whims in their heads, that's for sartin. I don't know what to make of 'un, not I. Now there's all yon great park there, kept for his lordship to look at, and his lordship has not seen it these twelve years. Ah! if it was mine, I'd let all the villagers turn their cows in there, and it should not cost 'em a farthing; then, as the parson said last Sunday, I should be as rich as any in the land, for I should have the blessings of the poor. Dang it! here comes Snacks. Now I shall get a fine jobation, I suppose.

Enter SNACKS, bowing very obsequiously; Robin takes his hat off, and stands staring at him.

Rob. I be main tired, Master Snacks; so I stopped to rest myself a little; I hope you'll excuse it. I wonder what the dickens he's grinning at. (Aside.)

Snacks. Excuse it? I hope your lordship's infinite goodness and condescension will excuse your lordship's most obsequious, devoted, and very humble servant, Timothy Snacks, who is come into the presence of your lordship, for the purpose of informing your lordship—

Rob. Lordship! He, he, he! Ecod! I never knew as I had a hump before. Why, Master Snacks, you grow funny in your old age.

Snacks. No, my lord, I know my duty better; I should never think of being funny with a lord.

Rob. What lord? Oh! you mean the lord Harry, I suppose. No, no; must not be too funny with him, or he'll be after playing the very devil with you.

Snacks. I say, I should never think of jesting with a person of your lordship's dignified character.

Rob. Dig—dig—what! Why, now I look at you, I see how it is: you are mad. I wonder what quarter the moon's in. Lord! how your eyes roll! I never saw you so before. How came they to let you out alone?

Snacks. Your lordship is most graciously pleased to be facetious.

Rob. Why, what gammon are you at? Don't come near me, for you have been bit by a mad dog: I'm sure you have.

Snacks. If your lordship will be so kind as to read this letter, it would convince your lordship—Will your lordship condescend?

Rob. Why, I would condescend, but for a few reasons, and one of them is, that I can't read.

Snacks. I think your lordship is perfectly right; for these pursuits are too low for one of your lordship's nobility.

Rob. Lordship, and lordship again! I'll tell you what, Master Snacks; let's have no more of your fun, for I won't stand it any longer, for all you be steward here. My name's Robin Roughhead, and if you don't choose to call me by that name, I sha'n't answer you, that's flat. I don't like him well enough to stand his jokes. (Aside.)

Snacks. Why, then, Master Robin, be so kind as to attend whilst I read this letter. (Reads.) "Sir,—This is to inform you, that my Lord Lackwit died this morning, after a very short illness; during which, he declared that he had been married, and had an heir to his estate. The woman he married was commonly called, or known, by the name of Roughhead: she was poor and illiterate, and, through motives of shame, his lordship never acknowledged her as his wife. She has been dead some time since, and left behind her a son called Robin Roughhead: now this said Robin is the legal heir to the estate. I have, therefore, sent you the necessary writings to put him into immediate possession, according to his lordship's last will and testament. Your's to command, KIT CODICIL, Attorney at Law."

Rob. What, what, all mine? the houses, the trees, the fields, the hedges, the ditches, the gates, the horses, the dogs, the cats, the cocks, and the hens, and the cows, and the bulls, and the pigs, and the—What! are they all mine? and I, Robin Roughhead, am the rightful lord of all this estate? Don't keep me a minute now, but tell me it is so! Make haste, tell me—quick, quick!

Snacks. I repeat it, the whole estate is your's.

Rob. Huzza! Huzza! (Catches off Snacks's hat and wig.) Set the bells a ringing; set the ale a running; make every body drunk; if there's a sober man to be found any where to-day, he shall be put in the stocks. Go get my hat full of guineas to make a scramble with; call all the tenants together. I'll lower the rents—I'll—

Snacks. I hope your lordship will do me the favour to—

Rob. Why, that may be as it happens; I can't tell. (Carelessly.)

Snacks. Will your lordship dine at the castle to-day?

Rob. Yes.

Snacks. What would your lordship choose for dinner?

Rob. Beef-steaks and onions, and plenty of 'em.

Snacks. Beef-steaks and onions! What a dish for a lord! He'll be a savoury bit for my daughter, though. (Aside.)

Rob. What are you at there, Snacks? Go, get me the guineas—make haste; I'll have the scramble, and then I'll go to Dolly, and tell her the news.

Snacks. Dolly! Pray, my lord, who's Dolly?

Rob. Why, Dolly is to be my lady, and your mistress, if I find you honest enough to keep you in my employ.

Snacks. He rather smokes me. (Aside.) I have a beauteous daughter, who is allowed to be the very pink of perfection.

Rob. D—n your daughter! I have got something else to think of: don't talk to me of your daughter; stir your stumps, and get the money.

Snacks. I am your lordship's most obsequious—Zounds! what a peer of the realm.

[Aside, and exit.]

Rob. Ha, ha, ha! What work I will make in the village. Work! no, there shall be no such thing as work, it shall be all play. Where shall I go? I'll go to—No, I won't go there; I'll go to Farmer Hedgestakes, and tell him—No, I'll not go there; I'll go to—D—n it, I'll go no where; yes, I will; I'll go every where; I'll be neither here, nor there, nor any where else. How pleased Dolly will be when she hears—

Enter Villagers, shouting.

Dick, Tom, Jack, how are you, my lads? Here's news for you! Come, stand round, make a ring, and I'll make a bit of a speech to you. (They all get round him.) First of all, I suppose Snacks has told you that I'm your landlord?

Vil. We are all glad of it.

Rob. So am I; and I'll make you all happy; I'll lower all your rents.

All. Huzza! Long live Lord Robin!

Rob. You sha'n't pay no rent at all.

All. Huzza! huzza! long live Lord Robin!

Rob. I'll have no poor people in the parish, for I'll make 'em all rich; I'll have no widows, for I'll marry 'em all. (Women shout.) I'll have no orphan children, for I'll father 'em all myself; and if that's not doing as a lord should do, then I say I know nothing about the matter, that's all.

All. Huzza! huzza!

Enter SNACKS.

Snacks. I have brought your lordship the money. He means to make 'em fly, so I have taken care the guineas shall be all light. (Aside.)

Rob. Now, then, young and old, great and small, little and tall, merry men all, here's among you. (Throws the money; they scramble.) Now you've got your pockets filled, come to the castle, and I'll fill all your bellies for you.

[Villagers carry him off, shouting; Snacks follows.]

SCENE III.—Inside of a neat Cottage; table spread for dinner.

Enter MARGERY and DOLLY.

Dolly. There now, dinner's all ready, and I wish Robin would come. Do you think that I may take up the dumplings, mother?

Mar. Ay, ay, take 'em up; I warrant him he'll soon be here; he's always in pudding-time.

Dol. And well he may, for I'm sure you keep him sharp-set enough.

Mar. Hold your tongue, you baggage! He pays me but five shillings a week for board, lodging, and washing: I suppose he's not to be kept like a lord for that, is he? I wonder how you'll keep him when you get married, as you talk of?

Dol. Oh! we shall contrive to make both ends meet, and we shall do very well, I dare say; for Robin loves me, and I love Robin dearly.

Mar. Yes; but all your love won't keep the pot boiling, and Robin's as poor as Job.

Dol. La, mother, now don't be so cross! Oh dear! the dinner will get cold, and the dumplings will be quite spoiled; I wish Robin would come. (Robin sings without.) Oh! here he comes, in one of his merry humours.

Enter ROBIN, he cools himself with his hat, then sings and dances.

Why, Robin, what's the matter with you?

Rob. What! you haven't heard, then? Oh, I'm glad of that; for I shall have the fun of telling you.

Dol. Well, sit down then, and eat your dinner; I have made you some nice hard dumplings.

Rob. Dumplings! D—n dumplings.

Dol. D—n dumplings. La! mother, he d—ns dumplings. Oh! what a shame. Do you know what you are saying, Robin?

Rob. Never talk to me of dumplings.

Mar. But I'll talk of dumplings though, indeed. I shouldn't have thought of such behaviour: dumplings are very wholesome food; quite good enough for you, I'm sure. (Very angry.)

Rob. Are they, mother Margery? (Upsets the table, and dances on the plates, &c. and sings.) Tol de rol lol.

Mar. Oh dear! the boy's mad; there's all my crockery gone! (Picking up the pieces.)

Dol. (Crying.) I did not think you could have used us so; I'm quite ashamed of you, Robin!

Rob. Now doantye cry now, Dolly; doantye cry.

Dol. I will cry, for you behave very ill.

Rob. No, doantye, Dolly, doantye, now. (Shews a purse.)

Dol. How did you come by that, Robin?

Mar. What, a purse of gold? Let me see.—(Snatches the purse, and sits down to count the money.)

Dol. What have you been about, Robin?

Rob. No, I have not been about robbing; I have been about being made a lord of, that's all.

Dol. What are you talking about? Your head's turned, I'm sure.

Rob. Well, I know it's turned; it's turned from a clown's head to a lord's. I say, Dolly, how should you like to live in that nice place at the top of the hill yonder?

Dol. Oh! I should like it very much, Robin; it is a nice cottage.

Rob. Doant talk to me of cottages, I mean the castle!

Dol. Why, what is your head running upon?

Mar. Every one golden guineas, as I'm a virtuous woman. Where did you get them, Robin?

Rob. Why, where there's more to be had.

Mar. Ay, I always said Robin was a clever lad. I'll go and put these by. [Exit.]

Dol. Now, do tell me what you've been about. Where did you find all that money?

Rob. Dolly, Dolly, gee'us a buss, and I'll tell thee all about it.

Dol. Twenty, an' you pleasen, Robin.

Rob. First, then, you must know that I am the cleverest fellow in all these parts.

Dol. Well, I know'd that afore.

Rob. But I'll tell you how it is; it's because I am the richest fellow in all these parts; and if I haven't it here, I have it here. (Pointing to his head and his pocket.) That castle's mine, and all these fields up to the very sky.

Dol. No, no; come, Robin, that won't do.

Rob. Won't it? I think it will do very well.

Dol. No, no; you are running your rigs; I know you are, Robin.

Rob. It's all true, Dolly, as sure as the devil's in Lunnun.

Dol. What! are you in right down arnest?

Rob. Yes, I am: his lordship's dead, and he has left word as how that my mother was his wife, and I his son.

Dol. What?

Rob. Yes, Dolly, and you shall be my lady.

Dol. No? Shall I?

Rob. Yes, you shall.

Dol. Ecod, that will be fine fun. My Lady—

Rob. Now, what do you think on't?

Dol. My Lady—Lady Roughhead—

Rob. Why, Dolly!

Dol. Lady Roughhead? How it sounds! Ha, ha, ha! (Laughs immoderately.)

Rob. Egad, I believe she's going into a high strike. Dolly! Dolly! (Slapping her hands.)

Dol. Ha, ha, ha!

Rob. Doantye laugh so; I don't half like it. (Shakes her.) Dolly!

Dol. Oh! my dear Robin, I can't help laughing to think of Lady Roughhead.

Rob. The wench will go beside herself to a sar-tainty.

Dol. But now is it true in arnest?

Rob. Ay, as sure as you are there. But come, what shall we do? where shall we go? Oh! we'll go and see old mother Dickens; you know she took my part, and was very kind to me when poor mother died; and now she's very ill, and I'll go and give her something to comfort her old soul. Lord, lord! I have heard people say as riches won't make a body happy; but while it gives me the power of doing so much good, I'm sure I shall be the happiest dog alive. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Road to the castle.

Enter MR. FRANK.

Frank. Well, then, to the house of woe I must return again. And can I take no comfort with me? nothing to cheer my loving wife and helpless children? What misery to see them want!

Enter ROBIN, unobserved by Frank.

Rob. Want! No, there shall be no such thing as want where I am, that's for certain.

Frank. My own distress I could bear well, very well; but to see my helpless innocents enduring all the woes poverty brings with it, is more than I can bear.

Rob. And more than I can bear, too. (Throws his hat upon the ground, and takes money out of his pocket, which he throws into it.)

Frank. To-day, I almost fear, they have not tasted food.

Rob. And I ha' been stuffing my d—d guts enough to make 'em burst. (Drops more money into his hat.)

Frank. How happy once my state! Where'er I turned my eyes, good fortune smiled upon me; then did the poor ever tell a tale of woe without relief? Were not my doors open to the unfortunate?

Rob. How glad I be as I be a lord.

Frank. No hand stretched out to my relief.

Rob. Eh! what? Yes it is, Mr. Frank! Lord, sir! I am very glad as I met with you.

Frank. Why so, my friend?

Rob. Because you be mortal poor, and I be mortal rich, and I'll share my last farthing with you.

Frank. Thank you, my kind lad. But what reason have you?

Rob. What reason have I? Why, you gave me when I wanted it.

Frank. I can't remember.

Rob. But that's no reason as I should forget it; it's a long time ago, too; but it made such a mark here, (pointing to his head,) that time won't rub it out. It's now fourteen years since poor mother died; she was very ill one day when you happened to come by our cottage, and saw me stand blubbering at the door: I was then about this high. You took me by the hand; and I shall never forget the look you gave me when you axed me what was the matter with me; and when I told you, you called me a good lad, and went in and talked to mother. From that time you came to see her every day, and gave her all the help as you could; and when she died, poor soul! you buried her: and if ever I forget such kindness, I hope good luck will for ever forget me.

Frank. Tell me your name: it will remind me.

Rob. Robin Roughhead, your honour. To-day I be come to be lord of all this estate; and the first good I find of it is, that I am able to make you happy. (Stuffing the money into Frank's pockets.) Come up to the castle, and I'll give you as much money as you can carry away in a sack.

Frank. What sympathy is in that honest bosom! But how has this good fortune come to you?

Rob. Why, that poor woman as you buried was wife to his lordship: he has owned it on his death-bed, and left word as I'm his son.

Frank. How strange are the vicissitudes of life!

Rob. Now, sir, I am but a simple lad, as a body may say; and if you will be so good as to help me with your advice, I shall take it very kind of you, sir.

Frank. I thank you for the good opinion you have of me; and, as far as my poor abilities go, they shall be at your service.

Rob. Thankye, sir, thankye! But, pray, what bad luck made you so devilish poor?

Frank. It would take a long time to tell you the story of my misfortunes; but I owe them to the oppression of Mr. Snacks, the steward.

Rob. Snacks! Oh, d—n 'un! I'll do for him soon. He's rotten here, Master Frank: I do think as how he's a d—d old rogue.

Frank. Judge not too harshly.

Rob. Come, sir, will you go up to the castle?

Frank. Excuse me; the relief which you have so generously given me, enables me to return to my family.

Rob. Well, but you'll come back?

Frank. To-morrow.

Rob. No, to-night. Do'e favour me; I want to speak to you.

Frank. I have a long way to walk, and it will be very late before I can return; but I will refuse you nothing.

Rob. Thankye, sir; you're very kind: I shall stay till you come, if it's all night.

Frank. Proud wealth, look here for an example! My generous heart, how shall I thank you?

Rob. Lord, lord! doant think of thanking a man for paying his debts. Besides, if you only knowed how I feel all over me—it's a kind of a—I could cry for joy. [Exeunt.]

Enter RATTLE.

Rat. Well, everything is prepared for my attack on the castle to-night; and I don't much fear but I shall find means to terrify the enemy, and make him surrender at discretion. Yes, yes, Master Snacks, I shall soon be with you. (Shouting, music, and ringing of bells.) What a d—d racket here is in the village to-day! I wonder what it's all about?

Re-enter ROBIN.

Holloa, there! Stop, my fine fellow. Pray, can you tell me what all this uproar is about in the village?

Rob. Why, you be Master Rattle from Lunnun.

Rat. Well, I don't want to be told that.

Rob. Gee us your hand, Rattle, thou be'st a d—d honest fellow, and I like thee; I do indeed.

Rat. Very familiar, upon my word.

Rob. I liked you ever since you let old Toppin have the three pounds to pay his rent with; and now, whilst I think on't, here 'tis again; take it, for I won't let anybody give away money here but myself.

Rat. Why, what in the name of wonder is all this? What are you at? I think I'll open a shop here for the sale of bad debts.

Rob. Here, take the money.

Rat. Put it up, my fine fellow! you'll want it, perhaps.

Rob. Me want money! Shall I lend you an odd thousand, and set you up in a shop?

Rat. Why, who the devil are you?

Rob. Why, doant you know? I be Robin.

Rat. Robin, are you? Egad! I think you sing like a goldfinch.

Rob. Very well, Rattle; that's a good joke.

Rat. Why, curse me! if I am up to you, Master Robin; you are queering me, I believe.

Rob. Well, I shall be glad to see thee at the castle, Rattle. You see, I'm not ashamed of my old acquaintance, as some folks are.

Rat. Not ashamed of his old acquaintance! Why, what do you mean?

Rob. I can't stop to talk to you any longer.

Good b'ye, Rattle; thou be'st an honest fellow, and I shall be glad to see thee at the castle. [Exit.]

Rat. I declare I'm quite dumbfounded. And have I lived all my days in Lombard-street for this—to be hummed by a clown? (Laughing, music, ringing of bells, &c.) I believe the people are all mad to-day; I can't think what they are at.

Enter Clown, in a hurry.

Here, here, Hob! I want to speak with you.

Clown. You mun meak heast, then; for I be going to dine wi' my lord, and I shall be too late.

Rat. Wheugh! What, are you drunk?

Clown. Noa, noa; but I soon shall be, I take it, for there's plenty o' yeale to be gotten.

Rat. Plenty o' yeale to be gotten, is there?

Clown. Ees, I shall have a rare swig at it.

Rat. Pray, my fine fellow, can you tell me what the bells are ringing for?

Clown. Ees, to be sure I con.

Rat. Well, what is it?

Clown. Why, it's bekeas they do pull the ropes, I tell thee. Dinner will all get yeaten up whilst I stond here talking wi' you. (Runs off; Rattle runs after him and brings him back.)

Rat. You are a very communicative young fellow, indeed; I have learnt one thing from you, however, that there's plenty of eating and drinking going on; so I'll try if I can't be in at the death. Now, start fair, and the devil take the hindmost.

[They run off.]

SCENE II.—A Hall in the castle, leading to an inner apartment.

Enter SNACKS.

Snacks. Tell her to come this way. A young woman wanting Robin! This must be his sweet-heart Dolly, that he talks so much about; they must not come together; if they do it will knock up all my plan. What shall I do with her? if I could but get her into this room, she'd be safe enough—Here she is.

Enter DOLLY and MARGERY.

Are you the young woman that wanted to speak with his lordship?

Dol. Yes, sir.

Snacks. And, pray, what might you want with him?

Mar. She wants to settle some matters of her own with him.

Dol. Yes, that's all, sir.

Snacks. I dare say, but I must know what these things are. (Margery feels herself of great importance, and is particularly noisy through the whole of this scene. Snacks is alarmed lest Robin should hear her.)

Mar. Such matters as consarn nobody but themselves, and you must not meddle with them.

Snacks. (Aside.) Curse that old devil, what a tongue she has! I shall never be able to manage her. (To Dolly.) You can't see his lordship, he's engaged.

Dol. Yes, I know his lordship's engaged, for he promised me a long while ago.

Snacks. Oh! then you are the poor unfortunate young woman that—

Mar. (Very angry.) No, sir; she is the lucky young woman that is to be my lady; and I'd have you to know that I'm her mother.

Snacks. Ah, poor soul! I pity her; I do, indeed, from the bottom of my heart.

Mar. But she is not to be pitied; I shouldn't have thought of that! Pity, indeed!

Snacks. Poor dear creature! it's a sad job, but it can't be helped: his lordship is going to be married to-morrow to another woman.

Dol. What?

Snacks. It's true, indeed; I am very sorry.

Mar. And she is not to be my lady, after all?

Snacks. No, poor girl!

Dol. And Robin has quite forgot me! (Crying.) Oh dear, oh dear! I was afraid how it would be when he came to be a lord. And has he quite forgot me?

Snacks. Yes; he told me to tell you that he has done with you.

Mar. (Very noisy.) But I have not done with him, though. Pretty work, indeed! But I'll ring a peal in his ears, that shall bring him to his senses, I warrant; I'll teach him to use my daughter ill. He's a rogue, a rascal, a scapegallows, a vagabond; I'll find him out; I'll—

Snacks. (Trying to appease her.) Hush, hush!

Mar. I'll raise the dead, I will.

Snacks. Be cool, be cool! Robin will certainly hear this old bell-wether, and I shall be blown. (Aside.)

Mar. I'll make him down on his knees, I will; I'd have him to know, that though he is a lord, he shall remember his promise: I'll play the very devil with him, if I can find him. I'm in such a passion, I could tear his eyes out. Oh! if I can but see him—(Going, Snacks stops her.)

Snacks. Here, here! stop, stop! I'll go and bring him to you. Curse her old throat! (Aside.) Only just walk in here a moment, I'll talk to him myself; I will, indeed; perhaps I shall bring him round, my dear.

Dol. Thankye, sir; tell him I'll hang myself if he doesn't marry me. [Goes in.]

Mar. And tell him I'll kill him if he doesn't marry her. [Goes in; Snacks locks the door.]

Snacks. Well, they are safe for the present; I wish they were out of the house, though. If I can but bring this marriage to bear, I'm a made man. I have been very careful of the old lord's money, and I should like to take care of a little of the young lord's money. If I can but marry the girl and him, I'll soon double the twenty-six thousand pounds I have in the five per cents. sacked from my old master.

Rat. (Without, in a hollow voice.) Villanous robber!

Snacks. O lord! what's that? (Pauses.) It has put me in such a fright: that ghost's abroad again. What else could it be? I am afraid to open my eyes, for fear he should stare me in the face. I confess I've been a rogue, but it's never too late to mend. Say no more, and I'll make amends; indeed, I will. Upon my soul, I will; upon the word of an honest man, I will. [Exit.]

Enter RATTLE.

Rat. Ha, ha, ha! I think I gave his conscience a kick there. Twenty-six thousand pounds in the five per cents! let me remember that. I'm up to your tricks, Mr. Snacks; but you sha'n't carry on your scheme much longer, if I have any skill. If I don't quicken your memory a little, I'll give over conjuring and set up a chandler's-shop. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A handsome Apartment in the castle. A table with wines, &c.

ROBIN and SNACKS discovered.

Rob. (Rather tipsy.) Well, Snacks, this is very good stuff; I don't know as ever I drank any before: what do you call this, Snacks?

Snacks. Red-port wine, an't please your lordship.

Rob. Yes, red-port wine pleases his lordship. I wonder where this comes from. Oh! from the Red Sea, I suppose.

Snacks. No, my lord; there's plenty of spirits there, but not wine, I believe.

Rob. Well, one more thing full; only one; because, you know, now I'm a lord, I must not make a beast of myself; that's not like a nobleman, you know.

Snacks. Your lordship must do as your lordship pleases.

Rob. Must I? then give us t'other sup.

Snacks. I think his lordship is getting rather forward. I'll bring my daughter upon the carpet presently. (Aside.)

Enter Servant.

Serv. Please you, Master Snacks, here's John the carter says he's so lame he can't walk; and he hopes you'll let him have the pony, to-morrow, to ride by the waggon.

Snacks. Can't walk, can't he? Lame, is he?

Serv. Yes, sir.

Snacks. And what does he mean by being lame at this busy time? Tell him he must walk; it's my will.

Rob. (Aside to Serv.) You, sir, bring me John's whip, will you? [Exit Servant.] That's right, Snacks; d—n the fellow, what business has he to be lame?

Snacks. Oh! please your lordship, it's as much as I can do to keep these fellows in order.

Rob. Oh! they are sad dogs. Not walk, indeed! I never heard of such impudence.

Snacks. Oh, shameful, shameful! If I were behind him, I'd make him walk.

Enter a Servant with a whip, which he gives to Robin.

Rob. Come, Snacks, dance me a hornpipe.

Snacks. What?

Rob. A hornpipe.

Snacks. A hornpipe! I can't dance, my lord.

Rob. Come, none of your nonsense; I know you can dance; why you was made for dancing. There's a leg and foot. Come, begin!

Snacks. Here's no music.

Rob. Isn't there? then I'll soon make some. Lookye, here's my fiddlestick; how d'ye like it? Come, Snacks, you must dance; it's my will.

Snacks. Indeed, I'm not able.

Rob. Not able! Oh, shameful, shameful! Come, come, you must dance; it's my will. (Whips him.)

Snacks. Must I? Then here goes. (Hops about.)

Rob. What, d'ye call that dancing fit for a lord? Come, quicker, quicker. (Whips Snacks, who roars out.) There, that will do; now go and order John the carter the pony, will you?

Snacks. What a cunning dog it is! He's up to me now; but I think I shall be down upon him, by-and-by. (Aside.) [Exit.]

Rob. Ha, ha, ha! how he hopped about and halloed. But I'll work him a little more yet.

Re-enter SNACKS.

Well, Snacks, what d'ye think of your dancing-master?

Snacks. I hope your lordship won't give me any more lessons at present; for, to say the truth, I don't much like the accompaniment.

Rob. You must have a lesson every day, or you'll forget the step.

Snacks. No; your lordship has taken care that I sha'n't forget it for some time.

Rob. I can't think where Dolly is; I told her to come to me.

Snacks. My daughter's very beautiful.

Rob. Dang it! you talk a great deal—and I'll have a peep at her. I wish Dolly would come.

Snacks. Oh! don't think of her.

Rob. Not think of her! Why, pray?

Snacks. Oh! she's a—

Rob. A what? Take care, or I shall make you dance another hornpipe.

Snacks. I only mean to say, that she's too low for your lordship.

Rob. Too low! why, what was I just now? If I thought riches would make me such a rascal as to use the poor girl ill—a fig for 'em all! I'd give 'em up, and be plain Robin, honest Robin, again.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber, with a picture hanging over a closet-door.

Enter RATTLE and MISS NANCY.

Rat. Well, you see I've gained admission, notwithstanding your father's order to the contrary.

Nan. Yes; but how do you mean to get his consent to—

Rat. Why, as to his consent, I don't value it a button; but then five thousand pounds is a sum not to be sneezed at. I have given the old boy a bit of a hint to-night that he didn't much relish.

Nan. I expect my father here every minute, with his new-made lordship.

Rat. Indeed! then only hide me in this room, and the business is done.

Nan. That I will, where nobody can find you, I'm sure: I have a closet behind this picture of the old lord, made, I believe, to hide the family plate and jewels in; but it's quite forgotten now. (Opens the closet-door.)

Rat. Oh! it was made on purpose for me: I'll put a jewel into it presently. Here, (gives a paper) let this lie carelessly on the table; it's worth five thousand pounds.

Snacks. (Without.) This way, this way, my lord.

Rat. Oh, d—n it! here they come; tell him you've been frightened by a ghost; and if he signs the paper, give a loud cough.

[Puts the paper on the table, and exit into the closet.]

Enter SNACKS and ROBIN.

Snacks. There she is. Isn't she a beauty? What do you say now?

Rob. Why, I say she is not fit to hold a candle to my Dolly.

Nan. Pretty courtship, indeed. (Aside.)

Snacks. Ah! you'll alter your mind soon; I know you will. Come, let's sit down and talk of it. (They sit.)

Nan. (To Snacks.) Oh! my dear sir, I've been so frightened. Do you know, I think I've seen the very ghost that alarmed you so once.

Snacks. A what? a ghost? O Lord! I hope not. I hate the very sight of them. It's very odd; but—(starting)—Didn't I hear a noise?

Nan. Oh! sir, that's a very common thing in this part of the castle; I have been most terribly frightened lately.

Rob. Why, what frightened you? We are all good people here; they won't hurt us, will they Snacks?

Snacks. No, no; they—that is—(Alarmed.)

Rat. (From behind.) Hear!

Rob. What?

Rat. Hear!

Snacks. Lord have mercy upon me! (Kneels.)

Rat. Offspring of mine, listen not to the advice of that wretch!

Rob. I doant intend it.

Rat. He'll betray you: your intended bride he has imprisoned in the yellow chamber: go, set her at liberty.

Rob. What! my Dolly? Has he imprisoned her in the yellow chamber? Oh, dang your old head!

[Knocks Snacks down, and exit.]

Rat. Wretch! restore your ill-gotten wealth; twenty-six thousand pounds in the five per cents.

Snacks. I'll do anything that you command.

Rat. Sign the paper before you. (Snacks signs the paper. Nancy coughs.)

RATTLE jumps out of the closet, and takes the paper.

Rat. How do you do? how are you?

Snacks. Give me that paper.

Rat. Not a word: twenty-six thousand pounds in the five per cents. Now, dear Nancy, you are mine, and five thousand pounds.

Snacks. (To Nancy.) You to rebel against me, too, you baggage.

Mar. (Without.) Only let me catch hold of him, I'll give it him; an old, abominable—

Enter MARGERY.

Oh! you are there, are you? You wicked wretch! let me get at him. (Runs after Snacks, and beats him.) A pretty pack of lies you have told, you old ragamuffin, you.

Enter ROBIN and DOLLY.

Rob. What! are you there, Rattle?

Rat. Yes, I'm the ghost—Hear!

Rob. Why, you frightened old Honesty a little.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Please you, Master Snacks, the bailiffs ha' gotten Master Frank, and are bringing him here.

Rob. What! the bailiffs got him? Oh, you old rascal! (To Snacks.) Let him come here in a moment! [Exit Servant.] Oh! Snacks, I'm sorry for you; for I'm sure you can't be happy: a man as does so much harm, and so little good, never can be happy, I'm sure.

Enter MR. FRANK.

I be very sorry as they used you so, Mr. Frank, but I couldn't—

Frank. I know your heart too well to think you could.

Rob. I have a greater favour to ask of you, Mr. Frank: you see we've rather found Snacks out; now, will you—dang it, will you take care of me, and come and live in the castle with us, and give me your advice? You know how I mean; teach me a bit, you know.

Frank. You are too generous: but I accept your proffered kindness; and, by my care and attention to your welfare, will repay a small part of the debt I owe you.

Rob. Now, then, I am happy; with such a friend as Mr. Frank, Dolly, we shall know how to take care of ourselves and our neighbours; and I'll take care that poor folks shall bless the day as made me a lord. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall in George Bevil's house.

Enter ROBIN.

Robin. Heyday! Here's a house with a witness! Two o'clock, and not a soul stirring yet. What a charming thing it is to be quality! for, then, one need never do any one thing like the rest of the world: lie a-bed all day, sit up all night, spend an estate without ever having one, run in debt to everybody, pay nobody, laugh at everybody, despise everybody, and cuckold everybody. Oh, what a delightful thing it is to be quality! But I wonder Mr. Chapeau is not up yet, he did not use to be so late. A sweet fellow! has more of the man of fashion about him, than any servant in town. I wish I was like him; I strive all I can, but I cannot get his manner.

JENNY crosses the stage.

Harkye! my dear, is Captain Bevil at home?

Jenny. Who, sir?

Robin. What! is there nobody up yet?

Jenny. Up yet! no, sir; I believe they are not long gone to bed. Why, sure, you must be as great a stranger here as I am, to think of finding any one stirring at this time of the day.

Robin. A stranger! what, then, you are a new comer: I don't remember having had the pleasure of seeing you before, my dear.

Jenny. No, sir; I have been here but a week; and I don't know yet who it is I live with: Mrs. Suds, the washerwoman, recommended me; mayhap, you may know her.

Robin. I am acquainted with the family, but I have not the honour of knowing her. (Takes snuff.)

Jenny. And here I am, but I have never seen the face of my master since here I've been. I never hears anything of him, but when he raps at the door in the morning; and he is always going to bed just as I begin to think of getting up. What, perhaps, you want to speak to Mr. Chapeau?

Robin. Yes, I wish I could see him. You must know I live with your master's elder brother.

Jenny. Oh! what in the square?

Robin. No, no; that's the eldest, the great 'Squire Bevil: there are three of them. He that lives in St. James's-square, is, as I told you, the eldest, and has a great fortune; my master studies the law in the Temple, and your master, my dear, is the youngest, and studies nothing at all in the army: he's an officer in the foot-guards. I want to know if he's upon duty, can you tell me?

Jenny. Indeed, I can't, sir; but I know that he never comes home all night long. I wonder, for my part, what the quality can find to do up so, always, night after night, night after night.

Chap. (Within.) William! William!

Jenny. Oh, Lord! I vow there is Mr. Chapeau up, I must run and wash the steps: your servant, sir. [Exit.]

Robin. Your servant, my dear. A good fine girl that; I must see if she is not to be had. Oh! here he comes, here he comes.

Enter CHAPEAU.

Ah, Monsieur Chapeau! How do you do?

Chap. Ah, Master Robin! are you there? How goes it, my little dapper Robin?

Robin. You have slept it out, with a witness, my dear sir; it is almost two o'clock. (Looking at his watch.)

Chap. Is it, indeed! Why, we were up very late at Almack's last night, and lost all our money. Come, sit down. A d—d run against us all night long. But, however, no matter, the worse luck now, the better another time, eh! my little smiling Robin?

Robin. Ay, it is to be hoped so, Mr. Chapeau: I think they say that your master has lost considerably of late, has not he?

Chap. Oh! we have had the cursedest run of ill-luck that ever people had. And how to raise money upon earth we don't know; there's not an usurer, not a thief, between this and the Monument, but we have brought to a stand-still; not a penny will they lend us. I believe—though it is the devil to think of that too—but I believe we must marry somebody; we can't keep our heads above water much longer if we do not.

Robin. I should suppose, Mr. Chapeau, that your master had well nigh spent all his fortune by this time.

Chap. Spent his fortune! why we did not begin to make a figure, or be at all known in the world, till we had lost all we had.

Robin. Why, you don't tell me so!

Chap. You may stare, but it is very true. We did not begin to have credit, till we had not a farthing left in the world. Ah! Robin, London is the place for credit; pluck up but a good resolution, and you may run in debt as much as you please. Why the tradesmen are all playing as deep a game as our masters. William, bring chocolate.

Enter a Servant.

Or would you rather have tea, Robin?

Robin. No, thank you, Mr. Chapeau, chocolate if you please; I have left off tea some time.

Chap. Why, then, bring chocolate. [Exit Servant.]

Robin. As one don't drink so confoundedly hard as one used to do, I think there's less occasion for tea in a morning. But, pray, what might your master have lost last night?

Chap. 'Faith I can't justly say. Bob told me, (for you must know we had a little party with him last night,) that, at one in the morning, he was out nine hundred, and kept calling for rouleaus till past five, and every one quite worn out; so you may guess. (Chocolate brought in.) How much do you think I lost last night?

Robin. Upon my soul, I have no guess. Perhaps a guinea or two.

Chap. Fifty, or may I never rattle a box again. You must know that young Flimsy, Sir Harry Blackball, and some others, were all ballotted in last night, and we had devilish deep play.

Robin. What a genteel manner he has! (Aside.) Fifty guineas, Mr. Chapeau; why, that will make a horrid hole in your strong box, won't it?

Chap. A monstrous one, I can't say but it will. (Sipping chocolate.) But you must know (don't take any notice of it, though) I have been in keeping some time. A certain married woman, that shall be nameless, whose husband is monstrous rich, and keeps a shop in a certain street, that shall be nameless. You have seen her, my little Robin; a monstrous fine girl! She danced with me at the last masquerade; we were both monstrously well-dressed; after which, we went to a certain house, that shall be nameless. The husband is d—d jealous, though; and, between you and I, I am afraid he wants to get rid of her; so that, of late, we are grown more circumspect: for though I should like the éclat of a divorce; yet the money at present, the money, my little Robin, you know, is convenient.

Robin. O yes, d—e! the money to be sure. (Sipping.)

Chap. Robin, don't you remember meeting me in the Park, about ten days since, with a lady dressed in chintz, eh?

Robin. O lord, ay, very well! She was dressed in a muff too: I remember her. Why, that you told me, the next day, was a wax-chandler's lady in—

Chap. Hush! you confounded blab you; not a syllable for your life! (Clapping his hand to his mouth.)

Robin. Ha, ha! Have I smoaked you. Ha, ha, ha! (Bell rings.)

Chap. Ha! my master's bell; he is awake, then, I find. Toute à l'heure, monsieur; toute à l'heure. But what brought you here to-day so early, Robin; have you any message?

Robin. Yes, my master was not sure but his brother might be on guard, so bid me call and ask. He is at his brother's in the square: I fancy he intends coming down here presently. Some family business in hand, I have a notion.

Chap. Ay, they want to raise the devil, cash, I suppose. I fancy it is confounded low with both of them. That cursed place, White's, is so full of blacks, the poor lads can't keep a farthing for them. I suppose they want the eldest to lend.

Robin. Not my master, I warrant you; he's a good manager, sticks close to the law. Why, he's to be called to the bar next term. Devilish clever he is, an't he?

Chap. O devilish clever: a monstrous genius, Robin.

Robin. Very true, Mr. Chapeau, he is very monstrous.

JENNY re-crosses the stage.

Chap. Oh, Jenny! do you know has anybody called upon me or my master to-day?

Jenny. Yes, sir, there have been two ladies and an old cloaths'-man to you, and two thin ugly men asked for my master; I believe they be Jews.

Chap. Jews! Gadso, they must not be neglected. Did they say they would call again?

Jenny. Yes; one, I think, did say he would call again, and another of them left a paper parcel; I put it on the drawing-room table. [Exit.]

Chap. It's very well, Jenny. (Bell rings.) Well, Robin, you may tell your master that mine is just awake. If he has any business, this is the time to see him. Now or never. Adieu, au revoir.

Robin. Well, my dear Mr. Chapeau, adieu.—Adieu, as the French have it. (Going.)

Chap. But Robin, d—e, not a word of the little Chandler.

Robin. Oh! upon honour, I'll be close as wax.

Chap. Bravo! my little dapper Robin, you improve.

Robin. Yes, yes, thanks to you, I shall be something at last, with a little of your assistance. A charming, genteel fellow. [Exit.]

Chap. A foolish, awkward toad. (Bell rings.) I hear you, sir. What a d—d situation, after all, a servant's is; (taking snuff) never at ease, always attending other people's motions: I begin to be monstrous sick of it. As my master is pretty nearly ruined, I take it he will soon either hang or marry himself; I shall then beg leave to retire and enjoy the fruits of my industry, purchase some genteel sinecure, take a snug box in the country, and kill my own mutton. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Drawing-room.

Enter GEORGE BEVIL in his night-gown, and CHAPEAU.

G. Bev. My brother Harry's man here, do you say?

Chap. Yes, sir, he came from Mr. Bevil's in the square, to know if you were upon duty or not.

G. Bev. My brother, I suppose, then, will call here. I am glad of it. I shall have an opportunity of letting him into my situation. (Aside.) Anybody else?

Chap. Jenny says, sir, two Jews were here before I was up; they said they would call again, and one of them left this parcel.

G. Bev. Oh! very well; the writings, I suppose: ay, 'tis so. Lay them down. If they come again I must see them; and if anybody is with me, shew them into my dressing-room. There's no living without these Israelites. I am an absolute bankrupt with every Christian creature, and if my luck does not change shortly, they will find me out at Duke's-place too.

Enter HARRY BEVIL.

H. Bev. So, George, you are just up, I see; you are as regular in your irregularities, I find, as ever: St. James's dial does not better shew the hour of the day than you do the life of a modern fine gentleman.

G. Bev. St. James's dial, sir, is not as constant to the sun, as I am to my course of life. But how comes it that you are dressed so soon; are you going to dine with any of your patronising attorneys in Chancery-lane?

H. Bev. No; I dine at this end of the town; but I have business on my hands—business which, perhaps, may occasion business for my patronising attorneys, as you are pleased to call them. In short, George, I am upon the brink of matrimony.

G. Bev. Indeed! Why that's the very business I was wanting to open to you. I have thoughts of marrying, too. In short, Harry, such is my situation at present, that, formidable as it may be, I must marry; I must find out a wife, whose fortune may set me afloat again; for faith, as matters go, I am sinking very fast.

H. Bev. But the question is, where will you find one that can answer your purpose; I am sure, she must be handsome, or you will never like her; and her fortune must be very handsome, I am sure, or it will be of no use to you.

G. Bev. In both these points, Harry, I have been lucky enough to succeed. During the course of my sauntering duty in the Park, with the nursery-maids, I met with a very fine girl, who has a considerable fortune in her own power, but may expect a much greater if she marries with the consent of the old folks: of them I know nothing. The young thing is entirely mine, and I am foolish enough to be in love with her.

H. Bev. Simple indeed! And her name is—

G. Bev. There you must excuse me; I must be surer of carrying my point, before I open myself farther, even to you. But what, pray, is your situation?

H. Bev. Why, faith, odd enough, you will say. You have always laughed at me for sticking so close to the old ladies; but, at last, I am rewarded for it. One I have often seen at Lady Matchem's assemblies, has taken, it seems, so violent an inclination to me, that she has made me an offer of her daughter. 'Tis true, I am not acquainted with the girl, I have only seen her at a distance; but she is reckoned handsome; and as I am sure her fortune has numberless charms, I have made up my mind and am resolved.

G. Bev. And her name is—

H. Bev. There you must excuse me. As you said, I must be surer of my point, before I open myself, even to you. Lady Matchem has given me the characters of the family, which stand thus: the girl amiable and handsome, with a considerable fortune in her own power; but, as you said of your's, if papa and mamma consent, may have a much greater. The father is a man who has all his money in the stocks; and though he lives on this side Temple-bar, is as ignorant of good company as if he had never removed from Thames-street: all his time is taken up in listening to news, picking up intelligence, and buying in and selling out accordingly. The mother's only joy is cards and governing her family, which she does with as much authority, as her husband's obstinacy will let her. She has undertaken to open the matter to him; and this afternoon, I am, perhaps, to have the honour of an introduction to him. More I'll tell you when I know more.

G. Bev. Have you opened this business yet to my brother Frank?

H. Bev. Not yet. Does he know your plan of operations?

G. Bev. No; I went to him, the other day, with an intention of telling him all, and begging his advice and assistance; but, unluckily, the conversation turning first upon my losses at play, put us both so heartily out of humour, that company coming in, I took the first opportunity of retreating, and have not seen him since. It will be time enough to tell him, when I am a little surer of success. The day wears though, and I have a great deal of business upon my hands, besides dressing. I am laying some of my burdens upon the tribe of Issachar.

H. Bev. Who will take care to exonerate themselves, I warrant. How many Jews may your honour have in hand now?

G. Bev. Humph! why, faith, I believe about a round dozen; but if I marry, I will discard them all, and play a more Christian kind of game for the future.

H. Bev. Well, success attend you. Perhaps I may look in upon you at Almack's about eleven.

[Exit.]

G. Bev. Chapeau, get my things ready to dress. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Grub's House.

Enter GRUB.

Grub. What a miserable man I am! with a wife that is positive, a daughter that is marriageable, and a hundred thousand pounds in the stocks. I have not had one wink of sleep these four nights for them; any one of them is enough to make any reasonable man mad; but all three to be attended to at once, is too much. Ah! Jonathan Grub, Jonathan Grub! riches were always thy wish, and now thou hast them, they are thy torment. Will this confounded broker of mine never come? Let's see, (looking at his watch) 'tis time he was come back. Stocks fell three per cent. to-day, and, if the news be true, will tumble dreadfully to-morrow. (A knocking at the door.) There's Mr. Consol, I am sure. Who's there? Does nobody hear? Open the door, somebody! Oh, what infernal servants I have! Open the door for Mr. Consol! I believe there never was anybody so ill-served as I am. Nobody to—Oh! Mr. Consol, have they let you in?

Enter CONSOL.

Well, what says the ambassador's porter? What intelligence have you picked up? What says the ambassador's porter?

Consol. Why, he says—have you heard nothing since?

Grub. No, not a syllable; what does he say?

Consol. Why, he says—Lord how I am fatigued! Ah! 'tis a sign I grow old, as I tell my wife—I ran all the way to tell you.

Grub. Well, well, what did he say? what did he say?

Consol. Why, he said that his excellency was at home all last night.

Grub. Indeed! at home all night. Ay, reading the despatches: a war as sure as can be. Oh! the stocks will fall to the devil to-morrow. I shall lose all I have in the world. Why did I not take Whisper's advice and sell out yesterday: I should have made one and a half per cent. and have been snug; but now—

Consol. Why, but you are so hasty, Mr. Grub, you are so hasty; you won't hear me out; you are so hasty, as I tell my wife.

Grub. Oh, d—n your wife! Hear you out; what more have you to say, tell me?

Consol. Why, the porter said his excellency was at home all the evening, as I told you before.

Grub. Well, zounds! man, you said so before; why do you repeat it? You grow the errantest old fool that I ever saw. But what of his being at home, tell me that.

Consol. Why, I will, if you will but hear me out. Was at home all night—"All night" says I. "Yes, sir," says he—

Grub. Oh! if you are got at your says I's and says he's—

Consol. Nay, pray, Mr. Grub, hear me out.

Grub. Well, well, well, I hear you, man; but in the meantime, all I have in the world, the labour of fifty years, is going, going at a blow. Oh! this cursed Spanish war—I am sure we shall have a Spanish war—I always saw it would come to this. I was sure at the time of the peace that we should have a Spanish war one time or other. But, pr'ythee, man, do cut your story short.

Consol. Well, well, to cut the story short, when I asked him if he could find out, or guess, what made the ambassador stay at home all night, he told me—

Grub. What, what?

Consol. That the ambassador had a woman playing upon the fiddle to him all the evening.

Grub. A woman playing upon the fiddle! what to an ambassador of one of the first powers in Europe. It must be a joke. Why, zounds! man, they make you believe any nonsense they invent. An old fool!

Consol. Well, well, however that may be, I have got rare news from another quarter for you.

Grub. Have you? Well, what is it? None of your says I's and says he's now, I charge you.

Consol. Why, who should I meet but our friend Ben Coolen, coming hot foot to you from the India-house.

Grub. Indeed! Well, dear Consol, what is it?

Consol. Why, he says there's great news; India stock is up six per cent. already, and expected to be as much more by 'Change-time to-morrow.

Grub. My dear Consol, (embracing him.) I thank you: that revives me. Then hurry into the city as fast as you can, and buy as if the devil was in you; that revives me, that's great news, indeed.

Egad! the newspapers have put me into a devilish fright of late.

Consol. Yes, sir; to be sure they do keep a sad rumpus in the papers always.

Grub. D—n it, man, I never know what to think, they puzzle me so. Why, now of a morning at breakfast—in the first column, a friend to the stockholders shall tell me, and write very well and sensibly, that we have got the Indies in our pockets; then that puts me into spirits, and I'll eat you a muffin extraordinary; when I turn to the next column, there we are all undone again, another devilish clever fellow says we are all bankrupts, and the cream turns upon my stomach. However, this is substantial; so, my dear Consol, lose no time. This revives me. Thank you, my dear Consol: you are a very sensible man; and if you could but learn to leave out your says I's and says he's, and says they's, as good a broker as ever man put faith in. Come, get you gone, for I have great business in hand—the marriage of my daughter, Consol, or I would go into the city with you myself.

Consol. Ah! what you have made up your matters, then, with Lord Thoughtless.

Grub. No, no, Consol; not I indeed; he's none of my man, I promise you. I'll have none of your lords for my son-in-law, that I can tell you.

Consol. Ay, ay; very sad times among the quality, as I tell my wife. The Lord help them!

Grub. But away, away, dear Consol; and be sure let me hear, before bed-time, what you have done. I'll be in the city by seven to-morrow morning.

Consol. Very well, Mr. Grub; I'll take care, I'll take care. (Going.) Oh! but Mr. Grub, I hope you won't forget to come and eat a Welch-rabbit with me some of these days, as you promised me. I have finished my room: the bay-window is finished.

Grub. Is it, indeed!

Consol. Yes, and charming pleasant it is. I look up my lane, and down my lane, from the pewterer's at one corner, all the way along to the tallow-chandler's at the other.

Grub. Indeed!

Consol. Yes; and not a soul can stir of a Sunday, or knock at a door, but I see them.

Grub. Ay! why that is pleasant! Why you have a knack at these things, Consol; you are always improving: you have a knack at these things.

Consol. Yes, I thank heaven! I am always a doing, now a bit and then a bit, as I tell my wife.

Grub. Yes, yes; depend upon't I'll come. But, dear Consol, make haste now, if you love me. [Exit Consol.] Well! now this goes as I would have it; this goes as I would have it! If India stock rises six per cent. to-morrow, I shall make a great hand of it. But now for this other affair; now for the marriage of my daughter. I am glad I was so fortunate as to get acquainted with this gentleman; a fine fortune, in parliament, and an economist; three things very much to my mind. If I can but get my confounded wife to agree to it—but she's the devil to deal with. It was lucky I happened to meet with this man; for the women are so agog, now-a-days, that you can't provide too soon for them; and a fine young girl with thirty thousand pounds in her own power, is so tempting an object in this town, that the sooner you can get her married and safe out of your hands the better. Ah!—Now, if I could but double my capital, and bury my wife—(sighs)—But there is no such thing as real happiness on this side of the grave!

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Grub's House.Enter GRUB.

Grub. Now for this wife of mine: I suppose I shall have a fine piece of work with her to make her approve of this match; nay, ten to one, but as I have found out the man, she, for that reason only, will set herself against the business. But here she comes. Hum! I must break it to her by degrees; bring it coolly and cunningly about, by degrees—

Enter MRS. GRUB.

Oh! Mrs. Grub, my dear, how d'ye do? What's the news?

Mrs. G. News! Heavens, Mr. Grub! will you never leave off that filthy, vulgar, city custom of your's, of asking everybody you see for news, news? as if one was a hawker of Lloyd's Chronicle, or the Public Ledger. Now you are removed to this end of the town, why don't you do like the rest of your neighbours? When you are at Rome, do as Rome does, was always the saying of my poor dear brother, Sir Tympany Tar-barrel.

Grub. Your poor dear brother might say what he pleased; but he would never do as I have, leave the city, and all his old friends, and begin the world, as it were, over again, only to oblige his wife. You could never get him to stir out of Gutter-lane.

Mrs. G. Oh, hideous! name it not: but if you are at a loss for friends, why don't you do as I do, take pains to make them? But, no; I must do everything for the honour and credit of our name; and if I did not go about to the watering-places in the summer, with my child, and pick up fashionable company, and make a point of playing high at their assemblies in the winter, neither I nor my poor child would have a friend or acquaintance on this side Ludgate. Mrs. Deputy this and Mrs. Deputy t'other, and Alderman Goose, and Alderman Gander; pretty creatures to introduce to a young lady, with the fortune that Miss Grub will have.

Grub. Why, it is very true, as you say; you have taken great pains about her acquaintance, that's certain: but now you talk of acquaintance, my dear, who d'ye think is dead? poor Alderman Marrowfat!

Mrs. G. Oh, the filthy wretch! I'm mighty glad on't; he ought to have died twenty years ago. What was the matter with him?

Grub. Apoplexy! Eat as hearty a dinner at Girdler's-hall, as man could eat, and was dead before he could swallow church and state; stiff before the second toast could go round! Ah! the new paving of the streets killed him. Ah! the fatal effects of luxury! they will never leave their cursed improvements till they have killed us all! But, my dear, there's rare news from the Alley, India stock is mounting every minute.

Mrs. G. I am very glad to hear it, my dear.

Grub. Yes, I thought you would be glad to hear it; I have just sent Consol to the Alley, to see how matters go: I should have gone myself; but—I—wanted to—open an affair of some importance to you.

Mrs. G. Ay, ay; you have always some affair of great importance.

Grub. Nay, this is one: I have been thinking, my dear, that it was high time we had fixed our daughter; it is high time that Emily was married.

Mrs. G. You think so, do you? I have thought so any time these three years, and so has Emily too, I fancy. I wanted to talk to you upon the same subject.

Grub. You did! well I declare that's pat enough. He, he, he! I vow and protest I'm pleased at this: why, our inclinations do seldom jump together.

Mrs. G. Jump, quotha! no, on my conscience, I should wonder they did. And how comes it now to pass? What, I suppose you have been employing some of your brokers, as usual; or, perhaps, advertising, as you used to do; but I expect to hear no more of those tricks now we are come to this end of the town.

Grub. No, no, my dear; this is no such matter; the gentleman I intend—

Mrs. G. You intend!

Grub. Yes, I intend.

Mrs. G. You intend! What, do you presume to dispose of my child without my consent? Look you, Mr. Grub, as I have always said, mind your money matters; look to your bulls, and your bears, and your lame ducks, and take care they don't make you waddle out of the Alley, as the saying is; but leave to me the management of my child. What! things are come to a fine pass, indeed! I suppose you intend to marry the poor innocent to some of your city cronies, your factors, supercargoes, packers, and dry-salters; but, thank my stars! I have washed my hands of them, and I'll have none of them, Mr. Grub; no, I'll have none of them. It never shall be said, that after coming to this end of the town, the great Miss Grub was forced to trudge into the city again for a husband.

Grub. Why, zounds! are you mad, Mrs. Grub?

Mrs. G. No; you shall find I am not mad, Mr. Grub; that I know how to dispose of my child, Mr. Grub. What, did my poor dear brother leave his fortune to me and my child, and shall she now be disposed of without consulting me?

Grub. Why, the devil is in you, certainly! If you will but hear me, you shall be consulted: have I not always consulted you? was I not inclined, to please you, to marry my daughter to a lord; and has she not been hawked about till all the peerage of the three kingdoms turn up their noses at you and your daughter? Did I not treat with my Lord Spindle, my Lord Thoughtless, and my Lord Maukin? and did we not agree, for the first time in our lives, that it would be better to find out a commoner for her, as the people of quality only marry, now-a-days, for a winter or so?

Mrs. G. Very well; we did so. And who, pray, is the proper person to find out a match for her? who, but her mother, Mr. Grub, who goes into company with no other view, Mr. Grub? who flatters herself that she is no contemptible judge of mankind, Mr. Grub? Yes, Mr. Grub, I know mankind as well as any woman on earth, Mr. Grub.

Grub. That I believe from my soul, Mrs. Grub.

Mrs. G. Who, then, but me should have the disposal of her? And very well I have disposed of her: I have got her a husband in my eye.

Grub. You got her a husband!

Mrs. G. Yes, I have got her a husband.

Grub. No, no, no, Mrs. Grub; that will never do. What the vengeance! have I been toiling upwards of fifty years, up early, down late, shop-keeper and house-keeper; made a great fortune, which I could never find in my heart to enjoy; and now, when all the comfort I have in the world, the settlement of my child is in agitation, shall I not speak, shall I not have leave to approve of her husband?

Mrs. G. Heyday! You are getting into your tantrums, I see.

Grub. What! did I not leave the city, every friend in the world with whom I used to pass an evening? Did I not, to please you, take this house here? Nay, did I not make the d—est fool of myself, by going to learn to come in and out of a room with the grown gentlemen in Cow-lane? Did I not put on a sword, too, at your desire; and had I not like to have broken my neck down stairs by its getting between my legs, at that diabolical Lady there never was anybody so ill-served as I am. Nobody to—Oh! Mr. Consol, have they let you in?

Enter CONSOL.

Well, what says the ambassador's porter? What intelligence have you picked up? What says the ambassador's porter?

What-d'ye-call-'em's route? and did not all the footmen and chairmen laugh at me?

Mrs. G. And well they might, truly. An obstinate old fool!

Grub. Ay, ay; that may be; but I will have my own way; I'll give my daughter to the man I like. I'll have no sir this, nor lord t'other; I'll have no fellow with a waist down to his knees, and a skirt like a monkey's jacket; with a hat not so big as its button, his shoe-buckles upon his toes, and a queue thicker than his leg.

Mrs. G. Why, Mr. Grub, you are raving, distracted, surely. No, the man I propose—

Grub. And the man I propose—

Mrs. G. Is a young gentleman of fortune, discretion, parts, sobriety, and connexions.

Grub. And the man I propose is a gentleman of abilities, fine fortune, prudence, temperance, and every virtue—

Mrs. G. And his name is—

Grub. And his name is Bevil.

Mrs. G. Ah!

Grub. And his name is Bevil, I say.

Mrs. G. Bevil?

Grub. Bevil! a very pretty name, too.

Mrs. G. What, Mr. Bevil of Lincolnshire?

Grub. Yes; Mr. Bevil of Lincolnshire.

Mrs. G. Oh! my dear Mr. Grub, you delight me; Mr. Bevil is the very man I meant.

Grub. Is it possible! Why, where have you met with him?

Mrs. G. Oh! at several places; but particularly at Lady Matchem's assemblies.

Grub. Indeed! my dear Mrs. Grub, let me have one kiss.

Mrs. G. Take twenty, my dear Mr. Grub. (They embrace.)

Grub. Was ever anything so fortunate! Did not I tell you that our inclinations jumped. He, he, he! But I wonder that he never told me he was acquainted with you.

Mrs. G. Nay, I cannot help thinking it odd, that he should never tell me he had met with you: but I see he is a prudent man, he was determined to be liked by both of us. But where did you meet with him?

Grub. Why, he bought some stock of me, and so we became acquainted. But I am so overjoyed, adod! I scarce know what to say. My dear Mrs. Grub, let's send for the child, and open the business at once to her. I am so overjoyed—who would have thought it? Let's send for Emily. Poor, dear little soul! she little thinks how happy we are going to make her.

Mrs. G. I'll go fetch her. (Calling.) Oh, Betty! bid Miss Grub come down to her papa. Yes, poor soul! she will be overjoyed and surprised; so let us, my dear Mr. Grub, be gentle, and calmly drop it to her. Your only fault always was and will be hastiness: don't be hasty with her.

Grub. I won't, Mrs. Grub; I won't. But I am so overjoyed—

Mrs. G. Oh! pray, now don't be a fool. Here comes the poor child. Compose yourself, my dear: consider the poor child.

Enter EMILY.

Emily, my dear, come hither, child. Your papa and I—

Grub. Yes, my dear, your mother and I—

Mrs. G. Mr. Grub, will you hold your tongue? or I—

Grub. My dear, I say no more, I say no more; but, harkye—

Emily. So, the usual scene, I find. Something interesting is on foot, I am sure; I suppose a new match has been thought of for me. (Aside.) I heard you wanted me, papa.

Grub. Yes, my dear; but your mother will—

Mrs. G. Yes, my dear, I will, if you will but get out of my way. Yes, my sweet child, I want you; I am going to ask you a few questions—

Emily. Heavens! I hope they have not discovered me. (Aside.)

Mrs. G. Which I hope you will answer me ingenuously: come, now, don't be disturbed or alarmed. Ah! that enchanting modesty; how she puts me in mind of myself when I was of her age! But, my dear, your papa and I wish to know the state of your affections; how is your heart inclined towards the reception of a tender passion?

Grub. Ay, my dear; your mother means to ask you, how you are inclined to matrimony? What do you think of a husband, Emily?

Mrs. G. Mr. Grub, for heaven's sake! don't be so gross to the poor child. Come, my dear, you know your papa and I mean only to make you happy; indulgence was the plan upon which we brought you up.

Emily. My dear mamma, I should be the most undutiful of daughters, did I not shew a constant and grateful sense of it.

Mrs. G. Ay, very true. Now, child, we were always resolved to leave you to yourself in the choice of a husband: I remember my own case—Mr. Grub, my dear, do you remember, I could not abide the sight of you?

Grub. Yes, my dear, it's very true; I shall never forget it.

Mrs. G. I believe we were married nigh six weeks before you could get a syllable out of my mouth.

Grub. Yes; but you have made it up to me since, with a vengeance! But as to love, that always comes, as the old saying is—

Mrs. G. Oh! pr'ythee, none of your filthy old sayings now. Speak, Emily.

Emily. I hope, my dear mamma, I shall ever behave as you would wish me. Your kind declarations to me now, as well as the assurances you and my papa have always given me of an entire liberty in the choice I might hereafter make, call for my warmest acknowledgments, and I should be the most ungrateful of creatures, if, as far as in my power lies, I did not comply—

Grub. My dear child, my dear wife, I am the happiest man in the world; the happiest man in the world.

Mrs. G. My dear Mr. Grub, compose yourself, and don't go raving mad. Nay, I knew my sweet soul would be all compliance, and rewarded you shall be for it; we have found you a husband, that—

Emily. Ah!

Grub. Ay, we have got you such a husband, my dear—

Mrs. G. Ha! Why, methinks you change colour at the news, Emily! I beg, my sweet soul, you won't be alarmed.

Emily. Your pardon, my dearest mother; I must be alarmed, and own to you my reasons for it. Your very humane declarations, that you will never force me in an object of such importance, gives me spirits and confidence to tell you that I have already disposed of my heart.

Mrs. G. How!

Grub. What!

Mrs. G. Am I awake?

Grub. No, surely; we are in a dream.

Emily. Oh, heavens, sir! dearest mamma, don't terrify me with those looks.

Mrs. G. Disposed of your heart!

Grub. Disposed of your heart, with a vengeance!

Mrs. G. When?

Grub. Where?

Mrs. G. To whom?

Grub. Ay, to whom, I say?

Mrs. G. Where, and when was it? Who is he? Tell me all about it this instant.

Grub. Was there ever such an artful baggage! Oh! I am the most miserable man in the world! the most miserable man in the world!

Mrs. G. After all my pains! After all the money I have spent in going to Tunbridge and Bath, to Margate and Harrowgate, fresh water and salt water.

Grub. Oh, Mrs. Grub, Mrs. Grub! this is the blessed effects of your jauntings and journeys! With as snug a box upon Clapham-common, which, I think, by far the finest part of England, and everything handsome about you, you could not be contented; and, because there's not a foolish body of quality, now-a-days, lives a summer in their own houses, as they ought to do, you must be driving away to all the watering-places, too; and slap-dash, all on a sudden, when I least think on't, away I am hied the devil knows where. Ha! then, such plungings and pumpings, such divings and dippings, as if you had been bit by all the mad dogs in the kingdom!

Emily. My dearest father, hear me! Chance brought me acquainted with a gentleman, who is, I am certain, if you did but know him, the man in the world you would wish me to have; a man, amiable in the highest degree.

Mrs. G. Yes, yes; very likely, truly.

Grub. Ay, ay, a very pretty fellow, to be sure.

Emily. Yes, I must own, he has insinuated himself into my heart, and made on it the most indelible impression.

Mrs. G. Very fine, truly! I say impression, indeed! After all our indulgence—

Grub. Ay, after all our indulgence! Who was ever better dressed at my lord-mayor's balls? But who, in the devil's name, is he?

Mrs. G. Ay, who is he? Speak, who is he? What's his name, urchin?

Emily. His name is Bevil.

Mrs. G. Ha!

Grub. What!

Emily. I said, his name is Bevil. (In a fright.)

Mrs. G. Bevil! What, Bevil of Lincolnshire?

Grub. Ay, Bevil of Lincolnshire?

Emily. Yes, I think I have heard him talk of going into Lincolnshire.

Grub. Tol lol de rol! My dear child, my dear wife!

Mrs. G. My dear daughter, my sweet Mr. Grub!

Grub. I am the happiest man in the world, the happiest man in the world! Who could have thought it?

Emily. What can all this mean? (Aside.)

Mrs. G. Ah! my dear child, you have surely inherited all the penetration of your mother, with that strong likeness of my poor dear brother. Why, my dear, that Mr. Bevil is the very identical person we had in view for you.

Emily. Oh! my dear mamma, is it possible?

Grub. Ay, by the lord is it! so say no more, but kiss your own dear papa, you sweet little cherubim!

Mrs. G. But, my dear, it is very odd he should be acquainted with the child, and never once hint it to us.

Grub. Oh! not at all. I see through it, I see through it. He is a notable one, I see; he wants to have all our consents separately, that he may be the more certain of our affections.

Mrs. G. Nay, it must be so. And did he never say that he had met with your papa or me?

Emily. Never; I am very much surprised at it; but I am so happy in your concurrence with my wishes, that it almost overcomes me. This, sure, is the oddest event that ever happened. (Aside, and retiring.)

Mrs. G. Now, my dear, I think we may say, that we are completely happy.

Grub. Yes, my dear, we are, indeed. Such a dear, good child, and such a respectable son-in-law! The baggage knows how to choose herself a husband. He, he, he! He's as handsome a black man, I think, as ever I saw.

Mrs. G. Black, Mr. Grub? why, surely, your eyes begin to fail you! he's as handsome a fair man, indeed, as ever I saw.

Grub. Fair! No, no, no; I know complexions better than that comes to. He's black, I tell you.

Mrs. G. But he is fair, I tell you.

Grub. And I say, he is black.

Mrs. G. Black!

Grub. As a dot of ink.

Mrs. G. Why, child, Emily, my dear, what do you say, is he a black or a fair man?

Emily. (Coming forward.) In my opinion, he is neither one nor the other.

Mrs. G. Well, it does not signify disputing; as he will be here presently, we shall see which of us is right.

Grub. Here! How do you know that?

Mrs. G. I appointed him to call on me this evening, and the hour draws nigh.

Grub. Why, I appointed him to be here between six and seven, too! He, he, he! Our inclinations have jumped most marvellously to-day.

Emily. I received a note from him, about two hours since, telling me that he would be here about seven. I must own, thinking you would be out of the way, I permitted him to come here, for the first time.

Grub. And he never said a syllable to either of us, and pretended not to know us. Ha, ha, ha! that's very good! (Looks at his watch.) But it's time he was come; though, perhaps, the business of the house may detain him. I don't believe they are up yet.

Mrs. G. The house! what house?

Grub. The House of Commons: you know he is a member of parliament, I suppose, child.

Mrs. G. Not I, indeed; I know no such thing; I know he's not in parliament.

Grub. But I tell you he is.

Mrs. G. That's a very pretty story, indeed. Emily, child, do speak to your father, and don't let him expose his ignorance and obstinacy so unmercifully. Is not he studying the law in the Temple, my dear?

Grub. Don't he live in St. James's-square, my sweet?

Emily. No, indeed, papa; he is an officer in the guards, and lives in Pall-mall.

Mrs. G. The girl is distracted, sure; and will distract us too, I believe.

Grub. I never heard such confounded nonsense! you are both mad, I believe.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. A gentleman below desires to speak to my master.

Grub. Oh! he's come, I suppose. Now we shall see who's a fool, who's obstinate, and who's ignorant. Where is he?

Serv. I shewed him into the parlour, sir. [Exit.]

Grub. Oh! very well; I'll go down and shew him up. Now we shall see, now we shall know who he is, and what he is. [Exit.]

Enter a Servant.

Serv. (To Mrs. G.) Madam, the gentleman you expected is come, and in your dressing-room waiting for you.

Mrs. G. Yes, yes; I know he is come; but he is below stairs, your master is just gone down to him.

Serv. No, madam, that is somebody come in just now; the gentleman you mean, ma'am, has been here this half-hour. As you and my master seemed to be at high words, I did not choose to come in. [Exit.]

Mrs. G. Oh! then it seems your papa has got somebody else upon business with him. I'll go to Mr. Bevil, and make my apologies to him for detaining him so long. [Exit.]

Emily. This is, surely, the strangest affair that ever happened. What can they mean? I have no idea of it. I think Mr. Bevil would never enter privately into engagements with them, and not mention it to me. But I am glad it's come to this crisis; the sooner it's over the better: I am heartily tired of these violent disputes and wrangles every minute.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. (To Emily) Madam, the gentleman's come; he is in the blue room, and nobody has seen him.

Emily. Good heavens! What can all this mean? I'll go this instant to him, perhaps he may be able to explain it to me. [Exit.]

Enter GRUB.

Grub. Mrs. Grub, Mrs. Grub! Mr. Bevil is come, my dear.

Enter MRS. GRUB.

Mrs. G. Yes, my dear, I know he is come; he is in my dressing-room here.

Grub. In your dressing-room! Why, does the devil possess you still? why, he is on the stairs, coming up with me; he only stopped to speak to his chairman.

Mrs. G. That's very pleasant, truly; you are obstinate to the last, I see, you strange wretch you! But I'll shew you that Mr. Bevil is up here with me. (Goes to a door.)

Grub. And I'll shew you that Mr. Bevil is down here with me. (Goes to the room-door.) Oh! Mr. Bevil; pray, sir, walk in. Take care, the stairs are rather of the darkest.

Mrs. G. Mr. Bevil, sir, pray walk into this room.

Enter FRANK and HARRY BEVIL, meeting.

F. Bev. (Aside.) My brother Harry here! this is very odd!

H. Bev. (Aside.) My brother Frank! this is very strange!

Grub. (To Mrs. G.) Here's Mr. Bevil, my dear.

Mrs. G. No, my dear; this is Mr. Bevil.

Grub. That! who the devil is that?

Mrs. G. Mr. Bevil, I tell you. Who is that with you?

Grub. Why, who should it be but Mr. Bevil?

Mrs. G. Heyday! What can all this mean? Why, where is Emily? where is the child?

Grub. Ay, where is the child? where is Emily?

Enter EMILY.

Mrs. G. Here, Milly, my dear, here is Mr. Bevil come to see you.

Grub. No, no, child; here is Mr. Bevil.

Emily. Where, sir?

Grub. Here; this is he.

Mrs. G. No, no, no; this is he. (Turning her.)

Grub. No, no, no; this is he. (Turning her.)

Emily. No, indeed, papa, that's not the gentleman; I never had the pleasure of seeing him before.

Grub. No! Why, zounds—

Mrs. G. No, no, no; I knew he was mistaken; I saw he did not know what he was doing. But you are an obstinate brute! I knew that my Mr. Bevil here—

Emily. Who, madam? that gentleman.

Mrs. G. Yes, my dear, this is Mr. Bevil.

Emily. No, indeed, mamma, that's not he.

Mrs. G. Ha! what, not he! Who is he, then?

Grub. Ay, speak; who is he, then?

Emily. Indeed I don't know who the gentleman is.

Grub. But who is your Mr. Bevil, then? Where is he, to fill up this concert?

Enter GEORGE BEVIL.

G. Bev. Here I am, at your service, sir.

F. Bev. (Aside.) George here! nay, then, the mystery's out.

H. Bev. (Aside.) This is very ridiculous, faith.

Grub. The most impudent fellow I ever saw! Pray, sir, give me leave to ask you, who, in the devil's name, are you?

G. Bev. Sir, I have the honour to call myself Bevil.

Mrs. G. Pray, sir, do you know either of these gentlemen?

G. Bev. Oh! impostors, madam, impostors! I am the only Bevil breathing. Ha, ha, ha!

F. Bev. Come, sir, I'll explain this mystery: we are brothers; we have all been so close in this business, that we have unavoidably ran counter to one another; and, as George seems to have planned his operations with more propriety than we did, and made sure of the lady's affections, with pleasure I shall quit the field, and bow to his superior merit.

H. Bev. My dear George, you know me too well to doubt of my being in the same sentiments.

Grub. My dear, what do you think of this business?

Mrs. G. Why, I think, my dear, that as we can't help ourselves, we may as well make the best on't. What's done can't be undone, and it's well it's no worse, as was always the saying of my poor dear brother, Sir Tympany.

Grub. Egad! I believe he was right; and I may as well make the best on't; for if I don't give her away, she'll throw herself away. But I hope you won't follow the example of the great; there is such work among them!

G. Bev. Dear sir, don't nourish such strange prejudices. The great have their follies, 'tis true, but they have also their virtues, as well as the rest of mankind; and there are among them many shining objects of imitation: we should consider, sir, that the greatest couple in the nation is the best and happiest in it. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Drawing-room.

Enter MRS. JOHNSON, crossing the stage, a Boy following.

Mrs. J. Here, Betty, Dick! where are ye? Don't you see my Lord Sparkle's carriage? I shall have my lodgers disturbed with their thundering. What, in the name of wonder, can bring him here at this time in the morning? Here he comes, looking like a rake as he is.

Enter LORD SPARKLE, yawning.

Lord S. Bid 'em turn; I sha'n't stay a moment. So, Mrs. Johnson, I pulled the string just to see how your sylvans go on.

Mrs. J. As usual, my lord: but, bless me! how early your lordship is.

Lord S. How late, you mean. I have not been in bed since yesterday at one. I am going home now to rest for an hour or two, and then to the drawing-room. But what are the two rustics about? I have not been plagued with them these three or four days.

Mrs. J. They are now out.

Lord S. I supposed that, or I should not have called. But, pr'ythee, do they talk of returning to their native woods again?

Mrs. J. Oh no, sir! the young gentleman seems to have very different ideas: miss too has great spirits, though she seems, now and then, at a loss what to do with herself.

Lord S. Do with herself! Why don't you persuade her to go back to Cornwall? You should tell 'em what a vile place London is, full of snares, and debaucheries, and witchcrafts. You don't preach to 'em, Johnson.

Mrs. J. Indeed I do, my lord; and their constant answer is, "Oh! Lord Sparkle is our friend. Lord Sparkle would take it amiss if we should go; 'twould look like distrusting his lordship."

Lord S. Was ever man so hampered? Two fools! to mistake common forms and civilities for attachments.

Mrs. J. I fear, my lord, towards the young lady something more than forms—

Lord S. Never, upon my honour! I kissed her; so I did all the women in the parish; the septennial ceremony. The brother I used to drink vile port with, listen to his village stories, call his vulgarity wit, and his impudence spirit; was not that fatigue and mortification enough, but I must be bored with 'em here in town?

Mrs. J. But miss, sir, talks of pressing invitations and letters, and—

Lord S. Things of course; they had influence, and got me the borough: I, in return, said she was the most charming girl in the world; that I adored her; and some few things that every body says on such occasions, and nobody thinks of.

Mrs. J. But it appears that miss did think—

Lord S. Yes, faith; and on my writing a civil note that I should be happy to see them in town, et cætera, they took me at my word; and before I thought the letter had reached 'em, they were in my house, all joy and congratulation, I didn't choose to be encumbered with 'em, so placed 'em with you. The boy was at first amusing; but our circles have had him, and I must be rid of him.

Mrs. J. I must say, I wish I were quit of them at present; for my constant lodger, Mr. Belville, came to town last night, and he wants this drawing-room to himself; he's obliged to share it now with Mr. Pendragon and his sister.

Lord S. Eh! Belville? 'Gad, that's lucky! there is not a fellow in town better received by the women. Throw the girl in his way, and get quit of her at once.

Mrs. J. If you mean dishonestly, my lord, you have mistaken your person: I did not live so many years with your mother to be capable of such a thing. Ah! my lord, if my lady were living—

Lord S. She would scold to little purpose; and you may spare yourself the trouble. I tell you I care nothing about the girl; I merely want to get rid of her, and you must assist me. (Mrs. Johnson turns from him with disgust.) Heyday! the nicety of your ladyship's honour is piqued! Ha, ha, ha! the mistress of a lodging-house! Bien drole; ha, ha, ha! [Exit Mrs. Johnson.] But who is this hobbling up stairs? Ha! old Cato the censor, my honourable cousin! What the devil shall I do? No avoiding him, however.

Enter FITZHERBERT.

I wish I had been out of the house, Fitzherbert, before you appeared; I know I shall not escape without some abuse.

Fitz. I never throw away reproof, where there are no hopes of amendment—your lordship is safe.

Lord S. Am I to take that for wit?

Fitz. No; for then I fear you would not understand it.

Lord S. I want you to teach me some of that happy ease which you possess in your rudeness; 'twould be to me an acquisition. I am eternally getting into the most horrid scrapes, merely by politeness and good breeding. Here are two persons now in this house, for instance—

Fitz. Who do not know that the language of what you call politeness, differs from that of truth and honour. You see I know those to whom you allude. But we only lose time. Good day, my lord.

Lord S. Lose time! ha, ha, ha! Why, of what value can time be to you? the greatest enemy you have; adding every day to your wrinkles and ill-humour. I'll prove to you now, that I have employed the last twelve hours to better purpose than you have. Nine of them you slept away; the last three you have been running about town, snarling, and making people uneasy with themselves; whilst I have been sitting peaceably at Weltjie's, where I have won—guess what?

Fitz. Half as much as you lost yesterday; a thousand or two guineas, perhaps.

Lord S. Guineas! Pho, you are jesting! Guineas are as scarce with us as in the coffers of the congress. Like them we stake with counters, and play for solid earth.

Fitz. Well! (Impatiently.)

Lord S. Bullion is a mercantile kind of wealth, passing through the hands of dry-salters, vinegar-merchants, and lord-mayors. Our goddess holds a cornucopia instead of a purse, from which she pours corn-fields, fruitful valleys, and rich herds. This morning she popped into my dice-box a snug villa, five hundred acres, arable and pasture, with the next presentation to the living of Guzzleton.

Fitz. A church-living in a dice-box! Well, well, I suppose it will be bestowed as worthily as it was gained! Good day, my lord, good day! (Turns from him.)

Lord S. Good night, Crabtree, good night!

Enter a Servant.

Tell Belville I called to congratulate his escape from the stupid country. (Going.)

Fitz. My lord!

Lord S. Sir!

Fitz. I am going this morning to visit Lady Bell Bloomer. I give you this intimation, that we may not risk another rencontre.

Lord S. Civilly designed; and for the same polite reason I inform you, that I shall be there in the evening. [Exit.]

Fitz. Your master in bed yet; what time was he in town yesterday?

Serv. Late, sir. We should have been earlier, but we met with Sir Harry Hairbrain on the road, with his new fox-hounds; fell in with the hunt at Bagshot, broke cover, run the first burst across the heath towards Datchet; she then took right an end for Egham, sunk the wind upon us as far as Staines, where Reynard took the road to Oxford, and we the route to town, sir. (Bows.)

Fitz. Very geographical, indeed, sir. Now, pray inform your master—Oh, here we come!

Enter BELVILLE, in a robe de chambre.

Just risen from your pillow! Are you not ashamed of this? A fox-hunter, and in bed at eleven!

Bel. My dear, morose, charming, quarrelsome, old friend, I am ever in character! In the country, I defy fatigue and hardship. Up before the lazy slut, Aurora, has put on her pink-coloured gown to captivate the plough-boys; scamper over hedge and ditch; dead with hunger, alight at a cottage, drink milk from the hands of a brown wench, and eat from a wooden platter. In town, I am a fine gentleman; have my clothes au dernier goût; dine on made dishes; drink burgundy; and, in a word, am everywhere the ton.

Fitz. So much the worse, so much the worse, young man! to be the ton where vice and folly are the ruling deities, prove that you must be sometimes a fool, at others a—

Bel. Psha! you satirists, like moles, shut your eyes to the light, and grope about for the dark side of the human character: there is a great deal of good sense and good meaning in the world. As for its follies, I think folly a mighty pleasant thing; at least to play the fool gracefully, requires more talents than would set up a dozen cynics.

Fitz. Then half the people I know must have wonderful talents, for they have been playing the fool from sixteen to sixty. Apropos! I found my precious kinsman, Lord Sparkle, here.

Bel. Ay, there's an instance of the happy effects of total indifference to the sage maxims you recommend.

Fitz. Happy effects do you call them?

Bel. Most triumphant! Who so much admired? Who so much the fashion? The general favourite of the ladies, and the common object of imitation with the men! Is not Lord Sparkle the happy man who is to carry the rich and charming widow, Lady Bell Bloomer, from so many rivals? And will not you, after quarrelling with him half your life, leave him a fine estate at the end of it?

Fitz. No, no!—I tell you, no! (With warmth.)

Bel. Nay, his success with the widow is certain. He boasts his triumph everywhere; and as she is such a favourite of your's, everything else will follow.

Fitz. No; for if she marries Sparkle, she will be no longer a favourite; yet she receives him with a degree of distinction that sometimes makes me fear it.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mr. Beauchamp.

[Exit.

Fitz. Oh! I expected him to call on you this morning. You must obtain his confidence; it will assist me in my designs. When I found myself disappointed in my hopes of his lordship, I selected Beauchamp from the younger branches of my family; but of this he knows nothing, and thinks himself under high obligations to the patronage of the peer; an error in which I wish him to continue, as it will give me an opportunity of proving them both. But here he comes! This way I can avoid him.

[Exit.

Enter BEAUCHAMP.

Bel. Beauchamp! and in regimentals!—Why, pr'ythee, George, what spirit has seized thee now? When I saw thee last, thou wert devoted to the grave profession of the law, or the church; and I expected to have seen thee enveloped in a wig, wrangling at the bar; or seated in a fat benefice, receiving tythe-pigs and poultry.

Beau. Those, Belville, were my school designs; but the fire of youth gave me ardours of a different sort. The heroes of the Areopagus and the forum have yielded to those of Marathon; and I feel that whilst my country is struggling amidst surrounding foes, I ought not to devote a life to learned indolence, that might be gloriously hazarded in her defence.

Bel. I dare swear this heroic spirit springs from the whim of some fine lady, who fancied you would be a smarter fellow in a cockade and gorget, than in a stiff band and periwig.

Beau. If your insinuation means that my heart has not been insensible of the charms of some fair lady, you are right; but my transformation is owing to no whim of her's; for oh! Charles, she never yet condescended to make me the object of her thoughts.

Bel. Modest too! Ay, you were right to give up the law.—But who, pray, may this exalted fair one be who never condescended?

Beau. I never suffer my lips to wanton with the charming sounds that form her name. The lady has beauty, wit, and spirit; but, above all, a mind. Is it possible, Charles, to love a woman without a mind?

Bel. Has she a mind for you? that is the most important question.

Beau. I dare not feed my passion with so presumptuous a hope; yet I would not extinguish it if I could; for it is not a love that tempts me into corners to wear out my days in complaints; it prompts me to use them for the most important purposes: the ardours it gives me shall be felt in the land of our enemies; they shall know how well I love.

Bel. Pho! pho! this is the gallantry of one thousand one hundred and one; the kind of passion that animated our fathers in the fields of Cressy and Poitiers. Why, no beauty of our age, man, will be won in this style.—Now, suppose yourself at the opera. (Looks through his hand.) 'Gad, that's a fine girl!—Twenty thousand, you say? I think I'll have her.—Yes, she'll do. I—I must have her. I'll call on her to-morrow, and tell her so. Have you spirit and courage enough for that, my Achilles?

Beau. No, truly.

Bel. Then give up all thoughts of being received.

Beau. I have no thoughts of hazarding a reception. The pride of birth, and a few hundreds for my education, were the sole patrimony the imprudence of a father left me. My relation, Lord Sparkle, has procured for me a commission. Generously to offer that, and a knapsack to a lady of five thousand a year, would be properly answered by a contemptuous dismissal.

Bel. But suppose she should take a fancy to your knapsack?

Beau. That would reduce me to the necessity of depriving myself of a happiness I would die to obtain; for never can I submit to be quartered on a wife's fortune, whilst I have a sword to carve subsistence for myself.

Bel. That may be in the great style, but 'tis scarcely in the polite. Will you take chocolate in my dressing-room?

Beau. No, I am going to take orders at my colonel's. Where shall we meet in the evening?

Bel. Faith, 'tis impossible to tell. I commit myself to chance for the remainder of the day, and shall finish it as she directs. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—An Apartment at Clarinda's.

Enter CLARINDA, reading a catalogue, followed by TIFFANY.

Cla. Poor Lady Squander! So Christie has her jewels and furniture at last!—I must go to the sale. Mark that Dresden service, and the pearls. (Gives the catalogue to Tiffany.) It must be a great comfort to her to see her jewels worn by her friends. Who were here last night? (Sits down, and takes some cards from the table.) I came home so late, I forgot to inquire. Mrs. Jessamy—Lady Racket—Miss Belvoir—Lord Sparkle—(Starts up.)—Lord Sparkle here! Oh, heavens and earth! what possessed me to go to Lady Price's? I wish she, and her concert of three fiddles and a flute, had been playing to her kids on the Welsh mountains!—Why did you persuade me to go out last night?

Tif. Dear ma'am, you seemed so low-spirited, that I thought—

Cla. I missed him everywhere! At four places he was just gone as I came in. But what does it signify? 'Twas Lady Bell Bloomer he was seeking, I dare swear: his attachment to the relict is everywhere the subject. Hang those widows! I really believe there's something cabalistical in their names. No less than fourteen fine young fellows of fortune have been drawn into the matrimonial noose by them since last February. 'Tis well they were threatened with imprisonment, or we should not have had an unmarried infant above seventeen, between Charing-cross and Portman-square.

Tif. Well, I am sure I wish Lady Bell was married; she's always putting you out of temper.

Cla. Have I not cause? Till she broke upon the town, I was at the top of fashion; you know I was. My dress, my equipage, my furniture, and myself, were the criterions of taste; but a new French chambermaid enabled her ladyship, at one stroke, to turn the tide against me.

Tif. Ay, I don't know what good these maidemoiselles—

Cla. But, Tiffany, she is to be at court to-day, out of mourning for the first time. I am resolved to be there.—No, I won't go neither, now I think on't; if she should really outshine me, her triumph will be increased by my being witness to it. I won't go to St. James's; but I'll go to her rout this evening; and, if 'tis possible, prevent Lord Sparkle's being particular to her. Perhaps that will put her in an ill-humour, and then the advantage will be on my side. [Exit.

Tif. Mercy on us! To be a chambermaid to a miss on the brink of thirty, requires as good politics as being prime minister! Now, if she should not rise from her toilette quite in looks to-day, or if the desertion of a lover or the victory of a rival should happen, ten to one but I shall be forced to resign, without even a pension to retire on. [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An elegant Apartment at Lady Bell Bloomer's.

Enter JULIA, with papers in her hand.

Julia. What an invaluable treasure! Those dear papers, that have lain within the frigid walls of a convent, insensible and uninteresting to every one around them, contain for me a world of happiness. He is in England! How little he suspects that I too am here!

Enter KITTY.

Kitty. Mr. Fitzherbert will be here immediately, madam.

Julia. Mr. Fitzherbert? Very well. Has Lady Bell finished dressing yet?

Kitty. (Speaks extremely fast.) No, ma'am. Mr. Crape, the hair-dresser, has been with her these three hours, and her maid is running here and there, and Mr. John flying about to milliners and perfumers, and the new vis-a-vis at the door to carry her ladyship to court.—Everything black banished, and the liveries come home shining with silver; and the moment she's gone out, everybody will be in such a delightful hurry about the rout that her ladyship is to give this evening, that they say all the world—

Julia. Ha, ha, ha! Pr'ythee, stop. I can't wonder if Lady Bell should be transported at dropping her weeds, for it seems to have turned the heads of the whole family.

Kitty. Oh! dearee, ma'am, to be sure; for now we shall be so gay! Lady Bell has such fine spirits!—And 'tis well she has; for the servants tell me, their old master would have broke his heart else. They all adore her. I wish you were a little gayer, ma'am. Somehow we are so dull. 'Tis a wonder so young and so pretty a lady—

Julia. Don't run into impertinence. I have neither the taste nor talents for public life that Lady Bell Bloomer has.

Kitty. Laws, ma'am, 'tis all use! You are always at home; but Lady Bell knows that wit and a fine person are not given for a fire-side at home. (Drawls.) She shines every evening in half the houses of half-a-dozen parishes; and the next morning we have stanzas in the Bevy of Beauties, and sonnets, and billet-doux, and all the fine things that fine ladies are so fond of.

Julia. I can bear your freedoms no longer. Carry these flowers, with my compliments, and tell her ladyship I sent to Richmond for them, as I know her fondness for natural bouquets; and bid Harry deny me to everybody this morning, except Mr. Fitzherbert. [Exit Kitty.]

Enter FITZHERBERT.

Fitz. Happily excepted, my dear ward! but I suppose you heard my step, and threw in my name for a douceur. I can hardly believe, that when you shut your doors on youth and flattery, you would open them to a cross old man, who seldom entertains you with anything but your faults.

Julia. How you mistake, sir! You are the greatest flatterer I have; your whole conduct flatters me with esteem and love; and as you do not squander these things—(Smiles.)

Fitz. There I must correct you. I do squander them on few objects indeed; and they are proportionably warmer. I feel attachments fifty times as strong as your good-humoured, smiling people, who are every one's humble servant, and everybody's friend. Where is Lady Bell?

Julia. Yet at her toilette, I believe. My dear sir, I am every hour more grateful to you for having given me so charming a friend.

Fitz. So I would have you. When you came from France, I prevailed on her ladyship to allow you her society, that you might add to the polish of elegant manners, the graces of an elegant mind.—Here she comes; her tongue and her heels keeping time.

Enter LADY BELL BLOOMER.

Ay, ay, if all the women in the world were prating young widows, love and gallantry would die away, and our men grow reasonable and discreet.

Lady B. Oh, you monster! But I am in such divine spirits, that nothing you can say can destroy them. My sweet Julia, what a bouquet! Lady Myrtle will expire. She was so enveloped in flowers and evergreens last night, that she looked like the picture of Fair Rosamond in her bower.—My dear Fitz, do you know we dined yesterday in Hill-street, and had the fortitude to stay till eleven.

Julia. I was tired to death with the fatiguing visit.

Lady B. Now I, on the contrary, came away with fresh relish for society. The persevering civility of Sir Andrew, and the mawkish insipidity of his tall daughter, act like olives: you can't endure them on your palate, but they heighten the gusto of your tokay.

Fitz. Then I advise your ladyship to serve up Sir Andrew and his daughter at your next entertainment.

Lady B. So I would, only one can't remove 'em with the dessert. But how do you like me? Don't you think I shall make a thousand conquests to-day?

Fitz. Doubtless, if you meet with so many fools. But, pray, which of those you have already made will be the most flattered by all these gay insignia of your liberty?

Lady B. Probably he whom it least concerns.

Julia. Pray tell us which is that?

Lady B. Oh, heavens! to answer that requires more reflection than I have ever given the subject.

Julia. Should you build a temple to your lovers, I fancy we should find Lord Sparkle's name on the altar.

Lady B. Oh! Lord Sparkle! Who can resist the gay, the elegant, the all-conquering Lord Sparkle? the most distinguished feather in the plume of fashion; without that barbarous strength of mind which gives importance to virtues or to vices. Fashionable, because he's well-dressed; brilliant, because he's of the first clubs, and uses his borrowed wit like his borrowed gold—as though it were his own.

Fitz. Why, now, this man, whom you understand so well, you receive, as though his tinsel were pure gold.

Lady B. Ay, to be sure! tinsel is just as well for shew.

Fitz. But in the midst of all this sunshine for Lord Sparkle, will you not throw a ray on the spirited, modest Beauchamp?

Lady B. Were I so inclined, to make it welcome, I must change my fan for a spear, my feathers for a helmet, and stand forth a Thalestris. You know his mistress is war. (Sighs.) But why do I trifle thus?—The hour of triumph is at hand.

Fitz. Of what?

Lady B. The moment of triumph!—Anglice, the moment when, having shewn myself at half the houses in St. George's, I am set down at St. James's, my fellows standing on each hand, as I descend—the whisper flying through the crowd, "Who is she? who is that sweet creature? One of the four heiresses?" "No, she's a foreign ambassadress." I ascend the stairs—move slowly through the rooms—drop my fan—incommode my bouquet—stay to adjust it, that the little gentry may have time to fix their admiration; again move on—enter the drawing-room—throw a flying glance round the circle, and see nothing but spite in the eyes of the women, and a thousand nameless things in those of the men.

Julia. The very soul of giddiness.

Lady B. The very soul of happiness! Can I be less? Think of a widow just emerged from her weeds for a husband to whom her father, not her heart, united her, my jointure elegant, my figure charming—deny it if you dare! Pleasure, fortune, youth, health, all opening their stores before me; whilst innocence and conscious honour shall be my handmaids, and guide me in safety through the dangerous ordeal.

Fitz. To your innocence and conscious honour add, if you have time, (archly), a little prudence, or your sentinels may be surprised asleep, and you reduced to a disgraceful capitulation.

Lady B. Oh! I'm mistress of my whole situation, and cannot be surprised. But, heavens! I am losing a conquest every moment I stay! The loves and pleasures have prepared their rosy garlands, my triumphal car is waiting, and my proud steeds neighing to be gone!—Away to victory!

[Exit.]

Fitz. A charming woman, Julia! She conceals a fine understanding under apparent giddiness; and a most sensible heart beneath an air of indifference.

Julia. Yes, I believe her ladyship's heart is more sensible than she allows to herself. I rally her on Lord Sparkle, but it is Mr. Beauchamp; whose name is never mentioned but her cheeks tell such blushing truths, as she would never forgive me for observing.

Fitz. Upon my word, you seem well acquainted with your friend's heart! Will you be equally frank as to your own?

Julia. Sir!—my heart? (In confusion.)

Fitz. Yes, will you assist me in reading it?

Julia. To be sure, sir.

Fitz. Then tell me, if amongst the painted, powdered, gilded moths whom your beauty or fortune have allured, is there one whom you would honour with your hand? Ay, take time; I would not have you precipitate.

Julia. No, sir; not one. (Hesitating.)

Fitz. I depend on your truth, and on that assurance inform you, that a friend of mine is arrived in town, whom I mean this morning to present to you.

Julia. As a—

Fitz. As a lover, who has my warmest wishes that he may become your husband.

Julia. Do I know the person for whom you are thus interested, sir?

Fitz. You do not; but I have had long intimacy with him, and 'tis the dearest wish of my heart to see him and Julia Manners united.

Julia. I trust, sir, you will allow—

Fitz. Be under no apprehensions. Much as I'm interested in this union, your inclinations shall be attended to. I am now going to your lover, and shall introduce him to you this morning. Come, don't look so distressed, child, at the approach of that period which will give you dignity and character in society. The marriage state is that in which your sex evinces its importance; and where, in the interesting circle of domestic duties, a woman has room to exercise every virtue that constitutes the great and the amiable. [Exit.]

Julia. The moment I so much dreaded is arrived! How shall I reveal to my guardian, and to Lady Bell, that I am married? that I have already dared to take on me those important duties?

I must not reveal it; my solemn promise to my husband—But where is he? Oh! I must write to him this moment, that I may not be left defenceless to brave the storm of offended authority and love. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Belville's Lodgings.

Enter BELVILLE, dressed.

Bel. Let my trunks be ready, and the chaise at the door to-morrow morning by six, for I shall dine in Dover. (To a Servant without.)

Enter FITZHERBERT.

Fitz. Ha! just in time, I see! You are ready plumed for flight.

Bel. True; but my flight would have been to you. Impatient to know the cause of your summoning me from the Dryads and Hamadryads of Berkshire, your letter reached me at the very instant I were setting out for Dover in my way to Paris.

Fitz. Paris!

Bel. Yes.

Fitz. Pho, pho! stay where you are, stay where you are! The great turnpike between Dover and Calais, is a road destructive to this kingdom; and I wish there were toll-gates erected on its confines, to restrain with a heavy tax the number of its travellers.

Bel. I fear the tax would be more generally felt than the benefit; for it would restrain not only the folly-mongers and the fashion-mongers, but the rational inquirer and the travelling connoisseur.

Fitz. So much the better! so much the better! Our travelling philosophers have done more towards destroying the nerves of their country, than all the politics of France. Heyday! who's this? Oh! the Cornish lad, I suppose, whom Lord Sparkle placed here.

Bel. (Laughing.) Yes, an odd being! He was designed by nature for a clodpole; but the notice of a peer overset the little understanding he had, and so he commenced fine gentleman. He has a sister with him, who ran wild upon the commons till her father's death; but she fancies herself a wit, and satirizes Bruin. Here he comes.

Enter PENDRAGON.

Pen. My dear fellow-lodger, I'm come to—Oh! your servant, sir! (To Fitzherbert.) Is this gentleman a friend of your's?

Bel. He is.

Pen. Your hand, sir! (Passes Bel. and stands between them.) If you are Mr. Belville's friend, you are my friend, and we are all friends: I soon make acquaintance.

Fitz. A great happiness!

Pen. Yes, so it is, and very polite too. I have been in the great world almost six weeks, and can see no difference between the great world and the little world, only that they've no ceremony; and so as that's the mark of good breeding, I tries to hit it off.

Fitz. With success.

Pen. To convince you of that, I'll tell you a devilish good thing. You must know—

Fitz. Excuse me now, but I am convinced you will amuse me, and desire your company at dinner: they'll give you my address below. Mr. Belville, I have business of importance. [Exit, with Belville.]

Pen. 'Gad, I'm glad he asked me to visit him! He must be a lord by his want of ceremony. "Mr. Belville, I have business of importance," (imitates) and off they go. Now, in Cornwall, we should have thought that d—d rude; but 'tis easy. "Mr. Belville, I have business of importance." (Going.) Easy, easy, easy!

Enter SOPHY PENDRAGON.

Sophy. Brother Bobby, brother Bobby!

Pen. (Returns.) I desire, Miss Pendragon, you won't brother me at this rate; making one look as if one didn't know life. How often shall I tell you, that it is the most ungenteel thing in the world for relations to brother, father, and cousin, one another, and all that sort of thing. I did not get the better of my shame for three days, when you bawled out to Mrs Dobson, at Launceston concert, "Aunt, aunt! here's room between brother and I, if cousin Dick will sit closer to father!"

Sophy. And where's the harm? What d'ye think one has relations given one for? To be ashamed of 'em?

Pen. I don't know what they were given us for; but I know no young man of fashion cares for his relations.

Sophy. More shame for your young men of fashion; but I assure you, brother Bobby, I shall never give in to any such unnatural, new-fangled ways. As for you, since Lord Sparkle took notice of you, you are quite another thing. You used to creep into the parlour when father had company, hanging your head like a dead partridge; steal all round the room behind their backs to get at a chair; then sit down in one corner of it, tying knots in your handkerchief; and if anybody drunk your health, rise up, and scrape your foot so—"Thank you kindly, sir!"

Pen. By goles, if you—(Shakes his fist.)

Sophy. But now, when you enter the room, your hat is tossed carelessly on a table; you pass the company with a half bend of your body; fling yourself into one chair, and throw your legs on another. "Pray, my dear sir, do me the favour to ring."—"John, bring lemonade."—"Mrs. Plume has been driving me all the morning in Hyde-park against the wind, and the dust has made my throat mere plaster of Paris."

Pen. Hang me, if I don't like myself at second-hand better than I thought I should. Why, if I do it as well as you, Sophy, I shall soon be quite the thing. And now I'll give you a bit of advice: as 'tis very certain Lord Sparkle means to introduce you to high life, 'tis fitting you should know how to behave; and as I have been amongst 'em, I can tell you.

Sophy. Well!

Pen. Why, first of all, if you should come into a drawing-room, and find twenty or thirty people in the circle, you are not to take the least notice of any one.

Sophy. No!

Pen. No! the servant will, perhaps, get you a chair; if not, slide into the nearest. The conversation will not be interrupted by your entrance; for they'll take as little notice of you as you of them.

Sophy. Psha!

Pen. Then, be sure to be equally indifferent to the coming in of others. I saw poor Lady Carmine one night dying with confusion, for the vulgarity and ill-breeding of her friend, who actually rose from her chair, at the entrance of the Duchess of Dulcet and Lady Betty Blowze.

Sophy. Be quiet, Bobby!

Pen. True, as I am a young man of fashion! Then you must never let your discourse go beyond one word. If anybody should happen to take the trouble to entertain the company, you may throw in—"Charming! Odious! Capital!" Never mount to a phrase, unless to that dear delightful one, of "all that sort of thing."—The use made of that is wonderful! "All that sort of thing," is an apology for want of wit; it is a substitute for argument; it will serve for the point of a story, or the fate of a battle.

Sophy. Well, then, upon going away?

Pen. Oh, you go away as you came in! If one has a mind to give the lady of the house a nod, (nodding) one may; but 'tis still higher breeding to leave her with as little ceremony as I do you.

[Exit, without looking at her.]

Sophy. I wish I could be sure it were the fashion not to mind forms, I'd go directly and visit Lord Sparkle. I could tear my eyes out to think I was abroad to-day when he called on Mrs. Johnson! In all the books I have read, I never met with a lover so careless as he is. Sometimes I have a mind to treat him with disdain, and then I recollect all I have read about ladies' behaviour that break their lovers' hearts; but he won't come near me. Now I have been three days in a complying humour; but 'tis all one, still he keeps away. I'll be hang'd, if I don't know what he's about soon! He sha'n't think to bring me from the Land's-end to make a fool of me. Sophy Pendragon has more spirit than he thinks for. [Exit.]

Re-enter BELVILLE and FITZHERBERT.

Bel. A wife! heaven's last, best gift! But—a—no—I sha'n't marry yet. I have a hundred little follies to act before I do so rash a thing.

Fitz. But, I say, you shall marry. I have studied you from eighteen, and know your character; I have picked you out from all the blockheads and fools about you, to take a fine girl off my hands, with twenty thousand pounds.

Bel. But what is the lady? coquette, prude, or vixen?

Fitz. Treat her with confidence, tenderness, and respect, and she'll be an angel; be morose, suspicious, and neglectful, and she'll be—a woman. The wife's character and conduct is a comment on that of the husband.

Bel. Anything more? (Gaily.)

Fitz. Yes, she is my ward, and the daughter of the friend of my youth. I entertain parental affection for her, and give you the highest proof of my esteem in transferring to you the care of her happiness. Refuse it if you dare.

Bel. Dare! My dear friend, I must refuse the honour you offer me.

Fitz. How?

Bel. To be serious, it is not in my power to wed the lady.

Fitz. I understand you. I am disappointed! I should have mentioned this subject to you before I had suffered it to make so strong a feature in my picture of happiness.

Bel. Would you had, that I might have informed you at once—that I am—married.

Fitz. Married! Where, when, how, with whom?

Bel. Where? In France. When? About eight months since. How? By an English clergyman. With whom? Ah, with such an one! her beauty is of the Greek kind, which pleases the mind more than the eye; yet to the eye nothing can be more lovely: to this charming creature add the name of Julia Manners, and you know my wife.

Fitz. Julia Manners! Julia Manners, did you say?

Bel. Yes, Julia Manners! I first knew her at the house of a friend in Paris, whose daughters were in the same convent with herself. I often visited her at the grate; at length, by the assistance of Mademoiselle St. Val, prevailed upon her to give me her hand, but was immediately torn from her by a summons from my uncle at Florence; whence I was despatched to England on a ministerial affair.

Fitz. So, so, so! very fine! (Aside.) I suppose you had the prudence to make yourself acquainted with the lady's family, before you married her?

Bel. Yes; her family and fortune are elegant.

She has a guardian, whose address the sweet obstinate refused to give me, that she might herself reveal the marriage; which I had reasons, however, to request her not to do, till we both arrived in England.

Fitz. Then you have not seen your bride in England?

Bel. Oh, no! my Julia is yet in her convent. I have been preparing for her reception in Berkshire, and have written to inform her, that I would meet her at Calais; but I fear my letters have missed her; and shall, therefore, set out for Paris, to conduct to England the woman who must give the point to all my felicities.

Fitz. And has Julia been capable of this? Ungrateful girl! is it thus she rewards my cares? (Aside.)

Bel. Your silence and your resentment, my dear friend, whilst they flatter, distress me.

Fitz. I'm indeed offended at your marriage, but not with you; on you I had no claims. (Going.)

Bel. If you will leave me, adieu! I am going to run over the town. My mind, impatient for the moment which carries me to my sweet bride, feels all the intermediate time a void, which any adventure may fill up. [Exit.]

Fitz. Spite of my displeasure, I can hardly conceal from him his happiness! Yet I will. Julia must be punished. I have not deserved this want of confidence, and must correct it. If I don't mistake, Pendragon is a fit instrument; I'll take him home with me. Yes, yes, my young lady! you shall have a lover. Oh, these headstrong girls! [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Lord Sparkle's House.

LORD SPARKLE and BEAUCHAMP discovered at a table, on which are pens, paper, &c. Lord Sparkle superbly dressed.

Lord S. Poor George! and so thou wilt really be, in a few days, in the bosom of the Atlantic?

*Farewell to green fields and sweet groves,
Where Chloe engag'd my fond heart.*

(Rises, and comes forward.)

Hey for counterscarps, wounds, and victory.

Beau. I accept your last words for my omen; and now, in the true spirit of Homer's heroes, should take my congé, and depart with its influence upon me.

Lord S. First take an office which I know must charm you. You admire Lady Bell Bloomer?

Beau. Admire her! Yes, by heaven—

Lord S. No heroics, dear George, no heroics! they are totally out now; totally out both in love and war.

Beau. How, my lord?

Lord S. Indifference! that's the rule. We love, hate, quarrel, and even fight, without suffering our tranquillity to be incommoded: nothing disturbs.

Beau. Disgustful apathy! What becomes of the energies of the heart in this wretched system? Does it annihilate your feelings?

Lord S. Oh, no! I feel, for instance, that I must have Lady Bell Bloomer; and I feel curiosity to know her sentiments of me, of which, however, I have very little doubt. But all my art can't make her serious; she fences admirably, and keeps me at the length of her foil. To you she will be less on her guard.

Beau. Me! you surprise me, my lord. How can I be of use in developing her ladyship's sentiments?

Lord S. By sifting them. When you talk of me, see if she blushes: mention some woman as one whom I admire, and observe if she does not make some spiteful remark on her shape, complexion, or conduct; provoke her to abuse me with violence, or to speak of me with confusion: in either case I have her.

Beau. Your instructions are ample, my lord; but I do not feel myself equal to the embassy.

Lord S. Your pardon, sir. You refuse, then, to oblige me? (Piqued.)

Beau. I cannot refuse you; my obligations to your lordship make it impossible: but, of all mankind, I, perhaps, am the last you should have chosen for the purpose.

Lord S. Nay, pr'ythee, don't be ridiculous! it is the last service you can do me; and you are the only man whom I could entrust with so delicate a business.

Beau. I accept it as a proof of your lordship's confidence, and will discharge the commission faithfully. It will, at least, give me an occasion to converse with Lady Bell, and to converse with her on love. Oh! my heart, how wilt thou contain thy ardours in the trying moment. [Aside, and exit.]

Lord S. Ha, ha, ha! I am confirmed in my suspicions, that the fellow has had the vanity to indulge a passion for Lady Bell himself. Well, so much the better! the commission I have given him will sufficiently punish him for his presumption.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mrs. Kitty is below, my lord, Miss Manners' woman.

Lord S. Ha! send her up, send her up. [Exit Servant.] I had begun to give up that affair; but I think I won't neither. It will be rather a brilliant thing to have Lady Bell for a wife, and her friend for a mistress. Yes, it will be a point: I think I'll have the éclat of the thing.

Enter KITTY.

Well, Kitty, what says the little frost-piece, Julia?

Kitty. Oh! nothing new, my lord: she's as insensible as ever. I makes orations all day long of your lordship's merit, and goodness, and fondness, and—

Lord S. (Staring.) Merit, and goodness, and fondness! And don't you give a parenthesis to my sobriety and my neatness, too? Ha, ha, ha! you foolish little devil, I thought you knew better. Tell her of my fashion, my extravagance; that I play deepest at Weltjie's, am the best dressed at the opera, and half ruined myself by granting annuities to pretty girls.

Kitty. What! my lord, is spreading out your faults the way to win a fair lady?

Lord S. Faults! Have I not told thee, that the governing passion of the female mind is the rage of being envied? The most generous of them would like to break the hearts of half-a-dozen of their friends, by the preference given to themselves. Go home, good Kitty, and con your lesson afresh: if you can pick up any stories of extravagance and gallantry, affix my name to them, and repeat them to your mistress.

Kitty. Then she'll tell them to Lady Bell, perhaps, for a warning.

Lord S. For a warning, quotha! My devoirs to Lady Bell are of a different kind, and we understand each other. I address her for a wife, because she's the fashion; and I address Julia for a mistress, because 'tis the fashion to have mistresses from higher orders than sempstresses and mantua-makers.

Kitty. And is that your only reason, my lord, for bribing me so high?

Lord S. Not absolutely. I have a pique against her guardian; who, though he has the honour to be related to me, will not suffer me to draw on his banker for a single guinea.

Kitty. Oh, gemini! I am glad to hear that. I'd do anything to plague Mr. Fitzherbert, and can go on now with a safe conscience. He had like to have lost me my place once, because I was flighty; but I'll be up with him, now.

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Belville. [Exit.]
Lord S. Go, Kitty, into that room; I'll speak to you presently. [Exit Kitty.]

Enter BELVILLE.

My dear Belville! welcome once more to the region of business and pleasure.

Bel. I thank you. But pray, my lord, don't dismiss the lady.

Lord S. The lady! Ha, ha, ha! That lady, sir, is a lady's gentlewoman, an't please ye. I suppose you have heard that I am going to marry Lady Bell Bloomer: we are the two most fashionable people in town; and, in course, must come together.

Bel. A clear deduction.

Lord S. Now she has a friend, whom I mean, at the same time, to take for a mistress: won't that do, eh?

Bel. Decidedly. Everything with you, my lord, is a hit.

Lord S. True, true! Men of sense have one way of getting through life, men of genius another.

Bel. Doubtless; and the advantage lies with the men of genius, for to their genius are all their faults imputed; nay, their faults are considered as the graceful meanderings of a mind too ethereal to be confined to the rules of common sense and decorum: a mighty easy way of building reputation. Ha, ha, ha! You are dressed with infinite malice to-day, my lord.

Lord S. Malice! Not at all: I am dressed for court. I were going to Westminster; but I hear there is to be a presentation of misses to-day, and I would not for the world lose the dear creatures' blushes on their first appearance; for, 'faith, most of them will never blush again. Will you go?

Bel. 'Tis too late to dress; besides, I have devoted this day to adventure. I am rambling thro' the town, discovering what new stars have appeared in the galaxy of beauty, during my absence; and a dangerous progress it is: the rays of a pair of black eyes from a chariot in Pall-mall would have annihilated me, had not, at the same instant, two beautiful blue ones from a window given a fillip to my sinking spirits. A fine turned ancle, whose polish shone through its neat silk stocking, encountered me in St. James's-street; but I was luckily relieved by a little rosy mouth, that betrayed, with a deceitful smile, teeth most murderously white. A Galatea darted by me on the right, whilst a Helen swam along on the left. In short, from such sweet besiegers nothing could have preserved me but the sweeter charms of a beloved, though absent fair one. (Sighs.)

Lord S. Now, I never trouble my head about absentees. I love beauty as well as any man; but it must be all in the present tense. Shall I set you down any where? I must go.

Bel. No: but I see your writing things are here; if you'll permit me, I'll pen a short note to Beauchamp on business I had forgot this morning, and despatch it by a chairman.

Lord S. To be sure. I penned a note ten minutes since to my steward, to raise the poor devils' rents. Upon my soul, I pity them! But how can it be otherwise, when times are so confounded hard? [Exit, singing.]

Bel. (Writes.) Good morning. My compliments to the ladies' blushes.

Re-enter KITTY, passing Belville.

Kitty. So, so, his lordship has forgot me; I must go after him.

Bel. (Comes forward.) Ha! that's the confidante. (Aside.) So, pretty one, whose chattels are you?

Kitty. My mistress's, sir.

Bel. And who is your mistress?

Kitty. A lady, sir.

Bel. And her name?

Kitty. That of her father, I take it.

Bel. Upon my word, your lady has a very brilliant servant: is she as clever as you are?

Kitty. Why, not quite, I think, or she would not keep me to eclipse her.

Bel. Bravo! I wish I knew her. Will you tell me her name?

Kitty. Can you spell?

Bel. Yes.

Kitty. Why, then, you'll find it in the four-and-twenty letters. (Going.)

Bel. (Catches her.) Nay, by heaven! you have raised my curiosity.

Kitty. Pho! what signifies asking me? You know well enough who she is: I heard you and Lord Sparkle talking about her. Let me go; for I am going to carry a message to Mr. Fitzherbert.

Bel. Mr. Fitzherbert!

Kitty. Ay, her guardian.

Bel. Her guardian! What, Fitzherbert of Cambridgeshire?

Kitty. Yes; and if you want to know more, he's the crossdest old wretch that ever breathed. You'll find him out by that description; and so, your servant. [Exit.]

Bel. Fitzherbert's ward! and this creature her servant! and Lord Sparkle plotting to get her for a mistress! I am astonished! the very lady he this morning offered for my bride. Well, I must find Fitzherbert immediately. Lord Sparkle will, perhaps, think me guilty of a breach of honour; the imputation I must incur, that I may not be really guilty of a breach of humanity, and of gratitude. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Lady Bell Bloomer's House.

Enter FITZHERBERT, followed by a Servant.

Fitz. Tell Miss Manners I am here. [Exit Serv.] I cannot be seriously angry with Julia; but I must take some revenge on her disobedience, before I acquaint her with the felicity that attends her. Come in, young Cornish, pray.

Enter PENDRAGON:

Pen. What, does the lady live in this fine house?

Fitz. Yes; but pray observe, that I don't engage she shall be smitten with you: I can go no further than to introduce you; the rest must depend on the brilliancy of your manners.

Pen. Oh! leave me alone for that. I knew how 'twould be if I once shewed myself in London. If she has a long purse, I'll whisk her down to Cornwall, jocky Lord Sparkle, and have the borough myself.

Fitz. A man of spirit, I see!

Pen. Oh! as to my spirit, that nobody ever doubted. I have beat our exciseman, gone to law with the parson; and, to shew you that I did not leave my spirit in the country, since I came to London, I have fined a hackney-coachman for abuse.

Fitz. Very commendable. But here comes the lady.

Enter JULIA.

Mr. Pendragon, this is my ward; who, I am sure, will give your addresses all the encouragement I wish them.

Pen. Servant, madam. She looks plaguy glum. (Aside.)

Julia. I can scarcely support myself. (Aside.)

Fitz. Pray, my dear, speak to Mr. Pendragon. You seem greatly confused.

Pen. Oh! sir, young ladies will look confused and embarrassed, and all that sort of thing, on these occasions; but we men of the world are up to all that.

Julia. Heavens! is it to such a being I should have been sacrificed? (Aside.)

Pen. I see your ward is one of the most diffident ones. I am surprised at that; bred in high life.

Fitz. Oh! now and then, you find a person of that cast in the best company; but they soon get over it.

Pen. Yes, formerly, I used to blush, and be modest; but if any one ever catches me modest again, I'll give them my estate for a pilchard.

Julia. Then it seems impossible, (pardon me, sir,) (to Fitzherbert) that an union can take place between you and me; for I place modesty among the elegancies of manners, and think it absolutely necessary to the character of a gentleman.

Fitz. Well done, Julia! (Aside.) Fie upon you to treat my friend with such asperity.

Pen. Oh! leave her to me, sir; she's ignorant, but I shall teach her. There are three things, miss, only necessary to the character of a gentleman: a good air, good assurance, and good teeth. (Grins.)

Julia. Doesn't his list want good manners, sir? (To Fitzherbert.)

Pen. Oh, no, ma'am! if you had said good taste, it would have been nearer the thing; but even that is unnecessary. A gentleman's friends can furnish his house, and choose his books, and his pictures; and he can learn to criticise them by heart. Nothing is so easy as to criticise; people do it continually.

Fitz. You see, Mr. Pendragon has information, Julia. I'll leave you a few moments, that he may unfold himself to advantage: and, remember, if you refuse the man I design for your husband, you lose me. Keep it up with spirit; I'll wait for you below. (Apart to Pendragon.) Now shall impertinence and disobedience correct each other. (Aside.) [Exit.]

Pen. Now to strike her with my superior ease. (Aside.) So, miss, your guardian, I think, has a mind that we shall, in the vulgar speech, marry.

Julia. Well, sir! do you know what belongs to the character of a husband?

Pen. Ay! Do you know what belongs to being a wife?

Julia. I guess that to your wife will belong ill-humour with you at home; shame with you abroad; in her face forced smiles; in her heart hidden thorns.

Pen. The devil! What, you have found your tongue, ma'am! Oh, oh! I shall have a fine time on't, I guess, when our connexion begins.

Julia. Our connexion! Pray, sir, drop the idea. I protest to you, that were it possible for me to become your wife, I should be the most wretched of women.

Pen. Oh, no! you wouldn't; I hardly know a wife who is not wretched.

Julia. Unfeeling man! Would you presume to enter into a state, to the happiness of which, union of soul, delicacy of sentiment, and all the elegant attention of polished manners are necessary and indispensable?

Pen. What's all that? Union of soul! sentiment! attentions! That's not life, I'm sure.

Julia. I am not able to conceive by what witchcraft Mr. Fitzherbert has been blinded to the weakness of your head, and the turpitude of your heart. Tell him, sir, there is not a fate I would not prefer to that of being united to a man whose vice is the effect of folly, and whose folly is as hateful even as his vice. [Exit.]

Pen. Yes, yes; I'll tell, depend on't. Egad! she's a spirit. So much the better; more pleasure in taming her. A meek wife cheats a man of his rights, and deprives him of the pleasure of exacting her obedience. Let me see: vice—folly—impudence—ignorance. Ignorance, too! [Exit.]

Re-enter JULIA.

Julia. What have I done? I dare not see my guardian; his displeasure will kill me. Oh, Belville! where art thou? Come and shield thy unhappy bride! What steps can I take?

Enter KITTY.

Kitty. Dear ma'am, I'm so grieved to see you so unhappy! If I'd such a cross old guardian, I'd run away from him.

Julia. The very thought which that instant presented itself to my mind. Have you not told me that some relation of your's has lodgings?

Kitty. Yes, ma'am; the most elegantest in London.

Julia. I don't want elegant apartments; but I wish, for a short time, to be concealed in some family of reputation.

Kitty. To be sure, ma'am; 'tis the most prudent thing you can do.

Julia. And yet, my heart fails me.

Kitty. Oh, ma'am! don't hesitate; I'll go and pack up a few things, and call a coach, and be off, before Lady Bell comes from court.

Julia. I fear 'tis a wrong step; and yet, what other can I take? I dare not reveal my marriage, without the permission of my husband; and, till his arrival, I must avoid both a guardian's anger, and the addresses of a lover. (Aside.) [Exit.]

Kitty. I know not what she means; but there is some mystery, I find. So there should be. If ladies had not mysteries, a chambermaid's place would be hardly worth keeping. I have mysteries, too, and she shall have their explanation from Lord Sparkle. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Clarinda's House.

Enter LADY BELL BLOOMER, meeting CLARINDA.

Lady B. Ha, ha, ha! my dear creature, what an embarras! Driving swiftly through the streets, Lady Whipcord dashed upon us in her flaming phaeton and six, gave a monstrous big Newmarket word to my poor fellows, and, with infinite dexterity, entangled the traces. It happened near your door; so I have taken shelter with you, and left her ladyship to settle the dispute with my coachman; ha, ha, ha! But why were you not at court to-day?

Cla. I had a teasing headache; but, pray, tell me what happened there. Deuce take her! she looks as well as ever. (Aside.)

Lady B. Oh! the ladies, as usual, brilliant; nothing so flat as the men. The horrid English custom ruins them for conversation. They make themselves members of clubs in the way of business, and members of parliament in the way of amusement: all their passions are reserved for the first, and all their wit for the last.

Cla. 'Tis better in Paris.

Lady B. Oh, 'tis quite another thing! Devoted to elegance, they catch their opinions, their wit, and their bon mots, from the mouths of the ladies. 'Tis in the drawing-room of madame, the duchess, the marquis learns his politics; whilst the sprightly countess dispenses taste and philosophy to a circle of bishops, general, and abbés.

Cla. Yet I am mistaken if you have not found one Englishman to reconcile you to the manners of the rest. Lord Sparkle, for instance; your ladyship thinks, I'm sure, that he has wit at will.

Lady B. Oh, yes! quite at will. His wit, like his essence-bottle, is a collection of all that is poignant in a thousand flowers; and, like that, is most useful, when he himself is most insipidly vacant.

Cla. With such sentiments I wonder you can suffer his addresses.

Lady B. What can I do? The man is so much the fashion, and I shall be so much envied. Why, you know, my dear, for instance, you'd be inclined to stick a poisoned nosegay in my bosom, if I should take him.

Cla. Ha, ha, ha! ridiculous! Believe me, madam, I shall neither prepare a bouquet, nor invoke a fiery shower to grace your nuptials.

Lady B. No; your showers would be tears, I fancy. (Aside.) Here he comes!

Cla. Ha! Lord Sparkle! Your ladyship's accident was fortunate. (Sneering.)

Enter LORD SPARKLE.

Lord S. Heavens! Lady Bell, your horses fly like the doves of Venus. I followed you from St. James's; but my poor earth-born cattle wouldn't keep pace with your's.

Cla. Oh! don't complain; if her ladyship won the race, you see she stopped for you at the goal.

Lord S. Charming Miss Belmour, what an enlivening intimation! Where was your ladyship on Thursday? You would have found excellent food for your satire at Mrs. Olio's; we had all the law ladies from Lincoln's Inn, a dozen good velvets from Bishopsgate, with the wives and daughters of half the M. D.'s and LL. D.'s in town.

Lady B. Oh! my entertainment was quite as good as your's. We were in Brook-street, at Lady Laurel's, and found her surrounded by her literati of all denominations. We had masters of art, and misses of science. On one hand an essayist, on the other a moralist; there a poetaster, here a translator; in that corner a philosopher, in the other a compiler of magazines. Tropes, epigrams, and syllogisms, flew like sky-rockets, in every direction; till the ambition of pre-eminence lighted the flame of controversy, when they gave each other the lie literally with infinite spirit and decorum.

Lord S. Excellent! I'll repeat every word in a place where it will be remembered, and the satire enjoyed.

Cla. In that hope your lordship may safely knock at every door in the street; satire is welcome everywhere.

Lady B. Yes, if it will bear a laugh; that's the grand art of conversation. They pretend we are fond of slander; but rob scandal of its laugh, and 'twould soon be banished to the second table for the amusement of butlers and chambermaids.

Lord S. Indeed! Then I believe half our acquaintance would go down to the second table, too. [Enter a Servant, gives Lord Sparkle a letter, and exit. Reads it aside.] Julia! astonishing! So sudden in your movements, Mrs. Kitty! (Aside. Turns to the Ladies.) This vulgar thing, called business, is the greatest evil in life; it destroys our most brilliant hours; and is fit only for younger brothers and humble cousins. Miss Belmour, I must tear myself away. Shall I attend your ladyship to your carriage? (To Lady B.)

Lady B. If you please. Miss Belmour, "I must tear myself away;" but you'll shine upon us at night.

[Exeunt Lord S. and Lady B.]

Cla. Shine upon you at night! That, I know, you are insolent enough to believe impossible. What can I think of her sentiments for Lord Sparkle? Sometimes I believe 'tis a mere attachment of vanity on both sides. That reserved creature, Beauchamp, is in his confidence; but he leaves town this very day, and I shall have no opportunity of conversing with him. (Muses.) There is but one chance—going to visit him: but how can I possibly do that? If he had a library, one might go to look at his books. Well, I don't care, go I will; and if I can't invent an excuse, I'll put a good face upon the matter, and go without one. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Lady Bell Bloomer's.

Enter LADY BELL BLOOMER, followed by her Maid.

Lady B. Miss Manners gone out in a hackney-coach, and no message left!

Maid. No, madam.

Lady B. Very strange!

Maid. Mr. Beauchamp has been waiting almost an hour for your ladyship's return.

Lady B. Mr. Beauchamp! Here, go and put some otto of roses in that handkerchief. [Exit Maid.] Now, shall I admit him or not? I suppose he has, at length, vanquished his modesty, and is come to tell me that—that—Well, I vow I won't hear him. Yes, I will. I long to know the style in which these reserved men make love. To what imprudence would my heart betray me? Yet I may surely indulge myself in hearing him speak of love; in hearing, probably, for the first time, its genuine language.

Re-enter Maid, and presents the handkerchief.

Tell Mr. Beauchamp I am here. [Exit Maid.] Now, how shall I receive him? (Takes her fan from her pocket, and walks about, humming a tune.)

Enter BEAUCHAMP.

Oh! Mr. Beauchamp, this is the luckiest thing! I have had ten disputes to-day about the figures on my fan; and you shall decide them. Is that beautiful nymph a flying Daphne, or an Atalanta?

Beau. (Looking at her fan.) From the terror of the eye, madam, and the swiftness of her step, it must be a Daphne. I think Atalanta's head would be more at variance with her feet; and, while she flies, her eye would be invitingly turned on her pursuers.

Lady B. I think you are right. Yes; there does want the kind, inviting glance, to be sure.

Beau. I know one to whom your ladyship appears the disdainful Daphne. How happy would he be could he behold in your eye the encouragement of Atalanta's.

Lady B. Mercy! for so bashful a man, that's pretty plain. (Aside.)

Beau. This is, probably, the last visit I can make you before I leave England: will your ladyship permit me, before I leave it, to acquaint you that there is a man whose happiness depends on your favour? (Agitated.)

Lady B. A man whose happiness depends on me, Mr. Beauchamp? (Looking on her fan.)

Beau. Yes, madam; and—and—I cannot go on! Why did I accept a commission in which success would destroy me? (Aside.)

Lady B. The man seems to have chosen a very diffident advocate in you, sir.

Beau. 'Tis more than diffidence, madam; my task is painful.

Lady B. Ay, I thought so! You have taken a brief in a cause you don't like; I could plead it better myself.

Beau. I feel the reproach.

Lady B. 'Tis difficult for you, perhaps, to speak in the third person: try it in the first. Suppose, now, ha, ha! only suppose, I say, for the jest's sake, that you yourself have a passion for me, and then try how you can plead it.

Beau. (Kneels.) Thus—thus would I plead it, and swear, that thou art dear to my heart as fame and honour! To look at thee is rapture; to love thee, though without hope, felicity!

Lady B. Oh! I thought I should bring him to the point at last. (Aside.)

Beau. (Rises.) To what dishonesty have I been betrayed! (Aside.) Thus, madam, speaks my friend through my lips; 'tis thus he pleads his passion.

Lady B. Provoking! (Aside.) What friend is this, sir, who is weak enough to use the language of another to explain his heart?

Beau. Lord Sparkle.

Lady B. Lord Sparkle! Was it for him you knelt? (He bows to her.) Then, sir, I must inform you, that the liberty you have taken—Heavens! how do I betray myself. (Aside.) Tell me, sir, on your honour, do you wish to succeed in pleading the passion of Lord Sparkle?

Beau. (Hesitating.) My obligations to his lordship—our relationship—the confidence he has reposed in me—

Lady B. Stop, sir! I, too, will repose confidence in you, and confess that there is a man whom I sometimes suspect not to be indifferent to me; but 'tis not Lord Sparkle. Tell him so; and tell him that—that—tell him what you will.

Beau. Heavens! what doth she mean? What language is this her eye speaks? (Aside.)

Lady B. Do you visit me this evening. Here will be many of my friends, and you shall then see me in the presence of the man my heart prefers. [Beauchamp bows, and goes to the door; then returns, advances towards Lady Bell, makes an effort to speak; finds it impossible, then bows, and exits.] Heavens! what necessity have lovers for words? What persuasion in that bashful irresolution! Now, shall I let him quit England or not? What! give up a coronet and Lord Sparkle for a cockade and Beauchamp? Preposterous! says vanity. But what says love? I don't exactly know; but I'll examine their separate claims, and settle them with all the casuistry of four-and-twenty. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Lord Sparkle's House.

Enter JULIA and KITTY.

Julia. I am so agitated with this rash step, that I can hardly breathe. (Throws herself into a chair.) Why did you confirm me in my imprudent resolution?

Kitty. Imprudent! I'm sure, ma'am, 'tis very prudent, and very right, that a young lady like you should not be snubbed, and have her inclinations thwarted by an ill-natured, positive old guardian.

Julia. (Looking round.) What apartments! and the hall we came through had an air much beyond a lodging-house.

Kitty. Oh, dear ma'am! you may be as private here as you please. (A rapping at the door.) There's my cousin come home, I dare say; I'll send her to you, and then you may settle terms. [Exit.]

Julia. I feel I have done wrong, and yet I am so distracted, I know not how I could have done otherwise.

Enter LORD SPARKLE.

Heavens! Lord Sparkle here!

Lord S. Yes, my lovely Julia, here I am; and, upon my soul, if you knew the engagements I have broke for the happiness, you would be gratified.

Julia. Gratified! I am astonished! equally astonished at your being here, and at your strange address.

Lord S. Astonished at my being here! Why, to be sure, it is not usual to find a man of fashion in his own house; but when I heard that you were in my house, how could I do less than fly home?

Julia. Home! Your own house! What can all this mean?

Lord S. Mean! Love, gallantry, joy, and ever new delights!

Julia. Oh! I am betrayed! Where is my wicked servant?

Lord S. Pho! never think of her! Why all this flutter, my sweet girl? You have only changed guardians; and you shall find, that being ward to a young man of fashion and spirit, is a very different thing from—

Julia. Oh, heavens! what will become of me?

Lord S. Nay, this is quite ridiculous, after having fled to my protection. I feel myself highly honoured by your confidence, and will take care to deserve it.

Julia. Why do I remain here an instant? (Goes towards the door.)

Lord S. (Holds her.) This is downright rudeness! But, be assured, after having chosen my house for your asylum, I shall not be so impolite as to suffer you to seek another.

Julia. You know, sir, that your house and you I would have fled from, to the furthest corner of—

Enter BEAUCHAMP.

Oh! Mr. Beauchamp, save me. I have been basely betrayed.

Beau. Betrayed, Miss Manners! Yes, madam, I will protect you at every hazard.

Lord S. Come, none of your antique virtues, George, pray. This is a piece of badinage of the eighteenth century, and you can't possibly understand it. Miss Manners chose to pay me a visit, and I desire you'll leave us.

Julia. My lord, how dare you thus trifle with a woman's honour?

Beau. Be not alarmed, madam, I will defend you.

Lord S. (Takes him aside.) Pho! pr'ythee, George, be discreet. This is all female artifice. You popped upon us, and this is a salvo for her reputation.

Beau. Pardon me, my lord; in believing you, in opposition to the evidence of this young lady's terrors, I may be guilty of an irremediable error.

Lord S. Nay, if you are serious, sir, how dare you break in upon my privacy?

Beau. This is not a time to answer you, my lord. The business that brought me here I am indebted to; I should not else have prevented your base designs.

Lord S. Base designs, Mr. Beauchamp!

Beau. Yes, Lord Sparkle! Shall I attend you home, madam?

Julia. Oh, sir! I dare not go there. I fled from Lady Bell's when I was betrayed into this inhuman man's power. Convey me to some place where I may have leisure to reflect.

Lord S. And do you think, Mr. Beauchamp, I shall put up with this? Remember, sir—

Beau. Yes, my lord, that as a man, it is my duty to protect endangered innocence; that, as a soldier, it is part of the essence of my character; and whilst I am grateful to you for the commission I have the honour to bear, I will not disgrace it, in suffering myself to be intimidated by your frowns.

[Exit Beau. leading Julia.]

Lord S. So, so, so! an ancient hero in the house of a modern man of fashion! Alexander in the tent of Darius! Scipio and the fair Parthenia! The fellow has not an idea of any morals but those in use during the Olympiads.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mr. Pendragon and his sister, my lord.

Lord S. Who? (With an air of disgust.)

Serv. Mr. and Miss Pendragon.

Lord S. Then carry them to the housekeeper's room; give them jellies and plum-cake, and tell them—

Enter PENDRAGON, leading in SOPHY.

Oh! my dear Miss Pendragon, you honour me. But I am the most unlucky man on earth! I am obliged, upon business of infinite importance, to be at Whitehall within five minutes.

Pen. But first, my lord, you must settle a little business here with Miss Pendragon.

Sophy. I tell you, Bobby, I'll speak myself; and as few words are best, pray, my lord, what do you mean by treating me in this manner?

Lord S. I shall be miserable beyond bearing, if any treatment of mine has incurred your displeasure.

Sophy. Well, now you talk of being miserable, you have softened my heart at once. But, pray, my lord, is it fashionable for people on the terms you and I are, to keep asunder?

Lord S. What the devil can the girl mean? (Aside.)

Sophy. Never even write! no billets! no bribing the maid to slip notes into my hand! Why, you don't even complain, though 'tis five days since you saw me.

Lord S. Complain! I am sure, I have been exceedingly wretched.

Sophy. Then why did not you tell me so? Why, that's the very thing I wanted. If I had known you had been wretched, I should have been happy.

Pen. Well, I see I shall lose an opportunity here. I came to challenge you, my lord.

Lord S. Challenge me!

Pen. Yes. Miss Pendragon told me she was dissatisfied; "then," says I, "I'll demand satisfaction;" and I didn't care if things had gone a little further; for to call out a lord would be a feather in my cap as long as I live. However, you are agreed.

Sophy. Do be quiet, Bobby! We are not agreed. I have heard nothing of settlements, nothing of jewels.

Lord S. My dear ma'am, you are pleased to amuse yourself.

Sophy. Why, my lord, those things must be all settled beforehand, you know.

Lord S. Before what?

Sophy. What? Before our marriage, my lord.

Lord S. Marriage! Ha, ha, ha!

Sophy. Heyday! Will you pretend that you did not intend to marry me, when I can prove that you have courted me from twenty instances?

Lord S. Indeed.

Pen. Ay, that she can. Come, Miss Pendragon, your proofs; I'll support 'em.

Sophy. Why, in the first place, my lord, you once placed a nosegay in my bosom, and said, "Oh! I wish I were these happy roses!"—the very speech that Sir Harry Hargrave made to Miss Woodville. Another time you said, "I was a most bewitching and adorable girl!"—exactly what Colonel Finch said to Lady Lucy Lustre. Another time you said, "How would a coronet become those shining tresses!"—the very speech of Lord Rosehill to Miss Danvers: and these couples were every one married.

Lord S. Married! I never heard of them. Who are they? Where the devil do they live?

Pen. Live? Why, in our country, to be sure. (Struts up to him.)

Sophy. No, no, Bobby; in The Reclaimed Rake, and The Constant Lovers, and Sir Charles Grandison, and Roderick Random, and—

Pen. Yes, sir, they live at Random, with Sir Charles Grandison. Now d'ye know 'em?

Lord S. Ha, ha, ha! you are a charming little lawyer, (to Sophy) and might, perhaps, establish your proofs for precedents, if Sir Charles Grandison were on the bench: yet, I never heard of his being made chief-justice, though I never thought him fit for anything else.

Pen. What the devil's this? What, did not you bring all those fine proofs from fashionable life? And are you such a fool as not to understand what we call common-place?

Sophy. Common-place!

Pen. Yes, we persons of elegant life use the figure, hyperbole.

Sophy. Hyperbole! What's that?

Pen. Why, that's as much as to say, a stretch.

Sophy. A stretch! What, then, you have been mocking me, my lord?

Lord S. Not in the least; I shall be the happiest man existing to, to—Egad! I must take care of my phrases. (Aside.) I mean that I shall be always, and upon all occasions, your most devoted très humblement serviteur. Were there ever two such bumpkins? (Aside.) [Exit.]

Sophy. What's he gone? Oh! villain, monster! I am forsaken! Oh! I am rejected! All Cornwall will know it. (Cries.)

Pen. Tin-mines and all. But don't ye cry, Miss Pendragon, don't ye cry. (Sobs.)

Sophy. Oh! I am rejected!

Pen. I am glad on't, with all my heart. I'll challenge him yet; and they won't know in Cornwall exactly how it was. They'll hear that a lord fought about ye, and all that sort of thing; and whether for ye or against ye, 'twill be much the same.

Sophy. But will you challenge him really, Bobby?

Pen. Upon honour! I admire the claw of the thing. Egad, Sophy! I'm glad he's forsaken thee. Now my character will be finished. A man can't shew his face in company till he has stood shot, and fired his pistol in the air.

Sophy. In the air? If you don't fire it through him—

Pen. Oh, never fear! I'll do all that sort of thing. Come along; I'll go home directly, and practise at the hen-coop in the yard. I'll fire through one end, and you shall hold your calash against the other; and if I don't hit it, say I'm no marksman.

[Exeunt Pendragon, with Sophy under his arm.]

SCENE III.—Beauchamp's Lodgings.

Enter BEAUCHAMP and JULIA.

Beau. I entreat your pardon for conducting you to my own lodgings; but here, madam, you will be safe till you determine how to act. What are your commands for me?

Julia. Oh! Mr. Beauchamp, I have no commands; I have no designs! I have been very imprudent; I am still more unhappy.

Beau. Shall I acquaint Mr. Fitzherbert?

Julia. It was to avoid him that I left Lady Bell. I have reasons that make it impossible to see Mr. Fitzherbert now.

Beau. Is there no other friend?

Julia. Oh, yes! I have one friend. Were he here, all my difficulties would vanish. It may seem strange, Mr. Beauchamp, but I expect that you believe—heavens! here's company! (Looks out.) 'Tis Miss Belmour; the last woman on earth whom I would trust. Where can I go?

Beau. Miss Belmour! very odd! But, pray, be not uneasy. That room, madam, if you will condescend—(Julia rushes through the door.)

Enter CLARINDA, laughing.

Cla. Ha, ha, ha! I expect your gravity to be amazingly discomposed at so hardy a visit; but I took it very ill that you did not design to call upon me before your departure; and so, as I was passing your door, I stopped, in mere frolic, to inquire the cause.

Beau. You do me infinite honour, madam. I am thankful that I failed in my attention, since it has procured me so distinguished a favour.

Cla. Oh! your most obedient. You are going to leave England for a long while; you'll find us all in different situations, probably, on your return. Your friend, Lord Sparkle, for instance: I am informed that he is really to marry Lady Bell Bloomer; but I don't believe it. Do you?

Beau. 'Tis impossible, madam, for me—

Cla. Pho, pho! impossible! Such friends as you are, I suppose, keep nothing from one another. We women can't exist without a confidante, and, I dare say, you men are fully as communicative. Not that it is anything to me; but as I have a prodigious regard for Lady Bell—

Bel. (Without.) Beauchamp, Beauchamp!

Cla. Heaven and earth, how unlucky! Here's some man. I am the nicest creature breathing in my reputation. What will he think? I'll run into this room. (Runs towards the door.)

Beau. Pardon me, madam, you cannot enter there. (Prevents her.)

Cla. I must. (Pushes at the door.) O, ho! the door is held, sir.

Beau. My dear madam, I am infinitely sorry for the accident; but suppose—suppose, I say, ma'am, that a friend of mine has been in a duel, and concealed in that room?

Cla. Ridiculous! I saw the corner of a white satin petticoat. Is that the dress of your duelling friends? I will go in. (Struggles.) So, 'tis too late. (Flings away spitefully.)

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. So, so so! I beg your pardon. How could you be so indiscreet, Beauchamp? Though a young soldier, I thought you knew enough of generalship to be prepared for a surprise.

Cla. Oh! so he was; but not for two surprises.

Beau. Believe me, Belville—I am infinitely concerned—(To Clarinda.)

Cla. Oh! I detest your impertinent concern. Keep it for the lady in the other room.

Bel. A lady in the other room, too! Heyday, Beauchamp! who would have suspected—

Beau. 'Tis all a mistake. The lady in the next room—But, pr'ythee, go.

Bel. Only tell me if you have seen Fitzherbert. I have been seeking him this hour, on a business of the utmost consequence.

Beau. I have not; but about this time you'll find him at home.

Bel. Enough! Miss Belmour, pray, suffer no concern; depend on my honour. Beauchamp, (takes him aside) who is the lady in the other room?

Beau. Had I meant you to have known, that room would have been unnecessary. (Belville seems still inquisitive; Beauchamp draws him aside.)

Cla. Now do I die to know who it can be. Indeed, 'tis necessary for my own sake. Whilst she has been hid, I have been exposed; and who knows what the creature may say? I'll try once more. She has my secret, and I'll have her's. (Aside. Forces open the door.)

Re-enter JULIA from the room.

Julia. Belville! (Runs towards him.)

Bel. Julia! (Starts back.)

Cla. Miss Manners! Ha, ha, ha!

Julia. Oh, Belville! throw me not from you.

Bel. Astonishing!

Cla. Oh, charming! the modest Julia and the reserved Beauchamp! Ha, ha, ha! But, Mr. Belville, how came you of this sober party? Ha, ha, ha!

Julia. Speak to me.

Cla. Now, Mr. Beauchamp, you know the purport of my visit. I had heard that Miss Manners has been seen to visit you; and not being willing to trust to such a report, was resolved, if possible, to discover the truth.

Bel. Wretched woman! (To Julia.)

Julia. Barbarous creature! (To Clarinda.) Oh! hear me, I conjure you! (To Belville.)

Bel. Hear you! No, madam. And, if my contempt, my hatred, my—oh!—You, sir, I must speak to in another place; yet, perhaps, you were not acquainted that—what would I say? The word which I have pronounced with rapture, chokes me. From this moment, farewell! (To Julia.) [Exit.]

Beau. What can I think of all this?

Julia. Oh, sir!

Beau. Permit me, madam, to ask if you have long known Mr. Belville?

Julia. Yes, too long.

Cla. Oh, oh! too long! Ay, young ladies should be cautious how they form acquaintance. For my part—But you look ill, child. (Takes her by the hand.) Well, I have no hard heart; I can pity your weakness, miss; I won't upbraid you now. My coach waits. Shall I conduct you home?

Julia. Yes, to Lady Bell—to Lady Bell. I am very ill.

Cla. Adieu, Mr. Beauchamp. This has been an unlucky frolic. 'Tis amazing you grave people can be so careless. [Exeunt Clarinda and Julia.]

Beau. An unlucky frolic, indeed. I always considered Miss Manners as a pattern of delicacy and virtue; nor dare I now, spite of circumstances, think otherwise.

Enter LORD SPARKLE.

Lord S. So, so, Seignior Quixotte! What, so soon lost your prize? Ay, you see, quarrelling for these virtuous women is as unprofitable as the assault of the windmills. Have you seen Lady Bell in my behalf?

Beau. Lady Bell, my lord? Why, sure, 'tis impossible, after your attempt on Miss Manners—

Lord S. Psha! Women like to receive the devoirs of those whom others of their sex have found so dangerous. What did you discover of Lady Bell's sentiments towards me?

Beau. I meant to have given the intelligence softened, but the agitations of my mind make it impracticable; I must, therefore, inform you, in one word, Lady Bell Bloomer's choice is made, and that choice has not fallen upon your lordship.

Lord S. Then I must inform you, in two words, that I am convinced you are mistaken. But your reasons, sir, your reasons?

Beau. Her ladyship furnished me with a decisive one: she acknowledged a pre-engagement; and added, if I visited her this evening, I should see her in the presence of the man her heart prefers.

Lord S. (Laughs violently.) Excellent! charming ingenuity! Ha, ha, ha! The kindest, softest message that ever woman framed. And you, like the sheep laden with the golden fleece, bore it insensible of its value. Ha, ha, ha! You can't see through the pretty artifice?

Beau. No really.

Lord S. Why, 'tis I who am to be there; there by particular invitation. You'll see her in my presence; and this was her pretty, mysterious way of informing me that I am the object of her choice.

Beau. Indeed!

Lord S. Without a doubt. But you deep people are the dullest fellows at a hint. But I am satisfied, and shall go to her rout in brilliant spirits. You shall come, and see my triumph confirmed. Come, you rogue, and see the lovely widow in the presence of the man her heart prefers. Poor George! you must have been cursedly stupid not to have conceived that I was the person. [Exit.]

Beau. Yes, I will come. Oh, vanity! I had dared to explain—yes, I construed the sweet confusion! Oh! I blush at my own arrogance. Lord Sparkle must be right. Well, this night decides it. Nar—rowly will I watch each tone and look, to discover—oh! ever blest—he whom her heart prefers!

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Lady Bell Bloomer's.

Enter LADY BELL BLOOMER and Servant.

Lady B. Are the tables placed in the outer room?

Serv. Yes, ma'am, all but the pharoah table.

Lady B. Then carry that there too. I positively will not have a table in the drawing-room. [Exit Serv.] Those who play don't visit me, but the card-tables; and where they find them is very immaterial. Let me see: for whist, Sir James Jennet, Lady Ponto, Mrs. Lurchem, and Lady Carmine; for pharoah, Mrs. Evergreen, Lord Dangle, Sir Harry—Heyday!

Enter CLARINDA and JULIA.

Cla. Come, child, don't faint. You had more cause for terror, half an hour ago.

Lady B. Heavens! Julia, where have you been?

Cla. Ay, that's a circumstance you would not have known, but for an accident; and I am very sorry it fell to my lot to make the discovery.

Lady B. (Takes Julia's hand.) Speak, my love!

Julia. Miss Belmour will tell you all she knows; I am too wretched.

Cla. Nay, as to what I know, I know very little: I can tell what I saw, indeed. Having received intimations not quite consonant to one's notions of decorum, I pretended a frolic, and called on Mr. Beauchamp, and there I found this lady concealed.

Lady B. Heavens! Julia! 'tis impossible.

Cla. Nay, she can't attempt to deny what I myself saw. Other discoveries had liked to have been made, too; but Miss Manners may explain them herself, for I see your rooms begin to fill. I shall report that your ladyship is a little indisposed, as an excuse for your not immediately appearing.

[Exit.]

Lady B. (With a countenance of terror.) Julia! you at Mr. Beauchamp's?

Julia. Lady Bell, though I have acted rashly, and was, indeed, found there, I am not the guilty creature you imagine. I am married! I will no longer conceal it. (Bursts into tears.)

Lady B. Married! Oh, heavens! (Throws herself in a chair, with her back to Julia.)

Julia. I dared not reveal it to my guardian; and for that reason, fled from your house.

Lady B. Oh, Julia! and you are married? What a serpent have I nourished! But, forgive me. You knew not—alas! I knew not myself, till this moment, how much—

Julia. My dearest madam, do not add to my afflictions; for, indeed, they are severe.

Lady B. Ungenerous girl! why did you conceal from me your situation?

Julia. Good heavens! is it destined that one imprudent step is to lose me every blessing? In the agonies of my heart I flew to your friendship, and you kill me with reproaches.

Lady B. And you have killed me by your want of confidence. Oh, Julia! had you revealed to me—

Julia. I dared not; for when Mr. Belville prevailed on me to give him my hand—

Lady B. Mr. Belville! Mr. Belville, say you? (Eagerly.)

Julia. Yes; it was in Paris we were married.

Lady B. So, so, so! what a pretty mistake I made; but it was a mistake! (Aside.) And so, my sweet Julia is married! married in Paris! Sly thing! But how came you at Mr. Beauchamp's, my love?

Julia. In my rash flight this morning, my wicked maid betrayed me into Lord Sparkle's house. There Mr. Beauchamp snatched me from ruin, and gave me a momentary asylum in his lodgings.

Lady B. Did Beauchamp? But what is his worth and his gallantry to me? Can't he do a right thing but my heart must triumph? (Aside.)

Julia. At Mr. Beauchamp's my husband found me; and found me hid with so suspicious a secrecy! Ha! here comes Mr. Fitzherbert! How can I see him?

Enter FITZHERBERT.

Fitz. My Julia! my dear Julia!

Julia. Oh, sir!—

Fitz. Come, I know all; and to relieve one cause of your distress, will tell you, that the lover I shocked you with to-day, was only my agent in the little revenge I had resolved to take for your having married, without my consent, the very man for whom all my cares designed you.

Julia. Is it possible?

Fitz. At the moment he left Paris for Florence, you received my directions to return home; thus Belville's letters missed you, and he remained ignorant that you were in London.

Julia. Oh, sir! had you revealed this to me this morning, what evils should I have escaped!

Fitz. My dear girl, I decreed you a little punishment; but your own rashness has occasioned you a severer portion than you deserved.

Lady B. But where is the bridegroom?

Fitz. He is without, satisfied from the mouth of Beauchamp of your conduct, (to Julia) and impatient to fold his Julia to his heart.

Julia. Oh, sir! lead me to him. To find my husband, and to be forgiven by you, are felicities too great.

[Exit, led by Fitz.]

Lady B. What a discovery has Julia's marriage made to me of my own heart! I have persuaded myself it knew no passion but the desire of conquest; but the pangs of jealousy proved to me, in one moment, that all its sense is love. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—An elegant Apartment lighted up; card parties seen; Servants carrying refreshments.

Enter PENDRAGON, meeting CLARINDA and two Ladies, who come forward.

Pen. Bobs! Miss Belmour, how d'ye do? I didn't think to see you. Mr. Fitzherbert brought me here, and I have been examining every face, to see if I knew anybody; but fine ladies are so alike, that one must have long intimacy to know one's acquaintance. Red cheeks, white necks, and smiling lips, crowd every room.

1 Lady. Heyday! a natural curiosity. Pray, sir, how long have you been in the world?

Pen. How long? Just twenty years last Lammas.

1 Lady. Pho! I don't inquire into your age: how long is it since you left your native woods? Were you ever at a rout before?

Pen. Ay, that I was, last week: it beat this all to nothing. 'Twas at our neighbour's, the wine merchant's, at his country-house at Kentish-town.

Cla. Oh, lud! I wish I had been of your party; I should have enjoyed a Kentish-town rout.

Pen. Oh! you must have been pleased; for the rooms were so little, and the company so large, that every thing was done with one consent. We were packed so close, that if one party moved, all the rest were obliged to obey the motion.

1 Lady. Delightful! Well, sir—

Pen. We had all the fat widows, notable misses, and managing wives of the parish; so there was no scandal, for they were all there. At length the assembly broke up: such clattering, and squeedging down the gangway staircase; whilst the little footboy bawl'd from the passage, "Miss Bobbin's bonnet is ready!" "Mrs. Sugarplum's lantern waits!" "Mrs. Peppercorn's pattens stop the way!" (Imitating.)

Cla. Oh! you creature, come with me; I must exhibit him in the next room.

1 Lady. Oh! stay; take my card: I shall have company next Wednesday, and I insist on your's. [Exit Clarinda and Pendragon.] He is really amusing.

Enter LORD SPARKLE with two Gentlemen.

But hide your diminished heads, ye beaux and witlings! for here comes Lord Sparkle.

Lord S. (Speaks as he comes forward) I hope the belles won't hide theirs; for in an age where the head is so large a part of the lady, one should look about for the sex.

1 Gent. Well, my lord, you see I have obeyed your summons: I should not have been here, notwithstanding Lady Bell's invitation, had you not pressed it.

2 Gent. Nor I. I promised to meet a certain lady in the gallery at the opera to-night; and I regret that I did not, for I see her husband is here. Why did you press us so earnestly to come?

Lord S. Why, faith, to have as many witnesses as I could to my glory. This night is given by Lady Bell to me. I am the hero of the fête, and expect your congratulations. Here the dear creature comes.

Enter LADY BELL BLOOMER, who addresses the Company.

Lady B. How do you do? How do you do? (On each side.) You wicked creature, why did you disappoint me last night? Lady Harriot, I have not seen you this age. Oh! Lord Sparkle, I have been detained from my company by Mr. Fitzherbert, planning a scheme for your amusement.

Lord S. Indeed! I did not expect that attention from him; though I acknowledge my obligations to your ladyship's politeness.

Lady B. That air of self-possession, I fancy, would be incommoded, if you guessed at the entertainment. (Aside.) Have you seen Mr. Beauchamp?

Lord S. For a moment. But, charming Lady Bell, (takes her hand) I shall make you expire with laughing. I really believe the poor fellow explained your message in his own favour; ha, ha, ha!

Lady B. Ridiculous! ha, ha, ha!

Enter BEAUCHAMP.

Beau. Ha! 'tis true! There they are, retired from the crowd, and enjoying the privacy of lovers. (Aside.)

Lady B. See, there he is: I long to have a little badinage on the subject. Let us tease him. (Apart to Lord Sparkle.)

Lord S. Oh! nothing can be more delightful. (Apart.) Hither, sighing shepherd, come! Come, Beauchamp, take one last, one lingering look: sha'n't he, Lady Bell?

Lady B. Doubtless, if he has your lordship's leave.

Lord S. He seems astonished; ha, ha, ha! Nay, it is cruel! If the poor youth has the misfortune to be stricken, you know he can't resist fate. Ixion sighed for Juno.

Lady B. Yes, and he was punished too. What punishment, Mr. Beauchamp, shall we decree for you?

Beau. I am astonished! Was it for this your ladyship commanded me to attend you?

Lady B. How did I command you? Do you remember the words?

Beau. I do, madam. You bid me come this evening, that I might behold you in the presence of the man your heart prefers.

Lady B. Well, sir, and now, now you see me.

Lord S. Oh! the sweet confusion of the sweet confession! (Kisses her hand.)

Beau. This ostentation of felicity, madam, is ungenerous, since you know my heart; 'tis unworthy you. I thank you for it; I have a pang the less. (Going.)

Lady B. Hold, sir! are you going?

Beau. This instant, madam. I came in obedience to your commands; but my chaise is at your door; and before your gay assembly breaks up, I shall be far from London; and, in a day or two, from England. I probably now see your ladyship for the last time. Adieu!

Lady B. Stay, Mr. Beauchamp! (Agitated.)

Lord S. Ay, pr'ythee, stay; I believe Lady Bell has a mind to make you her conjugal father at the wedding.

Beau. I forgive you, my lord: excess of happiness frequently overflows into insolence; and it is the privilege of felicity to be unfeeling. But how, madam, has the humble passion which has so long consumed my life, rendered me so hateful to you, as to prompt you to this barbarity? I have not insulted you with my love; I have scarcely dared to whisper it to myself; how then have I deserved—

Lady B. O, mercy, don't be so grave; I am not insensible to your merit; nor have I beheld your passion with disdain. But what can I do? Lord Sparkle has so much fashion, so much elegance, so much—

Lord S. My dearest Lady Bell, you justify my ideas of your discernment; and thus I thank you for the distinguished honour. (Kneels to kiss her hand.)

Enter SOPHY.

Sophy. Oh, you false-hearted man! (Cries.)

Lord S. Heyday! (Starting up.)

Sophy. Don't believe a word he says, for all you are so fine a lady. He'll tell you of happiness and misery, and this, and that, and the other; but 'tis all common-place and hyperbole, and all that sort of thing.

Lady B. Indeed! What, has this young lady claims on your lordship?

Lord S. Claims! ha, ha, ha! Is it my fault that a little rustic does not know the language of the day? Compliments are the ready coin of conversation, and it is every one's business to understand their value.

Re-enter PENDRAGON.

Pen. (Clapping him on the shoulder.) True, my lord, true! And, pray, instruct me what was the value of the compliment, when you told me I should make a figure in the guards, and that you would speak to your great friends to make me a colonel?

Lord S. Value! why, of just as much as it would bring. You thought it so valuable, then, that you got me a hundred extra votes on the strength of it; and you are now a little ungrateful wretch to pretend 'twas worth nothing.

Enter FITZHERBERT, leading in JULIA.

Fitz. But here, Lord Sparkle, is a lady who claims a right on a different foundation. She had no election interest to provoke your flatteries, yet you have not scrupled to profess love to her, whilst under the roof of her friend, whose hand you were soliciting in marriage.

Julia. Yes, I entreat your ladyship not to fancy that you are to break the hearts of half our sex by binding Lord Sparkle in the adamantine chains of marriage. I boast an equal right with you, and don't flatter yourself I shall resign him.

Lord S. Mere malice, Lady Bell! Fitzherbert's malice! I never had a serious thought of Miss Manners in my life.

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. What! and have you dared to talk of love to that lady, my lord, without a serious thought?

Lord S. Heyday! what right have you—

Bel. Oh! very trifling; only the right of a husband. The lady so honoured by your love-making in jest is my wife: in course, all obligations to her devolve on me.

Lord S. Your wife! my dear Belville, I give you joy with all my soul. You see 'tis always dangerous to keep secrets from your friends. But is anybody else coming? Have I any new crimes to be accused of? Any more witnesses coming to the bar?

Bel. No; but I am a witness in a new cause, and accuse you of loading the mind of my friend Beauchamp with a sense of obligation you had neither spirit or justice to confer.

Lady B. A commission, my lord, which was sent Mr. Beauchamp under a blank cover, by one who could not bear to see his noble spirit dependant on your caprices.

Bel. And when his sentiments pointed out your lordship as his benefactor, you accepted the honour, and have laid heavy taxes on his gratitude.

Lord S. Well, and what is there in all that? Beauchamp did not know to whom he was obliged; and wouldn't it have been a most unchristian thing to let a good action run about the world belonging to nobody? I found it a stray orphan, and so fathered it. But you, Fitzherbert, I see are the lawful owner of the brat; so, pr'ythee, take it back; and thank me for the honour of my patronage.

Fitz. Your affected pleasantry, Lord Sparkle, may shield you from resentment, but it will not from contempt. Your effrontery—

Lord S. Effrontery! Pr'ythee, make distinctions. What in certain lines would be effrontery, in me is only the ease of fashion; that delightful thing which enables me at this moment to stand serene amidst your meditated storm. Come, my dear Lady Bell, let us leave these good gentry, and love ourselves amidst the delights of fashion, and the charms of bon ton.

Lady B. Pardon me, my lord! As caprice is absolutely necessary to the character of a fine lady, you will not be surprised if I give an instance of it now; and, spite of your elegance, your fashion, and your wit, present my hand to this poor soldier, who boasts only worth, spirit, honour, and love.

Beau. Have a care, madam! Feelings like mine are not to be trifled with. Once already the hopes you have inspired—

Lady B. The hour of trifling is past; and surely it cannot appear extraordinary, that I prefer the internal worth of an uncorrupted heart, to the outward polish of a mind too feeble to support itself against vice, in the seductive forms of fashionable dissipation.

Lord S. Heyday! what is your ladyship in the plot?

Fitz. The plot has been deeper laid than you, my lord, have been able to conceive. As I have the misfortune to be related to you, I thought it my duty to watch over your conduct. I have seen your plans, and many of them have been defeated, though you knew not by what means. But what fate does your lordship design for these young people, decoyed by you from their native ignorance and home?

Lord S. Let them return to their native ignorance and home as fast as they can.

Pen. No, no! hang me, if I do that. I know life now, and life I'll have: Hyde-park, plays, operas, and all that sort of thing. But, old gentleman, as you promised to do something for me, what think ye of a commission? The captain there can't want his now; suppose you turn it over to me.

Fitz. No, young man, you shall be taken care of; but the requisites of a soldier are not those of pertness and assurance. Intrepid spirit, nice honour, generosity, and understanding, all unite to form him. It is these which make a British soldier the first character in Europe: it is such soldiers who make England invincible, and her glittering arms triumphant in every quarter of the globe.

Sophy. Well, Bobby may do as he will; I'll go back to Cornwall directly, and warn all my neighbours to take special care how they trust to a lord's promises at an election again.

Lord S. Well, great attempts and great failings mark the life of a man of spirit. There is éclat even in my disappointment to-night; and I am ready for a fresh set of adventures to-morrow.

Fitz. Incorrigible man! but I have done with you. Beauchamp has answered all my hopes, and the discernment of this charming woman, in rewarding him, merits the happiness that awaits her; and that I may give the fullest sanction to her choice, I declare him heir to my estate. This, I know, is a stroke your lordship did not expect.

Beau. And was it, then, to you, sir—The tumults of my gratitude—

Fitz. Your conduct has completely rewarded me; and in adopting you—

Lady B. Oh! I protest against that. Our union would then appear a prudent, sober business; and I shall lose the credit of having done a mad thing for the sake of the man my heart prefers.

Fitz. To you I resign him with pleasure; his fate is in your hands.

Lady B. Then he shall continue a soldier; one of those whom love and his country detain to guard her dearest, last possessions.

Beau. Love and my country! Yes, ye shall divide my heart. Animated by such passions, our forefathers were invincible; and if we'd preserve the freedom and independence they obtained for us, we must imitate their virtues. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Street before Arden's door.

MOSBY discovered.

Mosby. The morning's dark and horrid as my purpose.
Thrice have my snares been laid for Arden's life,
And thrice hath he escap'd. I am not safe:
The living may revenge. Oh! could I win
Alicia to conspire her husband's fall,
Then might I say, security, thou'rt mine,
And laugh at all to come. For other instruments,
There's Green: he bears him hard about this suit
For th' abbey-lands, to which the hot youth pleads
Some fancied right. Michael, the trencher fav'rite;
A bastard, bred of Arden's charity;
He has been privy to our secret joys,
And, on that trust presuming, loves my sister;
Winks at adultery, and may at murder.
Maria is his price. I've plac'd her here,
Companion of my sweet Alicia's hours,
To spread her charms for ever in his eye:
To her are all my visits. But Alicia—
She must, she shall comply: when to my arms
Her honour she resign'd, her fond reluctance whisper'd
She could deny me nothing. This to try.
 [Exit into Arden's house.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

ARDEN in his night-gown.

Arden. Unhappy Arden, whither canst thou wander
To lay thy heavy load of sorrows down?
Will change of place relieve th' afflicted mind,
Or does all nature yield a balm to cure
The pangs of slighted love and broken faith?
Ungrateful, false Alicia! false with Mosby,
The vile dependant of my foe profess'd;
Lord Clifford's full-fed flatt'rer! Oh! damn'd—Come, Franklin, come: Arden, thy friend, invites
 thee;
And let me pour my griefs into thy bosom,
And find in friendship what I've lost in love.

Enter ALICIA.

Alicia. Why, Arden, do you leave your bed thus early?
Have cold and darkness greater charms than I?
There was a time when winter-nights were short,
And Arden chid the morn that call'd him from me.
Arden. This deep dissembling, this hypocrisy,
(The last worst state of a degenerate mind,)
Speaks her in vice determin'd and mature.

(Aside.)
Alicia. What maid, that knows man's variable nature,

Would sell her free estate for marriage bonds?
From vows and oaths, and every servile tie,
The tyrant man at pleasure is set free:
The holy nuptial bond leaves him at large;
Yet vests him with a power that makes us slaves.
'Tis heavenly this—

Arden. To stop my just reproach,
Art thou the first to tax the marriage state?

Alicia. Are you not jealous? Do you not give ear

To vain surmises and malicious tongues,
That hourly wound my yet untainted fame?

Arden. And would'st thou make me author of the shame

Thy guilt has brought on us? I'll bear no longer.
The traitor, Mosby, curs'd, detested Mosby,
Shall render an account for both your crimes.

Alicia. What do I hear? (Aside.)

Arden. That base mechanic slave
Shall answer with his blood.

Alicia. Oh! hear me speak.

Arden. No, I am deaf; as thou hast ever been
To fame, to virtue, and my just complaints.

Alicia. Thus, on my knees—

Arden. Adult'ress! dost thou kneel
And weep, and pray, and bend thy stubborn heart

(Stubborn to me) to sue for him? Away!

Away this instant, lest I kill thee, too.
(Recovering himself.)

No; not the hell thou'st kindled in this bosom
Shall make me shed thy blood.

Alicia. I do not hope it.

Arden. For me be as immortal as thy shame.

Alicia. I see your cruel purpose: I must live,
To see your hand and honour stain'd with blood;
Your ample fortune seiz'd on by the state;
Your life a forfeit to the cruel laws.

Oh! Arden, blend compassion with your rage,
And kindly kill me first.

Arden. Not for my sake
Are all thy tears; then had you felt them sooner:
Plead not the ruin you have made; but say
Why have you driven me to these extremes?
Why sacrificed my peace, and your own fame,
By corresponding with a menial slave?

Alicia. Thou canst not think that I have wrong'd thy bed?

Arden. Would I could not!

Alicia. By heaven!—

Arden. No perjuries.

But now, as you lay slumb'ring by my side,
I still awake, anxious and full of thought,
(For thou hast banish'd sleep from these sad eyes,)

With gentle accents thrilling with desire,
You call'd on Mosby; love made me doubt my ears,

And question if the dark and silent night
Conspir'd not with my fancy to deceive me:

But soon I lost the painful, pleasing hope;
Again you call'd upon your minion Mosby.
Confirm'd, I strove to fly your tainted bed,
But, wanting strength, sunk lifeless on my pillow.
You threw your eager arms about my neck,
You press'd my bloodless cheeks with your warm lips,

Which glow'd, adult'ress, with infernal heat!
And call'd a third time on the villain Mosby.

Alicia. A dream, indeed, if I e'er call'd on him.

Arden. Thy guilty dreams betray thy waking thoughts.

Alicia. I know I'm simple, thoughtless, and unguarded;

And what is carelessness, you construe guilt.
Yet were I weak as those fantastic visions,
Sure, I could ne'er have condemn'd you, Arden,
On circumstances and an idle dream.

Arden. But such a dream!

Alicia. Yet were it but a dream,
Which, tho' I not remember, I abhor;
And mourn with tears, because it gives you pain.
Arden, you do not wish me innocent,
Or on suspicions could you doom me guilty?

Arden. Not wish thee innocent! Do sinking mariners,

When struggling with the raging seas for life,
Wish the assistance of some friendly plank?

'Tis that, and that alone, can bring me comfort.

Alicia. Oh! jealousy, thou fierce, remorseless fiend,

Degen'rate, most unnatural child of love;
How shall I chase thee from my Arden's bosom?

Arden. There is a way, an easy way, Alicia.

Alicia. Oh! name it—speak.

Arden. What's past may be forgotten.

Your future conduct—

Alicia. You distract me, Arden.

Say, how shall I convince you of my truth?

Arden. I ask but this: never see Mosby more.
By heaven, she's dumb! (He starts.)

Alicia. Oh! how shall I conceal
My own confusion, and elude his rage? (Aside.)

Arden. Thou'rt lost, Alicia! lost to me and heav'n.

Alicia. Indeed I'm lost, if you unkindly doubt me.

Arden. Wilt thou, then, ne'er converse with Mosby more.

Alicia. If e'er I do, may heav'n and you forsake me!

Arden. You'll keep your word, Alicia? Pr'ythee, say.

Alicia. You'll break my heart.

Arden. I'd rather break my own.

Then thou art innocent, and lov'st me still.

Alicia. And ever will.

Arden. Give me thy hand—thy heart,
Oh! give me that.

Alicia. That always was your own.

Arden. Thou flatterer! then whence this cruel strife?

Still art thou cold: nor warm as thy embraces,
Nor sparkle in thine eyes the fires of love:
Cold, cold, and comfortless.

Alicia. Indeed you fright me.

Arden. 'Tis possible—

Alicia. What?

Arden. That thou may'st yet deceive me.

Alicia. Oh! I am wretched.

Arden. Both, perhaps, are so.

But if thou ever lov'd, thou'lt not despise me,
And wilt forgive me, if, indeed, I've wrong'd thee,

As I've forgiven thee. Pity, I'm sure, I need.

[Exit.]

Alicia. Thou hast it, Arden, ev'n from her that wrongs thee.

All, all, shall pity thee, and curse Alicia.

Can I feel this, and further tempt the stream
Of guilty love? Oh! whither am I fallen?

Enter MARIA.

Maria. A happy day, Alicia; and may each morn

Of coming life be usher'd with like joy.

Franklin, from court return'd, has brought the grant

Of the abbey-lands, confirm'd by the young king,
To Arden for his life: nor will deliver

But to himself the deed.

Alicia. A worthy friend!

The grant is not more welcome to my husband,
Than Franklin's company.

Maria. He's flown to meet him.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. (To Maria.) Madam, your brother Mosby—

Alicia. Where is Mosby?

Serv. He waits below.

Alicia. Oh! haste, and lead me to him.

Serv. Madam, he but desires to see his sister.

Alicia. His sister! What, did he not ask for me?

Maria. Perhaps—

Alicia. Pray, give me leave—looks he in health?

Serv. He seems in health.

Alicia. Here, and not ask for me!

Seems he or angry, then, or melancholy?

Answer me, stock, stone!

Serv. Truly, I can't say.

Alicia. Thou canst say nothing. Get thee from my sight.

Yet, stay—no matter. I'll myself go seek him.

[Exeunt Alicia and Serv.]

Maria. Where reason is, can passion thus prevail? [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Parlour in Arden's house.

Enter ALICIA meeting MOSBY.

Alicia. Mosby, that brow befits our wayward fate.

The evil hour, long fear'd, is fall'n upon us,
And we shall sink beneath it. Do not frown;
If you're unkind, to whom shall I complain?

Mosby. Madam, it was my sister I expected—

Alicia. Am I forgotten, then? Ungrateful man!
This only could have added to my woes.
Did you but know what I have borne for you,
You would not thus, unmov'd, behold my tears.

Mosby. Madam, you make me vain.

Alicia. Insult not, Mosby.

You were the first dear object of my love,
And could my heart have made a second choice,
I had not been the object of your scorn:
But duty, gratitude, the love of fame,
And pride of virtue, were too weak t' erase
The deep impression of your early vows.

Mosby. Therefore, you kindly chose to wed another.

Alicia. Reproach me not with what I deem'd my duty.

Oh! had I thought I could assume the name,
And never know th' affection of a wife,
I would have died ere giv'n my hand to Arden.

Mosby. You gave him all.

Alicia. No, no; I gave him nothing:
Words without truth; a hand without a heart.
But he has found the fraud; the slumb'ring lion,
At length, hath rous'd himself—

Mosby. And I must fall
The victim—

Alicia. No, he knows not yet his wrongs.

Mosby. But quickly will.

Alicia. That, that's my greatest fear.

Mosby. Then, branded with a strumpet's hated name,

The cause abhorr'd of shame, of blood, and ruin,
Thou'lt be expos'd and hooted thro' the world.

Alicia. Oh! hide the dreadful image from my view.

Chaste matrons, modest maids, and virtuous wives,
Scorning a weakness, which they never knew,
Shall blush with indignation at my name.

Mosby. My death—but that, tho' certain—

Alicia. Labour not

To drive me to despair. Fain would I hope—

Mosby. You may—and be deceiv'd. For me, I know

My fate's resolv'd: and thee the instrument;
The willing instrument of Mosby's ruin.
Inconstant, false Alicia!

Alicia. False indeed;

But not to thee, cruel, injurious Mosby.

Mosby. Injurious! false one, might not all these dangers

That threaten to involve us both in ruin,
Ere this have been prevented?

Alicia. Ha! Say on.

Mosby. And not preventing, art not thou the cause?

Alicia. Ah! whither, Mosby, whither would'st thou drive me?

Mosby. Nay, didst thou love, or would'st secure thy fame,

Preserve my life, and bind me your's for ever,
'Tis yet within your power.

Alicia. By Arden's death!

Mean'st thou not so? speak out, and be a devil.

Mosby. Yes, 'tis for thee I am so. But your looks Declare, my death would please you better, madam.

Alicia. Exaggerating fiend! be dumb for ever.
His death! I must not cast a glance that way.

Mosby. Is there another way? Oh! think, Alicia.

Alicia. I will, for that will make me mad: and madness

Were some excuse. Come, kind distraction! come,

And Arden dies: my husband dies for Mosby.

(Shrieks and runs to Mosby.)

Enter ARDEN and FRANKLIN.

He's here! Oh, save me! tell me, did he hear?

Arden. (Starting.) Franklin, support your friend.

I shake with horror.

Frank. What moves you thus?

Arden. See, Mosby with my wife!

Mosby. But, madam, I shall spare your farther trouble:

In happy time behold my neighbour here.

(As taking leave of Alicia.)

Alicia. Mischief and wild confusion have begun,
And desolation waits to close the scene. [Exit.]

Mosby. Sir, I would gladly know, whether your grant

Of the rich abbey-lands of Feversham

Be yet confirm'd or not?

Arden. What, if I tear

Her faithless heart, ev'n in the traitor's sight,

Who taught it falsehood?

(Aside.)

Frank. He is lost in thought.

But I can answer that: it is confirm'd.

I brought the deed, with the great seal annex'd,

Sign'd by our pious Edward and his council.

Mosby. I'm satisfied.

Arden. So am not I. By hell,

There's justice in the thought. I'm strangely tempted.

(Aside.)

Mosby. My friend seems wrapt in thought: I came to advise him,

That Green, by virtue of a former grant

His father long enjoy'd—

Arden. For my estate,

The law and this good seal is my security;

To them I leave Green and his groundless claim.

But my just right to false Alicia's heart,

(So dearly purchas'd with a husband's name,

And sacred honour of a gentleman,)

I shall assert myself, and thus secure

From further violation.

(Draws.)

Mosby. Her known virtue

Renders the injury your fancy forms,

A thing of air.

Frank. Impossible to thought.

Whence, Arden, comes this sudden madness on thee,

That your Alicia, ever dear esteem'd,
And deeply lov'd—

Arden. Out on the vile adult'ress!
But thou demure, insinuating slave, (To Mosby.)
Shalt taste my vengeance first. Defend thyself.

Mosby. I scorn to take advantage of your rage.

Arden. A coward, too. Oh! my consummate shame.

Mosby. This I can bear from you.

Arden. Or any man.

Why hangs that useless weapon by your side,
Thou shame to manhood? Draw. Will nothing move thee? (Strikes Mosby.)

Frank. Hold! Whither would your mad revenge transport you?

Arden. Shall shameful cowardice protect a villain!

Mosby. You choose a proper place to shew your courage.

Arden. Go on. I'll follow to the ocean's brink,
Or to the edge of some dread precipice,
Where terror and despair shall stop thy flight,
And force thy trembling hand to guard thy life.

Mosby. What I endure to save a lady's honour!
(To Franklin.)

Frank. Your longer stay will but incense him
more:

Pray, quit the house.

Mosby. Sir, I shall take your counsel. [Exit.

Arden. He hath escap'd me, then. But, for my wife—

Frank. What has she done?

Arden. Done! Must I tell my shame?

Away, begone; lest, from my prey withheld,
I turn, and tear th' officious hand that holds me.
Soft! art thou Franklin? Pardon me, sweet
friend:

My spirits fail—I shake—I must retire.

Frank. To your Alicia?

Arden. To my lonely couch;

For I must learn to live without her, Franklin.

Frank. Pray heaven forbid!

Arden. To hate her, to forget her, if I can:

No easy task for one who doats like me.

From what a height I'm fallen! Once smiling
love

Of all its horrors robb'd the blackest night,

And gilt with gladness ev'ry ray of light,

Now tyrant-like his conquest he maintains,

And o'er his groaning slave with rods of iron reigns. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter GREEN and MOSBY.

Green. You pity me, and know not my estate.
I'm ruin'd, Mosby, thoughtless and ill-advis'd;
My riotous youth will leave my age a beggar.
These abbey-lands were all the hopes I'd left:
My whole support.

Mosby. Base and ungen'rous Arden!
To force a man, born equal to himself,
To beg or starve.

Green. By heaven! I will do neither:
I'll let the proud oppressor know—

Mosby. How blind is rage!
Who threatens his enemy, lends him a sword
To guard himself.

Green. Robb'd of the means of life,
What's life itself? an useless load, a curse:
Which yet I'll dearly sell to my revenge.

Mosby. You mean to kill him, then?

Green. I do, by heaven!

Mosby. Suppose you fail.

Green. I can but lose my life.

Mosby. Then where is your revenge, when he, secure,

Riots unbounded in his ill-got wealth?

Green. What can I do?

Mosby. 'Tis plain you wish him dead.

Green. Each moment of his life is to my soul
A tedious age of pain; for while he lives,
Contempt, and all the ills a lazar knows,
Must be my wretched lot, and lengthen out
The miserable hours. What grovelling wretch
Would wish to hold his life on such conditions?

Mosby. But change the scene: suppose but Arden dead,

Your land restor'd, and fortune in your pow'r;
Honour, respect, and all the dear delights
That wait on wealth, shall wing the joyful hours,
And life contracted seem one happy day.

I hate this Arden, and have stronger motives
Than any you can urge to wish his death;
He has accus'd, insulted, struck me;

Nay, his fair, virtuous wife, on my account—

Green. If fame speaks true, you're to be envied there.

Mosby. The world will talk—But be that as it may,

I want not cause, nor will, nor means, nor friends.

Green. Nor opportunity shall long be wanting.

Mosby. Enough: his fate is fix'd. See, Brad-shaw's here.

Enter BRADSHAW.

Brad. Save, save you, gentlemen.

Mosby. We thank you, neighbour.
But whither in such haste?

Brad. To the isle of Sheppey,
To wait on good Lord Cheyney. As he holds
In high esteem our worthy townsman Arden,
I shall first call on him. 'Tis well I met you,
For yonder two were but bad road-companions.

Green. They seem of desp'rate fortunes.

Mosby. Have they names?

Brad. One I know not; but judge him from his comrade.

The foremost of the two I knew at Boulogne,
Where, in the late king's reign, I serv'd myself.
He was a corporal then, but such a villain!
Beneath a soldier's name: a common cut-throat,
That preys on all mankind, and knows no party.

Mosby. A horrid character you give him, Bradshaw.

Brad. No worse than he deserves.

Mosby. (Aside.) An useful hint:
He shall not want employment. What's his name?

Brad. Black Will. His family-name I never heard.

Mosby. (To Green.) A word—write you a letter
to Alicia:
Disguise your hand. This honest fool may bear
it.

Hint at these men. In case her courage fail,
She will be glad to shift the deed on them.

Green. I am instructed.

Enter BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG.

B. Will. What, comrade Bradshaw. How fare
you, man? 'Sblood! dost not remember honest
Black Will. Why, thou'rt grown purse-proud,
sure.

Brad. Why, you are not easily forgotten,
Will. But, pr'ythee, what brings thee to Fever-sham?

B. Will. A soldier, you know, is at home, where-ever he comes. Omne solum forti patri. There's Latin. Give's a tester.

Brad. In time of peace we should apply to some honest, creditable business, and not turn the name of soldier into vagabond.

B. Will. Yes, as you have done. I'm told, you keep a goldsmith's shop here in Feversham; and, like a mechanical rogue, live by cheating. I have more honour.

Brad. Would thou hadst honesty!

B. Will. Where do our honesties differ? I take a purse behind a hedge, and you behind a counter.

Brad. Insolent slave!

B. Will. You cent. per cent. rascal! I may find a time to teach you better manners.

Brad. Go, mend thy own.

B. Will. Thou wert always a sneaking fellow, Bradshaw, and could'st never swear, nor get drunk. Come, shall I and my comrade Shakebag taste your ale?

Brad. My house entertains no such guests. Farewell, gentlemen.

Mosby. Along with Bradshaw,
And leave the management of these to me.

(Aside to Green.)

Green. It shall be done. Bradshaw, a word with thee.

Brad. Your pardon, gentlemen.

[Exeunt Green and Brad.]

B. Will. He was a cadet in the last French war, like other soldiers, then; but now he has got a nest and feathered it a little, he pretends to reputation. 'Sblood! had this been a fit place, he had not escap'd me so. You have surveyed us well. (To Mosby.) How do you like us?

Mosby. Methinks I read truth, prudence, secrecy,
And courage, writ upon your manly brows.

B. Will. What hellish villany has this fellow in hand, that makes him fawn upon us? (Aside.)

Mosby. I fear the world's a stranger to your merit.

If this may recommend me to your friendship—
(Gives a purse.)

B. Will. Of what damn'd deed is this to be the wages?

Shake. Hast ever an elder brother's throat to cut?

B. Will. Or an old peevish father to be buried?

Mosby. Neither of these.

Shake. A rival then, mayhap.

Mosby. There you come nearer to me.

Shake. Then speak out.

We're honest, sir.

B. Will. Trusty, and very poor.

Mosby. Metal too fit for me. (Aside.) Then, hear me, sir.

But you must both, ere I disclose my purpose, Promise, and bind that promise by your oaths, Never—(They both laugh.)—Why this unseasonable mirth?

B. Will. You'd have us swear?

Mosby. Else why did I propose it?

B. Will. There's the jest. Are men who act in despite of all law, honour, and conscience; who live by blood; (as it is plain you think we do;) are we free-thinkers, like silly wenches and canting priests, to be confined by oaths?

Shake. Would you bind us, let the price equal the purchase, and we'll go to hell for you with pleasure.

Mosby. Horrid! they shock ev'n me who would employ 'em. (Aside.)

I apprehend: the business, then, is this:
In Feversham, there lives a man, call'd Arden,
In general esteem, and ample means;
And has a wife the very pride of nature.
I have been happy long in her affections;
And, he once dead, might with her share his fortunes.

He's jealous, too, of late, and threatens me.
Love, int'rest, self-defence, all ask his death.

B. Will. This man you'd have despatch'd?

Mosby. I would.

B. Will. Rich, you say?

Mosby. Immensely so.

B. Will. And much belov'd?

Mosby. By all degrees of men.

B. Will. George, this will be a dangerous piece of work.

Shake. D—n'd dangerous. A man so known; and of reputation, too.

B. Will. And then, the power and number of his friends must be considered.

Mosby. What, does your courage shrink already, sirs?

Shake. No.

B. Will. This is ever the curse of your men of true valour; to be the tools of crafty, cowardly knaves, who have not the heart to execute what their heads have projected. It is a d—d, ungrateful world. What money have you more about you?

Mosby. Ten pieces.

B. Will. I've had as much for stealing a dog.

Mosby. I give you that as a retaining fee:
When the deed's done, each shall have twice that sum,

And a good horse to further his escape.

B. Will. Sir, will you have him murdered in a church?

Shake. Or on the altar? say the word, and it shall be done.

Mosby. Some safer place; the street, highway, or fields,

Will serve my turn as well.

Shake. Just as you please.

Mosby. Where may I find you, gentlemen?

B. Will. At Adam Fowl's, the Flower-de-luce.

Mosby. I have confederates in this design;
When we've contriv'd the manner of his death,
I'll send you word.

B. Will. You'll find us always ready.

Mosby. And determined?

B. Will. Ay, fear it not. Farewell.

[Exeunt several ways.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Arden's house.

Enter ALICIA, with a letter.

Alicia. He doubts me; yet he dares not tell me so;

But thus, by Green, whets my unsettled mind.

(Reads.)

"Strike home, or not at all. In case you fail,
We have found instruments by means of Bradshaw."

He shall not find me undetermined now.

Hark! Michael's on the watch. If Arden sleeps,
(For so he seems dispos'd,) he'll bring me word:
That's the safest time. This promis'd marriage
With Mosby's sister has remov'd his qualms.

Enter MICHAEL.

Why dost thou break upon me unawares?
What of your master?

Mich. He's scarce sunk to rest,
But full of meditated rage 'gainst Mosby.

Alicia. He'll sleep in peace ere long.

Mich. Think not on that.

Oh! did Maria bless me with her smiles,
As you do Mosby, had I twenty lives,
I'd risk 'em all to win her to my arms.

Alicia. I pray thee, leave me, Michael. [Exit

Mich.] What is nature?

There is a pow'r in love, subdues to itself

All other passions in the human mind.
 This wretch, more fearful than the lonely murderer,
 Who with inquiring eyes some stranger views,
 Would meet the king of terrors undismay'd,
 For her he loves, and dare him to the combat.
 And shall not I preserve my Mosby's life,
 And shall not I—a husband! What's a husband?
 I have a soul above th' unnatural tie,
 That tells me, I'm his right, and only his,
 Who won my virgin heart. Ye tender parents,
 Whose cruel kindness made your child thus wretched,
 Turn not your eyes towards earth to view this scene;
 'Twill make you sad in heav'n. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another Room.

ARDEN sleeping on a couch. Enter ALICIA, with a dagger in her hand.

Alicia. See! Jealousy o'erwatch'd is sunk to rest,
 While fearful guilt knows no security,
 But in repeated crimes. My weary eyes,
 Each moment apprehensive of his vengeance,
 Must seek for rest in vain till his are clos'd.
 Then for our mutual peace, and Mosby's love.
 (Approaching to stab him, starts.)
 He wakes! Defend me from his just revenge!
 And yet, he sees me not, nor moves a finger
 To save his threaten'd life. Then, whence that voice,
 That pierc'd my ears, and cried, Alicia, hold!
 Can mimic fancy cheat the outward sense,
 And form such sounds? If these heart-racking thoughts
 Precede the horrid act, what must ensue?
 Worse plague I cannot fear from Arden's death;
 But from his life, the death of him I love.
 Perish the hated husband! Wherefore hated?
 Is he not all that my vain sex could wish?
 My eyes, while they survey his graceful form,
 Condemn my heart, and wonder how it stray'd.
 He sighs—he starts—he groans. His body sleeps,
 But restless grief denies his mind repose.
 Perhaps he dreams of me; perhaps he sees me.
 Thus, like a fury, broke from deepest hell,
 Lust in my heart, and murder in my hand—
 (Alicia drops the dagger. Arden starts up.)
 Arden. Her dagger, Michael! seize it, and I'm safe.
 How strong she is! Oh! what a fearful dream!
 Before me still! speak, vision, art thou Alicia,
 Or but the coinage of my troubled brain?
 Alicia. Oh, Arden! husband—lord—
 Arden. Art thou my wife?
 Thou'rt substance—I'm wrapp'd in wonder!
 Hence!
 Hast lost all sense of fear as well as shame,
 That thou durst haunt me thus, asleep and waking,
 Thou idol and thou torment of my soul?
 Alicia. My bleeding heart—
 Arden. Away, begone and leave me:
 Lest, in the transports of unbounded rage,
 I rush upon thee, and deface those charms,
 That first enslav'd my soul; mangle that face
 Where, spite of falsehood, beauty triumphs still;
 Mar that fair frame, and crush thee into atoms.
 Avoid me, and be safe. Nay, now you drive me hence,
 (Alicia kneels, he turns away.)
 Cruel and false as thou hast been to me,
 I cannot see thee wring thy suppliant hands,
 And weep, and kneel in vain. [Exit.]
 Alicia. This, this is he
 I came prepar'd to murder. Curst Alicia!
 (Takes up the dagger.)

In thy own bosom plunge the fatal steel,
 Or his who robb'd thee of thy fame and virtue.
 It will not be: fear holds my dastard hand.
 Those chaster pow'rs that guard the nuptial bed
 From foul pollution, and the hand from blood,
 Have left their charge, and I am lost for ever.
 [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Road near Feversham.

Enter BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG.

Shake. D——n! posted as you were, to let him 'scape!

B. Will. I pray thee, peace.

Shake. Green and I beheld him pass carelessly by within reach of your dagger. If you had held it but naked in your hand, he would have stabbed himself as he walked.

B. Will. I had not power to do it: a sudden damp came over me; I never felt so in my life. A kind of palsy seized me.

Shake. Palsy! when you're upon your duty! Go, go, and sleep, or drink away your fears. You tremble still.

B. Will. I tremble! my courage was never yet called in question, villain. When I fought at Boulogne under the late king, both armies knew and feared me.

Shake. That might be, because they did not know you. Dog, I'll shake you off to your old trade of filching in a throng. Murder's too genteel a business for your capacity. Sirrah, I have taken more gold at noon-day, than ever you filched copper by candle-light.

B. Will. Cowardly slave, you lie!

Shake. A coward! 'Sblood! that shall be proved. Come on.

B. Will. To thy heart's blood.

Shake. To thine. (They fight.)

Enter GREEN.

Green. What, are you mad? For shame, put up your swords.

Shake. Not till I've had his life.

B. Will. Fool, guard thy own.

Green. Pray, hear me, gentlemen.

B. Will. Stand farther off.

Shake. Away.

Green. This broil will ruin all.

Shake. He begun it.

B. Will. Ay, and will end it too.

Green. Arden, you know, returns, and will you let him

Escape a second time?

Shake. Who did the first?

Green. No matter, that may be repair'd.

B. Will. Brand me with cowardice!

Green. Come, come, you're both to blame.

Speak, will you lay aside this senseless broil?

B. Will. Nay, let him speak.

Shake. Why, rather than lose this opportunity—
 (Puts up his sword.)

B. Will. Ay, we'll defer it till Arden's dead; I'm for doing business first, and then for play.

Shake. Challenge me when thou darest.

Green. The night draws on. Are you resolv'd?

Shake. We are.

Green. Enough. See where he comes. I must withdraw;

But when you've done the deed, and sent his soul—

No matter where—I'll come to you again. [Exit.]

B. Will. Something rises in my throat; I can scarcely breathe: I'd rather poison half-a-dozen cardinals, than kill this honest man; but I'll do't for my reputation.

Shake. He comes. Retire a little. Let him advance, then bury your dagger in his heart. If you fail, I'll second you.

B. Will. Stand further off, I shall not need your aid.

Shake. Now strike.

Enter ARDEN first, and then LORD CHEYNEY, attended.

B. Will. Again prevented! Ten thousand devils take them all!

Lord C. Arden, well met. You're to the isle of Sheppey

Grown quite a stranger. Shall we see you there?

Arden. I purpos'd soon t' have waited on your lordship.

Lord C. Well, will you sup with me to-night at Shorlow?

Arden. Franklin, my lord, who is my guest at present,

Expects me at my house.

Lord C. Then will you dine with me to-morrow?

Arden. I'll not fail your lordship.

Lord C. Believe me, worthy friend, I'm glad to see you.

Walk you towards Feversham?

Arden. So please your lordship.

[Exeunt Lord C. and Arden.]

B. Will. Just as I had taken aim, too! 'Sblood! I could kill myself for vexation.

Enter GREEN.

Green. Well, Arden is at last despatch'd?

Shake. Yes, safe to Feversham.

Green. Safe, say you? his good fortune mocks us all.

These strange escapes have almost stagger'd me; But, thinking of my wrongs, I'm more confirm'd.

B. Will. Well said, my man of resolution. A gentleman commits a murder with double the satisfaction for such a heart. We must lay our snares more cunning for the future.

Green. We should consult with Michael, Arden's man.

The pigmy-hearted wretch, though long ago He swore his master dead, acts with reluctance.

Shake. The coward must be spurred. He does it, or he dies.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. I saw my master and Lord Cheyney pass, And my heart leap'd for joy. (Apart.)

B. Will. What says the villain?

Mich. Would I were gone! (Aside.) Sir, if I give offence— (Going.)

Green. Michael, come back; you must not leave us so.

Mich. What is your pleasure?

Green. Why, we understand

You are in love with Mosby's beauteous sister.

Mich. Suppose I am.

B. Will. You deal too mildly with the peasant. You swore to kill your master, villain. Be an honest man of your word, and do't then, white liver!

Mich. Sir, I repented.

B. Will. Repented! What's that? Dog! know your rank, and act as we command, or your heart's blood—

Mich. What must I do? (Frightened.)

B. Will. Do! You must shew us the house, appoint the time and place, and lure your master thither. We'll take care of him without your trouble.

Green. So shall you purchase noble Mosby's friendship;

And, by his friendship, gain his sister's love.

Mich. They'll murder me too, should I not comply. (Aside.)

Green. Think on your love, your interest.

B. Will. Or your death.

Mich. To-night, soon as the abbey-clock strikes ten, (Trembling.)

Come to his house, I'll leave the doors unbarr'd: The left-hand stairs lead to my master's chamber: There take him, and dispose him as you please.

Green. This cannot fail.

Shake. Unless this love-sick coward thinks to deceive us.

Mich. I will not, by heaven!

B. Will. I believe thee; for, by hell! thou dar'st not. [Exeunt Green, B. Will. and Shake.]

Mich. Master, thy constant love and daily bounty

Deserve more grateful offices from Michael.

[Exit, weeping.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Arden's house.

ALICIA discovered.

Alicia. When vice has spread her poison thro' the soul,
How lifeless, slow, confus'd, and insincere,
Are our resolves in the pursuits of virtue!
What wonder, then, heav'n should refuse its aid
To thoughts, that only blossom for a time;
Look blooming to the eye, but yield no fruit.

Enter MOSBY.

Mosby. I come, Alicia, to partake thy griefs;
For fire divided burns with lesser force.

Alicia. I know thee: thou art come to fan the flame
Thy breath hath kindled here, till it consume us.
But tears and sighs shall stifle in my heart
The guilty passion.

Mosby. Is heroic love,
That form'd the bright examples of thy sex,
Made their lives glorious, and their fame immortal,
A crime in thee? Art thou not mine by oaths,
By mutual sufferings, by contract mine?

Alicia. Why do you urge a rash, a fatal promise,
I had no right to make or you to ask?

Why did you practise on my easy heart?
Why did I ever listen to your vows?
In me 'twas foolish guilt and disobedience;
In you 'twas avarice, insolence, and pride.

Mosby. 'Twas love in me, and gratitude in you.

Alicia. 'Twas insolence in you, meanness in me,
And madness in us both. My careful parents,
In scorn of your presumption and my weakness,
Gave me in marriage to a worthy gentleman,
Of birth and fortune equal to my own.

Three years I liv'd with him without reproach,
And made him in that time the happy father
Of two most lovely children. I, too, was happy;
At least, I liv'd in hopes I might be so:
For time, and gratitude, and Arden's love,
I hop'd might quench my guilty flame for you,
And make my heart a present worthy him.

Mosby. And dost thou glory in thy perjuries?
In love, inconstancy alone's a crime.
Think on the ardour of our youthful passion,
Think how we play'd with love; nor thought it
guilt,
Till thy first falsehood, (call it not obedience,)
Thy marriage with this Arden made me desperate;
Think on the transports of our love renew'd,
And—

Alicia. Hide the rest, lest list'ning winds should hear,
And publish to the world our shameful tale.
Here let remembrance of our follies die.

Mosby. Shall our loves wither in their early bloom?

Alicia. Their harvest, else, will be to both our shames.

Hast thou not made a monster of me, Mosby?
You should abhor me, I abhor myself.
When unperceiv'd I stole on Arden's sleep,
(Hell steel'd my heart, and death was in my hand,)
Pale anguish brooded on his ashy cheek,
And chilly sweats stood shivering on his brow.
Relentless murder, at a sight so sad,
Gave place to pity; and, as he wak'd, I stood
Irresolute, and drown'd in tears.

Mosby. She's lost.

And I in vain have stain'd my soul with blood.

(Aside.)

Alicia. Give o'er in time: in vain are your attempts

Upon my Arden's life; for heav'n, that wrested
The fatal weapon from my trembling hand,
Still has him in charge.

Mosby. Little she thinks (Aside.)
That Arden's dead ere now. It must be so;
I've but that game to play, ere it be known.

Alicia. I know our dang'rous state; I hesitate;
I tremble for your life; I dread reproach.
But we've offended, and must learn to suffer.

Mosby. Then Arden live in his Alicia blest,
And Mosby wretched. Yet should chance or nature

Lay Arden gently in a peaceful grave,
Might I presume to hope? Alicia, speak.

Alicia. How shall I look into my secret thoughts,
And answer what I fear to ask myself?

(A long pause.)

Mosby. Silence speaks best for me. His death once known,

I must forswear the fact, and give these tools
To public justice; and not live in fear. (Aside.)
Thy heart is mine. I ask but for my own.
Truth, gratitude, and honour, bind you to me,
Or else you never lov'd.

Alicia. Then why this struggle?
Not lov'd! Oh! had my love been justly plac'd,
As sure it was exalted and sincere,
I should have gloried in it, and been happy.
But I'll no longer live the abject slave
Of loose desire: I disclaim the thought.

Mosby. I'll ask no more what honour should deny;
By heav'n, I never will.

Alicia. Well, then, remember,
On that condition only, I renew
My vows. If time and the event of things
(Giving her hand.)
Should ever make it lawful, I'll be your's.

Mosby. Oh! my full joys—

Alicia. Suppress thy frantic transports;
My heart recoils, I am betray'd; oh! give me back
My promis'd faith.

Mosby. First, let the world dissolve.

Alicia. There is no joy nor peace for you or
me:
All our engagements cannot but be fatal.

Mosby. The time may come when you'll have other thoughts;
Till then, farewell. (Aside.) Now, Fortune, do thy worst. [Exit.]

Alicia. Mosby, return. He's gone, and I am wretched,
I should have banish'd him my sight for ever.
You happy fair ones, whose untainted fame
Has never yet been blasted with reproach,
Fly from th' appearance of dishonour far.

Virtue is arbitrary, nor admits debate:
To doubt is treason in her rigid court;
But if ye parley with the foe, you're lost. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another Room in Arden's house.

ARDEN and FRANKLIN sitting together on a couch;
Arden thoughtful.

Frank. Nay, wonder not. Tho' ev'ry circumstance

Thus strangely met to prove the lady false,
And justify the husband's horrid vengeance,
Yet it appears to ev'ry honest eye,
(Too late for the poor lady,) she was wrong'd.

Arden. Is't possible?

Frank. Ay, very possible:

He lives that proves it so. Conceal'd from justice,
He pines with ceaseless sorrow for his guilt,
And each hour bends him lower towards his grave.

Arden. I know thy friendship, and perceive its drift.

I'll bear my wrongs—for, sure, I have been wrong'd.

Do I but think so, then? What fools are men
Whom love and hatred, anger, hope, and fear,
And all the various passions, rule by turns,
And in their several turns alike deceive!

Frank. To cast away, and on suspicion only,
A jewel, like Alicia, were to her
Unjust, and cruel to yourself. (Clock strikes ten.)
Good night,

The clock has stricken ten.

Arden. I thought it more.

Frank. I thought it not so much.

Arden. Why, thus it is:

Our happy hours are few, and fly so swift,
That they are past ere we begin to count 'em:
But when with pain and misery oppress'd,
Anticipating time's unvarying pace,
We think each heavy moment is an age.

Frank. Come, let's to rest. Impartial as the grave,

Sleep robs the cruel tyrant of his pow'r,
Gives rest and freedom to the o'erwrought slave,
And steals the wretched beggar from his want.
Droop not, my friend, sleep will suspend thy cares,

And time will end them.

Arden. True; for time brings death,
The only certain end of human woes.
Sleep interrupts, but waking we're restor'd
To all our griefs again. Watching and rest,
Alternately succeeding one another,
Are all the idle business of dull life.
What shall we call this undetermin'd state;
This narrow isthmus 'twixt two boundless oceans;
That whence we came, and that to which we tend?

Is it life chequer'd with the sleep of death?
Or death enliven'd by our waking dreams?
But we'll to bed. Here, Michael, bring the lights.

Enter MICHAEL, with lights.

Heav'n send you good repose.
(Gives Franklin a light.)

Frank. The like to you.

Mich. Shall I attend you, sir?

Frank. No, no; I choose to be alone. Good night.

[Exit Franklin. Michael attends his master, and returns.]

Mich. I, who should take my weapon in my hand
And guard his life with hazard of my own,
With fraudulent smiles have led him, unsuspecting,

Quite to the jaws of death: but I've an oath;
Mosby has bound me with a horrid vow,
Which, if I break, these dogs have sworn my death.
I've left the doors unbarr'd. Hark! 'twas the latch.
They come—I hear their oaths, and see their daggers
Insulting o'er my master's mangled body,
While he for mercy pleads. Good master, live:
I'll bar the doors again. But should I meet
'em—
What's that? I heard 'em cry, "Where is this coward?"
Arden once dead, they'll murder me for sport.
Help! call the neighbours! Master! Franklin!
help!

Enter ARDEN and FRANKLIN, undressed.

Arden. What dismal outcry's this?
Frank. What frights thee, Michael?
Mich. My master, Franklin!
Arden. Why dost tremble so?
Mich. I dream'd the house was full of thieves and murderers. (Trembling.)
Arden. Dream'd! what, awake? Are all the doors made fast?
Mich. I think they are.
Arden. I'll go and see myself. [Exit.]
Frank. You made a fearful noise.
Mich. Did I?
Arden. (Within.) Why, Michael!
Frank. You tremble still. Has any one been
here?
Mich. No, I hope not. My master will be angry.

Re-enter ARDEN.

Arden. This negligence not half contents me,
sir;
The doors were all left open.
Mich. Sir—
Arden. To bed,
And, as you prize my favour, be more careful.
[Exit Michael.]
Frank. 'Tis very cold. Once more, my friend—
Arden. Good night. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The Street before Arden's door; the door shut.

Enter BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG.

B. Will. Zounds! Michael has betray'd us;
The doors are fast. Away, away! Disperse!
[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Flower-de-Luce.

Enter MOSBY and MICHAEL.

Mich. Though I with oaths appeal'd to conscious
heav'n,
That Arden rose and shut the doors himself,
Yet, but for Green, these bloody rogues had kill'd
me.
We must desist: Franklin and sweet Maria
Have promis'd, at Alicia's own request,
To interfere—
Mosby. Such ever be the employ
Of him I hate.
Mich. The mourning fair, all chang'd,
By me conjures you, (and with tears she spoke
it,)

Not to involve yourself and her in ruin,
By seeking to renew a correspondence
She has renounc'd for ever.
Mosby. How! confusion!
Mich. And hopes, as heav'n, in answer to her pray'rs,
Hath reconcil'd her duty and affection,
You will approve her resolution—
Mosby. Doubtless.
Mich. And learn, by her example, to subdue
Your guilty passion.
Mosby. Ha, ha, ha! exquisite woman.
So, rather than not change, she'll love her husband!
But she will not persevere.
Mich. Yes, sure, she will.
Mosby. Have I then slighted her whole sighing sex,
Bid opportunity and fortune wait;
And all to be forsaken for a husband!
By heav'n, I am glad he has so oft escap'd,
That I may have him murder'd in her sight.

Enter GREEN.

Green. How strange a Providence attends this man!
'Tis vain to strive with heav'n; let's give it o'er.
Mosby. No; when I do, may I be curst for ever,
Hopeless to love, and hate without revenge:
May I ne'er know an end of disappointment,
But press'd with hard necessity, like thee,
Live the contempt of my insulting foe.
Green. I scorn the abject thought; had he a life
Hung on each hair, he dies. If we succeed,
(To Michael.)
This very night Maria shall be thine.
Mich. I am a man again.
Mosby. I've thought a way
That may be easy under friendship's mask,
Which, to a foe suspected, may be hard.
Green. Friendship! impossible—
Mosby. You know him not.
You, with your ruffians, in the street shall seek
him.
I follow at some distance. They begin
(No matter how) a quarrel, and at once
Assault him with their swords. Straight I appear,
Forget all wrongs, and draw in his defence;
Mark me, be sure, with some slight wound; then fly,
And leave the rest to me.
Mich. I know his temper.
This seeming benefit will cancel all
His former doubts, and gain his easy heart.
Green. Perhaps so; yet—
Mosby. Further debates are needless. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Arden's house.

Enter FRANKLIN and MARIA.

Frank. Well, in what temper did you find Alicia?
Maria. Never was anguish, never grief like her's:
She eats nor sleeps. Her lovely, downcast eyes,
That us'd to gladden each beholder's heart,
Now wash the flinty bosom of the earth.
Her troubled breast heaves with incessant sighs,
Which drink the purple streams of life, and blast
Her bloom, as storms the blossoms of the spring.
But, sure, her pray'rs must quickly reach high
heav'n,

Relenting Arden, kindly sooth her sorrows,
And her lost peace restore.

Frank. Their mutual peace, Maria!
For his can ne'er be found but in Alicia.
Asham'd to view the face of man or day,
As Mosby's name was written on his brow,
He cheerless wanders; seeks the darkest gloom
To hide his drooping head, and grieve alone.
With a full heart, swoln eyes, and falt'ring
tongue,
He sometimes, seeking to beguile his grief,
Begins a mournful tale: but straight a thought
Of his imagin'd wrongs crossing his memory,
Ends his sad story ere the half be told.
Oh! may our pains with wish'd success be crown'd.

Enter ARDEN.

Arden. No, Franklin, no; your friendly cares are vain:
Were I but certain she had wrong'd my bed,
I then might hate her, and shake off my woes;
But thus perplex'd, can never taste of comfort.
Frank. O jealousy! thou bane of social joys!
Oh! she's a monster, made of contradictions!
Let truth in all her native charms appear,
And, with the voice of harmony itself,
Plead the just cause of innocence traduc'd;
Deaf as the adder, blind as upstart greatness,
She sees nor hears. And yet let slander whisper,
Or evil-ey'd suspicion look oblique,
Rumour has fewer tongues than she has ears;
And Argus' hundred eyes are dim and slow,
To piercing jealousy's.
Arden. No more, no more;
I know its plagues, but where's the remedy?
Maria. In your Alicia.
Frank. She shall heal these wounds.
Arden. She's my disease, and can she be my cure?
My friends should rather teach me to abhor her,
To tear her image from my bleeding heart.
Maria. We leave that hateful office to the fiends.
Frank. If you e'er lov'd, you'll not refuse to see her:
You promis'd that.
Arden. Did I?
Frank. Indeed you did.
Arden. Well, then, some other time.
Frank. No; see her now.
Arden. Franklin, I know my heart, and dare not see her.
I have a husband's honour to maintain,
I fear the lover's weakness may betray.
Let me not do what honour must condemn,
And friendship blush to hear.
Frank. That Arden never will.
Maria. Did you but know her grief—
Arden. Am I the cause?
Have I, just heav'n, have I ever injur'd her?
Yet I'm the coward. O prepost'rous fear!
See where she comes, arm'd with my num'rous
wrongs,
I'll meet, with honourable confidence,
Th' offending wife, and look the honest husband.
Frank. Maria, we'll withdraw; even friendship
here
Would seem impertinence.
[Exeunt Franklin and Maria.]
Arden. Be still my heart!

Enter ALICIA, not seeing Arden.

Alicia. How shall I bear my Arden's just re-proaches?
Or can a reconciliation long continue,
That's founded on deceit? can I avow

My secret guilt? No; at so mean a thought
Abandon'd infamy herself would blush.
Nay, could I live with public loss of honour,
Arden would die to see Alicia scorn'd.
He's here! earth open—hide me from his sight.
Arden. Guilt chains her tongue. Lo! silent, self-condemn'd,
With tearful eyes and trembling limbs she stands.
Alicia. Fain would I kiss his footsteps; but that look,
Where indignation seems to strive with grief,
Forbids me to approach him.
Arden. Who would think
That anguish were not real?
Alicia. I'm rooted here.
Arden. Those tears, methinks, ev'n if her guilt were certain,
Might wash away her pains.
Alicia. Support me, heav'n!
Arden. Curse on the abject thought. I shall relapse
To simple dotage. She steals on my heart,
She conquers with her eyes. If I but hear her voice,
Nor earth nor heav'n can save me from her snares.
Oh! let me fly, if I have yet the pow'r.
Alicia. Oh! Arden, do not, do not leave me thus. (Kneels, and holds him.)
Arden. I pray thee, loose thy hold.
Alicia. Oh! never, never.
Arden. Why should I stay to tell thee of my wrongs,
To aggravate thy guilt, and wound thy soul?
Thyself, if all these agonizing struggles
Of tears, of sighs, of groans, of speechless sorrow,
Be but sincere, thyself will do it better.
One thing I'll tell thee; (for perhaps 'twill please
thee;)
Thou'st broke my heart, Alicia.
Alicia. Oh! (She falls to the ground.)
Arden. And canst thou,
Can woman pity whom she hath undone?
Why dost thou grasp my knees? what would'st
thou say,
If thou could'st find thy speech?
Alicia. Oh! mercy, mercy!
Arden. Thou hast had none on me: let go my hand;
Why dost thou press it to thy throbbing heart,
That beats—but not for me.
Alicia. Then may it ne'er beat more.
Arden. At least, I'm sure it did not always so.
Alicia. For that my soul is pierc'd with deep remorse;
For that I bow me to the dust before thee,
And die to be forgiven. Oh! Arden, Arden!
Arden. Presumptuous fool! what business hast thou here?
Did I not know my weakness, and her pow'r!
Rise, rise, Alicia.
Alicia. No; here let me lie
On the bare bosom of this conscious earth,
Till Arden speak the words of peace and comfort,
Or my heart break before him.
Arden. Oh! Alicia,
Thou inconsistent spring of grief and joy,
Whence sweet and bitter streams, alternate flow,
Come to my arms, and in this too fond bosom
Disburden all the fulness of thy soul.
Alicia. Let me approach with awe that sacred temple,
Resume my seat, and dwell for ever there.
Arden. There ever reign, as on thy native
throne,
Thou lovely wanderer!

Alicia. Am I at last,
In error's fatal mazes long bewilder'd,
Permitted here to find my peace and safety?

Arden. Dry up thy tears ; and tell me, truly tell
me,
Has my long suffering love at length prevail'd,
And art thou mine indeed?

Alicia. Heav'n's my witness,
I love thee, Arden ; and esteem thy love
Above all earthly good. Thy kind forgiveness
Speaks to my soul that peaceful calm confirm'd
Which reason and reflection had begun.

Arden. Thou'rt cheaply purchas'd with unnumber'd sighs,
With many a bitter tear, and years of patience,
Thou treasure of more worth than mines of gold.
I will not doubt my happiness. Thou art,
Thou wilt be mine, ever, and only mine.

Alicia. I am, I will. I ne'er knew joy till
now.

Arden. This is our truest, happiest nuptial day.
To-night, thou knowest, according to my custom,
Our yearly fair returning with St. Valentine,
I treat my friends. I go to countenance
Their honest mirth, and cheer them with my bounty.

Till happy night farewell. My best Alicia,
How will our friends rejoice, our foes repine,
To see us thus?

Alicia. Thus ever may they see us!
The wand'ring fires that have so long misled me,
Are now extinguish'd, and my heart is Arden's.
The flow'ry path of innocence and peace
Shines bright before, and I shall stray no longer.
Whence, then, these sighs, and why these floods of tears?

Sighs are the language of a broken heart,
And tears the tribute each enlighten'd eye
Pays, and must pay, for vice and folly past.
And yet the painful'st virtue hath its pleasure :
Tho' dangers rise, yet peace restor'd within,
My soul collected shall undaunted meet them.
Tho' trouble, grief, and death, the lot of all,
On good and bad without distinction fall ;
The soul which conscious innocence sustains,
Supports with ease these temporary pains ;
But, stung with guilt, and loaded by despair,
Becomes itself a burden none can bear. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—The Street. People at a distance as at a fair.

Enter ARDEN on one side, and BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG on the other ; GREEN directing them.

B. Will. Shakebag, you'll second me. 'Sblood!
give the way. (Pushes Arden.)

Shake. May we not pass the streets?

Arden. I saw you not.

B. Will. Your sight, perhaps, is bad ; your feeling may be better. (Strikes him.)

Arden. Insolent villains! (Draws.)

B. Will. Come, we'll teach you manners.

Arden. Both at once! barb'rous cowards!

Enter MOSBY.

Mosby. O bloody dogs! attempt a life so precious!

B. Will. This is a fury, George.

Shake. I've pink'd him tho'.

[Black Will and Shakebag beaten off.

Arden. Villains come back, and finish your design.

Mosby. Shall I pursue them, sir?

Arden. Not for the world.

Mosby! amazing generosity!

Mosby. I hope you are not hurt.

Arden. Pierc'd to the heart—

Mosby. Forbid it, heaven! quick, let me fly for help.

Arden. With sharp reflection: Mosby, I can't bear

To be so far oblig'd to one I've wrong'd.

Mosby. Who would not venture life to save a friend?

Arden. From you I've not deserv'd that tender
name.

Mosby. No more of that ; would I were worthy of it.

Arden. I own my heart, by boiling passions torn,

Forgets its gentleness ; yet is ever open
To melting gratitude. Oh! say what price
Can buy your friendship?

Mosby. Only think me your's.

Arden. Easy indeed. I am too much oblig'd.
Why reek'd not your good sword its justice on
me,

When mad with jealous rage, in my own house,
I urg'd you to my ruin?

Mosby. I lov'd you then

With the same warmth as now.

Arden. What's here! you bleed.

Let me bind up your wound.

Mosby. A trifle, sir.

Arden. Your friendship makes it so. See,
Franklin, see

Enter FRANKLIN.

The man I treated as a coward, bleeding,
(Wretch that I am!) for his defence of me.
Look to your wound. And, Mosby, let us hope You'll sup with me. There will be honest Bradshaw,

And Franklin here, and—

Mosby. Sir, I will not fail.

Frank. I shall not come.

Arden. Nay, Franklin, that's unkind.

Pr'ythee—

Frank. Nay, urge me not. I have my reasons.

Mosby. Avoids my company! So much the better.

His may not be so proper. (Aside.) An hour
hence,

If you are not engag'd, we'll meet at Fowl's.

Arden. I will be there.

Mosby. Till then I take my leave. [Exit.

Arden. How have I been mistaken in this man?

Frank. How are you sure you're not mistaken
now?

Arden. No doubt he loves me; and I blush to think

How I've suspected him, and wrong'd Alicia.

Frank. May you be ever happy in your wife:
But—

Arden. Speak—But what? Let's have no riddles here.

Can she be innocent, and Mosby guilty?

Frank. To speak my thoughts, this new officious fondness

Makes me suspect: I like him worse than ever.

Arden. Because I like him better. What a churl.

Frank. You're cred'lous, and treat my serious doubts

With too much levity. You vex me, Arden.

Arden. Believe me, friend, you'll laugh at this hereafter. [Exit.

MOSBY, having watched Franklin out, re-enters with GREEN.

Mosby. The surly friend has left him, as I wish'd.

You see how eagerly the foolish fowl
Flies headlong to our snare: now to inclose him.
At eight, the guests are bidden to his banquet,
And only Michael, of his numerous train,
Keeps home with his Alicia. He'll secure
The keys of all the doors, and let you in
With my two trusty blood-hounds. Alicia seems Averse at present.

Green. She'll not dare betray us.

Mosby. Not when the deed is done. We know too much.

She'll be our prisoner, and shall be observ'd.
Towards evening, then, upon a slight pretence,
To pass an hour at draughts, (a game he loves,)
I'll draw this husband home. You'll be prepar'd
In th' inner room, (Michael will shew it you,)
Till at a signal given, you all rush forth,
And strangle him.

Green. Good; 'tis a death that leaves
No bloody character to mark the place.

Mosby. Howe'er, come all provided with your daggers.

Do you seek Michael, I'll instruct the rest.

Green. What shall the signal be?

Mosby. These words in th' game:

"I take you now."

Green. Arden! thou'rt taken now, indeed.

Mosby. His body, thrown behind the abbey-wall,

Shall be descried by th' early passenger
Returning from the fair. My friend, thy hand:
Shakes it? Be firm, and our united strength,
With ease, shall cast dead Arden to the earth.

Green. Thanks to his foolish tenderness of soul.

Mosby. True; he who trusts an old invet'rate foe,

Bares his own breast, and courts the fatal blow.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V

SCENE I.—Arden's House.

Enter ALICIA.

Alicia. What have I heard! Is this the house of Arden?

Oh! that the pow'r which has so oft'n sav'd him,
Would send his guardian angel to him now,
To whisper in his ear his present danger!
Fly, Arden, fly! avoid this fatal roof,
Where murder lurks, and certain death awaits thee.

Wander, no matter where, turn but from hence,
Thou canst not miss thy way. The house is theirs.

I am suspected; Michael guards the door,
And ev'n Maria's absent. Bloody Mosby,
These are the fruits of thy detested lust.
But hark! the fiends approach. Green had humanity,

Enter GREEN, BLACK WILL, SHAKEBAG, and MICHAEL.

Could I prevail on him! Oh, sir—

(Talks apart with Green.)

B. Will. What a fair house! rich furniture;
what piles of massy plate; and then yon iron chest.
Good plunder, comrade.

Shake. And Madam Arden there, a prize worth them all to me.

B. Will. And shall that fawning, white-liver'd coward, Mosby, enjoy all these?

Shake. No doubt he would, were we the fools he thinks us.

Green. Had he as many lives as drops of blood, I'd have them all. (To Alicia.)

Alicia. But for one single night—

Green. I'd not defer his fate a single hour, Tho' I were sure myself to die the next.
So, peace, irresolute woman, and be thankful
For thy own life.

Alicia. Oh! mercy, mercy—

Green. Yes,

Such mercy as the nursing lioness,
When drain'd of moisture by her eager young,
Shews to the prey that first encounters her.

B. Will. Who talks of mercy, when I am here?

Green. She would prevent us; but our steady courage
Laughs at her coward arts.

(Knocking gently at the gate.)

Why, Michael.

Mich. Sir!

Green. Thou bloodless coward, what dost tremble at?

Dost thou not hear a knocking at the gate?

[Exit Michael.]

Mosby, no doubt. How like a sly adulterer,
Who steals at midnight, and with caution gives
Th' appointed signal to his neighbour's wife.

B. Will. Which is the place where we're to be conceal'd?

Green. This inner room.

B. Will. 'Tis well. The word is "Now I take you." (Knocking, louder than before.)

Green. Ay, there's authority. That speaks the master.

He seems in haste. 'Twere pity he should wait,
Now we're so well prepar'd for his reception.

[Green, B. Will, and Shakebag, go into the inner room.]

Alicia. Now whither are they gone? the door's unbarr'd;

I hear the sound of feet. Should it be Arden,
And Mosby with him—I can't bear the doubt,
Nor would I be resolv'd. Be hush'd my fears,
'Tis Mosby, and alone.

Enter MOSBY.

Sir! hear me, Mosby.

Mosby. Is this a time—

Alicia. I will be heard,

And mark me, when I swear, never hereafter,
By look, word, act—

Mosby. Be d—d—your husband—

Alicia. Ha! (She screams.)

Enter ARDEN and MICHAEL.

Arden. Am I a monster, that I fright thee thus?
(To Alicia.)

Say, what has happen'd since I left the house?
Thou look'st, Alicia, as if wild amazement
Had chang'd thee to the image of herself.

Alicia. Is Franklin with you?

Arden. No.

Alicia. Nor Fowl, nor Bradshaw?

Arden. Neither, but both expected.

Alicia. Merciful heav'n!

Arden. I meant to dedicate this happy night
To mirth and joy, and thy returning love.

(She sighs.)

Make me not sad, Alicia; for my sake;
Let discontent be banish'd from your brow,
And welcome Arden's friends with laughing eyes.
Amongst the first let Mosby be enroll'd.

Alicia. The villain! (Aside.)

Arden. Nay, I am too well convinc'd
Of Mosby's friendship, and Alicia's love,
Ever to wrong them more by weak suspicions.
I've been, indeed, to blame; but I will make
thee

A large amends, Alicia. Look upon him,
As on the man that gave your husband's life.

Alicia. Would take my husband's life! I'll tell him all,

And cast this load of horror from my soul:
Yet, 'tis a dreadful hazard. Both must die.

A fearful thought! Franklin may come, or Bradshaw;

Oh! let me not precipitate his fate! (Aside.)

Mosby. I see my presence is offensive here.
(Going.)

Arden. Alicia! No; she has no will but mine.

Mosby. It is not fit she should; and yet, perhaps,

'Twere better, sir. Permit me to retire.

Arden. No more. Our friendship publicly avow'd

Will clear her injur'd virtue to the world.

Mosby. Something there is in that—

Arden. It is a debt

I owe to both your fames, and pay it freely.

Mosby. For her sake, then, not for my own.

Alicia. (Aside.) O d—d dissembler.

Arden. Come, take your seat; this shall not save your money.

Bring us the tables, Michael. (They sit and play.)

Alicia. (Aside.) Oh! just heaven,
Wilt thou not interpose? How dread this pause!
Ten thousand terrors crowd the narrow space.

Arden. Your thoughts are absent, Mosby.

B. Will. Blood! why don't Mosby give the word?

Mich. Give back, the game's against him.

Alicia. Fly, Franklin, fly! to save thy Arden's life.

Murder herself, that chases him in view,
Beholding me, starts back, and for a moment
Suspends her thirst for blood. (Apart.)

Arden. Come, give it up; I told you I should win. (Rises.)

Mosby. No; I see an advantage; move again.

Arden. There.

Mosby. Now I take you.

(Black Will throws a scarf over Arden's head, in order to strangle him; but Arden disengages himself, wrests a dagger from Shakebag, and stands on the defence, till Mosby getting behind and seizing his arm, the rest assassinate him.)

Alicia. Oh! power omnipotent! make strong his arm,

Give him to conquer. Ha! my pray'rs are curses,

And draw down vengeance where they meant a blessing.

Arden. Inhospitable villain!

Alicia. Oh! he dies.

Arden. Oh! hold your bloody—Mosby, too!
Nay, then, (Falling.)

I yield me to my fate. Is this, Alicia,
This the return for my unequal love?

Alicia. Or death, or madness, would be mercies
now,

Therefore, beyond my hopes.

Arden. Oh! Mosby, Michael, Green,

Why have you drawn my blood upon your souls?

Mosby. Behold her there, to whom I was be-troth'd,

And ask no further.

Green. Think on thy abbey-lands

From injur'd Green.

Arden. You now are your own judges,
But we shall meet again where right and truth—

Who, who are these? But I forgive you all.
Thy hand, Alicia.

Alicia. I'll not give it thee.

Arden. O wretched woman! have they kill'd thee, too;

A deadly paleness, agony, and horror,
On thy sad visage sit. My soul hangs on thee,
And though departing, just departing, loves thee:
Is loth to leave, unreconcil'd to thee,
This useless mangled tenement of clay.

Dismiss her pleas'd, and say thou'rt innocent.

Alicia. All hell contains not such a guilty wretch.

Arden. Then welcome death! tho' in the shape of murder.

How have I doated to idolatry!

Vain, foolish wretch, and thoughtless of hereafter;

Nor hop'd, nor wish'd a heav'n beyond her love.
Now, unprepar'd, I perish by her hate.

Alicia. Though blacker, and more guilty than the fiends,

My soul is white from this accursed deed.

Oh! Arden, hear me—

Arden. Full of doubts I come,

Oh! thou Supreme, to seek thy awful presence.

My soul is on the wing. I own thy justice.

Prevent me with thy mercy— (Dies.)

Alicia. Turn not from me:

Behold me, pity me, survey my sorrows.

I who despis'd the duty of a wife,

Will be thy slave. Spit on me, spurn me, sir, I'll love thee still. Oh! could'st thou court my scorn,

And now abhor me, when I love thee more,

If possible, than e'er thou lov'd Alicia.

Mosby. Mad fool, he's dead, and hears thee not.

Alicia. 'Tis false!

He smiles upon me and applauds my vengeance.

(Snatches a dagger, and strikes at Mosby. A knocking at the gate.)

Mosby. D—n!

B. Will. 'Sdeath! we shall leave our work un-finish'd, and be betray'd at last. Let's hide the body.

Mosby. Force her away.

Alicia. Inhuman bloody villains!

(She swoons as she is forced from the body.)

Enter MARIA.

Maria. Mosby here?

My sliding feet, as they move trembling forwards,
Are drench'd in blood. Oh! may I only fancy
That Arden there lies murder'd.

Mosby. How fares Alicia?

Alicia. As the howling damn'd; and thou my hell.

Maria. Unhappy brother!

If thou hast done this deed, hope not to 'scape:
Mercy herself, who only seeks for crimes,
That she may pardon and reform the guilty,
Would change her nature at a sight like this.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. The guests are come; the servants all re-turn'd.

Mosby. Alicia, be thyself; and mask thy heart
(Mosby lifts up Alicia.)

From every prying eye, with courteous smiles.

Alicia. Thou canst not think me mean enough to live.

Mosby. You would not choose an ignominious death?

Alicia. That's all I dread. Might but the silent
grave,

When it receives me to its dark abode,
Hide, with my dust, my shame! Oh! might that be,

And Arden's death reveng'd. 'Tis my sole prayer.
If not, may awful justice have her course. [Exit.

Mosby. Sister, our lives are thine—

Maria. Though Mosby has shook off humanity,
I can't be his accuser. [Exit.

Mosby. Follow them, Green, and watch Alicia's conduct.

Green. I will, but cannot answer for my own.
Oh! Arden, Arden! could we change conditions—
[Exit.

B. Will. Why, what a crew of cowards!

In the same moment murdering and repenting.

Mosby. Give me the ring that is on Arden's finger.

Shake. There. Will you have his purse, too?

Mosby. No, keep that.

B. Will. Thanks for our own; we should have kept the ring,

Were it not too remarkable.

But how must we dispose of the body?

Mosby. Convey it thro' the garden, to the field Behind the abbey-wall: Michael will shew the way.

The night is dark and cloudy; yet take heed,
The house is full of company.

B. Will. Sir, if you doubt our conduct, do't yourself.

Mosby. Nay, gentlemen—

Shake. Pretend to direct us!

Mosby. For your own sakes—Arden will soon be miss'd.

Shake. We know our business, sir.

Mosby. I doubt it not.

There's your reward. The horses are both saddled,

And ready for your flight.

B. Will. Use them yourself:

I hope we're as safe as you.

Mosby. Why, gentlemen—Arden I us'd thee worse. (Aside.)

B. Will. We shall take care, however, for our own sakes.

Mosby. 'Tis very well; I hope we all are friends.

So, softly, softly, Michael! not that door.

(Michael going out at the wrong door.)

So, make what speed you can; I'll wait you there.
[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Hall in Arden's house.

MOSBY discovered.

Mosby. They must pass undescried: gardens and fields

Are dreary deserts now. Night-fowls and beasts of prey

Avoid the pinching rigour of the season,

Nor leave their shelter at a time like this.

And yet this night, this ling'ring winter night,

Hung with a weight of clouds that stops her course,

Contracts new horrors, and a deeper black,

From this d—d deed. Mosby, thou hast thy wish.

Arden is dead; now count thy gains at leisure.

Dangers without, on every side suspicion;

Within, my starting conscience mark such wounds,

As hell can equal, only murderers feel. (A pause.)

This, this the end of all my flatt'ring hopes!

Oh! happiest was I in my humble state;

Though I lay down in want, I slept in peace:

My daily toil begat my night's repose,

My night's repose made day-light pleasing to me.

But now I've climb'd the top-bough of the tree,

And sought to build my nest among the clouds:

The gentlest gales of summer shake my bed,

And dreams of murder harrow up my soul.

But hark! not yet: 'tis dreadful being alone.

This awful silence, that unbroken reigns

Through earth and air, awakes attention more,

Than thunder bursting from ten thousand clouds:

'Sdeath! 'tis but Michael. Say—

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. Dead Arden lies

Behind the abbey; 'tis a dismal sight!

It snow'd apace while we dispos'd the body.

Mosby. And not as you return'd?

Mich. No, sir.

Mosby. That's much—

Should you be question'd as to Arden's death,

You'll not confess?

Mich. No, so Maria's mine.

Mosby. She's thine, if all a brother can—

Mich. What's if?

I bought her dear, at hazard of my soul,

And force shall make her mine.

Mosby. Why, how now, coward!

Enter MARIA.

Maria. The guests refuse to take their seats without you.

Alicia's grief, too, borders on distraction.

Thy presence may appease—

Mosby. Increase it rather.

Maria. Michael, your absence too has been observ'd.

Mosby. Say we are coming. [Exit Maria.

Mich. One thing I'd forgot:

Soon as the company have left the house,

The ruffians will return.

Mosby. What would the villains?

Mich. They mutter'd threats and curses,

And seem'd not satisfy'd with their reward. [Exit.

Mosby. Let them take all. Ambition, av'rice, lust,

That drove me on to murder, now forsake me.

Oh! Arden, if thy discontented ghost

Still hovers here to see thy blood reveng'd,

View, view the anguish of this guilty breast,

And be pleas'd [Exit.

SCENE III.—A Room in Arden's house. A table spread for supper.

GREEN, BRADSHAW, ADAM FOWL, ALICIA,
MARIA, &c. discovered.

Brad. Madam, be comforted.

A. Fowl. Some accident, or business unforeseen, detains him thus.

Brad. I doubt not of his safety.

Alicia. I thank you, gentlemen; I know you lov'd

My Arden well, and kindly speak your wishes.

Enter MOSBY.

Mosby. I am asham'd I've made you wait: be seated.

Green. Madam, first take your place.

Alicia. (Aside.) Make me not mad:

To me, henceforth, all places are alike. (Sits.)

Mosby. Come, since we want the master of the house,

I'll take his seat for once.

Alicia. Dares he do this? (Aside.)

Mosby. I'm much afflicted that he stays so late;
The times are perilous.

Green. And he has enemies,
Though no man, sure, did e'er deserve them less.

Mosby. This day he was assaulted in the street.

Green. You sav'd him, then.

Mosby. Would I were with him now!

Maria. She starts, her looks are wild. (Aside.)
How fare you, madam?

Alicia. I'm lost in admiration of your brother.

Maria. I fear her more than ever. (Aside.)
Madam, be merry.

Mosby. Michael, some wine. Health and long life to Arden. (Drinks.)

Alicia. The good you wish, and have procur'd for Arden, (Rising.)

Light on thyself.

Maria. For heaven's sake!—

Alicia. Give me way. (Comes forward.)
Let them despatch, and send me to my husband:

(All rise.)

I've liv'd too long with falsehood and deceit.

(Knocking at the gate.)

A. Fowl. What noise is that? [Exit Michael.]

Brad. Pray heaven, that all be right.

Mosby. Bar all the doors.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. We are discover'd, sir. (To Mosby.)
The mayor, with officers and men in arms.

Enter Mayor, with Officers.

Mayor. Go you with these, and do as I directed. [Exeunt Officers and others.]
I'm sorry that the duty of my office
Demands a visit so unseasonable.

Mosby. Your worship, doubtless, were a welcome guest
At any hour; but wherefore thus attended?

Mayor. I have received a warrant from the council

To apprehend two most notorious ruffians;
And information being made on oath,
That they were seen to enter here to-night,
I'm come to search.

Green. I'm glad it is no worse. (Aside.)

Mosby. And can you think that Arden entertains

Villains like those you speak of? Were he here,
You'd not be thank'd for this officiousness.

Mayor. I know my duty, sir, and that respect,
So justly due to our good neighbour's worth.
But where is Arden?

Alicia. Heavens! where indeed!

Maria. Alicia, for my sake— (Aside.)

Alicia. If I were silent,
Each precious drop of murder'd Arden's blood
Would find a tongue, and cry to heaven for vengeance.

Mayor. What says the lady?

Mosby. Oh! sir, heed her not:

Her husband has not been at home to-night,
And her misboding sorrow for his absence,
Has almost made her frantic.

Mayor. Scarce an hour
Since I beheld him enter here with you.

Mosby. The darkness of the night deceiv'd you,
sir:

It was a stranger, since departed hence.

Mayor. That's most surprising. No man knows him better.

Frank. (Without.) Within there! ho! bar up your gates with care,
And set a watch. Let not a man go by;

Enter FRANKLIN and others, with lights.

And ev'ry tongue, that gave not its consent

To Arden's death, join mine and cry aloud
To heaven and earth for justice. Honest Arden,
My friend, is murder'd.

Mayor. Murder'd!

Green. How?

Mosby. By whom?

Frank. How shall I utter what my eyes have seen!

Horrid, with many a gaping wound, he lies
Behind the abbey, a sad spectacle!

O vengeance! vengeance!

Mayor. Justly art thou mov'd.

Passion is reason in a cause like this.

Frank. Eternal Providence, to whose bright eye

Darkness itself is as the noon-day blaze,
Who brings the midnight murd'rer and his deeds
To light and shame, has, in their own security, Found these.

Mayor. Here seize them all—this instant:

(Alicia faints.)

Look to the lady. This may be but feign'd.
Your charge but goes along with my suspicions.

Brad. And mine.

A. Fowl. And mine.

Frank. First hear me, and then judge,
Whether on slight presumptions I accuse them.
These honest men, (neighbours and townsmen
all,)

Conducted me, drooping with grief and fear,
To where the body lay; with them I took these notes,

Not to be trusted to the faithless memory:

"Huge clots of blood and some of Arden's hair
May still be seen upon the garden-wall;

Many such rushes as these floors are strew'd with,

Stick to his shoes and garments: and the prints
Of several feet may in the snow be trac'd,

From the stark body to the very door."

These are presumptions he was murder'd here,
And that th' assassins having borne his corse
Into the fields, hither return'd again.

Mosby. Are these your proofs?

Green. These are but circumstances,
And only prove thy malice.

Frank. And this scarf,
Known to be Arden's, in the court was found,
All blood.

Mayor. Search 'em.

Mich. I thought I'd thrown it down the well.

(Aside.)

Mayor. (To an Officer.) Enter that room, and search the lady there;

We may, perhaps, discover more.

(Officer goes out and re-enters; in the meantime, another Officer searches Mosby and Green.)

1 Officer. On Arden's wife I found this letter.

2 Officer. And I this ring on Mosby.

Mayor. Righteous heaven!

Well may'st thou hang thy head, detested villain:
This very day did Arden wear this ring;
I saw it on his hand.

Mosby. I freely yield me to my fate.

Enter another Officer.

Officer. We've seiz'd two men behind some stacks of wood.

Mayor. Well, bring 'em in.

BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG brought in.

They answer the description;
But let them wait till I have done with these.
Heav'ns! what a scene of villany is here.

(Having read the letter.)

B. Will. Since we're sure to die, though I could wish it were in better company, (for I hate that fawning rascal, Mosby,) I'll tell the truth for once. He has been long engaged in an affair with Arden's wife there; but fearing a discovery, and hoping to get into his estate, hired us to hide him. That's all.

Mayor. And you the horrid deed perform'd?

Shake. We did, with his assistance, and Green's and Michael's.

Mayor. This letter proves Alicia, from the first, Was made acquainted with your black design.

B. Will. I know nothing of that; but if she was, she repented of it afterwards. So, I think, you call that a change of mind.

Mayor. That may avail her at the bar of heav'n, But is no plea at our's.

Enter ALICIA, with Officers.

Bear them to prison;
Load them with irons, make them to feel their
guilt,

And groan away their miserable hours,
Till sentence of the law shall call them forth
To public execution.

Alicia. I adore
Th' unerring hand of justice; and with silence
Had yielded to my fate; but for this maid,

Who, as my soul dreads justice on her crimes,
Knew not, or e'er consented to this deed.

Mayor. But did she not consent to keep it secret?

Mosby. To save a brother and most wretched friend.

Mayor. She has undone herself; behold how innocence

May suffer in bad fellowship. And Bradshaw,
My honest neighbour, Bradshaw, too: I read it
With grief and wonder.

Brad. Madam, I appeal

To you, as you are shortly to appear
Before a judge that sees our secret thoughts,
Say, had I knowledge, or—

Alicia. You brought the letter,
But well I hope, you knew not the contents.

Mayor. Hence with them all, till time and further light

Shall clear these mysteries.

A. Fowl. If I'm condemn'd,
My blood be on his head that gives the sentence.
I'm not accus'd, and only ask for justice.

Frank. You shall all have justice, rig'rous justice.

So shall the growth of such enormous crimes,
By their dread fate be check'd in future times:

Of av'rice, Mosby a dread instance prove,
And poor Alicia of unlawful love. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter ETAN, meeting SELIM.

Etan. Selim, from whence? What station? From what post?

How stands the fate of China? Whence that tumult,
That mingled burst of horror and despair,
That rose to heav'n, as if the sound imported
The wreck of nature?

Selim. With too sure presage,
It speaks the fall of China: all who rush'd
With eager hope, this morning, to yon plains,
To learn the earliest tidings of their fate,
Now back recoil; they pour into the city;
Dismay and horror wild in ev'ry face!
Soon as they reach'd the gates, a peal of groans
Burst forth at once! then silence, deep and vast,
Ensued; and sorrow, without tongue or utterance,
Roams through each street; matrons and hoary sires,
All to their sev'ral habitations press,
Embrace their young ones, and, in pensive mood,
Await their final doom.

Etan. Then Timurkan
Has conquer'd; and that burst, that rent the skies,
Was the last gasp of freedom and of laws,
A dying nation's groan! This dead repose
Deepens the horror of the dreadful scene.
Where, Selim, is my father? Where is Zamti?

Selim. On the high rampart near the eastern gate,
But now I left him: from that post he views
The gen'ral panic; there beholds the ruin,
Th' inevitable ruin that surrounds us.
Amazement for awhile suppress'd his voice;
With folded arms he stood; then, with a sigh
His lab'ring bosom heav'd; at length, he cried,
The Tartar has prevail'd, and resignation
Is now the only virtue fate has left us.

Etan. To bow the neck to the fell Tartar's yoke,

Is that the resignation heav'n demands?
No; let us summon all that's left of valour,
Oppose the Tartar's entry, man the works,
And arm each hand for freedom. Timurkan
Will shrink and look dismay'd, when he beholds
That we have spirits here, who still can mock
His utmost rage, and, on the brink of ruin,
Snatch the still wav'ring, the unsettled victory
Ev'n from the conqueror's sword.

Selim. My friend, forbear;
This tow'ring spirit, this impetuous ardour,
Can nought avail; can only heap destruction
On thee, on Zamti, and that best of women,
Your wretched mother, the forlorn Mandane;
Whose ev'ry sentiment, whose ev'ry passion,
Big with the image of a much-lov'd son,
Still turns to thee; ev'n from her country's cause,
And our long line of kings, to thee she turns
With the strong ardour of maternal love.

Etan. Yes, Selim, yes; her tenderness of soul,
Ever awake, alarm'd, and prone to melt
For others' good, regardless of herself;
Starts and turns pale at every cloud that low'rs;
Sees fancied ills, and each sad moment proves
The strong vicissitude of hope and fear.
Be it thy care, my friend, to see Mandane;
Assuage her troubled spirit: in this hour,
This crisis of our fate, let her remain
Safe in her lone retreat: I'll round the walls,
And seek my father's presence; in his soul
My voice shall wake the patriot flame, and rouse
All that is hero in him. Selim, yes;
We'll dare for liberty, or bravely die. [Exit.]

Selim. Go, gen'rous youth; go, seek thy father's presence:
From him thou'lt learn how vain this swelling tide

Of desp'rate valour. Ha! Mandane comes,
And her looks speak the horror of the time.

Enter MANDANE and MIRVAN.

Man. No, never, Mirvan, never: urge no more;
'Tis vain, 'tis ineffectual. Gracious heav'n!
Will not this palace drench'd in gore, the crown
Of China's kings fix'd on the Tartar's brow;
Will not a tract of twenty years in bondage;
Ah! will not these suffice, without fresh cause
Of bitter anguish in Mandane's breast?

Mir. The measure of our woes has long been full.
Our kings dethron'd, our country laid in ruin;
Nought else is worth a pang.

Man. Yes, all; we all
Must feel the kindred touch: each day the cries
Of widows, orphans, father, son, and brother,
In vain are sent to heav'n; the ruthless fury
Of these barbarians, these accurs'd invaders,
Burns with increasing fire; the thunder still Roll's o'er our heads, engend'ring in its course
New flame, new vengeance, with collected wrath,
To burst at once, and bury us in ruin.

Mir. And quickly fall it must: the hand of heav'n
Weighs this great empire down.

Man. No; tax not heav'n!
Almighty justice never bares its arm
'Gainst innocence and truth: 'tis Timurkan,
That fell barbarian, that insatiate waster.
May curses blast the Tartar! He—'tis he
Has bore down all; and still his reeking sword,
In yonder field of death, where Corea's troops
Made their last stand for liberty and China,
Crimsons the land with blood. This battle lost!
And is there, then, no hope? The Tartar comes—
In triumph, said'st thou? From what quarter?
How?

Whence came the tidings?
Selim. From yon lofty tow'r,
As my eye straining toward the distant plain
Sent forth an anxious look, through clouds of dust
The savage bands appear'd; the western sun
Gleam'd on their burnish'd helms; and soon a shout
From their glad multitude proclaim'd th' approach
Of Timurkan: once more inflam'd with conquest
The tyrant comes; and soon, within our walls,
Uprears his conq'ring banner.

Man. Selim, go;
Again look out; gather the flying news,
And let me know each circumstance of ruin.

[Exit Selim.]

Mir. Better suppress those unavailing tears;
That fruitless flood of grief.

Man. It will not be;
Ev'n midst the horrors of this dismal hour,
When fate has all transferr'd from lost Cathai,
To vile barbarian hands; yes, even now,
In these black moments of despair and ruin,
This heart revolting from the public cause,
Bleeds from a private source; bleeds for the woes
That hang o'er Zamti's house.

Mir. Each sun that rises
Brings some new grief; and where our fate will stop,
Heav'n only knows.

Man. Ay, there—there lies the thought
At which imagination starts appall'd
With horror, at the scene her busy workings
Have colour'd to my sight; there lies the thought
That wakens all a mother's fears. Protect,
Ye pow'rs, protect my son!

Mir. Your son, Mandane!
Have you not check'd his ardour? with your tears,
Your soft authority, restrain'd the hero
From the alarms of war?

Man. Unconscious man!
Thou little know'st his danger; but that truth
Must never pass these lips.

Mir. I hope Mandane
Doubts not my honest zeal. Full well you know,
I bear this tyrant deep and mortal hate;

That under him I list, and wear this garb,
In hopes that some occasion may arrive
When I may strike the unexpected blow,
And do my country right.

Man. Thy loyalty,
Thy truth and honour, have been ever spotless.
Besides the wrongs, the countless wrongs, the wounds

He gave your injur'd family and name—

Mir. Alas! those wounds must still lie bleeding
here,

Untented by the hand of time. Not all
His lenient arts, his favours heap'd upon me,
Shall cool the burning anguish of my soul.
What he, who slew my father? dragg'd my sister,
Blooming in years, to his detested bed?
Yes, tyrant, yes; thy unextinguish'd foe
Dwells in this bosom: surely, then, to me
Mandane may reveal her griefs.

Man. No more.
My woes must rest conceal'd; yet, should the Tartar
Learn from the captives of yon vanquish'd host,
That China's orphan breathes the vital air,
And to himself unknown, within his breast,
Unconscious, bears the gen'rous glowing flame
Of all the virtues of his ancient line;
Oh! should they know that the dear youth survives,
Their fury, then, would kindle to a blaze;
Might spread destruction round; and, in the ruin,
My blameless son must perish.

Mir. Seek not thus
To multiply the ills that hover round you,
Nor from the stores of busy fancy add
New shafts to fortune's quiver. Zamti's care
Averts impending danger from his friends;
And o'er the mandarin his manners pure,
And sacred function, have diffus'd an air
Of venerable awe, which ev'n can teach
These northern foes to soften into men.

Man. Yes, Mirvan, yes; religion wears a mien
In Zamti's person so severely mild,
That the fierce Scythian rests upon his spear,
And wonders what he feels: such is the charm
Of heartfelt virtue; such is nature's force
That speaks abroad, and in rude, northern hearts
Can stamp the image of an awful God!
From that source springs some hope. Wretch that I am!

Hope idly flutters on my trembling tongue,
While melancholy, brooding o'er her wrongs,
Lays waste the mind with anguish and despair.
What noise is that?

Mir. Compose this storm of grief;
In every sound your fancy hears the Tartar.
'Tis Zamti this way bends.

Man. Celestial powers!
What lab'ring sighs heave in his breast! what horror
Rolls in the patriot's eye! Thou, Mirvan, leave me,
Leave me in those lov'd arms to meet our fate.

[Exit Mirvan.]

Enter ZAMTI.

Zamti!

Zamti. Mandane!

Man. Ah! what hast thou seen?
What heard? Say, quickly tell—has fate decreed
The doom of China?

Zamti. China is no more;
The eastern world is lost; the glorious fabric,
For ages that has stood the seat of empire,
Falls with the universe beneath the stroke
Of savage power; falls from its towering hopes,
For ever, ever fall'n!

Man. Yet why, ye powers,
Why should a tyrant, train'd to lust and murder,
A lawless ravager from barren wilds,
Where cheerful day ne'er dawns, but low'ring
heav'n
For ever rolls a turbulence of clouds;

Why should a monster thus usurp the world,
And trample fair integrity and truth
Beneath his ruffian feet?

Zamti. Far hence, Mandane,
Those happy days, alas! are fled, when peace
Here nurs'd her blooming olives, and shed round
Her fostering influence: in vain the plan
Of sacred laws, by hoary elders taught;
Laws, founded on the base of public weal,
Gave lessons to the world: in vain Confucius
Unlock'd his radiant stores of moral truth;
In vain fair science, and each tender muse,
Beam'd every elegance on polish'd life:
Barbarian power prevails. Whate'er the wise,
Whate'er the sons of genius could inspire,
All that bright art could give, must fade away,
And every virtue wither at the blast
Of northern domination.

Man. Fatal hour!
More fatal ev'n than that which first beheld
This race accurst within these palace walls;
Since hope, that balm of wretched minds, is now
Irrevocably lost.

Zamti. Name not the day
Which saw this city sack'd: fresh stream my eyes,
Fresh bleeds my heart, whene'er the sad idea
Comes o'er my tortur'd mind. Why, cruel powers,
Why, in that moment, could not Zamti fall?

Man. Thy office, and the symbol of thy god,
Made ev'n the conqueror suspend his blow,
And murmur soft humanity. High heaven
Protected thee for its own great designs.

Zamti. Yes, my Mandane, in that hour of carnage,
For purposes yet in the womb of time,
I was reserv'd; I was ordain'd to save
The royal child, the dear, the precious babe,
The last of all my kings. Full twenty years
I've hid him from the world, and from himself;
And now I swear—kneel we together here,
While in this dreadful pause our souls renew
Their solemn purpose. (They kneel.) Thou, all-gracious Being!

Whose tutelary care hath watch'd the fate
Of China's orphan, who hast taught his steps
The paths of safety, still envelop him
In sevenfold night, till your own hour is come,
Till your slow justice see the dread occasion
To rouse his soul, and bid him walk abroad
Vicegerent of your power; and if thy servant,
Or this his soft associate e'er defeat,
By any word or deed, the great design,
Then straight may all your horrible displeasure
Be launch'd upon us from your red right arm,
And in one ruin dash us both together,
The blasted monuments of wrath.

Man. That here,
Mandane vows ne'er to betray his cause,
Be it enroll'd in the records of heaven. (They rise.)

Zamti. And now my heart more lightly beats;
methinks,
With strength redoubled I can meet the shock
Of adverse fate.

Man. And, lo! the trial comes.
Etan, why sudden thus—

Re-enter ETAN.

Etan. My honour'd father,
And you, my helpless mother, ah! where now,
Illustrious, wretched pair, where will you fly?
Where shall your miseries now find a shelter?

Zamti. In virtue. I and this dear, faithful woman,
We ask no more.

Man. Oh! say, what new event
Brings on the work of fate?

Zamti. Say, does the Tartar
Return, unglutted yet with blood?

Etan. He does.
Ev'n now his triumph moves within our gates,
In dread barbaric pomp: the iron swarms

Of Hyperboreans troop along the streets,
Reeking from slaughter; while, from gazing crowds
Of their dire countrymen, an uproar wild,
Of joy ferocious, through th' astonish'd air
Howls like a northern tempest. O'er the ranks,
Proud in superior eminence of guilt,
The tyrant rides sublime; behind his car,
The refuse of his sword, a captive train
Display their honest scars, and gnash their teeth
With rage and desperation.

Man. Cruel fate!

Etan. With these a youth, distinguish'd from the rest,
Proceeds in sullen march: heroic fire
Glow in his cheek, and from his ardent eye
Beams amiable horror.

Man. What of this youth?

Zamti. Be not alarm'd, Mandane. What of him?

Etan. On him all eyes are fix'd with eager gaze,
As if their spirits, struggling to come forth,
Would strain each visual nerve; while through the crowd

A busy murmur ran—"If fame say right,
Beneath that habit lurks a prince, the last
Of China's race." The murmur spreads abroad
From man to man, and all with one acclaim,
Pronounce their vengeance on him.

Man. Why on him?

Why on that youth?

Zamti. Ye groundless terrors, hence! (Aside.)

Etan. And yet, my father, this heroic youth—
Oh! should he be the prince—

Zamti. Forbear, young man,
Nor yield to vain surmise: withdraw thee hence
To the religious grove, where oft I walk
In pensive solitude: I there will meet thee.

[Exit Etan.]

Heavens! how each black'ning hour, in deeper horror,
Comes charg'd with woe!

Man. Can Hamet be their pris'ner?
Those eyes upturn'd to heav'n, alas! in vain,
Declare your inward conflict.

Zamti. Lov'd Mandane!
Heed not the workings of a sickly fancy,
Wrought on by every popular report.
Thou know'st, with Morat, I convey'd our son
Far as the eastern point of Corea's realm;
There, where no human trace is seen, no sound
Assails the ear, save when the foaming surge
Breaks on the shelving beach, that there your boy Might mock their busy search; while here the prince,

Train'd as your own, eludes suspicion's eye.

Re-enter ETAN.

What wouldst thou, Etan?

Etan. Eagerly without,
A rev'rend stranger craves access to Zamti.

Zamti. Give him admittance. [Exit Etan.] My Mandane, leave me;

Retire, my love, awhile; I'll come anon,
And fortify thy soul with firm resolve,
Becoming Zamti's wife.

Man. Yes, Zamti's wife
Shall never act unworthy of her lord.
Then hence I'll go, and satisfy each doubt
This youthful captive raises in my heart,
Quick panting with its fears. And, oh! ye powers!
Protect my king, my husband, and my son. [Exit.]

Zamti. My spirits rush tumultuous to my heart.
What may this mean?

Enter MORAT.

Morat. Zamti!

Zamti. Ha! through the veil
Of age—that mien, those features—Morat!

Morat. Yes;
Let me once more embrace thee.

Zamti. Good old man!

But wherefore art thou here? What of my boy?

Morat. Ah! what, indeed! Ev'n from the ocean's margin,

Parch'd with the sun, and chill'd with midnight damps,

O'er hills, and rocks, and dreary continents,
In vain I follow'd.

Zamti. Why didst let him forth?

Morat. Think not thy Morat urg'd him to the deed,

His valour was the cause; and soon as fame
Proclaim'd the prince alive, the mighty din
Of preparation through all Corea's realm
Alarm'd his breast; indignant of control,
He burst his covert; and, now, hapless youth!
Alas! ev'n now, he drags the conqueror's chain.

Zamti. Mandane, then, may still embrace her son.
My boy survives, and still may live in freedom.

Morat. Alas! the measure of your woes is full.
Unconscious of our frauds, the tyrant thinks
The prince his pris'ner.

Zamti. Ah! what say'st thou, Morat?

Morat. Wild through the streets the foe calls out on Zamti.

Thee they pronounce the author of the fraud;
And on your Hamet threaten instant vengeance.

Zamti. There was but this, but this last stab to nature,

And here it pierces. Was it not enough
To tear my child from his fond mother's arms,
Doom'd for his prince to wander o'er the world?
Alas! what needed more? Fond, foolish eyes,
Stop your unbidden gush: I will not yield.
Oh! what a sacrifice must now be made!

Morat. But when the truth is known—

Zamti. Too cruel task!

To conquer nature while the heart-strings break.

Morat. Why heave those sighs? and why that burst of grief?

Zamti. My son—his guiltless blood—I cannot speak.

Morat. Ha! wilt thou shed his blood?

Zamti. Thou wretched father!

Morat. Oh! had you known the virtues of your son,

His truth, his courage, his enlighten'd mind—

Zamti. I prythee, urge no more: here nature's voice

Speaks in such pleadings, such reproaches, Morat;
Here in my very heart; gives woundings here,
Thou canst not know, and only parents feel.

Morat. And wilt thou, cruel in thy tears—

Zamti. Forbear!

In pity to a father—Oh, forbear!
Think of Zaphimri.

Morat. Ah! how fares the prince?

Zamti. He fares, my Morat, like a god on earth,
Unknowing his celestial origin;
Yet quick, intense, and bursting into action;
His great heart lab'ring with he knows not what Prodigious deeds; deeds which, ere long, shall rouse,

Astonish, and alarm the world.

Morat. What means

Those mystic sounds?

Zamti. Revenge, conquest, and freedom!
The midnight hour shall call a chosen band
Of hidden patriots forth; who, when the foe
Sinks down in drunken revelry, shall pour
The gather'd rage of twenty years upon him;
And, at one blow, redeem the eastern world.

Morat. By heaven! the glorious news—

Zamti. And canst thou think,

To save one vulgar life, that Zamti now
Will mar the vast design? No, let him bleed;
Let my boy bleed! In such a cause as ours,
I can resign my son; with tears of joy
Resign him; and one complicated pang

Shall wrench him from my heart.

(Warlike music heard.)

The conqueror comes!

This is no hour for parleying. Morat, hence,
And leave me to my fix'd resolve.

Morat. Yet think,

Think of some means to save your son.

Zamti. No more;

It cannot be: the soul of Timurkan
Is bold and stirring: when occasion calls,
He springs aloft like an expanding fire,
And marks his way with ruin. Should I try
By any virtuous fraud to save my son,
The tyrant claims Zaphimri; since he knows
The prince survives, the thought will make him daring

Beyond his former crimes; for joy and riot,
Which this day's triumph brings, remorseless rage
And massacre succeed; and all our hopes
Are blasted for an unimportant boy.

(Music heard again.)

Morat. That nearer sound proclaims his dread approach.

Yet once more, Zamti, think—

Zamti. Farewell! I'll send
Those shall conduct thee where Orasming lives:
There dwell unseen of all. But, Morat, first Seek my Mandane. How shall I support
Her strong impetuosity of grief,
When she shall know my fatal purpose? Thou
Prepare her tender spirit; sooth her mind;
And save, oh! save me from the dreadful conflict.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter MANDANE and MORAT.

Man. Oh! tell me, Morat, tell me of my son.
Is he return'd? Does he revisit thus
His native clime? And does the Tartar deem him
Of royal race descended? Whence on him
Could that suspicion glance?

Morat. This very morn,
Ere yet the battle join'd, a faithful messenger,
Who through the friendly gloom of night had held
His darkling way, and pass'd the Tartar's camp,
Brought me advices from the Corean chief,
That soon as Hamet reach'd the tented field,
His story he explain'd; the gallant leader
With open arms receiv'd him, knew him for your son,

Train'd him to arms, and granted his request
To join the martial train.

Man. Oh! love of glory,
Thou fatal foe to a fond mother's peace!
Source of heroic deeds! how bright thy flame
Shines in my boy!

Morat. Pleas'd with his youthful ardour,
The cautious chieftain knew the son of Zamti,
In secret knew him, nor reveal'd he aught
That touch'd his birth; but still the busy voice
Of fame, increasing as she goes, through all the ranks

Babbled abroad each circumstance; from thee
How he was privately convey'd; sent forth
A tender infant to be rear'd in solitude,
A stranger to himself. The soldier saw
With what a graceful port he mov'd in arms,
An early hero! deem'd him far above
The common lot of life; deem'd him Zaphimri;
And all with loyalty, with love beheld him.

Man. Oh! I must see him; midst the tyrant's
ranks

I'll seek my son: from all his father's virtues
He could not derogate; his bosom fraught
With gen'rous instinct, with each fine incentive
That prompts the manly deed, he could not loiter
His days inglorious. Yes, I will behold him,
See him with indignation clank his chains,

Perhaps provoke his fate; and, in that moment,
His mother shall protect him; in these arms
Infold him close, and shelter him from death.

Morat. Yet think, Mandane, with a mother's fondness,

If you too rashly thus proclaim your son,
Who shall protect the prince? Zaphimri, then,
By thee is mark'd the victim that must bleed.

Man. My son shall live. To save Zaphimri's life,
Is it of course that I must yield my child?

Thou didst not mean it: give my son a victim?
Thou art a stranger to a mother's love;
Know'st not how Zamti dotes upon his boy;
His heart will ne'er consent. Come, let us seek him;
He will instruct thee how a father feels. [Exit.]

Morat. Yet, stay, Mandane—hark! the Tartar comes: (Warlike music heard.)

I dread the wildness of those glowing passions,
That violence of virtue: strong affection
Has touch'd her soul, and will not know restraint.
[Exit.]

Two large folding doors in the back scene are thrown open by the Tartars; then enter TIMURKAN, with his Train.

Tim. Hail to this regal dome, this gorgeous palace!

Where this inventive race have lavish'd all
Their elegance: ye gay apartments, hail!
Beneath your storied roof, where mimic life
Glow to the eye, and at the painter's touch,
A new creation lives along the walls,
Once more receive a conqueror, arriv'd
From rougher scenes, where stern rebellion dar'd
Draw forth his phalanx, till this warlike arm
Hurl'd desolation on his falling ranks;
And now the monster, in yon field of death,
Lies overwhelm'd in ruin.

Octar. From this day,
Beneath the victor's feet, the eastern world
Lies bound in adamantine chains.

Tim. Henceforth
Shall Timurkan display his conqu'ring banners
From oriental climes to where the Tanais
Devolves his icy tribute to the sea.

Octar. But first, this captive prince—

Tim. Yes, Octar, first
Zaphimri gluts my rage—bring him before us:
For Zamti—he, that false, insidious slave,
Shall dearly pay the forfeit of his crimes.

Octar. His guilt 'twere best to pardon: vers'd in wiles

Of sly hypocrisy, he wins the love
Of the deluded multitude: 'twould seem,
Should we inflict the death his frauds deserve,
As if we meant destruction to their faith;
And when the minds of a whole people burn
For their religious rites, the fury kindles
With rage more dreadful, as the source is holy.

Tim. Thy policy is just: henceforth, my art,
To make this stubborn race receive the yoke,
Shall be by yielding to their softer manners,
Their vesture, laws, and customs; thus to blend,
And make the whole one undistinguish'd people.
Lo! where the boy comes forth. What sullen passions
Swell in his breast in vain!

Enter HAMET, in chains.

Thou art the youth
Who flesh'd your sword in many a slaughter'd Tartar,
And this day mow'd our battle down.

Hamet. I am.

Tim. Too well I mark'd thy steps, and saw thee open

A wasteful passage through th' embattled plain.

Hamet. Then be thou witness for me, in that hour
I never shunn'd your thickest war: and if
In yonder field, where my poor countrymen

In mangled heaps lie many a rood extended,
Kind fate had doom'd me to a noble fall,
With this right arm I earn'd it.

Tim. Say, what motive
Unsheath'd thy rebel blade, and bade thee seek
These wars?

Hamet. The love of honourable deeds,
The groans of bleeding China, and the hate
Of tyrants.

Tim. Ha! take heed, rash youth! I see
This lesson has been taught thee. Octar, haste,
Summon the mandarin. Now tremble, slave;
[Exit Octar.]

Thy motive to these wars is fully known:
Thou art Zaphimri.

Hamet. I, Zaphimri?

Tim. Yes;
Thou art Zaphimri! Thou, whose treacherous guile

Stole from my rage, and sent to distant wilds,
Till years and horrid counsel should mature thee
For war and wild commotion.

Hamet. I, the prince?
The last of China's race? nay, mock not majesty;
Nor with the borrow'd robes of sacred kings
Dress up a wretch like me. Were I Zaphimri, Thinkest thou thy trembling eye could bear the shock

Of a much injur'd king? couldst thou sustain it?
Say, couldst thou bear to view a royal orphan,
Whose father, mother, brothers, sisters, all,
Thy murd'rous arm hath long since laid in dust?
Whose native crown on thy ignoble brow
Thou dar'st dishonour? whose wide wasted country
Thy desolating sword hath made a wilderness?

Tim. Thou hast been tutor'd in thy lone retreat
By some sententious pedant; soon these vain,
These turgid maxims, shall be all subdued
By thy approaching death.

Hamet. Let death come on;
Guilt, guilt alone, shrinks back appall'd; the brave
And honest still defy his dart; the wise
Calmly can eye his frown; and misery
Invokes his friendly aid to end her woes.

Tim. Thy woes, presumptuous boy, with all my fears,
Shall soon lie buried.

Enter ZAMTI and OCTAR.

Pious false one, say,
For well thou know'st, who is that stubborn youth?
Zamti. His air, his features, and his honest mien,
Proclaim all fair within; but, mighty sir,
I know him not.

Tim. Reflect, old man, nor dare,
As thou dost dread my pow'r, to practise guile
Beneath a mask of sacerdotal perfidy.
Priestcraft, I think, calls it a pious fraud.

Zamti. Priestcraft and sacerdotal perfidy
To me are yet unknown: religion's garb
Here never serves to consecrate a crime;
We have not yet, thank heav'n, so far imbib'd
The vices of the north.

Tim. Thou vile impostor!
Know, that the slaves, whom this day saw impal'd,
Have own'd the horrid truth; have own'd they fought

To seat Zaphimri on the throne of China.
Thou, stripling, mark my words: dar'st thou be honest,

And answer who thou art?

Hamet. Dare I be honest?
I dare. A mind grown up in native honour
Dares not be otherwise. If, then, thy troops
Ask from the lightning of whose blade they fled,
Tell 'em 'twas Hamet's.

Zamti. 'Tis; it is my son—

My boy—my Hamet!

Tim. Where was thy abode?

(Aside.)

Hamet. Far hience remote, in Corea's happy realm,
Where the first beams of day with orient blushes
Tinge the salt wave; there, on the sea-beat shore,
A cavern'd rock yielded a lone retreat
To virtuous Morat.

Zamti. Oh! ill-fated youth! (Aside.)

Hamet. The pious hermit, in that moss-grown dwelling,
Found an asylum from heart-piercing woes,
From slavery, and that restless din of arms,
With which thy fell ambition shook the world;
There, too, the sage nurtur'd my greener years.
With him, and contemplation, have I walk'd
The paths of wisdom; what the great Confucius
Of moral beauty taught; whate'er the wise,
Still wooing knowledge in her secret haunts,
Disclos'd of nature to the sons of men,
My wond'ring mind has heard; but, above all,
The hermit taught me the most useful science,
The noble science to be brave and good.

Zamti. Hear him, immortal pow'rs! His ev'ry word
Pierces my heart. (Aside.)

Tim. Who said he was your father?

Hamet. My birth, the pious sage, I know not why,
Still wrapp'd in silence; and when urg'd to speak,
He only answer'd, that a time might come
When Hamet should not blush to know his father.

Tim. Now, then, declare, hast thou ne'er heard of Zamti?

Hamet. Of Zamti! Oft enraptur'd with his name,
My heart has glow'd within me, as I heard
The praises of that venerable man.

Tim. Thou slave! each circumstance arraigns thy guilt. (To Zamti.)

Hamet. Can that be Zamti?

Tim. Lo! Behold the traitor!

Hamet. Oh! let me thus adore that rev'rend form,
Thus, on my knees, adore.

Tim. Pernicious slave!
Confusion has o'erta'en thy subtle frauds,
Thy guilt is manifest. Now own your king;
Or, to make vengeance sure, through all the east
Each youth shall die, and carnage thin mankind;
Till, in the gen'ral wreck, your boasted orphan
Shall undistinguish'd fall. When treason lurks,
Each moment's big with danger. Ocar, thou
Attend my words, and see our will obey'd.

(Talks apart with Ocar.)

Zamti. Now, virtuous cruelty, repress my tears.
Cease your fond conflict, nature! Hear me, Tartar,
That youth—his air—his look unmans me quite.

Tim. This moment, vile dissembler! speak.

Zamti. That youth—
I've dealt by him as ev'ry king would wish,
In a like case, his faithful subjects would.

Tim. Dost thou avow it? triumph, Timurkan,
And in Zaphimri's grave lie hush'd my fears.
Ocar, this moment lead the victim forth
To yonder sacred temple: at the tomb,
Where the long-boasted line of China's kings
Lies hears'd in death, this very hour shall see
The victim offer'd to our living Lama,
For this day's conquest. Thence, a golden train
Of radiant years shall mark my future sway. [Exit.]

Zamti. Flow, flow my tears, and ease my bursting heart.

Hamet. Nay, do not weep for me, thou good old man.

If it will close the wounds of bleeding China,
That a poor wretch like me must yield his life,
I give it freely. If I am a king,
Though, sure, it cannot be, what greater blessing
Can a young prince enjoy, than to diffuse
By one great act that happiness on millions,
For which his life should be a round of care?
Come, lead me to my fate. [Exit, with Ocar, &c.]

Zamti. Mandane's air!

His mother's dear resemblance rives my soul.
Yet let him die: yes, Tartar, wreak thy fury
Upon an helpless, an inglorious boy.
If, from his death, this groaning empire rise
Once more itself, resplendent, rich in arts
That humanize the world, he pays a debt
Due to his king, his country, and his God.

Enter ETAN.

Etan. May I approach my father? Even now
I met the captive youth; the gen'ral voice,
With one consent, proclaim him China's orphan;
And you, sir, you have own'd th' important truth.

Zamti. Come nearer, Etan: thou perceiv'st the toils
That now encircle me.

Etan. But, wherefore, sir,
Why thus acknowledge him? why own the prince,
And yield him thus to death?

Zamti. Dream not, young man,
To stand secure, yet blooming into life,
While dangers hover round your father's head.
The stock once fallen, each scion must decay.

Etan. Then let me perish: witness for me, heaven,
Could Etan's fall appease the tyrant's wrath,
A willing victim he would yield his life,
And ask no greater boon of heav'n.

Zamti. This zeal,
So fervid in a stranger's cause—

Etan. A stranger!
My king a stranger! Sir, you never meant it.
Perhaps you would explore the fiery seeds
Of Etan's temper, ever prompt to blaze
At honour's sacred name? Perish the man,
Who, when his country calls him to defend
The rights of humankind, or bravely die,
Who, then, to glory dead, can shrink aghast,
And hold a council with his abject fears.

Zamti. These tow'rings of the soul, alas! are vain.

I know the Tartar well: we must resign.

Etan. Oh! sir, at your command each honest hand

Will grasp a sword, and midst encircling guards,
Reach the usurper's heart; or, should we fail,
Should overwhelming bands obstruct the deed,
We'll greatly dare to die; better to die
With falling liberty, than basely lead
An ignominious life. Zaphimri lost,
Ne'er shall fair order dawn; but through the land
Slav'ry shall clank her chains, and violation,
Rapine, and murder, riot at the will
Of lust and lawless pow'r.

Zamti. Thou brave young man!
Come to this fond embrace. To ease at once
Thy gen'rous fears—the prince Zaphimri's safe,
Safe in my guardian care.

Etan. This pris'ner, sir,
He is not, then, the prince?

Zamti. Obscure by birth,
He is no public loss.

Etan. And yet his youth,
And his untimely fate, plead strongly for him.
And then, methinks, (perhaps, 'tis fancy's error,)
Methinks he bears a semblance of Mandane.

Zamti. His words transfix my heart. (Aside.)

Etan. And where, meantime,
Where is the royal heir? If right I judge,
He will not tamely see a blameless youth
A victim in his cause.

Zamti. Seek not too soon
To know the prince: now I'll disclose the work,
The work of vengeance, which my lab'ring soul
Has long been fashioning. This very hour,
Stupendous ruin hovers o'er the heads
Of this accursed race.

Etan. Ruin!

Zamti. I'll tell thee:

When Timurkan led forth his savage bands,
Unpeopling this great city, I then seiz'd
The hour to tamper with a chosen few;
Who have resolv'd when the barbarians lie
Buried in sleep and wine, and hotly dream
Their havoc o'er again; then, then, my son,
In one collected blow to burst upon 'em,
Like their own northern clouds, whose midnight
horror,

Impending o'er the world, at length breaks forth
In the vaunt lightning's blaze, in storms and thunder,
Through all the red'ning air, till frightened nature
Start from her couch, and waken to a scene
Of uproar and destruction.

Etan. Oh! my father,
The glorious enterprise—

Zamti. Mark me, young man.
Seek thou my friends, Orasming and Zimventi.
In the dim cloister of yon temple
Thou'lt find them musing; bid them ne'er abate
Their high, heroic ardour; let them know
Whate'er shall fall on this old mould'ring clay,
The tyrant never shall subdue my mind.

Man. (Within.) Oh! let me fly, and find the barb'rous man.

Where, where is Zamti?

Zamti. Ha! Mandane's voice!
Go, leave me, Etan, and observe my orders.

[Exit Etan.

Wild as the winds, the mother all alive
In ev'ry heartstring, the forlorn one comes
To claim her boy.

Re-enter MANDANE.

Man. And can it, then, be true?
Is human nature exil'd from thy breast?
Art thou, indeed, so barb'rous?

Zamti. Lov'd Mandane,
Fix not your scorpions here: a bearded shaft
Already drinks my spirits up.

Man. I've seen
Thy trusty Morat—I have heard it all.

Zamti. I cannot speak to thee.

Man. Think'st thou those tears,
Those false, those cruel tears, will choke the voice
Of a fond mother's love, now stung to madness?
Oh! I will rend the air with lamentations,
Root up this hair, and beat this throbbing breast;
Turn all connubial joys to bitterness,
To fell despair, to anguish and remorse,
Unless my son—

Zamti. Thou ever faithful woman,
Oh! leave me to my woes.

Man. Give me my child;
Thou worse than Tartar, give me back my son.
Oh! give him to a mother's eager arms,
And let me strain him to my heart.

Zamti. Heav'n knows
How dear my boy is here: but our first duty
Now claims observance: to our country's love
All other tender fondnesses must yield.
I was a subject, ere I was a father.

Man. You were a savage, bred in Scythian wilds,
And humanizing pity never reach'd
Your heart. Was it for this, oh! thou unkind one!
Was it for this, oh! thou inhuman father!
For this you woo'd me to your nuptial bed?
For this I clasp'd thee in these circling arms,
And made this breast your pillow? Cruel, say,
Are these your vows? are these your fond endear-
ments?

Nay, look upon me; if this wasted form,
These faded eyes, have turn'd your heart against
me,

With grief for you I wither'd in my bloom.

Zamti. Why thus transfix my heart?

Man. Alas! my son,
Did I then fold thee in these matron arms
To see thee bleed? Thus dost thou, then, return?
This could your mother hope, when first she sent

Her infant exile to a distant clime?
Ah! could I think thy early love of fame
Would urge thee to this peril; thus to fall
By a stern father's will? By thee to die!
From thee, inhuman, to receive his doom!
Murder'd by thee! Yet, hear me, Zamti, hear me;
Thus, on my knees—I threaten now no more—
'Tis nature's voice that pleads; nature alarm'd,
Quick, trembling, wild, touch'd to her inmost
feeling,

When force would tear her tender young ones from her.

Zamti. Oh! seek not with enfeebling, fond ideas
To swell the flood of grief. It is in vain:
He must submit to fate.

Man. (Rising.) Barbarian, no;
He shall not die: rather—I pr'y thee, Zamti,
Urge not a grief-distracted woman; tremble
At the wild fury of a mother's love.

Zamti. I tremble rather at a breach of oaths.
But thou break thine; bathe your perfidious hands
In this life-blood; betray the righteous cause
Of all our sacred kings.

Man. Our sacred kings!
What are the scepter'd rulers of the world?
Form'd of one common clay, are they not all
Doom'd with each subject, with the meanest slave,
To drink the cup of human woe? alike
All levell'd by affliction? Sacred kings!
'Tis human policy sets up their claim:
Mine is a mother's cause; yes, mine the cause
Of husband, wife, and child, those first of ties,
Superior to your right divine of kings.

Zamti. Then go, Mandane, thou once faithful woman,
Dear to this heart in vain. Forget at once
Those virtuous lessons which I oft have taught
thee,

In fond credulity, while on each word
You hung enamour'd: go; to Timurkan
Reveal the awful truth; be thou spectatress
Of murder'd majesty; embrace your son,
And let him lead, in shame and servitude,
A life ignobly bought. Then let those eyes,
Those faded eyes, which grief for me hath dimm'd,
With guilty joy reanimate their lustre,
To brighten slavery, and beam their fires
On the fell Scythian murderer.

Man. And is it thus,
Thus is Mandane known? Come, lead me hence,
Where I may lay down life to save my king,
But save my Hamet too; then, then you'll find
A heart beats here as warm and great as thine.

Zamti. Then make with me one ever-glorious effort,
And rank with those, who, from the first of time,
In fame's eternal archives stand rever'd,
For conqu'ring all the dearest ties of nature,
To serve the gen'ral weal.

Man. That savage virtue
Loses with me its horrid charms. I've sworn
To save my king; but should a mother turn
A dire assassin? Madness, at the thought, Shoots through my brain. And, look, they seize my child;

They lead him forth; they fix him on the rack;
His father—see—forbear—his father strikes—
Hold, Zamti, hold—ah! see—he dies—he dies!
(Faints in his arms.)

Zamti. She faints, she faints! th' impetuous storm of passion,
Shakes her weak frame.

Enter an Attendant.

Quickly, Arsace, help,
Support her; lend your aid. Soft! wand'ring life
Rekindles in her cheek. Conduct her hence.

[Exeunt Mandane and Attendant.

Propitious heaven! behold a father's sufferings;
Support our frailty; kindle in our souls

A ray of your divine enthusiasm,
Such as inflames the patriot's breast, and lifts
Th' impassion'd mind to that sublime of virtue,
That even on the rack it feels the good,
Which, in a single hour, it works for millions,
And leaves the legacy to times unborn. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Temple. A tomb in the middle.Enter MORAT.

Morat. This is the place, these the long-winding isles,
The solemn arches, whose religious awe
Attunes the mind to melancholy musing,
Such as befits freemen reduc'd to bondage.
Here Zamti meets his friends; amid these tombs,
Where lie the sacred manes of our kings,
They pour their orisons; hold converse here
With the illustrious shades of murder'd heroes,
And meditate a great revenge. A groan!
The burst of sorrow from some care-worn wretch,
That sorrows o'er his country. Ha! 'tis Zamti.

Enter ZAMTI from the tomb.

Zamti. Who's he that seeks these mansions of the dead?

Morat. The friend of Zamti and of China!

Zamti. Morat!

Come to my arms, thou brave, thou gen'rous man!
I have been weeping o'er the sacred relics
Of a dear murder'd king. Where are our friends?
Hast seen Orasming?

Morat. Through these vaults of death
Lonely he wanders, plung'd in deep despair.

Zamti. Hast thou inform'd him? Hast thou aught reveal'd
Touching Zaphimri?

Morat. There I wait thy will.

Zamti. Oh! thou art ever faithful: on thy lips
Sits pensive silence, with her hallow'd finger,
Guarding the pure recesses of the mind.
But, lo! they come.

Enter ORASMING, ZIMVENTI, and others.

Droop ye, my gallant friends?

Oras. Oh! Zamti, all is lost; our dreams of liberty
Are vanish'd into air. Ev'n heaven, combined
With lawless might, abandons us and virtue.

Zamti. Can your great souls thus shrink within ye? thus
From heroes will you dwindle into slaves?

Zim. Oh! could you give us back the royal orphan;

Danger would smile, and death lose all its terror.

Zamti. What, would his presence fire you?

Oras. Yes, by heav'n!

This night should free us from the Tartar's yoke.

Zamti. Then mark the care of the all-ruling mind.
This youthful captive, whom in chains they hold,
Is not Zaphimri.

Oras. and Zim. Not Zaphimri?

Zamti. No;

Unconscious of himself, and to the world unknown,
He walks at large among us.

Oras. Heavenly powers!

Zamti. This night, my friend, this very night to rise

Refulgent from the blow that frees us all,
From the usurper's fate, the first of men,
Deliv'rer of his country.

Oras. Mighty gods!

Can this be possible?

Zamti. It is most true.

This very hour shall give you China's heir.

What, ho! (looks at the tomb) come forth: 'tis
Zamti's voice that calls.

You seem transfix'd with wonder! Oh! my friends,
Watch all the motions of your rising spirit,
Direct your ardour, when anon you hear

What fate, long pregnant with the vast event,
Is lab'ring into birth.

Enter ETAN from the tomb.

Etan. Each step I move,
A deeper horror sits on all the tombs;
The shrines look pale around; each altar shakes,
Conscious of some important crisis.

Zamti. Yes,

A crisis, great indeed, is now at hand.
Heaven holds its golden balance forth, and weighs Zaphimri's and the Tartar's destiny,
While hov'ring angels tremble round the beam.
Hast thou beheld that picture?

Etan. Fix'd attention

Hath gaz'd on every part; yet still to me
It shadows forth the forms of things unknown,
All imag'ry obscure, and wrapt in darkness.

Zamti. That darkness my informing breath shall clear,

As morn dispels the night. Lo! here display'd
This mighty kingdom's fall. Behold that child,
That royal infant, the last sacred relic
Of China's kings: see where a mandarin
Conveys the babe to his wife's fost'ring breast,
There to be nourish'd in an humble state;
While their own son is sent to climes remote,
That, should the fell usurper e'er suspect
The prince alive, he for his king might bleed,
And mock the murd'ers rage.

Etan. Amazement thrills

Through all my frame; and my mind, big with wonder,

Feels every power suspended.

Zamti. Rather say,

That strong imagination burns within thee.
Dost thou not feel a more than common ardour?

Etan. By heav'n! some impulse never felt before,

Some strange inspir'd emotion stirs within me;
A thousand images all rise at once,
And o'er-inform my soul. Oh! that the hour
Of fate were come. This very night I'll sheathe
My dagger's point deep in the tyrant's heart.

Zamti. Wilt thou?

Etan. By ev'ry pow'r that now beholds me;
By all the mighty dead that round us lie;
By all, who this day groan in chains, I will!

Zamti. And when thou dost, tell the devoted tyrant,

It is the prince that strikes.

Etan. The prince's wrongs

Shall nerve my arm, and urge the blow for freedom

With tenfold vengeance.

Zamti. Tell the groaning Tartar,

It is Zaphimri: 'tis the prince himself.

Etan. What says my father?

Zamti. Thou art China's orphan;
The last of all our kings; no longer Etan,
But now Zaphimri.

Zaph. Ha!

Oras. Mysterious hand

Of wonder-working heav'n!

Zaph. Can this be true?

A busy crowd of circumstances rise;
Thy frequent hints obscure, thy pious care
To train my youth to greatness, lend your aid
To my astonish'd pow'rs, that feebly bear
This unexpected shock of royalty.

Zamti. Thou art, thou art my sov'reign. Oh!
my friends,

Morat will tell you all; each circumstance;
Meantime, lo! there, behold—there is your king.

Morat. Oras. and Zim. Long live the father of the eastern world! (All kneel.)

Zamti. Sole governor of earth!

Zaph. All ruling pow'rs!

Is then a great revenge for all the wrongs
Of bleeding China; are the fame and fate

Of all posterity included here
Within my bosom?

Zamti. All; yes, all; the shades
Of your great ancestors now rise before thee,
Heroes and demi-gods! aloud they call
For the fell Tartar's blood.

Zaph. Oh! Zamti, all
That can alarm the pow'rs of man, now stirs
In this expanding breast.

Zamti. Anon, to burst
With hideous ruin on the foe. My gallant heroes,
Are our friends station'd at their posts?

Oras. They are.

Zamti. Each gate secur'd?

Oras. All safe.

Zamti. The signal fix'd?

Oras. It is. Will Mirvan join us?

Zamti. Doubt him not;

He pants for vengeance: when the assault begins,
He'll turn his arms upon th' astonish'd foe,
And add new horrors to the wild commotion.

Zaph. Now, bloody spoiler, now thy hour draws nigh;

And, ere the dawn, thy guilty reign shall end.

Zamti. How my heart burns within me! Oh!
my friends,

Call now to mind the scene of desolation,
Which Timurkan, in one accursed hour,
Heap'd on this groaning land. Ev'n now I see
The savage bands, o'er purple heaps of slain,
Forcing their rapid way: I see them urge,
With rage unhallow'd, to the sacred temple,
Where good Osmingt, with his queen and children,
Fatigu'd the gods averse. See where Orphisa,
Rending the air with agonizing shrieks,
Tears her dishevell'd hair; then, with a look
Fix'd on her babes, grief chokes its passage up,
And all the feelings of a mother's breast
Throbbing in one mix'd pang, breathless she faints
Within her monarch's arms; adown his cheek,
In copious streams, fast flow'd the manly sorrow;
While clust'ring round his knees, his little offspring,
In tears all-eloquent, with arms outstretch'd,
Sue for parental aid.

Zaph. Go on; the tale
Will fit me for a scene of horror.

Zamti. Oh! my prince,
The charge which your great father gave me, still Sounds in my ear. Ere yet the foe burst in,
"Zamti," said he, "preserve my cradled infant;
Save him from ruffians; train his youth to virtue;
Virtue will rouse him to a great revenge;
Or failing, virtue still will make him happy."
He could no more; the cruel spoiler seiz'd him,
And dragg'd my king, my ever honour'd king,
The father of his people; basely dragg'd him,
By his white rev'rend locks, from yonder altar,
Here on the blood-stain'd pavement; while the queen

And her dear fondlings, in one mangled heap,
Died in each other's arms.

Zaph. Revenge! revenge!
With more than lion's rage I'll spring upon him;
And, at one blow, relieve the groaning world.
Let us, this moment, carry sword and fire
To you devoted walls, and overwhelm him down
In ruin and dismay.

Zamti. Zaphimri, no;
By rashness you may mar a noble cause.
To you, my friends, I render up my charge;
To you I give your king! Farewell, my sov'reign.

Zaph. Zamti, thou gen'rous man! a thousand feelings

Of warmest friendship, all the tendencies
Of heart-felt gratitude are struggling here,
And fain would speak to thee, my more than father.
Farewell! sure we shall meet again?

Zamti. We shall.

[now

Zaph. Thou best of friends, farewell. Orasming,

The noblest duty calls; let us remember,
We are the men, whom from all humankind
Our fate hath now selected, to stand forth
Assertors of the public weal; to drench our swords
In the oppressor's heart; to do a deed,
Which heav'n, intent on its own holy work,
Shall pause with pleasure to behold.

[Exit, with Conspirators.]

Zamti. May the most high
Pour down his blessings on him; and, anon,
In the dead waste of night, when awful justice
Walks with her crimson steel o'er slaughter'd heaps
Of groaning Tartars, may he then direct
His youthful footsteps through the paths of peril;
Oh! may he guide the horrors of the storm,
An angel of your wrath, to point your vengeance
On ev'ry guilty head. There let him stop.
When you have broken the oppressor's rod,
Your reign will then be manifest; mankind will see
That truth and virtue still deserve your care.

(A dead march is heard.)

What mean those deathful sounds? Again they lead
My boy to slaughter. Fond, parental feelings!
Tear, tear me piecemeal! still you plead in vain.
Ye host of heav'n, look down; behold me here
Beleagu'd thus with ills: I now must prove Perjur'd to you, or cease to be a father.
In your own cause support me; lend me strength
To triumph o'er that nature which you gave.

A dead march. Enter OCTAR, HAMET, Guards, &c.

Octar. Here let the victim fall, and with his blood

Wash his forefather's tomb. The hated race Shall here lie crush'd; and, from this glorious era,

The eastern world, through all her wide domain,
Shall bend submissive to the Scythian yoke.

Hamet. (Standing near the tomb.) Where is the tyrant? I would have him see,
With envy, see the unconquer'd pow'r of virtue;
How it can calmly bleed, smile on the rack,
And with strong pinion soar above his pow'r,
To regions of perennial day.

Octar. The conqueror
Shall mark thee well, when, at to-morrow's dawn,
Shall be display'd, through the wide city's round,
Thy breathless corse, a spectacle of horror.
It now befits thee to prepare for death.

Hamet. I am prepar'd: I have no lust or rapine,
No murders to repent of; undismay'd,
I can behold all-judging heav'n, whose hand
Still compassing its wondrous ends, by means
Inextricable to all mortal clue,
Hath now enclos'd me in its awful maze.
Since 'tis by your decree, that thus beset,
Th' inexorable angel hovers o'er me,
Be your great bidding done.

Octar. The sabre's edge
Thirsts for his blood: despatch and end his being.

Enter MANDANE.

Man. Off, set me free! I must, I will have way.
Me, me, on me convert your rage: strike here!
Plunge in this bosom your abhorred steel,
And spare his precious life.

Octar. Hence, quickly bear
This wild, this frantic woman—

Man. Never, never!
You shall not force me hence: here will I cling
Fast to the earth, and rivet here my hands
In all the fury of the last despair.

He is my son! Oh! spare him! spare my child!

Octar. How, woman! your's? your son?

Man. Yes, Octar, mine;
My boy, my Hamet. Let my eager love
Fly all unbounded to him, clasp him thus,
Thus in his mother's arms—My child, my child!

Octar. Suspend the stroke, ye ministers of death,
Till Timurkan hear of this new event. [Exit.]

Man. Why didst thou dare return? Oh! rather why
Didst thou so long defer with ev'ry grace,
And every growing virtue, thus to raise
Your mother's dear delight to rapture?

Hamet. Lost
In the deep mists of darkling ignorance,
To me my birth's unknown. But sure that look,
Those tears, those shrieks, that animated grief,
Defying danger, all declare th' effect
Of nature's workings in a parent's heart.
Then let me pay my filial duty here,
Kneel to her native dignity, and pour
In tears of joy, the transport of a son [face;

Man. Thou art, thou art my son; thy father's
His ev'ry feature blooming in his boy.
Oh! tell me, tell me all; how hast thou liv'd
With virtuous Morat? how did he support,
In dreary solitude, thy tender years?
How train thy growing virtue? quickly tell me;
Oh! tell me all, and charm me with thy tongue.

Hamet. Mysterious pow'rs! have I then liv'd to this?
Thus on the brink of death to find a parent,
In virtue firm, majestic in distress,
At length to feel unutterable bliss
In her dear circling arms?

Re-enter OCTAR, with TIMURKAN and MIRVAN.

Tim. Where is this wild,
This frantic woman, who, with headlong grief,
Suspends my dread command? Tear them asunder;
Send her to some dark cell to rave and shriek,
And dwell with madness; and let instant death
Leave that rash youth a headless trunk before me.

Man. Now, by the ever-burning lamps that light
Our holy shrines, by great Confucius' altar,
By the prime source of life, and light, and being,
This is my child, the blossom of my joys.
Send for his cruel father; he, 'tis he Intends a fraud; he, for a stranger's life,
Would give his offspring to the cruel axe,
And rend a wretched mother's brain with madness.

Re-enter ZAMTI.

Zamti. Sure the sad accents of Mandane's voice
Struck on my frightened sense.

Tim. Once more, thou traitor!
Who is that stubborn youth?

Zamti. Alas! what needs
This iteration of my griefs?

Man. Forbear,
Thou marble-hearted father! 'tis your son.
And wouldst thou see him bleed?

Zamti. On him, on him
Let fall your rage.

Man. Oh! my devoted child! (Faints.)

Hamet. Support her, heaven! support her tender frame.

Now, tyrant, now I beg to live; lo! here
I plead for life; not for the wretched boon
To breathe the air, which thy ambition taints,
But, oh! to ease a mother's woes; for her,
For that dear object, let me live for her.

Tim. Spite of their frauds, the truth begins to dawn:

In her wild vehemence of grief, I hear
The genuine voice of nature.

Man. (Recovers.) Where's my child?
Oh! let me strain him to my heart; thy hard,
Thy cruel father shall not tear thee from me.

Tim. Hear me, thou frantic mourner! dry those tears;

Perhaps you still may save your darling son.

Man. Oh! quickly give the means.

Tim. Resign your king,
Your phantom of a king, and save your child.

Hamet. No, my much-honour'd mother, never hear

The base, the dire proposal; let me rather

Exhaust my life-blood at each gushing vein!
Mandane, then—then you may well rejoice
To find your child; then you may truly know
The best delight a mother's heart can prove,
When her son dies with glory.

Tim. Curses blast
The stripling's pride! (Talks apart with Octar.)

Zamti. Ye powers, enthron'd above!
You never meant entirely to destroy
This groaning land, when your benignant care
Lends us a youth like him. Let me enfold
That lovely ardour in his father's arms.
My brave, my gen'rous boy!

Tim. Dost thou at length
Confess it, traitor?

Zamti. Yes, I boast it, tyrant;
Boast it to thee, to earth, and heaven, I boast
This, this is Zamti's son.

Hamet. At length the hour,
The glorious hour is come, by Morat promis'd,
"When Hamet shall not blush to know his father."

Zamti. Oh! thou intrepid youth, what bright reward

Can your glad sire bestow on such desert?
The righteous gods, and your own inward feelings,
Shall give the sweetest retribution. Now,
Mandane, now my soul forgives thee all,
Since I have made acquaintance with my boy;
But, oh! I charge thee, by a husband's right—

Tim. A husband's right! a traitor has no rights;
Society disclaims him. Woman, hear,
And mark my words: abjure the mandarin,
Renounce all hymeneal vows, reveal
This mystery, and still your son may live,
While justice whirls that traitor to his fate.

Man. Thou vile adviser! what, betray my lord,
My honour'd husband; turn a Scythian wife;
Forget the many years of fond delight,
In which my heart ne'er knew decreasing love,
Charm'd with his noble, all-accomplish'd mind?
No, tyrant, no; with him I'll dare to die;
With him in ruin more supremely blest,
Than guilt upon a throne triumphant.

Zamti. Now,
Inhuman Tartar, I defy thy power.
Lo! here, the father, mother, and the son!
Try all your tortures on us: here we stand,
Resolv'd to leave a track of bright renown
To mark our being; resolv'd all to die,
The votaries of honour!

Tim. Then, by heaven!
Your doom is fix'd. This moment seize the slaves;
Deep in some baleful dungeon's midnight gloom
Let each apart be plung'd; and Etan, too—
Let him forthwith be found; he, too, shall share
His father's fate.

Mir. Be it my task, dread sir,
To make the rack ingenious in new pains;
Till even cruelty almost relent
At their keen, agonizing groans.

Tim. Be that,
Mirvan, thy care. By the immortal Lama,
I'll wrest the secret from them, or once more
My rage is up in arms: 'gainst Corea's chief
I will unfurl my banners; his proud cities
Shall dread my thunder at their gates, and mourn
Their smoking ramparts; o'er his verdant plains
And peaceful vales I'll drive my rapid car,
And ne'er know rest, ne'er sheathe th' avenging
sword,

Till their king fall, and treason is no more. [Exit.

Octar. Mirvan, bear hence those miscreants to their fate;

Thou, Zamti, art my charge.

Zamti. Willing I come.
My son, thy father doubts not of thy fortitude.
Mandane, summon all thy strength; the gods,
Who try thy virtue, may reward it still.

[Exit, with Octar.]

Man. Hamet! restor'd and lost again!

(Struggles with the Guards.)

Hamet. Alas!

No means to rescue thee! Inhuman villains!
And will you tear me from her? [He is dragged off.]

Man. Oh! my child!

Now, then, barbarians, you have seiz'd on all
My soul holds dear. What have I now to dread?
I gave him being; in the hour of peril
I flew to rescue him; I could no more.
If he must fall, I'll emulate his virtues;
True to the solemn vow I've breath'd to heaven,
True to my sovereign still! in honour's cause
The mother from her son shall learn to die.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Prison. HAMET lies stretched on the ground, in chains.

Enter ZAPHIMRI, in a Tartar dress, and MIRVAN.

Mir. There, stretch'd at length on the dank ground, he lies

Scorning his fate: your meeting must be short.

Zaph. It shall.

Mir. And yet I tremble for th' event.

Zaph. Mirvan, no more: I will hold converse with him,

Though death were arm'd against the interview.

[Exit Mirvan.]

Hamet. What wouldst thou, Tartar?

Zaph. Rise, thou gen'rous youth!

No vulgar errand mine.

Hamet. (Rises.) Now speak thy purpose.

Zaph. To these lone walls, where oft the Scythian stabber,

With murd'rous stride hath come; these walls that oft

Have seen the assassin's deeds, I bring a mind
Firm, virtuous, upright. Under this vile garb,
Lo! here a son of China.

Hamet. Yes, thy garb

Denotes a son of China, and those eyes
Roll with no black intent. Say on.

Zaph. Inflam'd

With admiration of heroic deeds,
I come to seek acquaintance with the youth,
Who, for his king, would die.

Hamet. And does thy heart

Applaud the deed?

Zaph. It does, by heaven, it does.

Yes, virtuous envy rises in my soul.

Thy ardour charms, and even now I pant
To change conditions with thee.

Hamet. Then my heart

Accepts thy proffer'd friendship. In a base,
A prone, degen'rate age, when foreign force
And foreign manners have o'erwhelm'd us all,
And sunk our native genius, thou retain'st
A sense of ancient worth. But wherefore here?
To this sad mansion, this abode of sorrow,
Com'st thou to know a wretch that soon must die?

Zaph. Oh! no; thou shalt not die. By me the king,

By me Zaphimri says—

Hamet. Zaphimri says!

Kind heaven! where is the king?

Zaph. His steps are safe,

Unseen as is the arrow's path. By me he says,
He knows, he loves, he wonders at thy virtue;
By me he swears, rather than thou shouldst fall,
He will emerge from dark obscurity,
And greatly brave his fate.

Hamet. Ha! die for me!

For me ignoble in the scale of being,
An unimportant wretch! Whoe'er thou art,
I pr'ythee, stranger, bear my answer back.
Oh! tell my sovereign, that here dwells a heart
Above all pain and peril. When I fall,
A worm, an insect dies; but in his life

Are wrapp'd the glories of our ancient line,
The liberties of China; then let him
Live for his people, be it mine to die.

Zaph. Can I hear this, just gods! and not dissolve

In tears of gratitude and love?

(Aside.)

Hamet. Why streams

That flood of grief? and why that stifled groan?
Through the dark mist his sorrow casts around him,
He seems no common man. Say, gen'rous youth,
Who and what art thou?

Zaph. Who and what am I?

The veriest wretch that ever groan'd in anguish.
One lost, abandon'd, plung'd in woe,
Beyond redemption's aid! to tell thee all
In one dire word, big with the last distress,
In one accumulated term of horror,
Zaphimri!

Hamet. Ha! my king!

Zaph. That fatal wretch,
Exalted into misery supreme!

Oh! I was happy while good Zamti's son;
I walk'd the common tracts of life, and strove
Humbly to copy my imagin'd sire.

But now—

Hamet. Yes now—if thou art he—as sure
'Tis wondrous like—rais'd to a state, in which
A nation's happiness on thee depends.

Zaph. A nation's happiness! there, there I bleed;
There are my pangs. For me this war began;
For me hath purple slaughter drench'd yon plains;
I am the cause of all: I forg'd those chains—
For Zamti and Mandane, too! by me they fall;
Them have I thrown into a dungeon's gloom:
These are the horrors of Zaphimri's reign!
I am the tyrant; I ascend the throne,
By base ingratitude, by the vile means
Of selfish cowardice, that can behold
Thee, and thy father, mother, all in chains,
All lost, all murder'd, that I thus may rise
Inglorious to a throne.

Hamet. Alas! thy spirit,
Thy wild disorder'd fancy, pictures forth
Ills that are not, or being ill, not worth
A moment's pause.

Zaph. Not ill! thou canst not mean it;
The angry fates, amidst their hoards of malice,
Had nought but this; they meant to render me
Peculiarly distress'd. Tell me, thou gallant youth,
(A soul like thine knows every fine emotion,)
Is there a nerve in which the heart of man
Can prove such torture, as when thus it meets
Unequall'd friendship, honour, truth, and love,
And no return can make?

Hamet. That pow'r will come.

Zaph. But when? when thou art lost!
When Zamti and Mandane are no more!
Oh! for a dagger's point to plunge it deep,
Deep in this—ha! deep in the tyrant's heart.

Hamet. There your revenge should point.—Alas!
my sov'reign,

Why didst thou venture to this place of danger?

Zaph. And canst thou deem me, then, so base of soul,

To dwell secure in ignominious safety;
With cold insensibility to wait
The ling'ring hours, with coward patience wait them,

Deliberating on myself, while ruin
Nods over Zamti's house? No, gen'rous youth,
I'll not think meanly of thee; no, that thought
Is foreign to thy heart.

Hamet. Withdraw thee hence;
Nor lightly hazard thus so dear a life:
Think of thy ancestors.

Zaph. My ancestors!
What is to me a long descended line,
A race of worthies, legislators, heroes,
Unless I bring their virtues, too? No more!

This very night I'll burst those guilty walls,
Rend those vile manacles, and give thee freedom.

Re-enter MIRVAN.

Mir. The time forbids delay: whilst thou art
here,

Thy fate's suspended on each dreadful moment.

Zaph. This garb will cloak me from each jealous
eye;

Thou need'st not fear detection.

(Flourish of trumpets.)

Hamet. Ha! what means
That sudden and wild harmony?

Mir. Ev'n now
The conqueror and his fell barbaric rout,
For this day's victory, indulge their joy.

Zaph. Joy soon to end in groans; for all conspires

To forward our design: a band of heroes
Ev'n now are ready; honourably leagu'd
To vindicate their rights. Thy father's care
Plann'd and inspir'd the whole. And, lo! the lights
That whilom blaz'd to heav'n, now rarely seen,
Shed a pale glimmer, and the foe secure,
Sinks down in deep debauch; while, all awake,
The genius of the land broods o'er the work
Of justice and revenge.

Mir. The gallant chiefs,
At their appointed station, are conven'd;
In silent terror all intent they stand,
And wait the signal in each gale that blows.

Hamet. Dream on; deluded Tartar, yes, dream
Still unsuspecting plunge in guilty joy, [on;
And bury thee in riot.

Zaph. Ne'er again
To wake from that vile trance; for ere the dawn,
Detested spoiler, thy hot blood shall smoke
On the stain'd marble, and thy limbs abhorr'd
I'll scatter to the dogs of China.

Mir. Ha!
Break off your conference: Octar this way comes;
Beware, my prince.

Enter OCTAR.

Well, Octar, there's your pris'ner.

(Points to Hamet.)

Octar. Convey him hence to where Mandane's grief
Rings through the vaulted roof.

Hamet. Yes, lead me hence
To soften anguish in a parent's breast.

[Exit, with Mirvan.]

Zaph. What may this mean? I dread some lurking mischief. [Exit.]

Octar. When the boy clings around his mother's heart,

Then, in that tender moment, tear him from her;
And, in her impotence of grief, the truth
Will burst its way.

Enter TIMURKAN.

Why from the genial banquet
Thus will my sov'reign seek a dungeon's gloom?

Tim. A more than midnight gloom involves my soul.

What boots the conqu'ring sword, the plume of victory,

If still this coward boy in secret lives;
If serpent-like, amidst the flow'ry garlands,
He wreaths his folds, to dash my promis'd joy,
And poison my delight?

Octar. Then, at once,
To end your fears, give Zamti to the sword,
His wife, and all who aid him in his guilt.
'Twill crush the seeds of dark conspiracy.

Tim. No; Zamti's death but multiplies my fears.
With him the truth lies buried in the tomb.
Hast thou beheld the stubborn mandarin?

Octar. Unconquer'd, yet by words he stands unmov'd,
Smiling contempt, as if some inward joy,

Like the sun lab'ring in a night of clouds,
Shot forth, at intervals, a gladsome ray,
Bright'ning the face of woe.

Tim. He must not die:

The slave shall linger out his days in torment.

Octar. Might I advise, Mandane may be won.
She still, sir, may be your's: a conqueror's sighs
Shall waft a thousand wishes to her heart,
Till female vanity aspire to reach
The eastern throne.

Tim. No, Octar; 'tis not mine
To melt in languishing desire, and try
The hopes, the fears, and the caprice of love.
Innurd to rougher scenes, for other arts
My mind's employ'd: to sling the well-stor'd quiver
Over this manly arm, and wing the dart
At the fleet rein-deer sweeping down the vale,
Or up the mountain straining ev'ry nerve;
To vault the neighing steed, and urge his course,
Swifter than whirlwinds, through the ranks of war,
Reeking with gore to drive my chariot wheels;
These are my passions, this my only science.
Rais'd from a soldier to imperial sway,
I still will reign in terror. Bring that traitor,
The hoary priest, before me. [Exit Octar.]
Now, by heav'n!

Their stubborn fortitude erects a fence
To shield 'em from my wrath, more pow'ful far
Than their high boasted wall, which long hath stood

The shock of time, of war, of storms, and thunder,
The wonder of the world. What art thou, virtue,
That giv'st these joys, my heart hath never known?

Enter ZAMTI, in chains.

Thy hated sight once more I brook, to try
If yet the sense of deeds abhorr'd as thine
Has touch'd your soul: while yet the hour permits,
Repent thee of thy crimes.

Zamti. The crime would be
To yield to thy unjust commands. But know,
A louder voice than thine forbids the deed,
The voice of all my kings; forth from their tombs,
Ev'n now, they send a peal of groans to heav'n,
Where all thy murders are long since gone up,
And stand in dread array against thee.

Tim. Murders!
Ungrateful mandarin! say, did not I,
When civil discord lighted up her brand,
And scatter'd wide her flames; when fierce contention,

'Twixt Zorohamti and Zaphimri's father,
Sorely convuls'd the realm; did not I then
Lead forth my Tartars from their northern frontier,
And bid fair order rise?

Zamti. Bid order rise!
Hast thou not smote us with a hand of wrath?
By thee each art has died, and ev'ry science
Gone out at thy fell blast. Art thou not come
To sack our cities, to subvert our temples,
The temples of our gods, and with the worship,
The monstrous worship of your living Lama,
Profane our holy shrines?

Tim. Resolve my doubts,
Nor think with groundless, with ill-tim'd reproach,
To talk me from my purpose.

Zamti. Tyrant, yes;
Yes, thou hast smote us with a hand of wrath,
Full twenty years hast smote us; but at length
Will come the hour of heav'n's just visitation,
When thou shalt rue—hear me, thou man of blood!
Yes, thou shalt rue the day, the day that saw thee
Imbrue those hands accurst in royal blood.
Now, tyrant, now—yes, tremble at my words,
The arm of the most high is bar'd against thee;
And, lo! the hand of fate describes thy doom
In glaring letters on yon rubied wall!
Each gleam of light is perish'd out of heav'n,
And darkness rushes o'er the face of earth.

Tim. And think'st thou, slave, with visionary fears
I e'er can shrink appall'd? thou moonstruck seer!
No more I'll bear this mockery of words.
What, Octar, ho!

Re-enter OCTAR.

Lead forth that frantic woman.
Ruin involves ye all; this very hour
Shall see your son impal'd; yes, both your sons.
Bring Etan, too, before us.

Octar. Etan, sir,
Is fled for safety.

Tim. Thou pernicious slave! (To Zamti.)

Zamti. The righteous gods protect him from thy rage. [Exit Octar.]

Tim. Him, too, thou wouldst withdraw from justice! him
Thy perfidy would send to Corea's realm,
To brood in secret o'er some work of treason.

Re-enter OCTAR, Guards, &c. with HAMET and MANDANE.

Now, then, deluded fair, if fix'd in error
You still persist, the rack shall have its prey.

Man. I tell thee, homicide, my soul is bound
By solemn vows; and wouldst thou have me break
What angels wafted on their wings to heav'n?

Tim. This moment saves your child, or dooms him dead.

Man. Goddess of vengeance, from your realms above,
Where near the throne of the most high thou sitt'st,
Inspired in darkness, amidst hoards of thunder,
Serenely dreadful, till dire human crimes
Provoke thee down, now, on the whirlwind's wing,
Descend, and with your flaming sword, your bolts,
Red with almighty wrath, let loose your rage,
And blast this vile seducer in his guilt.

Tim. Then seize her son, and give him to the rack.

Man. No; by the pow'rs above, by ev'ry tie
Of humanizing pity, seize me first:
Despatch his mother; end this wretched being.

Enter Guards, with ZAPHIMRI.

Zaph. (Rushing from the Guards.) Hold! mur-d'ers, hold! I charge you, slaves, forbear!

Zamti. Ha! China totters on the brink of ruin.
(Aside.)

Tim. Etan! thou art welcome to my great revenge!

Zaph. I come on matters of importance deep
Unto thy throne and life.

Zamti. Heed not an idle boy.

Tim. Proceed, and tell thy purpose.

Zaph. Even now
Thy death is plotting.

Tim. Ha! by whom?

Zaph. Zaphimri!

Zamti. What means my son?

Tim. Resign him to my vengeance,
And then our mercy shall to thee extend.

Zaph. Think not I come to save this worthless
life.

Pity Mandane; save her tender frame.

Pity that youth; (kneels) oh! save that godlike
man.

Zamti. Wilt thou dishonour me, degrade thyself,
Thy native dignity, by basely kneeling?
Quit that vile posture.

Tim. To appease our wrath,
Bring me Zaphimri's head.

Zaph. Will that suffice?

Tim. His blood atones for all.

Zaph. (Rises.) Then take it, tyrant;
I am Zaphimri; I your mortal foe.

Zamti. Angels of light, quick on your rapid wing
Dart from your thrones above, and hover round
him.

Man. Alas! all's ruin'd; China is no more.

Zaph. Behold me, Tartar; hear the voice of truth;

Thus, on his knees, Zaphimri begs to die.

Tim. Thou early traitor! by thy guilty father
Train'd up in fraud, wouldst thou deceive me, too?

Hamet. He would: all would deceive you; all conspire

Against my claim; all wrest my title from me:

The father's art, the mother's fond ambition,

Upon my ruins to exalt their name,

And raise their son to empire.

Zaph. Ha! forbear,

Rash youth, forbear; nor thus insult your king.

Miné is the crown; its miseries are mine:

Mine the worst malice fortune hath in store:

I claim it all, and will not bear a rival.

Hamet. Horror! believe him not; for me the troops

From Corea's realm dar'd to approach your walls:

I led them on; I came from climes remote;

The captives of your sword have own'd they fought
To see me seated on the throne of China.

Zaph. By heav'n, he's innocent; the guilt is mine.

Misguided boy! I charge thee dare no more

Usurp a monarch's right; resign at once

My lawful claim, the honours of my birth;

Give back my name; I ask it but to die.

Tim. Their wondrous conflict but involves me deeper

In doubt, mistrust, perplexity, and fear.

Misguided fair one, say which is your king?

Man. Behold their virtue, and respect them both.

Tim. Perdition seize her! Zamti, mark my words;

This moment clear each doubt, or keenest pangs
Shall hunt the secret through each trembling nerve.

Zamti. I have already yielded up my son;

I gave him to your sword; and after that,

After that conflict, think'st thou there is aught

Zamti has left to fear?

Tim. Yes; learn to fear

My will, my sov'reign will, which here is law,
And treads upon the neck of slaves.

Zamti. Thy will

The law in China? ill-instructed man!

Now learn an awful truth. Though ruffian pow'r

May, for awhile, suppress all sacred order,

And trample on the rights of man, the soul

Which gave our legislation life and vigour

Shall still subsist, above the tyrant's reach.

The spirit of the laws can never die.

Tim. Here, then, all parley ends: thy doom is fix'd:

This very moment drag 'em from my sight.

(Guards seize Zamti.)

Man. Yes, lead me with him: in his arms to die,

Mandane goes resign'd. But, tyrant, know

The great important truth is treasur'd here.

Thy pow'r can ne'er extort it. Yes, live on,

In the worst agony of doubt and fear.

With us the secret dies: that joy is ours;

With that we triumph still; with that we bid thee

Fear while we live, and tremble in our fall.

[Exit, with Zamti and Guards.]

Hamet. No, spare 'em, yet forbear; here point thy sword;

Unsluce these veins, but spare their matchless lives! [He is carried off.]

Zaph. I am your victim, by the gods, I am.

(Kneels, and holds Timurkan.)

Tim. Away, vile slave! go, see them bleed; behold

How they will writhe in pangs; pangs doom'd for
thee,

And all who deal in treachery like thine. [Exit.]

Zaph. (On the ground.) Yet hear me; yet a moment! barb'rous Scythians!

Wilt thou not open, earth, and take me down,

Down to thy caverns of eternal darkness?
And sleeps almighty justice? will it not
Awaken all its terrors? arm yon band
Of secret heroes with avenging thunder?
By heav'n, (rises) that thought lifts up my kindling
soul

With renovated fire. My glorious friends,
Who now, convene big with your country's fate,
When I am dead, oh! give me just revenge;
Let me not die inglorious; make my fall,
By some great act of yet unheard-of vengeance,
Resound throughout the world; that furthest
Scythia

May stand appall'd at the huge distant roar
Of one vast ruin tumbling on the heads
Of this fell tyrant, and his hatred race. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter ZAMTI and MANDANE, followed by OCTAR.

Zamti. Why dost thou lead us to this hated mansion?

Must we again behold the tyrant's frown?
Thou know'st our hearts are fix'd.

Octar. The war of words

We scorn again to wage. Beneath this roof
The rack is now prepar'd, and Timurkan,
Anon, shall view your pangs, and count each groan
Ev'n to the fullest luxury of vengeance.
Guard well that passage; (to the Guards within) see the traitors find

No means of flight, while to the conqueror
I hasten to receive his last commands. [Exit.]

Zamti. Thou ever faithful woman!

Man. Canst thou, Zamti,
Still call me faithful? by that honour'd name
Wilt thou call her, whose wild maternal love
Hath buried all in ruin?

Zamti. Yes, thou art,
Thou art my wife, whose virtue, ev'n in bondage,
Hath cheer'd my soul; and now thy ev'ry charm,
Endear'd by danger, kindled by distress
To higher lustre, all my passions beat
Unutterable gratitude and love.

And must—oh! cruel!—must I see thee bleed?

Man. For me death wears no terror on his brow.
Full twenty years hath this afflicted breast
Been smote with these sad hands; these haggard
eyes

Have seen my country's ruin; seen my husband,
My son, my king, all in the Tartar's hands.
What, then, remains for me? death, only death.

Zamti. Ah! can thy tenderness endure the pangs
Inventive cruelty ev'n now prepares?
Must this lov'd form, this soft perfection bleed?
Thy decent limbs be strain'd with cruel cords,
To glut a ruffian's rage?

Man. Alas! this frame,
This feeble texture, never can sustain it.
But this, this I can bear! (Shows a dagger.)

Zamti. Ha!

Man. Yes; this dagger!
Do thou but lodge it in this faithful breast,
My heart shall spring to meet thee.

Zamti. Oh!

Man. Do thou,
My honour'd lord, who taught'st me ev'ry virtue,
Afford the friendly, the last human office,
And teach me now to die.

Zamti. It must not be.

Hence let me bear this instrument of death.

(Takes the dagger.)

Shall we usurp the dread prerogative
Of life and death, and measure out the thread
Of our own being? 'Tis the cowards act,
Who dares not to encounter pain and peril.
Be that the practice of th' untutor'd savage;
Be it the practice of the gloomy north. [nod,]

Man. Must we, then, wait the haughty tyrant's

The vassals of his will? no; let us rather Nobly break through the barriers of this life,
And join the beings of some other world,
Who'll throng around our greatly daring souls,
And hail our flight with wonder and applause.

Zamti. Distress too exquisite! ye holy powers,
If aught below can supersede your law,
And plead for wretches, who dare, self-impell'd,
Rush to your awful presence; 'tis not, then,
When the distemper'd passions rage, when pride
Is stung to madness, when ambition falls
From her high scaffolding—oh! no; if aught
Can justify the blow, it is when virtue
No more can stand at bay, when liberty
No longer breathes at large; 'tis with the groans
Of our lov'd country, when we dare to die.

Man. Then here at once direct the friendly steel.

Zamti. Now, then, prepare thee. Ah! does this become

Thy husband's love? thus, with uplifted blade
Can I approach that bosom-bliss, where oft
With other looks than these, oh! my Mandane,
I've hush'd my cares within thy shelt'ring arms?

Man. Alas! the loves that bless'd our happy days,
Have spread their pinions never to return,
And the pale fates surround us. Zamti, come,
Here lay me down in honourable rest;
Come as thou art, all hero, to my arms,
And free a virtuous wife.

Zamti. It must be so:

Now, then, prepare thee. My arm flags and droops,
Conscious of thee in every trembling nerve.

(Throws down the dagger.)

By heaven, once more I would not raise the point
Against that hoard of sweets, for endless years
Of universal empire.

Man. Ha! they come;

The ministers of vengeance come; and yet
They shall not long insult us in our woes;
Myself will still preserve the means of death.

(Takes up the dagger.)

Re-enter OCTAR, with TIMURKAN and Guards.

Tim. Now, then, detested pair, your hour is come.

I hate this dull delay. Seize Zamti first;
Let studied art, with slow-consuming pangs,
Explore the truth; nor let him know relief,
In his worst agonies, till every secret
Burst forth in groans, and end my doubts and fears.

Zamti. Begin your tortures, end this wretched being;

I care not now how soon. (The Guards seize him.)

Man. Stay, Zamti, stay!

And will you force him thus? [He is forced off.]
Inhuman villains!

Oh! Timurkan, behold me humbled here,
Thus lowly on my knees, thus prone to earth,
And grov'ling at your feet. I ask to die;
Grant my request; it will not stain thy name
With weak humanity; deal still in blood.
Oh! let me perish in my husband's arms!
It will be mercy to indulge my prayer,
And murder shall for once be virtue in thee.

Tim. Behold him first, behold the hoary traitor
Gasping in death, and welt'ring in his gore.
Thy turn will follow. By thy treach'rous arts,
The hated orphan lives.

Man. (Rises.) And if he lives,
May heaven protect him, till the awful truth,
In some dread hour of horror and revenge,
Shall burst like thunder on thee. If by me
Zaphimri lives, then, tyrant, know thy duty;
Descend at once from a throne gain'd by murder,
And yield the crown, resign it to your master.

Tim. Pernicious traitress!

Enter MIRVAN.

Ha! what wouldst thou, Mirvan?

Mir. Near to the eastern gate, a slave reports,

As at his watch he stood, the gleam of arms
Cast a dim lustre through the night, and straight
The steps of men thick sounded in his ear.
In close array they march'd.

Tim. Ha! lurking treason!
What ho! my arms! Ourselves will sally forth.

Mir. My liege, their scanty and rash-levied numbers

Want not a monarch's sword. With eager zeal,
Upon the instant, I drew off the guards
That round the palace walls. Let Octar, sir,
Who oft has led them to renown in arms,
Let him but head the ranks, his valour soon
Shall bring the traitors bound in chains before you.

Tim. Well, be it so. Octar, do thou go forth,
And give the rebels to the sabre's edge.

[Exit Octar.]

Man. Why must I linger thus? Lo! Mirvan, too,
Leagu'd with the foe, a traitor to his king! (Aside.)

Mir. With sure conviction, we have further learn'd

The long-contended truth. Etan's their king.
The traitor, Zamti, counted but one son,
And him he sent—Mandane knows it all—
Far hence to Corea's realm.

Tim. At length thy guilt (To Mandane.)
Glazes to the sight. This hour Zaphimri dies.

Mir. To Morat's care th' insidious mandarin,
With that complotter in his dark designs,
Gave up their boy; while, unsuspected here,
They fix'd a safe asylum for their prince

Man. (Looks at Mirvan.) When shall I quit a world where men like thee

Are only fit to dwell?

Tim. Let Morat straight
Attend our presence; bring the slave before us.

Mir. This hour approves my loyalty and truth.
[Exit.]

Tim. Thanks to great Lama, treason is no more,
And their boy-king is found. Yes, traitress, now
Thou shalt behold the stripling's forfeit head.
Soon as the dawn shall purple yonder east,
Aloft in air all China shall behold it,
Parch'd by the sun, and welt'ring to the wind.

Re-enter MIRVAN.

Tim. Well, Mirvan, hast thou brought the treach'rous slave?

Mir. My liege, he comes, obedient to your will.

Enter ZAPHIMRI, with a sabre in his hand.

Zaph. Now, bloody Tartar, now, then, know
Zaphimri.

Tim. Accursed treason! To behold thee thus
In arms before me, blasts my aching sight;
My blood forgets to move; each power dies in me.

Man. Yes, monster, yes, thy fated hour is come.
Descend, thou tyrant, from a throne usurp'd,
And yield the crown, now yield it to thy master.

Zaph. Well may'st thou tremble, well may guilt like thine

Shrink back dismay'd; for thus avenging heaven
In me sends forth his minister of wrath,
To deal destruction on thee.

Tim. Coward slave!
A midnight ruffian, in th' unguarded hour,
Secure thou com'st, thus to assault a warrior
Thy heart would never dare to meet in arms.

Zaph. Not meet thee, Tartar! ha! in me thou seest

One, on whose head unnumber'd wrongs thou'st
Else could I scorn thee thus defenceless: yes,
My great revenge could bid thee try each shape,
Assume each horrid form, come forth array'd
In all the terrors of destructive guilt.

But now a dear, a murder'd father calls;
He beckons to the spot, the sacred altar
Which thy fell hand imbrued with royal blood.
Go, seek the temple; at that dread tribunal
Receive thy doom, and expiate thy crimes.

Tim. By heaven, I'll dare thee still; resign it,
slave!

Resign the blade to nobler hands.

(Seizes Mirvan's sabre.)

Man. Oh! horror!
Bring instant help; let not the fate of China
Hang on the issue of a doubtful combat.

Zaph. Now, lawless ravager, Zaphimri comes
To wreak his justice on thee.

[They fight; Zaphimri drives Timurkan off.]

Man. Now, just gods,
Sinew his arm, and guide the blow for freedom.

Mir. See there! behold, he darts upon his prey!

Zaph. (Within.) Die, bloodhound, die!

Mir. The Tartar drops his point.

Man. He falls, the victim falls.

Zaph. (Within.) My father strikes;
He gives the blow; and this, thou fell destroyer,
This for a nation's groans.

Enter HAMET.

Hamet. Where is Zaphimri?
Direct me to him.

Man. Hamet! Oh! my son,
Once more I clasp thee in thy mother's arms!
Lo! where the monster quivers on the ground!
Let me seek Zamti with the glorious tidings,
And call him back to liberty and joy.

[Exit, with Mirvan.]

Re-enter ZAPHIMRI.

Zaph. This reeking blade hath drunk the tyrant's blood.

Hamet. China again is free. There lies the corse

That breath'd destruction to the world.

Zaph. Yes, there,
Tyrannic guilt, behold thy fatal end,
The wages of thy sins.

Enter MORAT.

Hamet. Oh! Morat, welcome;
Welcome to conquest, freedom, and revenge.

Morat. Revenge now stalks abroad: our valiant leaders,

True to the destin'd hour, at once broke forth
From every quarter on th' astonish'd foe.

Zaph. Lo! Timurkan lies levell'd with the dust.

Morat. Oppression's iron rod at length is broke.
My king! my sovereign! (Kneels to Zaph.)

Zaph. Rise; the time demands
Far other cares. Where are my gallant friends?
Is the wild tumult o'er, and have they conquer'd?

Morat. The gates, the ramparts, and the citadel,
Each pass is ours; the unsuspecting foe,
Hemm'd in on every side, resists in vain.

Octar is fall'n: all cover'd o'er with wounds,
He met his fate; and still the slaught'ring sword
Invades the city, sunk in sleep and wine.

Zaph. Send forth, and let Orasming straight proclaim

Zaphimri king, my subjects' rights restor'd.

[Exit Morat.]

Now, where is Zamti? where my more than father?
Where is Mandane? Lead me, lead me to them.

Re-enter MIRVAN.

What means that pale despair?

Mir. Oh! dire mischance!

While here I trembled for the great event,
The unrelenting slaves, whose trade is death,
Began their work; nor piety nor age,
Could touch their felon-hearts: they seiz'd on Zamti,

And bound him on the wheel; a prey to villains

We found the good, the venerable man
Smiling in pangs; all frantic at the sight,
Mandane plung'd a poniard in her breast:

"With him I liv'd," she cried, "with him will die!"

Hamet. Oh! heaven! my mother! Summon ev'ry aid

To call her back to life.

Mir. In th' arms of death

Ev'n now she struggles.

Zaph. Fatal rashness. Say,
Is Zamti, too, destroy'd?

Mir. Life ebbs apace.

Releas'd from anguish, with what strength re-
main'd,

He reach'd the couch where lost Mandane now lies;
There threw his mangled limbs, there clinging to
her,

He pours his sad lamentings in a strain
Might call each pitying angel from the sky
To sympathize with human woe.

(The back scene opens.)

Zaph. And see,
See on that mournful bier he clasps her still;
Still hangs upon each faded feature; still
To her deaf ear complains in bitter anguish.

(Zamti and Mandane brought forward on a couch.)

Zamti. Yet live, Mandane; thou may'st still be happy;

Thou hast not merited an end like this.

Man. The hand of death ev'n now is heavy on me.

Zaph. Are these our triumphs? these our promis'd joys?

Zamti. The music of that voice recalls my soul.
(Rises, and runs to embrace Zaphimri; his strength fails, and he falls at his feet.)

My prince! my king!—

Zaph. Support him; bear him up.

Man. Where is my child, my Hamet? lives he still?

Hamet. He lives; but, oh! to see my mother
thus—

Man. Oh! let me fold thee. (Rises.) Ha! it is too much:

I thank you, heaven; these are a mother's joys;
And these you give to cheer me in my passage.
Soft, lay me, lay me down.

Hamet. Her eyes are fix'd;
A death-like paleness spreads o'er ev'ry feature.

Zaph. (Raises Zamti.) How fares it, Zamti,
now?

Zamti. Oh! blest event!
I could not hope such tidings; thee, my king,
And Hamet, too; I thought you both destroy'd.
My slow remains of life cannot endure
These strong vicissitudes of grief and joy.
And there, there lies Mandane, lead me to her.
Mandane, look upon me; once again
Let me behold the day-light of thy eyes.

Man. Alas! those eyes no more must gaze upon
thee;
That dear delight is fled; thee, too, my son,
No more I now must see thee; snatch'd from death,
This day restor'd, after whole years of absence.
I leave thee now, I leave my child for ever.
The heart-string breaks.—Oh! that thought tears;
it cleaves;

It drowns me in my tears.

Zamti. I pray ye, lead me,
Conduct me to her, nearer still, that both—
Alas! I faint;—support me. (Faints.)

Hamet. Once again
Mandane speak, and let me hear thy voice.

Man. Hamet, thy hand; forgive, forgive my rashness.

Could I survive your father? No; with him
The scene was clos'd; but—is the tyrant dead?

Hamet. His debt is paid.

Man. Alas! I follow him,
I follow thither, where eternal justice
Exalts the just, and humbles the oppressor.
And thee, my son, I leave thee here in freedom.

That joy is mine. Copy your father's actions,
You need no more: mankind will bless thee for it.
Remember all his precepts: his example
Will guide thy steps, and marshal thee to glory.
I die resign'd; and yet, and yet 'tis hard,
When freedom dawns, and after all my sufferings,
It's hard, my child, your mother now should leave
thee.

Zamti! where is he?

Zamti. (Revives.) Bend me, bend me forward.

Man. Alas! that sight—Oh! Zamti—Hamet—
Oh! (Dies.)

Zamti. She's gone, for ever, ever gone. Man-dane! (Sinks down by her.)

Thus do I see thee? cold, alas! death-cold.
Cold is that breast, where virtue from above
Fix'd her delighted mansion; and those lips
That utter'd heav'nly truth, pale, pale! dead, dead!
Pray ye entomb me with her.

Zaph. Take, ye pow'rs,
Your throne, your crown; take all your conquests back;

Zaphimri never can survive—

Zamti. I charge thee, live.
A base desertion of the public weal
Will ill become a king. Alas! my son,
By that dear tender name, if once again
Zamti may call thee, this is now the last,
The only interview we e'er shall have.

Zaph. And will ye, then, inexorable gods,
Will ye, then, tear him from my aching heart?

Zamti. The moral duties of the private man
Are grafted in thy soul: but, oh! remember,
The mean immutable of happiness;
Or in the vale of life, or on a throne,
Is virtue: each bad action of a king
Extends beyond his life, and oft renews
Its tyranny o'er ages yet unborn.

To error mild, severe to guilt, protect
The helpless innocent: be truth thy passion;
Spurn the base flatterer, and learn to feel
The best delight of serving humankind.

Hamet. He dies, he dies! the agony is on him.

Zamti. Life harass'd out, pursued with barb'rous art

Through ev'ry trembling joint, now fails at once.
Zaphimri—oh! farewell, I shall not see
The glories of thy reign. My son, my Hamet,
Thou good young man, farewell. Mandane, yes,
My soul with pleasure wings her flight, that thus,
Faithful in death, I leave these cold remains Near thy dear honour'd clay. (Dies.)

Zaph. And art thou dead,
Thou best of men? then must Zaphimri pine
In ever-during grief, since thou art lost;
Since that firm patriot, whose parental care Should raise, should guide, should animate my virtues,

Lies there a breathless corse.

Hamet. My liege, forbear;
Live for your people; madness and despair
Belong to woes like mine.

Zaph. Thy woes, indeed,
Are great, thou pious youth; yes, I will live
To soften thy afflictions; to assuage
A nation's grief when such a pair expires.
Come to my heart; in thee another Zamti
Shall bless the realm. Now let me hence to hail
My people with the sound of peace; that done,
To these a grateful monument shall rise,
With all sepulchral honour; frequent there
We'll offer incense; there each weeping muse
Shall grave the tributary verse; with tears
Embalm their memories; and teach mankind,
How'er oppression stalk the groaning earth,
Yet heav'n, in its own hour, can bring relief;
Can blast the tyrant in his guilty pride,
And prove the orphan's guardian to the last.

[Exeunt.]

THE EARL OF WARWICK;

A TRAGEDY, IN FIVE ACTS.—BY DR. THOMAS FRANKLIN.

Act IV.—Scene 1.

CHARACTERS.

KING EDWARD
EARL OF WARWICK

EARL OF PEMBROKE
EARL OF SUFFOLK

MARGARET OF ANJOU
LADY ELIZABETH GREY

LADY CLIFFORD OFFICERS

ACT I.—SCENE I.

Enter MARGARET OF ANJOU and LADY CLIFFORD.

Lady C. Thanks, gracious heav'n! my royal mistress smiles,
Unusual gladness sparkles in her eye,
And bids me welcome in the stranger joy,
To his new mansion.

Mar. Yes, my faithful Clifford,
Fortune is weary of oppressing me:
Through my dark cloud of grief, a cheerful ray
Of light breaks forth, and gilds the whole horizon.

Lady C. Henry in chains, and Edward on the
Of Lancaster; thyself a pris'ner here; [throne
Thy captive son torn from his mother's arms,
And in the tyrant's power; a kingdom lost!
Amidst so many sorrows, what new hope
Hath wrought this wondrous change?

Mar. That which alone,
In sorrow's bitt'rest hour, can minister
Sweet comfort to the daughters of affliction,
And bids misfortune smile, the hope of vengeance:
Vengeance, benignant patron of distress,
Thee I have oft invoc'd; propitious now
Thou smil'st upon me; if I do not grasp
The glorious opportunity, henceforth
Indignant frown, and leave me to my fate.

Lady C. Unhappy princess! that deceiver, hope,
Hath often flatter'd, and as oft betray'd thee:
What hast thou gain'd by all its promises?
What's the reward of all thy toils?

Mar. Experience.
Yes, Clifford, I have read the instructive volume
Of human nature; there long since have learn'd
The way to conquer men is by their passions;
Catch but the ruling foible of their hearts,
And all their boasted virtues shrink before you.
Edward and Warwick, those detested names,
Too well thou know'st, united to destroy me.

Lady C. That was, indeed, a fatal league.
Mar. But mark me;
If we could break this adamantine chain,
We might again be free: this mighty warrior,

This dread of kings, the unconquerable Warwick,
Is plighted to the fair Elizabeth. [ous widow,

Lady C. The Lady Grey, you mean, the beauty—
Whose husband fell in arms for Lancaster.

Mar. The same, my Clifford; Warwick long has Lady C. And means to wed her. [lov'd--

Mar. But if I have art,
Or she ambition, that shall never be.

Lady C. Canst thou prevent it?

Mar. Yes, my Clifford, Warwick
Were a mean choice for such transcendent beauty;
I shall provide her with a fitter husband,
A nobler far, and worthier of her charms,—
Young Edward.

Lady C. Ha! the king! impossible!
Warwick, ev'n now, commission'd by the state
To treat with Lewis, offers England's throne
To France's daughter; and ere this, perhaps,
Hath sign'd the solemn contract.

Mar. Solemn trifles!
Mere cobweb ties. Love's a despotic tyrant,
And laughs, like other kings, at public faith,
When it opposes private happiness:
Edward is youthful, gay, and amorous;
His soul is ever open to the lure
Of beauty, and Elizabeth hath charms
Might shake a hermit's virtue.

Lady C. Hath he seen
This peerless fair one?

Mar. Yes; by my contrivance,
When last he hunted in the forest, some,
Whom I had planted there, as if by chance
Alone directed, led him across the lawn
To Grafton: there, ev'n as my soul had wish'd,
The dazzling lustre of her charms surpris'd
His unsuspecting heart.

Lady C. What follow'd?

Mar. Oh!
He gaz'd and wonder'd; for awhile his pride
Indignant rose, and struggled with his passion;
But love was soon victorious: and, last night,
The Earl of Suffolk, (so my trusty spies

Inform me,) was despatch'd, on wings of love,
To plead his master's cause, and offer her
The throne of England.

Lady C. What if she refuse
The golden bribe?

Mar. No matter; all I wish
Is but to make them foes: the gen'rous Warwick
Is fiery, and impatient of reproof;
He will not brook a rival in his love,
Though seated on a throne; besides, thou know'st,
The haughty Earl looks down with scorn on Edward,
As the mere work of his all-pow'rful hand,
The baby monarch of his own creation. [veres

Lady C. Believe me, madam, Edward still re-
And loves him; still, as conscious of the debt,
Pays him with trust and confidence: their souls
Are link'd together in the strictest bonds
Of sacred friendship.

Mar. That but serves my cause:
Where ties are close, and interests united,
The slightest inj'ries are severely felt;
Offended friendship never can forgive.

Lady C. Now the full prospect opens to my view,
I see thy distant aim, and trace the paths
Of vengeance: England soon will be a scene
Of blood and horror; discord's fatal torch
Once lit up in this devoted land,
What pow'r shall e'er extinguish it? alas!
I tremble at the consequence.

Mar. And I
Enjoy it. Oh! 'twill be a noble contest [sion;
Of pride 'gainst pride, oppression 'gainst oppres-
Rise but the storm, and let the waves beat high,
The wreck may be our own: in the warm struggle,
Who knows but one or both of them may fall,
And Marg'ret rise triumphant on their ruin!
It must be so; and see the king approaches:
This way he passes from the council. Mark
His downcast eye: he is a stricken deer,
The arrow's in his side, he cannot 'scape:
We'll meet and speak to him.

Lady C. What mean you, madam?

Mar. To ask him what I know he will refuse;
That gives me fair pretext to break with him,
And join the man I hate, vindictive Warwick:
But, soft, he comes.

Enter KING EDWARD and an Officer.

K. Edw. Is Suffolk yet return'd?

Off. No, my good liege.

K. Edw. Go, wait and bring him to me; [Exit Off.
I'll to my closet. Pardon me, fair lady,
I saw you not.

Mar. Perhaps it is beneath
A conqu'ror to look down upon his slave;
But I've a boon to ask.

K. Edw. Whate'er it is,
Within the limits of fair courtesy,
Which honour can bestow, I'll not refuse thee.

Mar. There was time when Margaret of Anjou
Would not have deign'd to ask of Edward aught;
Nor was there aught which Edward dar'd refuse her;
But that is past, great Warwick's arm prevail'd,
And I am now your pris'ner.

K. Edw. Since the hour
When fortune smil'd propitious on the cause
Of justice, and gave vict'ry to our arms,
You have been treated with all due respect,
All your condition, or your sex could claim;
Serv'd like a queen, and lodg'd within our palace:
Is there aught more you can in reason ask,
Or I in prudence grant you?

Mar. Give me back
The liberty I lost, restore my son!
And I may then, perhaps, be reconcil'd
To an usurper; may withhold my vengeance,
And let thee sit unpunish'd on my throne.

K. Edw. You talk too proudly, madam; but to
I cannot fear, you have your liberty. [shew you
Letters this morning I receiv'd from France,
Have offer'd noble ransom for your person;
Without that ransom, (for the soul of Edward

Is far above the sordid lust of gold,)
I grant it: from this moment you are free;
But for your son, I cannot part with him.

Mar. I scorn your bounties, scorn your proffer'd
What's liberty to me without my child? [freedom:
But fate will place us soon above thy reach;
Thy short-liv'd tyranny is almost past;
The storm is gath'ring round thee, and will burst
With tenfold vengeance on thy guilty head.

K. Edw. I am not to be talk'd into submission,
Nor dread the menace of a clam'rous woman.

Mar. Thou may'st have cause to dread a woman's pow'r.

The time may come (mark my prophetic word!)
When wayward beauty shall repay with scorn
Thy fruitless vows, and vindicate my wrongs:
The friend thou lean'st on, like a broken reed,
Shall pierce thy side, and fill thy soul with anguish,
Keen as the pangs I feel: York's perjur'd house
Shall sink to rise no more; and Lancaster,
With added lustre, reassume the throne.
Hear this and tremble. Give me back my son,
Or dread the vengeance of a desp'rate mother.

[Exit Margaret and Lady Clifford.]

K. Edw. Imperious woman! but the voice of
Is ever clam'rous: 'tis the privilege, [woe
The charter of affliction to complain.
This tardy Suffolk! how I long to know,
Yet dread to hear my fate! Elizabeth,
On thee the colour of my future life
Depends; for thou alone canst make me bless'd
Or curs'd for ever. Oh! this cruel doubt
Is worse than all my tortures: but he comes,
Th' ambassador of love.

Enter the EARL OF SUFFOLK.

What news, my Suffolk?
Shall I be happy? Oh! I'm on the rack
Of expectation. Didst thou tell my tale
As if it were thy own? And may I hope—

Suf. My royal liege—

K. Edw. Good Suffolk, lay aside
The forms of dull respect, be brief, and tell me;
Speak, hast thou seen her, will she be my queen?
Quick, tell me ev'ry circumstance, each word,
Each look, each gesture; didst thou mark them,
Suffolk?

Suf. I did, and will recount it all; last night,
By your command, in secret I repair'd
To Grafton's tufted bow'r, the happy seat
Of innocence and beauty; there I found
Thy soul's best hope, the fair Elizabeth.
Ne'er did these eyes behold such sweet perfection:
I found her busy'd in the pious office
Of filial duty, tending her sick father.

K. Edw. That was a lucky moment to prefer
My humble suit: touch but the tender string
Of soft compassion in the heart, and love
Will quickly vibrate to its kindred passion.
You urg'd our royal purpose, then?

Suf. I did,

With all the warmth of friendship; dwelt with plea-
On ev'ry princely virtue that adorns [sure
Your heart: she listen'd with attention,
And echo'd back your praises.

K. Edw. Was not that
A kind of propitious omen?

Suf. Such indeed,
Hoping to find it, I call'd in the pow'rs
Of flattery to my aid, and gaz'd upon her,
As if confounded by her dazzling beauties.
Conscious she smil'd; but when, at length, I spake
Of England's monarch sighing at her feet,
The blush of virgin modesty o'erspread
Her cheek, and gave new lustre to her charms:
She turn'd aside, and as she silent bow'd
Her doubtful thanks, I mark'd the pearly tear
Steal down its secret track, and from her breast
Heard a deep sigh, she struggled to conceal;
If I have any judgment, or can trace
The hidden feelings of a woman's heart,
Her's is already fix'd: I fear, my liege,

With all that England, all that thou couldst give,
The crown would sit but heavy on her brow.

K. Edw. Not heavier, Suffolk, than it sits on mine:
My throne is irksome to me: who would wish
To be a sov'reign when Elizabeth
Prefers a subject? Then, th' impetuous Warwick,
His awful virtue will chastise my weakness.
I dread his censure, dread his keen reproaches,
And dread them more because they will be just.
I've promis'd Lewis to espouse his daughter,
To strengthen our alliance: would to heav'n
I had not! If I seek this coy refuser,
And break with France, Warwick will take th' alarm;
If once offended, he's inexorable.

Suf. I know him well. Believe me, the high
And haughty spirit, when it meets rebuke,
Is easiest check'd, and sinks into submission.
Let him, my liege, who ventures to arraign
His master's conduct, look into his own:
There ever is a corner in the heart
Open to folly; Warwick is not free
From human frailties.

K. Edw. No: ambition fires
His noble breast, love triumphs over mine:
But well thou know'st, our eyes are ever open
To others' faults, and shut against our own.
We seldom pity woes we ne'er experienc'd,
Or pardon weakness which we do not feel:
He is a hero.

Suf. Heroes are but men;
I have some cause to think so; but of that
We'll talk another time: meanwhile, my liege,
I think Lord Warwick is an useful friend.

K. Edw. Ay, and a dangerous foe; the people
To adoration love him: if he falls [love,
From his allegiance, crowds will follow him.
England has long been rent by civil broils,
And fain would rest her in the arms of peace:
Her wounds scarce clos'd, shall Edward open them,
And bid them bleed afresh? believe me, Suffolk,
I would not be the cause of new divisions
Amongst my people, for a thousand kingdoms.

Suf. 'Tis nobly said, and may thy grateful sub-
Revere thy virtues, and reward thy love. [jects

K. Edw. Oh! Suffolk, did they know but half the cares

That wait on royalty, they would not grudge
Their wretched master a few private hours
Of social happiness. If France consents,
I am undone; and Warwick hath ere this
Enslav'd me: curse on this state policy,
That binds us thus to love at second hand!
Who knows but he may link me to a wretch;
Wed me to folly, ignorance, and pride,
Ill-nature, sickness, or deformity!
And when I'm chain'd to mis'ry, coldly tell me,
To sooth my griefs, 'twas for the public good.

Suf. How far you have commission'd him, I know not;

But were I worthy to advise, my liege,
I would not be the dupe of his ambition,
But follow nature's dictates, and be happy.
England has charms besides Elizabeth's,
And beauties that—

K. Edw. No more; my heart is fix'd
On her alone: find out this pow'ful rival,
I charge thee, Suffolk: yet why wish to find,
What, found, will make me wretched? Were he bound

In cords of tend'rest friendship round my heart,
Dearer than Warwick, dearer than thyself,
Forgive me, but I fear I should abhor him.
Oh! think on something that may yet be done
To win her to my heart ere Warwick comes.

Suf. I hear he is expected every hour.

K. Edw. Grant, heav'n, some friendly storm may
I dread his presence here. [yet retard him!

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My liege, the Earl
Of Warwick is arriv'd.

K. Edw. Ha! when? how? where?

Would he were buried in the rapid waves
That brought him hither! Comes he here to-knight?

Mess. My liege, ere now he might have reach'd the palace;

But that the shouting multitudes press hard
On ev'ry side, and seem to worship him. [Exit.

Suf. Such adoration

But ill befits the idol that receives it. [see him

K. Edw. What's to be done? I cannot, must not Till all is fix'd: once more, my best-lov'd Suffolk,
Try the soft arts of thy persuasive tongue;
What method canst thou think on, to evade
This promis'd marriage with ambitious France?

Suf. Summon your council, lay your thoughts before them;

Meet Warwick there, and urge a sov'reign's right
To please himself in that which should concern
Himself alone: firm Buckingham and I
Will plead your cause against the haughty Warwick,
Whom I would treat with cold civility
And distant state, which ever angers more
Resentful spirits, than the warmth of passion.

K. Edw. 'Tis well advis'd: meantime, if possible,
I will compose my troubled thoughts to rest:
Suffolk, adieu: if Warwick ask for me,
I am not well; I'm hunting in the forest;
I'm busy—Stay, remember what I told you
Touching the earldom which I mean to give
Her father; that may bring her to the court:
You understand me, Suffolk; fare thee well.

[Exit Suffolk.

Why should I dread to see the man I love;
The man I rev'rence? Warwick is not chang'd,
But Edward is. Suffolk, I know, abhors him.
A fav'rite must be hated: if he urges
This dreadful contract, I shall hate him too:
I cannot live without Elizabeth.

I'll think no more: if I must sacrifice
My friendship or my love, the choice is made. [Exit.

ACT II.—SCENE I.

Enter WARWICK, speaking to an Officer.

War. 'Tis well: I shall attend his highness' pleasure. (Comes forward.)

Meet me i'th' council! Warwick might have claim'd
A private audience. After all my toils,
My perils in his service, 'tis a cold,
Unkind reception: some base whisperer,
Some needy sycophant, perhaps, hath poison'd
My royal master's ear; or, do I judge
Too rashly? As my embassy concerns
The public welfare, he would honour me
With public thanks. Elizabeth will chide me
For this unkind delay; but honour calls,
And duty to my king: that task perform'd,
I haste, my love, to happiness and thee. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—The Council-chamber.

KING EDWARD, DUKES OF CLARENCE and BUCK-INGHAM, EARLS OF SUFFOLK, PEMBROKE, &c. discovered.

K. Edw. Good Buckingham, I thank thee for thy counsel,

Nor blame thy honest warmth; I love this freedom;
'Tis the birthright of an Englishman,
And doth become thee: what says noble Suffolk?

Suf. I would not cross my royal master's will;
But, on my soul, I think, this nuptial league
With France prepost'rous and impolitic.
It cannot last; we are by nature foes,
And nought but mutual poverty and weakness
Can ever make us friends; she wants our aid
Against the pow'ful Burgundy; and, therefore,
Throws out this lure of beauty to ensnare you;
That purpose gain'd, she turns her arms against us.

Pem. Why, let her: if she comes with hostile arm,
England, thank heav'n! is ready to receive her:
I love my country, and revere my king,
As much, perhaps, as honest Buckingham,
Or my good fearful Lord of Suffolk here,
Who knows so well, or would be thought to know,
What France will do hereafter: yet, I think,
The faith of nations is a thing so sacred,

It ought not to be trifled with. I hate,
As much as you, th' unnatural forc'd alliance;
And yet, my lords, if Warwick is empow'r'd,
For so I hear he is, to treat with Lewis,
I know not how in honour you can swerve
From his conditions. (Shouting.)
Hark! the hero comes:
Those shouts proclaim him near: the joyful people
Will usher in their great deliverer
As he deserves.

Enter the EARL OF WARWICK.

K. Edw. Thrice welcome, noble Warwick,
Welcome to all! (To Clarence, Pembroke, &c.)

Suf. You've had, my lord, I fear,
An arduous task, which few could execute;
But Warwick, in the council and the field,
Alike distinguish'd, and alike successful.

K. Edw. What says our cousin France?

War. By me, my liege,
He greets you well, and hopes in closer ties
United soon to wear a dearer name.
At length, thank heav'n! the iron gates of war
Are clos'd, and peace displays her silken banners
O'er the contending nations; ev'ry doubt
Is now remov'd, and confidence establish'd,
I hope, to last for ages.

K. Edw. Peace, my lord,
Is ever welcome; 'tis the gift of heav'n,
The nurse of science, art's fair patroness,
And merit's best protector; but if France
Would chain us down to ignominious terms,
Cramp our free commerce, and infringe the rights
Of our liege subjects, England may repent
Too late her rash credulity, and peace
With all her blessings may be bought too dear.

War. The shame would then be his who made the
If any doubt my faith, my honest zeal [purchase
For thee and for my country, let him speak,
And I will answer: punish me, just heav'n,
If in the task I have consulted aught
But England's honour, and my sov'reign's glory!

K. Edw. Mistake me not, good Warwick; well
I know

Thy spotless truth, thy honour, and thy love;
But glory has no further charms for me:
Rais'd by thy pow'rful aid to England's throne,
I ask no more: already I am great
As fame and fortune with their smiles can make me,
And all I wish for now is to be happy. [care:

War. That, too, my liege, has been thy Warwick's
Happy thou shalt be if the fairest form
That ever caught a gazing lover's eye,
Join'd to the sweetest, most engaging virtues
Can make thee so. Bona accepts with joy
Thy proffer'd hand: she is, indeed, a gem
Fit to adorn the brightest crown; to see
Is to admire her; trust me, England's self,
The seat of beauty, and the throne of love,
Boasts not a fairer.

K. Edw. Beauty, good my lord,
Is all ideal; 'tis the wayward child
Of fancy, shifting with the changeful wind
Of fond opinion; what to you appears
The model of perfection, may disgust
My strange, capricious taste.

War. Such charms would fix
Inconstancy itself; her winning virtues,
Ev'n if her beauty fail'd, would soon subdue
The rebel heart, and you would learn to love her.

K. Edw. Is passion to be learn'd, then? wouldst
A science of affection; guide the heart, [thou make
And teach it where to fix? impossible!

'Tis strange philosophy! (Rises and comes forward.)
My lord of Warwick,
Your zeal in England's and in Edward's cause,
Merits our thanks; but for th' intended marriage
With France's daughter, it may never be.

War. Not be! it must: your sacred word is pass'd,
And cannot be recall'd: but three days since
I sign'd the contract, and my honour's pledg'd
For the performance. Heav'ns! whilst fickle France

Is branded 'midst the nations of the earth,
For breach of public faith, shall we, my liege,
Practise ourselves the vices we condemn;
Pass o'er a rival nation's ev'ry virtue,
And imitate their perfidy alone? [part

K. Edw. You'll pardon me, my lord; I thought it
Of a king's pow'r to have a will, to see
With his own eyes, and in life's little feast,
To cater for himself; but 'tis, it seems,
A privilege his servants can refuse him. [conquer
War. And so they ought: the king who cannot
His private interest for the public welfare,
Knows not his duty.

K. Edw. Kings, my lord, are born
With passions, feelings, hearts, like other men;
Nor see I yet, why Edward's happiness
Must fall a sacrifice to Warwick's honour. [own:

War. My honour, sir, is your's; my cause your
Who sent me, and whose image did I bear?
The image of a great and glorious king,
Or of a weak and wav'ring boy? Henceforth,
Choose from the herd of fawning sycophants,
Some needy slave for your mock embassies,
To do your work, and stain the name of England
With foul reproach. Edward, I blush for thee
And for my country; from this hour, expect
From injur'd France contempt, with deep resentment
For broken faith, and enmity eternal.

K. Edw. Eternal be it, then; for, as I prize
My inward peace, beyond the pomp of state,
And all the tinsel glare of fond ambition,
I will not wed her. Gracious heav'n! what am I?
The meanest peasant in my realm may choose
His rustic bride, and share with her the sweets
Of mutual friendship and domestic bliss;
Why should my happier subjects, then, deny me
The common rights, the privilege of nature,
And, in a land of freedom, thus conspire
To make their king the only slave amongst 'em?

War. The worst of slaves is he whom passion rules,
Uncheck'd by reason and the pow'rful voice
Of friendship, which, I fear, is heard no more
By thoughtless Edward: 'tis the curse of kings
To be surrounded by a venal herd
Of flatterers, that sooth his darling vices,
And rob their master of his subjects' love.
Nay, frown not, sirs, supported as ye are,
I fear you not: which of this noble train,
These well-beloved counsellors and friends,
Assembled here to witness my disgrace,
Have urged to this base, unmanly falsehood?
Shame on you all! to stain the spotless mind
Of uncorrupted youth, undo the work
Of Warwick's friendly hand, and give him back
A sov'reign so unlike the noble Edward. [tion,

Suf. My lord, we thank you for the kind sugges-
Howe'er ill-founded; and when next we meet
To give our voice in aught that may concern
The public weal, no doubt shall ask your leave
Ere we proceed.

Pem. My Lord of Suffolk, speak
But for yourself; Warwick hath too much cause
To be offended: in my poor opinion,
Whate'er you courtiers think, the best support
Of England's throne are equity and truth;
Nor will I hold that man my sov'reign's friend
Who shall exhort him to forsake his word,
And play the hypocrite: what tie shall bind
The subject to obedience, when his king,
Bankrupt in honour, gives the royal sanction
To perfidy and falsehood?

Buck. It becomes
But ill the Earl of Pembroke—

K. Edw. Good my lords,
Let us have no dissensions here; we met
For other purposes: some few days hence
We shall expect your counsel in affairs
Of moment; for the present, urge no further
This matter: fare ye well. (The Council break up.)

K. Edw. Lord Warwick, keep
In narrower bounds, that proud, impetuous temper;

It may be fatal : there are private reasons ;
When time befits we shall impart them to you.
Meanwhile, if you have friendship, love, or duty,
No more of Bona. I'm determin'd. [Exit.

War. So :
'Tis well ; 'tis very well ; I have deserv'd it ;
I've borne this callow eagle on my wing,
And now he spurns me from him : 'tis a change
I little look'd for, and sits heavy on me :
Alas ! how doubly painful is the wound,
When 'tis inflicted by the hand we love !
Cruel, ungrateful Edward !
Ha ! who's here ?
The captive queen ! If she has aught to ask
Of me, she comes in luckless hour, for I Am pow'rless now.

Enter MARGARET OF ANJOU.

Will Margaret of Anjou
Thus deign to visit her acknowledg'd foe ?

Mar. Alas ! my lord, inur'd to wretchedness
As I am, and familiar with misfortune,
I harbour no resentment ; have long since
Forgot that ever Warwick was my foe,
And only wish to prove myself his friend.

War. Talk not of friendship, 'tis an empty name,
And lives but in idea ; once, indeed,
I thought I had a friend.

Mar. Whose name was—Edward ;
Read I aright, my lord ? and am I not
A shrewd diviner ? yes ; that downcast eye
And gloomy aspect say I am : you look
As if the idol, made by your own hands,
Had fallen upon and crushed you : is't not so ?

War. Amazement ! nought escapes thy piercing
And penetrating judgment : 'tis too true, [eye
I am a poor dishonour'd slave,
Not worth thy seeking ; leave me, for the tide
Of court preferment flows another way. [not

Mar. The feast, perhaps, you have provided, suits
With Edward's nicer palate ; he disdains,
How sweet soe'er, to taste a foreign banquet,
And relishes no dainties but his own :
Am I again mistaken ?

War. Sure thou deal'st
With some all-knowing spirit, who imparts
Each secret purpose to thee, else how knew'st thou
That Edward refus'd to wed the princess ?

Mar. Oh ! it requires no supernatural aid
To trace his actions, nor has Marg'ret trod
The paths of life with unobserving eye :
I could have told you this long since ; for, know,
The choice is made, the nuptial rites prepar'd,
Which, but for your return, (as unexpected
As undesired,) had been, e'er this, complete ;
And, as in duty bound, you then had paid
Your due obedience to our English queen.

War. Determin'd, say'st thou ? gracious heaven !
I am return'd. ['tis well

Mar. Indeed, my lord, you came
A little out of season ; 'twas unkind
To interrupt your master's happiness,
To blast so fair a passion in its bloom,
And check the rising harvest of his love.

War. Marg'ret, I thank thee ; yes, it must be so :
His blushes, his confusion, all confirm it ;
And yet I am amaz'd, astonish'd.

Mar. Wherefore ?
Is it so strange a youthful prince should love ?
Is it so strange a mind, unfraught with wisdom,
And lifted high with proud prosperity,
Should follow pleasure through the crooked paths
Of falsehood, should forsake an useless friend,
For the warm joys of animating beauty ?

War. No : but 'tis strange, that he who knows how much
He ow'd to Warwick, he, who ev'ry hour
Tastes the rich stream of bounty, should forget
The fountain whence it flow'd.

Mar. Alas ! my lord,
Had you been chasten'd in affliction's school

As I have been, and taught, by sad experience,
To know mankind, you had not fall'n a prey
To such delusion.

War. Was it like a friend,
Was it like Edward to conceal his love ?
Some base, insinuating, artful woman,
With borrow'd charms, perhaps—

Mar. Hold, hold ! my lord,
Be not too rash : who fights in darkness oft
May wound a bosom friend : perhaps you wrong
The best and most accomplish'd of her sex.

War. Know you the lady ?

Mar. But as fame reports,
Of peerless beauty and transcendent charms ;
But of her virtues, I must ask of—you.

War. Of me ? what virtues ? whose ?

Mar. Elizabeth's.

War. Amazement ! no ; it must not, it cannot be :
Elizabeth ! he could not, dare not do it !
Confusion ! I shall soon discover all. (Aside.)
But what have I to do with Edward's choice,
Whoe'er she be, if he refuses mine ?

Mar. Dissimulation sits but ill, my lord,
On minds like your's : I am a poor weak woman,
And so, it seems, you think me. But suppose
That same all-knowing spirit which you rais'd,
Who condescends so kindly to instruct me,
Should whisper (Warwick knows the power of love
As well as Edward) that Elizabeth
Was his first wish, the idol of his soul ;
What say you ? might I venture to believe it ?

War. Marg'ret, you might ; for 'tis in vain to hide
A thought from thee ; it might have told you, too,
If it be so, there is not such a wretch
On earth as Warwick : give me but the proof.

Mar. Lord Suffolk was last night despatch'd to Grafton,
To offer her a share in Edward's throne.

War. Which she refus'd : did she not, Marg'ret ?
She did. [say,

Mar. I know not that, my lord ; but crowns
Are dazzling meteors in a woman's eye ;
Such strong temptations, few of us, I fear,
Have virtue to resist.

War. Elizabeth
Has every virtue ; I'll not doubt her faith.

Mar. Edward is young and handsome.

War. Curses on him !
Think'st thou he knew my fond attachment there ?

Mar. Oh ! passing well, my lord ; and when 'twas
urg'd,

How deeply 'twould affect you, swore by heav'n,
Imperious Warwick ne'er should be the master
Of charms like her's ; 'twas happiness, he said,
Beyond a subject's merit to deserve,
Beyond his hope to wish for or aspire to. [been

War. But for that Warwick, Edward's self had
A subject still ; and may be so, hereafter.
Thou smil'st at my misfortunes.

Mar. I must smile
When I behold a subtle statesman thus
Dup'd and deluded by a shallow boy ;
Sent on a fruitless errand to expose
His country and himself ; it was, indeed,
A master stroke of policy, beyond, [green
One should have thought, the reach of years so
As Edward's, to despatch the weeping lover,
And seize the glorious opportunity
Of tamp'ring with his mistress here at home.

War. Did Neville, Rutland, Clifford, bleed for this ?

Mar. For this doth Henry languish in a dungeon,
And wretched Marg'ret live a life of woe :
For this you gave the crown to pious Edward,
And thus he thanks you for his kingdom.

War. Crowns
Are baubles, fit for children like himself
To play with ; I have scatter'd many of them :
But thus to cross me in my dearest hope,
The sweet reward of all my toils for him

And for his country; if I suffer it,
If I forgive him, may I live the scorn
Of men, a branded coward, and old age
Without or love or rev'rence be my portion!
Henceforth, good Marg'ret, know me for thy friend:
We will have noble vengeance. Are there not
Still left amongst the lazy sons of peace,
Some busy spirits who wish well to thee
And to thy cause?

Mar. There are: resentment sleeps,
But is not dead; beneath the hollow cover
Of loyalty, the slumb'ring ashes lie
Unheeded; Warwick's animating breath
Will quickly light them into flames again. [thee:]

War. Then, Edward, from this moment I abjure
Oh! I will make thee ample recompense
For all the wrongs that I have done the house
Of Lancaster: go, summon all thy friends;
Be quick, good Marg'ret; haste ere I repent,
And yield my soul to perjur'd York again.
The king, I think, gives you free liberty
To range abroad.

Mar. He doth, and I will use it
As I would ever use the gift of foes,
To his destruction.

War. That arch-pander, Suffolk,
That minister of vice—But time is precious;
To-morrow, Marg'ret, we will meet in private,
And have some further conference; meantime,
Devise, consult, use ev'ry means against
Our common foe: remember, from this hour,
Warwick's thy friend: be secret and be happy.

[Exit.]

Mar. What easy fools these cunning statesmen
With all their policy, when once they fall [are,
Into a woman's pow'r! This gallant leader,
This blust'ring Warwick, how the hero shrunk
And lessen'd to my sight! Elizabeth,
I thank thee for thy wonder-working charms;
The time, perhaps, may come, when I shall stand
Indebted to them for—the throne of England.
Proud York beware, for Lancaster's great name
Shall rise superior in the lists of fame:
Fortune that long had frown'd, shall smile at last,
And make amends for all my sorrows past. [Exit.]

ACT III.—SCENE I.

Enter MARGARET OF ANJOU, LADY CLIFFORD, and Attendants.

Mar. (To a Gentleman.) Despatch these letters straight to Scotland; this
To the French envoy; these to the Earl of Pembroke. (Turning to Lady Clifford.)
Thus far, my friend, hath fortune favour'd us
Beyond our hopes: the soul of haughty Warwick
Is all on fire, and puling Edward loves
With most romantic ardour. Oh! my Clifford,
You would have smil'd to see how artfully
I play'd upon him: flatter'd, sooth'd, provok'd,
And wrought him to my purpose: we are link'd
In firmest bonds of amity and love.

Lady C. Hath Warwick, then, so soon forgot his Edward?
Think'st thou the frantic Earl will e'er exert
His ill-directed powers to pull down
The royal structure which himself had rais'd?
Never.

Mar. What is there disappointed love
And unrestrain'd ambition will not do?
I tell thee, we are sworn and cordial friends.

Lady C. Thou know'st he hates the house of Lancaster.

Mar. No matter; he has marvellous good skill
In making kings, and I have business for him.

Lady C. And canst thou, then, forget the cruel
wrongs,
The deep-felt inj'ries of oppressive Warwick,
To join the hand that forg'd thy husband's chains,
And robb'd thee of a crown?

Mar. But what, my Clifford,
If the same hand that ravish'd, should restore it?
'Tis a court friendship, and may last as long

As int'rest shall direct: I've not forgot,
No, nor forgiv'n; I hate, abhor, detest him;
But I will use him as my instrument,
My necessary tool; I'll make him draw
His trait'rous sword, to sheath it in the breast
Of him he loves, then point it to his own:
Yes, Clifford, I have twin'd me round his heart;
Like the fell serpent, crept into his bosom,
That I might sting more surely: he shall perish;
I keep him for the last dear precious morsel,
To crown the glorious banquet of revenge.

Lady C. 'Tis what he merits from us; yet th' attempt

Were dang'rous, he is still the people's idol.

Mar. And so, perhaps, shall Marg'ret be; ap-
Waits on success; the fickle multitude [plause
(Like the light straw that floats along the stream)
Glide with the current still, and follow fortune.
Our prospect brightens every hour: the people
Are ripe for a revolt: by civil wars,
Long time inur'd to savage scenes of plunder
And desolation, they delight in war: [ter,
These English heroes, when once flesh'd with slaugh-
Like the keen mastiff, lose not soon the track
Of vengeance, nor forget the taste of blood.

Lady C. What further succours have we to de-Beside Earl Warwick's? [pend on,

Mar. Oh! his name alone
Will be an army to us.

Lady C. If we have it:
Resentment is a short-liv'd passion. What
If Warwick should relent, and turn again
To Edward?

Mar. Then I have a bosom friend
That shall be ready to reward him for it;
But I have better hopes: without his aid,
We are not friendless: Scotland's hardy sons,
Who smile at danger, and defy the storm,
Will leave their barren mountains to defend
That liberty they love: add, too, the aid
Of gallant Pembroke, and the pow'rs which France
Will send to vindicate her injur'd honour:
E'er Edward can collect his force and take
The field, we shall be thirty thousand strong.

Lady C. But what becomes of the young prince?

Mar. Ay; there
I am, indeed, unhappy. Oh! my child,
How shall I set him free? Hear, nature, hear
A mother's pray'r! oh! guide me with thy counsel,
And teach me how to save my darling boy.
Ay, now I have it: monitress divine,
I thank thee: yes; I wait but for the means
Of his escape, then fly this hated palace,
Nor will return till I can call it mine. [Exeunt.]

Enter KING EDWARD and the EARL OF SUFFOLK.

K. Edw. I fear we've gone too far: th' indignant
Warwick [folk,
Ill brook'd our steady purpose; mark'd you, Suf-
With what an eye of scorn he turn'd him from us,
And low'r'd defiance: that prophetic woman!
Half of her curse already is fulfill'd,
And I have lost my friend.

Suf. Some friends, perhaps,
Are better lost: you'll pardon me, my liege;
But, were it fitting, I could tell a tale
Would soon convince you Warwick is as weak—

K. Edw. As Edward, thou wouldst say.

Suf. But 'twill distress
Thy noble heart too much; I dare not, sir;
Yet one day you must know it.

K. Edw. Then, by thee
Let it be told me, Suffolk; thy kind hand
Will best administer the bitter draught:
Go on, my Suffolk; speak, I charge thee, speak.

Suf. That rival whom thou wish'd me to discover— [thou found

K. Edw. Ay, what of him? quick, tell me, hast
The happy traitor? give me but to know,
That I may wreak my speedy vengeance on him.

Suf. Suppose that rival were the man whom most

You lov'd, the man, perhaps, whom most you fear'd;
Suppose 'twere—Warwick.

K. Edw. Ha! it cannot be:

I would not think it for a thousand worlds.

Warwick in love with her, impossible!

Now, Suffolk, do I fear thou speak'st from envy

And jealous hatred of the noble Warwick,

Not from the love of justice or of Edward:

Where didst thou learn this falsehood?

Suf. From the lips

Of truth, from one whose honour and whose word
You will not question; from—Elizabeth. [so.

K. Edw. From her! nay, then, I fear it must be

Suf. When last I saw her, for again I went

By your command, though hopeless of success,

With all the little eloquence that I

Was master of, I urg'd your ardent passion;

Told her how much, how tenderly you lov'd her,

And press'd with eagerness to know the cause

Of her unkind refusal; till at length,

Reluctantly, with blushes she confess'd [ness,

There was a cause: she thank'd you for your good-

'Twas more she said, much more than she deserv'd,

She ever should revere her king: and if

She had a heart to give, it should be—Edward's.

K. Edw. So kind, and yet so cruel: well, go on.

Suf. Then told me all the story of her love,

That Warwick long had woo'd her; that her hand

Was promis'd; soon as he return'd from France,

Though once her father cruelly oppos'd it,

They were, by his consent, to be united.

K. Edw. Oh! never, Suffolk, may I live to see

That dreadful hour! Designing hypocrite!

Are these his arts, is this the friend I lov'd?

By heav'n! she shall be mine; I will assert

A sov'reign's right, and tear her from him. What

If he rebel—another civil war!

'Tis terrible. Oh! that I could shake off

This cumbrous garb of majesty that clings

So close around me, meet him man to man,

And try who best deserves her: but when kings

Grow mad, their guiltless subjects pay the forfeit.

Horrible thought! Good Suffolk, for awhile

I would be private; therefore, wait without;

Let me have no intruders; above all,

Keep Warwick from my sight. [Exit Suffolk.

Enter the EARL OF WARWICK.

War. Behold him here;

No welcome guest, it seems, unless I ask

My Lord of Suffolk's leave: there was a time

When Warwick wanted not his aid to gain

Admission herè.

K. Edw. There was a time, perhaps, [it.

When Warwick more desir'd and more deserv'd

War. Never; I've been a foolish faithful slave;

All my best years, the morning of my life,

Hath been devoted to your service: what

Are now the fruits? disgrace and infamy;

My spotless name, which never yet the breath

Of calumny had tainted, made the mock

For foreign fools to carp at: but 'tis fit

Who trust in princes, should be thus rewarded.

K. Edw. I thought, my lord, I had full well repaid

Your services with honours, wealth, and pow'r

Unlimited: thy all-directing hand

Guided in secret ev'ry latent wheel

Of government, and mov'd the whole machine:

Warwick was all in all, and pow'rless Edward

Stood like a cipher in the great account. [thee

War. Who gave that cipher worth, and seated

On England's throne? thy undistinguish'd name

Had rotted in the dust from whence it sprung,

And moulder'd in oblivion, had not Warwick

Dug from its sordid mine the useless ore,

And stamp'd it with a diadem. Thou know'st,

This wretched country, doom'd, perhaps, like

To fall by its own self-destroying hand, [Rome,

Tost for so many years in the rough sea

Of civil discord, but for me had perish'd.

In that distressful hour I seiz'd the helm,

Bade the rough waves subside in peace, and steer'd

Your shatter'd vessel safe into the harbour.

You may despise, perhaps, that useless aid

Which you no longer want; but know, proud youth,

He who forgets a friend, deserves a foe.

K. Edw. Know, too, reproach for benefits re-
Pays ev'ry debt, and cancels obligation. [ceiv'd,

War. Why, that, indeed, is frugal honesty,

A thrifty saving knowledge, when the debt

Grows burthensome, and cannot be discharg'd.

A sponge will wipe out all, and cost you nothing.

K. Edw. When you have counted o'er the numerous train

Of mighty gifts your bounty lavish'd on me,

You may remember next the inj'ries

Which I have done you; let me know 'em all,

And I will make you ample satisfaction.

War. Thou canst not; thou hast robb'd me of a

It is not in thy pow'r to restore: [jewel

I was the first, shall future annals say,

That broke the sacred bond of public trust

And mutual confidence; ambassadors,

In after times, mere instruments, perhaps,

Of venal statesmen, shall recall my name

To witness, that they want not an example,

And plead my guilt, to sanctify their own.

Amidst the herd of mercenary slaves [Warwick

That haunt your court, could none be found but

To be the shameless herald of a lie? [on me?

K. Edw. And wouldst thou turn the vile reproach

If I have broke my faith, and stain'd the name

Of England, thank thy own pernicious counsels

That urg'd me to it, and extorted from me

A cold consent to what my heart abhorr'd.

War. I've been abus'd, insulted, and betray'd;

My injur'd honour cries aloud for vengeance;

Her wounds will never close!

K. Edw. These gusts of passion

Will but inflame them; if I have been right

Inform'd, my lord, besides these dang'rous scars

Of bleeding honour, you have other wounds

As deep, though not so fatal; such, perhaps,

As none but fair Elizabeth can cure.

War. Elizabeth!

K. Edw. Nay, start not, I have cause

To wonder most: I little thought, indeed,

When Warwick told me I might learn to love,

He was, himself, so able to instruct me:

But I've discover'd all.

War. And so have I;

Too well I know thy breach of friendship there;

Thy fruitless, base endeavours to supplant me.

K. Edw. I scorn it, sir; Elizabeth hath charms,

And I have equal right with you t'admire them:

Nor see I aught so godlike in the form,

So all-commanding in the name of Warwick,

That he alone should revel in the charms

Of beauty, and monopolize perfection.

I knew not of your love.

War. By heav'n! 'tis false;

You knew it all, and meanly took occasion,

Whilst I was busy'd in the noble office

Your grace thought fit to honour me withal,

To tamper with a weak, unguarded woman,

To bribe her passions high, and basely steal

A treasure which your kingdom could not purchase.

K. Edw. How know you that? But be it as it may,

I had a right, nor will I tamely yield

My claim to happiness, the privilege

To choose the partner of my throne and bed:

It is a branch of my prerogative. [rants:

War. Prerogative! what's that? the boast of ty-

A borrow'd jewel, glitt'ring in the crown

With specious lustre, lent but to betray:

You had it, sir, and hold it from the people.

K. Edw. And therefore do I prize it; I would guard

Their liberties, and they shall strengthen mine:

But when proud faction and her rebel crew

Insult their sov'reign, trample on his laws,

And bid defiance to his pow'r, the people,

In justice to themselves, will then defend

His cause, and vindicate the rights they gave.

War. Go to your darling people, then; for soon,
If I mistake not, 'twill be needful; try
Their boasted zeal, and see if one of them
Will dare to lift his arm up in your cause,
If I forbid them.

K. Edw. Is it so, my lord?
Then mark my words: I've been your slave too long,
And you have rul'd me with a rod of iron;
But, henceforth, know, proud peer, I am thy master,
And will be so: the king who delegates
His pow'r to others' hands, but ill deserves
The crown he wears.

War. Look well, then, to your own;
It sits but loosely on your head; for know,
The man who injur'd Warwick never pass'd
Unpunish'd yet.

K. Edw. Nor he who threaten'd Edward:
You may repent it, sir. My guards, there; seize
This traitor and convey him to the Tow'r!
There let him learn obedience.

Enter Guards, who seize Warwick.

War. Slaves, stand off:
If I must yield my sword, I'll give it him
Whom it so long has serv'd; there's not a part
In this old faithful steel, that is not stain'd
With English blood in grateful Edward's cause.
Give me my chains, they are the bands of friendship,
Of a king's friendship; for his sake, awhile,
I'll wear them.

K. Edw. Hence: away with him.

War. 'Tis well:
Exert your pow'r, it may not last you long;
For know, though Edward may forget his friend,
That England will not. Now, sir, I attend you.

[Exeunt Warwick and Guards.]

K. Edw. Presumptuous rebel! Ah! who's there?

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My liege,
Queen Marg'ret with the prince her son are fled;
In a few hours she hopes (for so we learn
From those who have pursu'd her) to be join'd
By th' Earl of Warwick; in his name, it seems,
She has already rais'd three thousand men.

K. Edw. Warwick in league with her? Oh, heav'n! 'tis well

We've crush'd the serpent ere his poison spread
Throughout our kingdom: guard the palace gates,
Keep double watch; summon my troops together.
Where is my brother Clarence, Buckingham,
And Pembroke? We must check this foul rebellion.

[Exit Messenger.]

Enter the EARL OF SUFFOLK.

Suf. My liege, the Duke of Clarence—

K. Edw. What of him? [him]

Suf. Hath left the court; this moment I beheld
In conf'rence deep with Pembroke, who, it seems,
Is Marg'ret's firmest friend: 'tis whisper'd, both
Will join the Queen.

K. Edw. Well; 'tis no matter: I
Have deeper cause for grief; he cannot feel
A brother's falsehood who has lost a friend,
A friend like Warwick. Suffolk, thou behold'st me
Betray'd, deserted by the man I lov'd;
Treated with indifference by her
Whom I ador'd, forsaken by my brother,
And threaten'd by the subjects I protect;
Oppress'd on every side: but thou shalt see
I have a soul superior to misfortunes.
Though rebel Clarence wrings my tortur'd heart,
And faithless Warwick braves me, we will yet
Maintain our right. Come on, my friend, thou know'st
Without his boasted aid I could have gain'd
The crown, without him now I will preserve it.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Tower.

Enter the EARL OF WARWICK.

War. Mistaken mortals plan delusive schemes
Of bliss, and call futurity their own,
Yet are not masters of a moment. This
Was the appointed time, the very day

Which should have join'd me to Elizabeth
In nuptial bonds: Oh! cruel memory,
Do not torment me. If there be a crime
Of deeper die than all the guilty train
Of human vices, 'tis—ingratitude.
'Tis now two years since Henry lost the crown,
And here he is, ev'n in this very prison
A fellow captive now: disgraceful thought!
How will he smile to meet his conqu'ror here!
Oh! for that stoic apathy which lulls
The drowsy soul to sweet forgetfulness!
But 'twill not be: Elizabeth, where art thou?
Perhaps with Edward—Oh! that thought distracts
It is, I fear, as Marg'ret said; she's false. [me:]
But when I look on these, can I expect
To find one virtue left in human kind?
My Pembroke too! am I so soon forgotten?
Oh! no; he comes—

Enter the EARL OF PEMBROKE.

Pem. My friend!

War. My Pembroke, welcome:
Thee I have ever found most just and kind;
But, in the darkness of adversity,
The jewel friendship shines with double lustre.

Pem. I am not of the insect train that bask
In fortune's sunshine, and when ev'ning damps
Arise, are seen no more: no, Warwick; what
I speak, I mean: you have been hardly treated.

War. Oh! Pembroke, didst thou know but half the wrongs

That I have suffer'd, thou wouldst pity me.

Pem. I would do more, much more, my Warwick:
Who only pities, but insults the wretched: [he]
I come with nobler views; I come to tell thee,
That I have felt thy inj'ries as my own,
And will revenge them too.

War. How kind thou art
To feel for Warwick!

Pem. Ev'ry honest breast
Must feel the inj'ries that a good man suffers:
Thine is the common cause of all: adieu
To English freedom, when our liberty
Shall be dependent on a sov'reign's nod,
When years of honest service shall be paid
With infamy and chains.

War. I've not deserv'd them. [hast great]

Pem. Nor shalt thou wear them long: for thou
And pow'rful friends—the noble Duke of Clarence—
Behold his signet: this, my Warwick, gain'd me
Admission here. We must be secret.

War. Then I am not forsaken: Clarence!—Ha!

Pem. Yes;
The gallant youth, with honest zeal, declar'd
He lov'd his brother much, but justice more.

War. Then, Edward, I defy thee: gen'rous Clarence!

Thou know'st the man who thus could treat a friend,
Would soon forget a brother. But say, Pembroke,
How stands the Duke of Buckingham?

Pem. Fast bound
To Edward; he and that smooth courtier, Suffolk,
Are the two rotten pillars that support
His tott'ring throne: but Marg'ret—

War. Ay; how fares
My new ally? has she escap'd the tyrant?

Pem. She has; and by some wondrous means con-
To free her captive son. [triv'd]

War. Though I abhor,
I must admire that enterprising woman:
Her active mind is ever on the wing
In search of fresh expedients, to recover
The crown she lost.

Pem. Aready she has rais'd
A pow'rful army; all the secret foes
Of York's ambitious line rush forth in crowds,
And join her standard: ere to-morrow's sun
Shall dawn upon us, she will set thee free.

War. Oh! Pembroke, nothing wounds the gen'rous
So deep as obligations to a foe. [mind]
Is there no way to liberty, my friend,
But through the bloody paths of civil war?

Pem. I fear there is not.

War. Then it must be so:

I could have wish'd—but freedom and revenge,
On any terms, are welcome.

Pem. Here, then, join we
Our hands—

War. Our hearts.

Pem. Now, Warwick, be thou firm
In thy resolves; let no unmanly fears,
No foolish, fond remembrance of past friendship
Unnerve thy arm, or shake thy steady purpose.

War. No; by my wrongs it shall not: once, thou
know'st,

I lov'd him but too well, and these vile chains
Are my reward. Oh! give me but the use
Of this once-pow'rful arm, and thou shalt see
How it shall punish falsehood. Are thy forces
Prepar'd?

Pem. They are, and wait but for my orders;
Clarence will join us soon: our first great end
Is to secure thy liberty; that done,
We haste to seize the palace, and redeem
The fair Elizabeth.

War. Redeem her, ha!

Is she a captive, too?

Pem. A willing slave;
A gay state pris'ner, left to roam at large
O'er the young monarch's palace.

War. Ay, my Pembroke,
That's more inviting than a prison. Oh!
She's false, she's false. Who sent her there?

Pem. She came,
It seems, to thank him for his royal bounties
To her good father, the new Earl of Rivers,
Who will, no doubt, persuade her to accept—

War. Of Edward's hand. Distraction! fly, my friend,

Haste thee to Marg'ret, tell her if she hopes
For Warwick's aid, she must release him now,
Ere Edward's ill-tim'd mercy shall prevent her.

Pem. I go; my friend, adieu! when next we meet,
I hope to bring thee liberty. [Exit.

War. Farewell.

She's lost! she's gone! that base seducer, Edward,
Hath wrought on her weak mind; it must be so.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lord, the Lady Elizabeth.

War. Amazement! sure,
It cannot be! admit her, sir. Why, what [Exit Mess.
Could bring her here? Edward has sent her hither
To see if I will crouch to him for pardon:
Be still, my jealous heart.

Enter LADY ELIZABETH GREY.

Eliz. My Warwick!

War. 'Tis a grace I look'd not for,
That a fair fav'rite, who so late had tasted
The pleasures of a court, should condescend
To visit thus a poor abandon'd captive.

Eliz. I come to take my portion of misfortune,
To pour the balm of comfort in, and heal,
If possible, the wounds which I had made.
Too well I know, I was the fatal cause
Of all thy sorrows; but the noble Edward,
For so, indeed, he is—

War. And art thou come
To plead the cause of him who sent me hither?

Eliz. I came to be the messenger of peace,
To calm thy troubled soul, and give thee rest;
To teach my Warwick to forget his wrongs.

War. Forget my wrongs! was that thy errand
To teach me low submission to a tyrant? [here,
To ask forgiveness, kneel, and deprecate
The wrath of blust'ring Edward? If thou com'st
On terms like these to bring me freedom, know
It will not be accepted: now I see
Through all your arts; by heav'n! I'd rather lose
A thousand lives, than owe one to his bounty.

Eliz. Either my Warwick is much chang'd, and
I fear he is, or he would never talk [so
Thus coldly to me; never would despise
A life so precious, if he knew how much

Elizabeth had suffer'd to preserve it.

The gallant Edward, won by my entreaties—

War. Entreaties! didst thou then descend so low
As to entreat him for me?

Eliz. Hadst thou seen,
When I implor'd him to forgive my Warwick,
How kind he look'd, how his repenting heart,
Heav'd with the pangs of agonizing friendship,
Thou wouldst have pity'd him.

War. Deceitful woman,
I see thy falsehood now; I am betray'd,
And thou art leagu'd with Edward to destroy me.

Go to your royal lover, and unite
Those only fit companions for each other,
A broken friendship, and a perjurd love:
Give up discarded Warwick, and to make
The compact firm, cement it with my blood.

Eliz. I thought the soul of Warwick far above
Such mean suspicions. Shall the man, whose truth,
Whose constancy, and love, have been so long
My bright example, shall he stoop so low
As thus to listen to an idle tale

Told by some prating courtier? If, indeed,
Thou couldst believe it, I should pity thee.

War. Where is your father, the new Earl of Rivers?
Why sends he not his forces to our aid?

Eliz. He cannot: honour, gratitude, forbid
That he should lift up his rebellious arm
Against his benefactor! well thou know'st,
Of late, when civil discord reign'd amongst us,
He fought with Henry, and with Henry fell:
When injur'd Edward gen'rously forgave,
Restor'd his forfeit lands, and late advanc'd him
To rank and title.

War. Infamy and shame!
The common nets which fearful knav'ry spreads
To catch ambition's fools: mean, sordid bribes!
We know the treasure they were meant to purchase.

Eliz. Unkind suggestion! how have I deserv'd it?
Have I for this refus'd a youthful monarch,
And spurn'd his offer'd sceptre at my feet,
To be reproach'd at last by cruel Warwick?
Had I once listen'd to him, had these eyes
Been dazzled with the splendour of a court,
I need not thus have chang'd it for a dungeon.
But since I am suspected, witness heav'n,
And witness Warwick, to my vows! henceforth,
Dear as thou art, I cast thee from my love;
Elizabeth will never wed a traitor.

War. Am I awake? and did Elizabeth
Say she would never wed her faithful Warwick?
Then bear me witness too, all-judging heav'n!
Here yield I up all visionary dreams
Of future bliss, of liberty, or life;
Ev'n the sweet hope of vengeance, that alone
Sustain'd my spirit, loses all its charms;
I wish'd for freedom but to purchase thine;
For life, but to enjoy it with my love,
And she disclaims me.

Eliz. Heav'n forbid! Oh! Warwick,
Let not the tide of passion thus overwhelm
Thy reason.

War. Canst thou pardon me? Thou know'st
Th' unguarded warmth, the weakness of my nature.
I would not wrong thee, but I've been so oft,
So cruelly deceiv'd.

Eliz. I know thou hast;
But never by Elizabeth.

War. Oh! no;
It is impossible that perfidy
Should wear a form like thine. (Looking at her.)
I wonder not

That Edward lov'd; no, when I look on thee,
All beauteous, all enchanting as thou art,
By heav'n! I think I could almost forgive him.

Eliz. Then wherefore not be reconcil'd?

War. To whom?
The author of my wrongs? It cannot be:
Know, I have promis'd Marg'ret to destroy him.

Eliz. Destroy thy friend! ungen'rous, cruel Warwick!

Is't not enough that thou hast triumph'd here?
Already we have pierc'd his noble heart
With the keen pangs of disappointed love: [rows?
And wouldst thou wound his breast with added sor-
Wouldst thou involve a nation in his ruin?

War. Elizabeth, no more: alas! too well
Thou know'st, there is a pow'rful advocate
In Warwick's breast, that pleads for perjur'd Edward. [wick!—

Eliz. Cherish the soft emotion: Oh! my War-

War. That angel form can never plead in vain;
But, then, my friends, where is the solemn vow
To Marg'ret and to Pembroke? there's the tie;
My honour's dearer to me—

Eliz. Than thy love;
Dearer, much dearer, than Elizabeth!
But I have done: farewell, my lord, I see
Thy deep resentment is not to be mov'd
By my weak influence o'er thee. (Going.)

War. Stay, I charge thee. [idol

Eliz. What is this phantom, honour? this proud
That tramples thus on ev'ry humble virtue?
This cruel, bloody Moloch, that delights
In human sacrifice? Oh! would to heav'n
I were its only victim! but with me,
You offer up your country and your king.

War. Think on my vow, think on my promise
giv'n. [grant

Eliz. Thy league with Marg'ret must be fatal:
We should succeed, and Lancaster once more
Assume the throne, how dear the victory
That's purchas'd with our fellow subjects' blood!
Alas! such triumphs make the conqu'ror weep.
But, if we fail—

War. Impossible!

Eliz. Oh! think,
Betimes, what dreadful punishments await
The vanquish'd rebel: thou, perhaps, my love,
Shalt then be doom'd on th' ignominious block
To fall inglorious; and, when thou'rt gone,
Who shall defend thy poor Elizabeth? [pose,

War. Alarming thought! it staggers my firm pur-
And makes me half a villain.

Enter an Officer.

Offi. Madam, the king demands your presence, I
Have orders to convey you to the palace.

War. And wilt thou leave me?

Eliz. This, my Warwick, this
Is the decisive moment; now determine;
Accept of mercy, ere it be too late;
Ere hasty Edward—Shall I say thou wilt
Return to thy obedience, and receive
Thy pardon? shall I? speak, my love.

War. Perhaps

I may accept it, if 'tis brought by thee.

Eliz. Then we shall meet in happiness.

War. Farewell! [Exeunt Eliz. and Officer.
Now to those worst companions in affliction,
My own sad thoughts again; they're gloomy all,
And, like my habitation, full of horror.
I like not Edward's message: if he hears
My league with Margaret, he still has pow'r
To make me feel his rage: I have deserv'd it.

(A trampling heard without.)

Methought I heard a noise: this way they come.
Perhaps it is the messenger of death.

Re-enter the EARL OF PEMBROKE.

Pem. The messenger of vengeance; see her sword:
Accept it, and be free. (Offers the sword.)

War. First, let me know
To whom I am indebted for't.

Pem. To me.

Soon as the rumour of thy foul disgrace
Had reach'd the public ear, th' impatient people,
Uncertain of thy fate, tumultuous throng'd
Around the palace, and demanded thee;
Give us our Warwick, give us back, they cry'd,
Our hero, our deliverer: I stepp'd forth,
And bade them, instant, if they wish'd to save
The best of men from infamy and death,
To follow me: transported they obey'd:

I led them hither; forc'd the prison-gates,
And brought thee this: direct it as thou wilt.
(Gives the sword.)

War. Welcome once more, thou dearest gift of
heav'n,

Immortal liberty! my friend, I thank thee.
Oh! Pembroke, would thou hadst been here! my
My dear Elizabeth is true. [love,

Pem. At least
You think so.

War. She has told me such sweet truths;
Edward repents him sorely, he is griev'd
At his ingratitude.

Pem. And well he may;
I fear thou art betray'd: alas! my Warwick,
Thy open, gen'rous, unsuspecting virtue
Thinks ev'ry heart as honest as thy own.
Thou know'st not Edward nor Elizabeth.
The kingdom is in arms, and ev'ry hour
It is expected France will join the queen:
England will want its great protector's aid.
Edward and Rivers have conspir'd to cheat
Thy credulous ear, and who so fit to spread
The flimsy web as thy Elizabeth,
Their fair ambassadress? I see thou'rt caught.

War. By heav'n! it may be so: I am the sport
Of fortune and of fraud.

Pem. Away, my friend:
It is not now a time to think of her:
Marg'ret, supported by thy pow'rful name,
And join'd by Clarence, wait us at the head
Of fifteen thousand men; who, eager all
To crush a tyrant, and pull down oppression,
Attend thy wish'd-for presence; not a soldier
Will act or move till Warwick shall direct them.
Edward and England's fate depend on thee.

War. Away, my friend, I'll follow thee.
[Exit Pembroke.]

Yet, stop
A moment; let not passion hurry me
To base dishonour: if my country calls
For Warwick's aid, shall I not hear her voice,
And save her? Pembroke may have private views,
And subtle Marg'ret, too. Elizabeth!
I must not lose thee. Oh! direct me, heav'n! [Exit.]

ACT V.—SCENE I.

Enter LADY ELIZABETH GREY

Eliz. The royal pardon came too late, and Pem-
Already has releas'd him: he is gone! [broke
Elizabeth may never see him more!
A thousand terrors haunt me; a fond father,
A guiltless sov'reign, a distracted lover;
Fame, fortune, friends, and country, all depend
On one eventful moment: hark! the sound
Of distant groans: perhaps the king—perhaps
My Warwick bleeds. Oh! agonizing thought!
Great God of armies, whose all-guiding hand
Directs the fate of nations, oh! look down
On thy own image; let not cruel discord
Divide their kindred souls! in pity hear!
Pour thy benignant spirit o'er their hearts,
And once more knit them in the bonds of peace!

Enter the EARL OF SUFFOLK.

Suf. The pray'r of innocence is always heard.
Eliz. Ha! Suffolk, whither hast'st thou? art thou come—

Suf. I come to heal thy sorrows, lovely fair one,
To tell thee, Edward, and thy much-lov'd Warwick,
Once more are friends.

Eliz. Indeed! Oh, welcome news!
My joy's too great for utterance: tell me, Suffolk,
How was it? speak, is Warwick safe? Oh, heav'n!

Suf. A moment's patience, and I'll tell thee all.
Marg'ret, thou know'st, had rais'd a pow'rful force,
That doubled Edward's troops: elate with pride,
And almost sure of victory, she urg'd
The tardy spearmen; on they rush'd as if Secure of conquest: the unhappy king
Stood nobly firm, and seem'd to brave his fate,
When Warwick, like a guardian god, appear'd:
His noble mien and all-commanding look

Struck deep attention; ev'ry eye was bent
Upon him, and an awful silence reign'd
O'er either host; he rais'd his voice on high,
And, "Stop," he cry'd, "your sacrilegious hands,
Nor touch my friend: who pierces Edward's breast,
Must pass through mine. I rais'd him to the throne,
And will support him there: to you I gave,
From you, my fellow-soldiers, I expect him:
Howe'er his cruel wrongs have wounded me,
He never injur'd you, and I forgive him."
He spake, and instant through the gazing crowd
A murmur ran; down dropp'd their nerveless arms,
As if enchanted by some magic pow'r, [ward!]
And with one voice they cry'd, "Long live King Ed-

Eliz. How pow'rful is the tongue of eloquence,
When in the cause of virtue! Well, what follow'd?

Suf. Encourag'd by the shouting soldiers, Edward
On like a modest virgin wishing came,
Yet fearful; Warwick, with a bridegroom's speed,
To meet him flew; into each other's arms
They ran with speechless joy: the tender scene
Affected ev'ry heart, and the rough soldier,
Unus'd to melting sympathy, forgot
His ruthless nature, and dissolv'd in tears.

Eliz. Sweet reconciliation! then, Elizabeth,
Thou didst not plead in vain. But, say, how brook'd
The haughty Queen this unexpected change?

Suf. Abash'd, confounded, for awhile she strove
To stem the torrent, but in vain; then fled Precipitate.

Eliz. But where, oh! where's my Warwick?

Suf. With a few chosen squadrons he pursues
The disappointed Marg'ret.

Eliz. Oh, my fears!
I know not why, but at that hateful name
I tremble ever; my foreboding heart
Presages something dreadful.

Suf. Do not vex
Thy tender mind with visionary dangers. [here,

Eliz. Oh! would to heav'n that he were shelter'd
And safe within these arms!

Suf. Be not alarm'd:
He is the care of heav'n: all good men love,
All bad ones fear him.

Eliz. Such superior merit
Must have a thousand foes, the constant mark
Of envy's poison'd darts.

Suf. There Suffolk feels
The keen reproach; with blushes I confess
There was a time, when, urg'd by fond ambition,
I look'd on Warwick with a jealous eye:
But this last noble deed hath won my heart,
And I am now a convert to his virtues:
But, see, the king approaches.

Enter KING EDWARD.

K. Edw. Health and peace,
And happiness to fair Elizabeth!
Thou art no stranger to the joyful news;
The lustre of those speaking eyes declares it.

Eliz. Suffolk, ev'n now, hath bless'd me with the tidings.

K. Edw. Oh! 'tis amazement all. Elizabeth,
When last we met, thou wert the suppliant, now
'Tis I must ask forgiveness, I who injur'd
The dearest, best of men. Oh! thou hast sav'd
Edward from shame, and England from destruction.

Eliz. Did I not say my Warwick would be just?

K. Edw. Thou didst, and on those beauteous lips fair truth

And soft persnasion dwell. Long time he stood
Inflexible, and deaf to friendship's voice,
Listen'd to nought but all-subduing love.
In after times, thy name shall be enroll'd
Amongst the great deliv'ers of their country.

Eliz. I have no title to the lavish praise
Thy gen'rous heart bestows; I only said
What duty prompted, and what love inspir'd;
Indulgent heav'n has crown'd it with success.

K. Edw. Thou hast done all: I am indebted to
For more, much more than I can e'er repay. [thee
Long time, with shame I own, hath Warwick soar'd

Above me, but I will not be outdone
For ever by this proud, aspiring rival:
Poor as I am, there yet is one way left
To pay the debt of gratitude I owe him,
One great reward for such exalted virtues,
Thyself, Elizabeth.

Eliz. What means my lord,
My royal master?

K. Edw. Yes; when next we meet
I will bestow it on him, will resign
All my fond claim to happiness and thee;
Though thy dear image ne'er can be effac'd
From Edward's breast, though still I dote upon thee,
Though I could hang for ever on thy beauties,
Yet will I yield them to their rightful lord:
Warwick has earn'd, Warwick alone deserves them.

Eliz. Would he were here to thank thee for thy goodness!

Know, gen'rous prince, Elizabeth has long
Admir'd thy virtues; and could love admit
Of a divided heart, the noble Edward
Would share it with his friend.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My royal liege,
The rebels are dispers'd; Queen Marg'ret's son
Was slain in the pursuit, and she—

K. Edw. I hope,
Secur'd.

Mess. Is taken pris'ner, and will soon
Be here.

K. Edw. But where's Lord Warwick?

Mess. Sir, the Queen—

Enter MARGARET OF ANJOU, prisoner.

Mar. Once more I am your pris'ner.

K. Edw. 'Twill be prudent
Henceforth to keep you so.

Mar. You dare not.

Thou think'st, perhaps, that I shall sue to thee
For mercy: no; in Marg'ret of Anjou,
Thou seest the wife, and daughter of a king;
A spirit not to be subdu'd; though fall'n,
Triumphant still, and though a pris'ner, free.
For know, I bear a mind above the reach
Of fortune or of Edward. I have lost
All I could wish to live for in my child;
And gain'd what most I wish'd to gain, revenge!
Or life or death are now indiff'rent to me.

K. Edw. For thy unbounded goodness, Pow'r Accept our praise! [supreme,

Eliz. (Kneeling.) Accept our humble pray'r!

Mar. Insulting piety! the common trick
Of hypocrites and slaves: when ye shall know
What Marg'ret knows, ye may not be so thankful.
Methinks, 'tis pity Warwick is not here
To join in your devotion.

Eliz. Would to heav'n
He were!

Mar. That monster! that perfidious slave!
Who broke his faith to Marg'ret and to thee;
Thy coward soul, unable to defend
The treasure thou hadst stol'n, could meanly stoop
To court the traitor whom thou dar'st not punish.
Not so the injur'd Marg'ret: she repell'd
The wrongs she felt, and the deceiver met
The fate he merited.

K. Edw. What fate? Ev'n now,
Crown'd with immortal wreaths, the hero comes
To bless his friends, and punish guilt like thine.

Mar. Proud and deluded wretches! I look down
With pity on you: captive as I am,
'Tis mine to judge and punish; be it your's
To hear and tremble.

K. Edw. Ah!

Eliz. What can this mean?

Mar. If I mistake not, Warwick is your friend,
Your lover, too, I think.

Eliz. My lord, my husband. [Warwick,

Mar. Know, then, that friend, that lover, perjur'd
Hath not an hour to live.

K. Edw. What murd'rous hand—

Mar. Mine, tyrant, mine! Think not I mean to hide

The noble deed; it is my happiness,
It is my glory: thou wilt call me base,
Blood-thirsty, cruel, savage, and revengeful;
But here I stand acquitted to myself,
And ev'ry feeling heart that knows my wrongs.
To late posterity dethroned queens
And weeping mothers shall applaud my justice.

K. Edw. Justice! on whom?

Mar. Can Edward ask me? Who
Imprison'd Henry, robb'd me of a crown,
And plac'd it on a proud usurper's head?
Who gave his sacred promise to a queen,
And broke it? Who, for which indignant heav'n
Chastis'd him, basely murder'd my sweet boy?
Bereft of honour, fortune, husband, child;
Depriv'd of ev'ry comfort, what remain'd
For me but vengeance? what for him but death?

K. Edw. What hast thou done? when? where?
speak, murd'ress, speak! [made

Mar. Press'd by surrounding multitudes, and
A slave, they dragg'd me to the conqu'ror's tent,
There the first horrid object I beheld,
Was the pale corse of my poor bleeding child:
There—as th' insulting Warwick stood, and seem'd
To triumph o'er him—from my breast I drew
A poniard forth, and plung'd it in his heart.
Th' astonish'd soldiers throng'd around him, seiz'd
And brought me here! Now to your pray'rs again.
(Elizabeth faints.)

K. Edw. She faints, good Suffolk; help, there!
help, support,
Assist her; lead her in. [Exeunt Suf. and Eliz.
If it be true,

As much I fear it is, a thousand deaths
Were punishment too little for thy guilt:
Thou shalt be tortur'd.

Mar. Tyrant, I defy thee;
Thy threats appal not me: prepare your tortures;
Let them be sharp and cruel as thyself,
All that ingenious malice can suggest,
Or pow'r inflict, 'twill be my comfort still,
They cannot be so great as those you feel.

K. Edw. Guards, take the monster hence; let her be chain'd
In some deep dungeon, dark as her own thoughts,
There let her perish: hence, away with her.

Mar. Despair and horror visit thee! farewell!
He comes; my triumph is complete: look there!
[Exeunt Margaret and Guards.

Enter the EARL OF WARWICK, leaning on Soldiers.

War. Where is he? Lead me, lead me to my king.

K. Edw. My Warwick! my preserver! she shall
For this in ev'ry vein. [bleed

War. Think not of her,
She has no pow'r to hurt thee; and, with guilt
Like her's, 'tis punishment enough to live:
This is no time for vengeance; death comes on
With hasty strides; 'tis but a little while,
A few short moments, and we part for ever.
My friend—

K. Edw. I am not worthy of the name,
For I disgrac'd, dishonour'd, murder'd thee;
Edward's unkindness was the cause of all:
Canst thou forgive me?

War. Oh! may Warwick's crimes
Ne'er meet forgiveness from offended heav'n,
If, from my soul, I do not pardon, love,
And honour thee!

K. Edw. Away, let me support him;
'Tis the last office I shall e'er perform
For thee, my Warwick. Wilt thou lean upon me,
And seal my pardon with one kind embrace?

War. We never hated.

K. Edw. But my love was blind.

War. And blinder my resentment.

K. Edw. I forgot
Thy services.

War. And I remember'd not
Thou wert my king. My sweet Elizabeth,
Where is she? Edward, do not keep her from me;
We are no rivals now.

K. Edw. Shock'd at the news
Of thy untimely fate, she sunk beneath it,
And fainted in these arms; I seiz'd th' occasion,
And bade her weeping maidens bear her hence:
This would have been a dreadful sight, indeed.

Eliz. (Without.) I can, I will support it.

War. Ha! that voice—
Sure, 'tis Elizabeth's!

Enter LADY ELIZABETH GREY.

Eliz. Oh! give me way,
For I must see him. Oh! my Warwick!

War. Oh!
This is too much; the bitterness of death
Is to be sever'd thus from those we love.

K. Edw. Why would you bring her here?

(To the Attendants.)

War. Elizabeth,
Be comforted.

Eliz. Oh! no, it is my doom
Never to taste of joy or comfort more:
No; from this hateful world will I retire,
And mourn my Warwick's fate; imploring heav'n
That I may soon wear out my little store
Of hopeful days, and join thee in the tomb. [wrong,

War. That must not be: I've done my friend a
And only thou canst make atonement for it.

Thy hand, Elizabeth,—if e'er thou lov'dst,—
Observe me now—thine, Edward—for my sake
Cherish this beauteous mourner, take her from me,
As the last present of a dying friend. [more dear,

K. Edw. If aught could make the precious gift
It would be, Warwick, that it came from thee.

Oh! I will guard her with a parent's care,
From every ill, watch over and protect her;
And when the memory of thee shall awake,
As oft it will, her poignant griefs, repel
The rising sigh, wipe off the flowing tear,
And strive to charm her to forgetfulness.

War. Wilt thou, indeed? then I shall die in Eliz. Yet thou may'st live. [peace.

War. Impossible: I feel
The hand of death press cold upon my heart,
And all will soon be o'er: I've liv'd to save
My falling country, to repent my crimes,
Redeem my honour, and restore my king.

K. Edw. Alas! my friend, the memory of thee
Will poison every bliss.

War. All-healing time,
That closes ev'ry wound, shall pour its balm
O'er thine; meanwhile, remember Warwick's fate.
I gave my word to Margaret, and broke it:
Heav'n is not to be mock'd, it soon o'ertakes us,
And in our crime we meet our punishment.
Oh! Edward, if thou hop'st that length of days
And fair prosperity shall crown thy wishes,
Beware of passion and resentment; make
Thy people's good and happiness thy own;
Discourage faction, banish flatt'ers, keep
Thy faith inviolate, and reign in peace.
I can no more—my love. Have mercy, heav'n! (Dies)

K. Edw. He's gone!

Eliz. And with him all my hopes of bliss.

K. Edw. Let ev'ry honour to a soldier due,
Attend the hero to his tomb; meanwhile,
Deep in the living tablet of my heart,
Will I engrave thy words, illustrious shade!
Living, thou wert my counsellor and friend,
And dead, I will remember and obey thee. [thee.

Eliz. Warwick, farewell; I shall not long survive

K. Edw. I hope thou wilt. Elizabeth, remember
His dying charge, think on thy promise giv'n.
Thou shalt remain with me, with me lament
Our common benefactor; we will sit
And talk together of my Warwick's virtues;
For I will try to emulate them all,
And learn, by copying him, to merit thee.
His great example shall inspire my breast
With patriot zeal, shall teach me to subdue
The pow'r of faction, vanquish party rage,
And make me, what alone I wish to be,
The happy king of an united people. [Exeunt.

SCENE I.—Covent Garden.

Enter MRS. AMLET and MRS. CLOGGIT.

Mrs. A. Good morrow, neighbour! good morrow, neighbour Cloggitt! How does all at your house this morning?

Mrs. C. Thank you kindly, Mrs. Amlet; thank you kindly; how do you do, I pray?

Mrs. A. At the old rate, neighbour, poor and honest; these are hard times, good lack!

Mrs. C. If they are hard with you, what are they with us? You have a good trade going; all the great folks in town help you off with your merchandise.

Mrs. A. Yes, they do help us off with them, indeed! they buy all.

Mrs. C. And pay—

Mrs. A. For some.

Mrs. C. Well, 'tis a thousand pities, Mrs. Amlet, they are not as ready at one as they are at t'other; for, not to wrong them, they give very good rates.

Mrs. A. Oh! for that, let's do them justice, neighbour; they never make two words upon the price, all they haggle about is the day of payment.

Mrs. C. There's all the dispute, as you say.

Mrs. A. But that's a wicked one: for my part, neighbour, I'm just tired off my legs with trotting after them; besides it eats out all our profit. Would you believe it, Mrs. Cloggitt, I have worn out four pair of pattens, with following my old Lady Youthful, for one set of false teeth, and but three pots of paint?

Mrs. C. Look you there, now!

Mrs. A. If they would but once let me get enough by them to keep a coach to carry me a dunning after them, there would be some conscience in it.

Mrs. C. Ay, that were something. But now you talk of conscience, Mrs. Amlet, how do you speed amongst your city customers?

Mrs. A. City customers! Now, by my truth, neighbour, between the city and the court, with reverence be it spoken, there's not a pin to choose. My ladies in the city, in times past, were as full of gold as they were of religion, and as punctual in their payments as they were in their prayers; but since they have set their minds upon quality, adieu one, adieu t'other! their money and their consciences are gone, heaven knows where!

Mrs. C. But what the murrain have they to do with quality? Why don't their husbands make them mind their shops?

Mrs. A. Their husbands! their husbands, say'st thou, woman? Alack, alack! they mind their husbands, neighbour, no more than they do a sermon.

Mrs. C. Good lack-a-day! that women born of sober parents, should be prone to follow ill examples! But now we talk of equity, when did you hear of your son Richard, Mrs. Amlet? My daughter Flipp says she met him t'other day, in an officer's dress, with three fine ladies, his footman at his heels, and as gay as a bridegroom.

Mrs. A. Is it possible? Ah! the rogue! Well, neighbour, all's well that's end well! But Dick will be hanged.

Mrs. C. That were pity.

Mrs. A. Pity, indeed! for he's a hopeful young man to look on; but he leads a life—Well; where he has it, heaven knows! but they say, he pays his club with the best of them. I have seen him but once these three months, neighbour, and then the varlet wanted money; but I bid him march, and march he did to some purpose; for, in less than an hour, back comes my gentleman into the house, walks to and fro in the room, with his hat on one side, whistling a minuet, and tossing a purse of gold from one hand to t'other, with no more respect, heaven bless us! than if it had been an orange. "Sirrah," says I, "where have you got that?" He answers me never a word, but sets his arms a-kimbo, cocks his saucy hat in my face, turns about his ungracious heel, and I've never set eyes on him since.

Mrs. C. Look you there, now! to see what the youth of this age are come to!

Mrs. A. See what they will come to, neighbour! Heaven shield, I say! but Dick's upon the gallop. Well, I must bid you good-morrow: I'm going where I doubt I shall meet but a sorry welcome.

Mrs. C. To get in some old debt, I warrant you?

Mrs. A. Neither better nor worse.

Mrs. C. From a lady of quality?

Mrs. A. No, she's but a scrivener's wife; but she lives as well, and pays as ill, as the stateliest countess of them all. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Street, with Moneytrap's house.

Enter BRASS.

Brass. Well, surely, through the world's wide extent, there never appeared so impudent a fellow as my school-fellow Dick! to pass himself upon the town for a gentleman, drop into all the best company with an easy air, as if his natural element were in the sphere of quality; when the rogue had a kettle-drum to his father, who was hanged for robbing a church, and has a pedler to his mother, who carries her shop under her arm. But here he comes.

Enter DICK.

Dick. Well, Brass, what news? Hast thou given my letter to Flippanta?

Brass. I am but just come; I haven't knocked at the door yet. But I have a pretty piece of news for you.

Dick. As how?

Brass. We must quit this country.

Dick. We'll be hanged first!

Brass. So you will, if you stay.

Dick. Why, what's the matter?

Brass. There's a storm coming.

Dick. From whence?

Brass. From the worst point in the compass, the law.

Dick. The law! Why, what have I to do with the law?

Brass. Nothing; and, therefore, it has something to do with you.

Dick. Explain.

Brass. You know you cheated a young fellow at piquet, t'other day, of the money he had to raise his company.

Dick. Well, what then?

Brass. Why, he's sorry he lost it.

Dick. Who doubts that?

Brass. Ay, but that is not all, he's such a fool to think of complaining on't.

Dick. Then I must be wise to stop his mouth.

Brass. How?

Dick. Give him a little back: if that won't do, strangle him.

Brass. You are very quick in your methods.

Dick. Men must be so, that will despatch business.

Brass. Hark you! Colonel, your father died in his bed? [fool.]

Dick. He might have done if he had not been a Brass. Why, he robbed a church.

Dick. Ay, but he forgot to make sure of the sexton.

Brass. Are not you a great rogue?

Dick. Or I should wear worse clothes.

Brass. Hark you! I would advise you to change your life.

Dick. And turn ballad-singer?

Brass. Not so, neither.

Dick. What, then?

Brass. Why, if you can get this young wench, reform, and live honest.

Dick. That's the way to be starved.

Brass. No; she has money enough to buy you a good place, and pay me into the bargain for helping her to so good a match. You have but this throw left to save you; for you are not ignorant, youngster, that your morals begin to be pretty well known about town: have a care your noble birth and your honourable relations are not discovered, too; there needs but that, to have you tossed in a blanket for the entertainment of the first company of ladies you intrude into; and then, like a dutiful son, you may dangle about with your mother, and sell paint; she's old and weak, and wants somebody to carry her goods after her. How like a dog will you look, your hair cropped up to your ears, and a band-box under your arm!

Dick. Why, faith! Brass! I think thou art in the right on't; I must fix my affairs quickly, or Madam Fortune will be playing some of her tricks with me; therefore, I'll tell thee what we'll do: we'll pursue this old rogue's daughter heartily; we'll cheat his family to some purpose, and they shall atone for the rest of mankind.

Brass. Have at her, then; I'll about your business presently.

Dick. Success attend thee! Adieu, my dear Brass! [Exit.]

Brass. Adieu, my dear—d—d rogue! Well, I say nothing. But when I have got matters into a good posture, he shall sign and seal, or I'll have him tumbled out of the house like a cheese. Now for Flippanta. (Knocks.)

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Flip. Who's that? Brass?

Brass. Flippanta!

Flip. What want you, rogne's face?

Brass. Is your mistress dressed?

Flip. What, already? Is the fellow drunk?

Brass. Why, with respect to her looking-glass, it is almost two.

Flip. What then, fool?

Brass. Why, then, it is time for the mistress of the house to come down, and look after her family.

Flip. Pr'ythee, don't be an owl. Those that go to bed at night may rise in the morning; we that go to bed in the morning, may rise in the afternoon.

Brass. When does she make her visits, then?

Flip. By candle-light; we women hate inquisitive sun-shine: but, do you know that my lady is going to turn good housewife?

Brass. What, is she going to die?

Flip. Die!

Brass. Why, that's the only way to save money for her family.

Flip. No; but she has thought of a project to save chair-hire.

Brass. As how?

Flip. Why, all the company she used to keep abroad, she now intends shall meet at her own house. Your master has advised her to set up a faro bank.

Brass. Nay, if he advised her to it, it's right; but has she acquainted her husband with it yet?

Flip. What to do? When the company meet, he'll see them.

Brass. Nay, that's true, as you say, he'll know it soon enough.

Flip. Well, I must begone; have you any business with my lady?

Brass. Yes, as ambassador from Araminta, I have a letter for her.

Flip. Give it me.

Brass. Hold! and, as first minister-of-state to the Colonel, I have an affair to communicate to thee.

Flip. What is it? quick!

Brass. Why, he's in love.

Flip. With what?

Brass. A woman—and her money together.

Flip. Who is she?

Brass. Corinna. He has ordered me to demand her of thee in marriage.

Flip. Of me?

Brass. Why, when a man of quality has a mind to a city fortune, wouldst have him apply to her father and mother?

Flip. No.

Brass. No, so I think: men of our end of the town are better bred than to use ceremony. Will you slip this letter into her prayer-book, my little queen? It's a very passionate one; it's sealed with a heart and a dagger; you may see by that what he intends to do with himself.

Flip. Are there any verses in it? If not, I won't touch it.

Brass. Not one word in prose; it's dated in rhyme.

Flip. (Takes the letter.) Well, but, have you brought nothing else?

Brass. Gad forgive me! I'm the forgetfullest dog—I have a letter for you, too; here 'tis, in a purse, but it's in prose; you won't touch it.

Flip. Yes, hang it! it is not good to be too dainty.

Brass. How useful a virtue is humility! Well, child, we shall have an answer to-morrow, sha'n't we?

Flip. I can't promise you that; for our young gentlewoman is not so often in my way as she should be. Her father, who is a citizen from the foot to the forehead of him, seldom lets her converse with her mother-in-law and me, for fear she should learn the airs of a woman of quality. But I'll take the first occasion: hark! there's my lady, go in and deliver your letter to her.

[Exeunt, with much ceremony.]

SCENE III.—A Parlour.

CLARISSA discovered reclining on a sofa. Enter FLIPPANTA and BRASS.

Clar. No messages this morning, from anybody, Flippanta? Lard! how dull that is! Oh! there's Brass! I did not see thee, Brass. What news dost thou bring?

Brass. Only a letter from Araminta, madam.

Clar. Give it to me: open it for me, Flippanta, I am so lazy to-day.

Brass. (To Flip.) Be sure you, now, deliver my master's as carefully as I do this.

Flip. Don't trouble thyself, I'm no novice.

Clar. (To Brass.) 'Tis well; there needs no answer, since she'll be here so soon.

Brass. Your ladyship has no farther commands, then?

Clar. Not at this time, honest Brass! Flippanta!

[Exit Brass.]

Flip. Madam!

Clar. My husband's in love.

Flip. In love?

Clar. With Araminta.

Flip. Impossible!

Clar. This letter from her is to give me an account of it.

Flip. Methinks, you are not very much alarmed.

Clar. No; thou know'st I am not much tortured with jealousy.

Flip. Nay, you are much in the right on't, madam; for jealousy's a city passion; 'tis a thing unknown amongst people of quality.

Clar. Fie! a woman must, indeed, be of a mechanic mould, who is either troubled or pleased with anything her husband can do to her. Pr'ythee, mention him no more: 'tis the dullest theme—

Flip. 'Tis splenetic, indeed. But when once you open your faro bank, I hope that will put him out of your head.

Clar. Alas! Flippanta, I begin to grow weary even of the thoughts of that, too.

Flip. How so?

Clar. Why, I have thought on't a day and a night already; and four-and-twenty hours, thou knowest, is enough to make one weary of anything.

Flip. Now, by my conscience! you have more woman in you than all your sex together: you never know what you would have.

Clar. Thou mistakest the thing quite. I always know what I want, but I am never pleased with what I have. The want of a thing is perplexing enough, but the possession of it is intolerable.

Flip. Well, I don't know what you are made of, but other women would think themselves blest in your case: handsome, witty, loved by everybody, and of so happy a composure to care a fig for nobody. You have no one passion, but that of your pleasures; and you have, in me, a servant devoted to all your desires, let them be as extravagant as they will: yet, all this is nothing; you can still be out of humour.

Clar. Alas! I have too much cause.

Flip. Why, what have you to complain of?

Clar. Alas! I have more subjects for spleen than one: is it not a most horrible thing that I should be but a scrivener's wife? Come, don't flatter me; don't you think nature designed me for something plus-elevée?

Flip. Nay, that's certain; but, on t'other side, methinks, you ought to be, in some measure, content, since you live like a woman of quality, though you are none.

Clar. Oh, fie! the very quintessence of it is Flip. What's that? [wanting.]

Clar. Why, I dare abuse nobody: I'm afraid to affront people, though I don't like their faces; or to ruin their reputations, though they pique me to it, by taking ever so much pains to preserve them: I dare not raise a lie of a man, though he neglects to make love to me; nor report a woman to be a fool, though she's handsomer than I am. In short, I dare not so much as bid my footman kick the people out of doors, though they come to ask me for what I owe them.

Flip. All this is very hard, indeed.

Clar. Ah! Flippanta, the perquisites of quality are of an unspeakable value.

Flip. They are of some use, I must confess; but we must not expect to have everything. You have wit and beauty, and a fool to your husband: come, come, madam, that's a good portion for one.

Clar. Alas! what signifies beauty and wit, when one dares neither jilt the men, nor abuse the women? I have been sometimes almost choked with scandal, and durst not cough it up for want of being a countess.

Flip. Poor lady!

Clar. Oh! liberty is a fine thing, Flippanta; it's a great help in conversation to have leave to say what one will. I have seen a woman of quality, who has not had one grain of wit, entertain a whole company the most agreeably in the world, only with her malice. But 'tis in vain to repine, I can't mend my condition till my husband dies; so I'll say no more on't, but think of making the most of the state I am in.

Flip. That's your best way, madam; and, in order to do it, pray, consider how you'll get some ready money to set your faro bank a-going: for that's necessary.

Clar. Thou say'st true: but what trick I shall play my husband to get some, I don't know; for my pretence of losing my diamond necklace has put the man into such a passion, I am afraid he won't hear reason.

Flip. No matter; he begins to think 'tis lost in earnest; so, I fancy, you may venture to sell it, and raise money that way.

Clar. That can't be, for he has left odious notes with all the goldsmiths in town.

Flip. Well, we must pawn it, then.

Clar. I am quite tired of dealing with those pawnbrokers.

Flip. I'm afraid you'll continue the trade a great while, for all that. (Aside.)

Enter JESSAMINE.

Jess. Madam, there's the woman below that sells paint and patches, false teeth, and all sorts of things for the ladies; I can't think of her name. [Exit.]

Flip. 'Tis Mrs. Amlet; she wants money.

Clar. Well, I ha'n't enough for myself; it is an unreasonable thing she should think I have any for her.

Flip. She's a troublesome jade!

Clar. So are all people who come a dunning.

Flip. What will you do with her?

Clar. I have just now thought on't. She is very rich, that woman is, Flippanta; I'll borrow some money of her.

Flip. Borrow! sure, you jest, madam.

Clar. No, I am in earnest; I give thee commission to do it for me.

Flip. Me!

Clar. Why dost thou stare, and look so un-gainly? Don't I speak to be understood?

Flip. Yes, I understand you well enough; but Mrs. Amlet—

Clar. But Mrs. Amlet must lend me some money; where shall I have any to pay her else?

Flip. That's true; I never thought of that, truly! But here she is.

Enter MRS. AMLET.

Clar. (Retires to the sofa.) How do you do? How do you do, Mrs. Amlet? I haven't seen you these thousand years; and yet, I believe, I am down in your books.

Mrs. A. Oh! madam, I don't come for that, alack!

Flip. Good-morrow, Mrs. Amlet!

Mrs. A. Good-morrow, Mrs. Flippanta!

Clar. How much am I indebted to you, Mrs. Amlet?

Mrs. A. Nay, if your ladyship desires to see your bill, I believe I may have it about me. There, madam, if it ben't too much fatigue to you to look it over.

Clar. Let me see it, for I hate to be in debt—where I am obliged to pay. (Aside. Reads.) "Imprimis. For bolstering out the Countess of Crump's left hip"—Oh, fie! this does not belong to me.

Mrs. A. I beg your ladyship's pardon. I mistook, indeed: 'tis a countess's bill I have writ out to little purpose. I furnished her, two years ago, with three pair of hips, and am not paid for them yet: but some are better customers than some. There's your ladyship's bill. (Giving the bill.)

Clar. (Reads.) "For the idea of a new invented corset"—Ay, this may be mine, but 'tis of a preposterous length. (Unrolling the bill.) Do you think I can waste time to read every article, Mrs. Amlet? I'd as lief read a sermon.

Mrs. A. Alack-a-day! there's no need of fatiguing yourself at that rate; cast an eye only, if your honour pleases, upon the sum total.

Clar. Total, fifty-six pounds and odd things.

Flip. But six-and-fifty pounds!

Mrs. A. Nay, another body would have made it twice as much, but there's a blessing goes along with a moderate profit.

Clar. Flippanta, go to my cashier, let him give you six-and-fifty pounds. (Adjusting her dress.) Make haste: don't you hear me? six-and-fifty pounds. Is it so difficult to be comprehended?

Flip. No, madam, I—I comprehend; six-and-fifty pounds. But—

Clar. But go and fetch it, then.

Flip. What she means, I don't know; but I shall, I suppose, before I bring her the money.

[Aside and exit.]

Clar. (Setting her hair in a pocket-glass.) The trade you follow gives a great deal of trouble, Mrs. Amlet?

Mrs. A. Alack-a-day! a world of pain, madam; and yet there's small profit, as your honour sees by your bill.

Clar. Poor woman! Sometimes you have great losses, Mrs. Amlet?

Mrs. A. I have two thousand pounds owing me, of which I shall never get ten shillings.

Clar. Poor woman! you have a great charge of children, Mrs. Amlet?

Mrs. A. Only one wicked rogue, madam, who, I think, will break my heart.

Clar. Poor woman!

Mrs. A. He'll be hanged, madam; that will be the end of him. Where he gets it, heaven knows! but he's always shaking his heels with the ladies, and his elbows with the lords. He's as fine as a prince, and as trim as the best of them; but the ungracious rogue tells all he comes near that his mother is dead, and I am but his nurse.

Clar. Poor woman!

Mrs. A. Alas! madam, he's like the rest of the world! everybody's for appearing to be more than they are, and that ruins all.

Clar. Well, Mrs. Amlet, you'll excuse me, I have a little business; Flippanta will bring you your money presently. Adieu, Mrs. Amlet! [Exit.]

Mrs. A. And I return your honour many thanks. Ah! there's my good lady, not so much as read her bill; if the rest were like her I should soon have money enough to go as fine as Dick himself.

Enter DICK.

Dick. Sure, Flippanta must have given my letter by this time; I long to know how it has been received.

Mrs. A. Misericorde! what do I see?

Dick. Fiends and hags! the witch my mother! (Aside.)

Mrs. A. Nay, 'tis he. Ah! my poor Dick! what art thou doing here?

Dick. What a misfortune! (Aside.)

Mrs. A. Good lard! now thou art bravely decked! But it's all one: I am thy mother still! and, though thou art a wicked child, nature will speak. I love thee, Dick, still. Ah, Dick! my poor Dick! (She attempts to kiss him, he passes under her arm.)

Dick. Blood and thunder! will you ruin me?

Mrs. A. Ah! the blasphemous rogue! how he swears!

Dick. You destroy all my hopes.

Mrs. A. Will your mother's kiss destroy you, varlet? Thou art an ungracious bird! kneel down and ask my blessing, sirrah.

Dick. Death and furies!

Mrs. A. Ah! he's a proper young man; see what a shape he has! Ah! poor child! (Running to embrace him, he escapes from her.)

Dick. Oons! keep off! the woman's mad! If anybody comes, my fortune's lost.

Mrs. A. What fortune, eh? speak, graceless! Ah! Dick, thou'lt be hanged, Dick.

Dick. Good, dear mother, now, don't call me Dick here.

Mrs. A. Not call thee Dick! Is it not thy name? What shall I call thee, Mr. Amlet, eh? Art not thou a presumptuous rascal? Hark you! sirrah, I hear of your tricks; you disown me for your mother, and say I am but your nurse. Is not this true?

Dick. No; I love you; I respect you; (taking her hand) I am all duty. But if you discover me here, you ruin the fairest prospect that man ever had.

Mrs. A. What prospect, eh? Come, this is a lie now.

Dick. No, my honoured parent, what I say is true. I am about a great fortune. I'll bring you home a daughter-in-law, in a coach and six horses, if you'll be quiet: I can't tell you more now.

Mrs. A. Is it possible?

Dick. 'Tis true, by Jupiter!

Mrs. A. My dear lad—

Dick. For heaven's sake—

Mrs. A. But, tell me, Dick—

Dick. I'll follow you home in a moment, and tell you all.

Mrs. A. What a shape is there!

Dick. Pray, mother, go.

Mrs. A. I must receive some money here first, which shall go for thy wedding dinner.

Dick. Here's somebody coming! Sdeath! she'll betray me.

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Dick. (Makes signs to his mother.) Good-morrow, dear Flippanta; how do all the ladies within?

Flip. At your service, Colonel; as far, at least, as my interest goes.

Mrs. A. Colonel! La you now! how Dick's respected! (Aside.)

Dick. Waiting for thee, Flippanta, I was making acquaintance with this old gentlewoman here.

Mrs. A. The pretty lad! he's as impudent as a lord. (Aside.)

Dick. Who is this good woman, Flippanta?

Flip. A gin of all trades; an old daggling cheat, that hobbles about from house to house to bubble the ladies of their money. I have a small business of your's in my pocket, Colonel. (Aside to Dick.)

Dick. An answer to my letter?

Flip. So quick, indeed? No, it's your letter itself.

Dick. Hast thou not given it, then, yet?

Flip. I haven't had an opportunity: but 'twon't be long first. Won't you go in and see my lady?

Dick. Yes, I'll go make her a short visit. But dear Flippanta, don't forget; my life and fortune are in your hands.

Flip. Never fear, I'll take care of them.

Mrs. A. How he traps them! let Dick alone. (Aside.)

Dick. (To his mother.) Your servant, good madam. [Exit.]

Mrs. A. Your honour's most devoted. A pretty, civil, well-bred gentleman this, Mrs. Flippanta. Pray, whom may he be?

Flip. A man of great note; Colonel Shapely.

Mrs. A. Is it possible! I have heard much of him, indeed, but never saw him before: one may see quality in every limb of him; he's a fine man, truly!

Flip. I think you are in love with him, Mrs. Amlet.

Mrs. A. Alas! those days are done with me; but if I were as fair as I was once, and as much money as some folks, Colonel Shapely should not catch cold for want of a bed-fellow. I love your men of rank, they have something in their air does so distinguish them from the rascality.

Flip. People of quality are fine things, indeed, Mrs. Amlet, if they had but a little more money; but for want of that, they are forced to do things their great souls are ashamed of. For example: here's my lady, she owes you but six-and-fifty pounds—

Mrs. A. Well!

Flip. Well, and she has it not by her to pay you.

Mrs. A. How can that be?

Flip. I don't know: her cash-keeper's out of humour; he says he has no money.

Mrs. A. What a presumptuous piece of vermin is a cash-keeper! Tell his lady he has no money! Now, Mrs. Flippanta, you may see his bags are full, by his being so saucy.

Flip. If they are, there's no help for it; he'll do what he pleases, till he comes to make up his yearly accounts.

Mrs. A. But madam plays sometimes; so when she has good fortune, she can pay me out of her winnings.

Flip. Oh! never think of that, Mrs. Amlet; if she had won a thousand pounds, she'd rather die in a gaol than pay off a farthing with it.

Mrs. A. Why, what shall we do, then: for I haven't one penny to buy bread.

Flip. I'll tell you—it just now comes into my head: I know my lady has a little occasion for money at this time; so, if you lend her a hundred pounds, do you see? then she may pay you your six-and-fifty out of it.

Mrs. A. Sure, Mrs. Flippanta, you think to make a fool of me?

Flip. No, the deuce fetch me if I do! You shall have a diamond necklace in pawn.

Mrs. A. Oh, ho! a pawn! That's another case. And when must she have the money?

Flip. In a quarter of an hour.

Mrs. A. Say no more. Bring the necklace to my house; it shall be ready for you.

Flip. I'll be with you in a moment.

Mrs. A. Adieu, Mrs. Flippanta!

Flip. Adieu, Mrs. Amlet! [Exit Mrs. A.] So! this ready money will make us all happy. This spring will set our faro table going, and that's a wheel will turn twenty others. My lady's young and handsome: she'll have a dozen intrigues upon her hands, before she has been twice at her prayers. So much the better; the more the grist, the richer the miller. Sure, never wench got into so hopeful a place! here's a fortune to be sold, and a master to be ruined. If I don't feather my nest, and get a good husband, I deserve to die both a maid and a beggar. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Gripe's House.

CLARISSA and DICK discovered, seated on a sofa.

Clar. What, in the name of dulness, is the matter with you, Colonel? You are as studious as a cracked chymist.

Dick. My head, madam, is full of your husband.

Clar. The worst furniture for a head in the universe.

Dick. I am thinking of his passion for your friend Araminta.

Clar. Passion! Dear Colonel, give it a less violent name.

Enter BRASS.

Dick. Well, sir, what want you?

Brass. The affair I told you of goes ill. There's an action out. (Aside to Dick.)

Dick. The devil there is!

Clar. What news brings Brass?

Dick. Before gad! I can't tell, madam; the dog will never speak out. My Lord What-d'ye-call-him waits for me at my lodgings: is not that it?

Brass. Yes, sir.

Dick. Madam, I ask your pardon.

Clar. Your servant, sir. [Exit Dick with Brass.] Jessamine!

Enter JESSAMINE.

Jess. Madam!

Clar. Where's Corinna? Call her to me, if her father hasn't locked her up; I want her company.

Jess. Madam, her guitar-master is with her.

[Exit.]

Clar. Psha! she's always taken up with her impertinent guitar-man. Flippanta stays an age with that old fool, Mrs. Amlet; and Araminta, before she can come abroad, is so long placing her coquet-patch, that I must be a year without company. How insupportable is a moment's uneasiness to a woman of spirit and pleasure.

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Oh! art thou come at last? Pr'ythee, Flippanta, learn to move a little quicker, thou know'st how impatient I am.

Flip. Yes, when you expect money.

Clar. Well, hast thou brought me any after all?

Flip. Yes, I have brought some. There! (giving her a purse) the old hag has struck off her bill, the rest is in that purse.

Clar. 'Tis well; but take care, Flippanta, my husband don't suspect anything of this; 'twould vex him, and I don't love to make him uneasy; so I would spare him these little sort of troubles, by keeping them from his knowledge.

Flip. See the tenderness she has for him, and yet he's always complaining of you.

Clar. 'Tis the nature of them, Flippanta; a husband is a growling animal.

Flip. How exactly you define them!

Clar. Oh! I know them, Flippanta: though I confess my poor wretch diverts me sometimes with his ill-humours. I wish he would quarrel with me to-day a little, to pass away the time, for I find myself in a violent spleen. My cloak and gloves, and the coach to the door!

Flip. Why, whither are you going?

Clar. I can't tell yet; but I would go spend some money, since I have it.

Flip. Why, you want nothing that I know of.

Clar. How awkward an objection now is that, as if a woman of education bought things because she wanted them.

Enter ARAMINTA.

Lard! what a tedious while you have let me expect you! I was afraid you were not well; how do you do to-day?

Aram. As well as a woman can do, that has not slept all night.

Flip. Methinks, madam, you are pretty well awake, however.

Aram. Oh! 'tis not a little thing will make a woman of my spirit look drowsy.

Clar. But, pr'ythee, what was't disturbed you?

Aram. Not your husband, don't trouble yourself; at least, I am not in love with him yet.

Clar. Well remembered, I had quite forgot that matter. I wish you much joy; you have made a noble conquest, indeed.

Aram. Do you know 'tis in my power to ruin this poor thing of your's? his whole estate is at my service.

Flip. Strike him, madam, and let my lady go your halves. There's no sin in plundering a husband, so his wife has share of the booty.

Aram. Whenever she gives me her orders, I shall be very ready to obey them.

Clar. Why, as odd a thing as such a project may seem, Araminta, I believe I shall have a little serious discourse with you about it. But, pr'ythee, tell me how you have passed the night? For I am sure your mind has been roving upon some pretty thing or other.

Aram. Why, I have been studying all the ways my brain could produce to plague my husband.

Clar. No wonder, indeed, you look so fresh this morning, after the satisfaction of such pleasing ideas all night.

Aram. Why, can a woman do less than study mischief, when she has tumbled and tossed herself into a burning fever, for want of sleep. But we'll discourse more of these matters as we go, for I must make a tour among the shops.

Clar. My coach waits at the door, we'll talk of them as we rattle along. [Exit with Araminta.]

Flip. What a pretty little pair of amiable persons are there gone to hold a council of war together! Poor birds! what would they do with their time, if the plaguing their husbands did not help them to employment? Well, if idleness be the root of all evil, then matrimony's good for something, for it sets many a poor woman to work. But here comes miss. I hope I shall help her into the holy state, too, ere long; and when she's once there, if she don't play her part as well as the best of them, I'm mistaken. Haven't I lost the letter I am to give her? No, here 'tis; so, now we shall see how pure nature will work with her, for art she knows none yet.

Enter CORINNA.

Cor. What does my mother-in-law want with me, Flippanta? they tell me she was asking for me.

Flip. She's just gone out; so, I suppose, 'twas no great business.

Cor. Then I'll go into my chamber again.

Flip. Nay, hold a little, if you please. I have some business with you myself, of more concern than what she had to say to you.

Cor. Make haste, then, for you know my father won't let me keep you company; he says you'll spoil me.

Flip. I spoil you! he's an unworthy man to give you such ill impressions of a woman of my honour.

Cor. Nay, never take it to heart, Flippanta, for I don't believe a word he says. But he does so plague me with his continual scolding, I am almost weary of my life.

Flip. Why, what is it he finds fault with?

Cor. Nay, I don't know, for I never mind him; when he has babbled for two hours together, methinks I have heard a mill going, that's all. It does not at all change my opinion, Flippanta, it only makes my head ache.

Flip. Nay, if you can bear it so, you are not to be pitied so much as I thought.

Cor. Not pitied! Why, is it not a miserable thing, such a young creature as I am should be kept in perpetual solitude, with no other company but a parcel of old frightful masters, to teach me geography, arithmetic, philosophy, and a thousand useless things? fine entertainment, indeed, for a young girl at sixteen! methinks, one's time might be better employed.

Flip. Those things will improve your wit.

Cor. Fiddle faddle! haven't I wit enough already? My mother-in-law has learned none of this trumpery, and is not she as happy as the day is long?

Flip. Then you envy her, I find.

Cor. And well I may. Does she not do what she has a mind to, in spite of her husband's teeth?

Flip. Look you there now! If she has not already conceived that to be the supreme blessing of life! (Aside.)

Cor. I'll tell you what, Flippanta, if my mother-in-law would but stand by me a little, and encourage me, and let me keep her company, I'd rebel against my father to-morrow, and throw all my books in the fire. Why, he can't touch a groat of my portion; do you know that, Flippanta?

Flip. So, I shall spoil her! Pray heaven the girl don't spoil me. (Aside.)

Cor. Look you! in short, he may think what he pleases; he may think himself wise; but thoughts are free, and I may think in my turn. I am but a girl, 'tis true, and a fool, too, if you believe him; but let him know, a foolish girl may make a wise man's heart ache; so he had as good be quiet. Now it's out! (Skips about.)

Flip. Very well: I love to see a young woman have spirit; it's a sign she'll come to something.

Cor. Ah! Flippanta, if you would but encourage me, you'd find me quite another thing. I am a devilish girl in the bottom; I wish you'd but let me make one amongst you.

Flip. That never can be, till you are married. Come, examine your strength a little. Do you think you durst venture upon a husband?

Cor. A husband! why, a—if you would but encourage me. Come, Flippanta, be a true friend, now. I'll give you advice when I have got a little more experience. Do you in your very conscience and soul think I am old enough to be married?

Flip. Old enough! Why, you are sixteen, are you not?

Cor. Sixteen! I am sixteen, two months, and odd days, woman! I keep an exact account.

Flip. The deuce you are!

Cor. Why, do you, then, truly and sincerely think I am old enough?

Flip. I do upon my faith, child!

Cor. Why, then, to deal as fairly with you, Flippanta, as you do with me, I have thought so any time these three years.

Flip. Now I find you have more wit than ever I thought you had; and to shew you what an opinion I have of your discretion, I'll shew you a thing I thought to have thrown in the fire.

Cor. What is it, for Jupiter's sake?

Flip. Something will make your heart chuck within you.

Cor. My dear Flippanta!

Flip. What do you think it is?

Cor. I don't know nor I don't care, but I'm mad to have it. (Flippanta shews the letter.) Oh, lard! a letter! Is there ever a token in it?

Flip. Yes, and a precious one, too. There's a handsome young gentleman's heart.

Cor. A handsome young gentleman's heart! Nay, then, it's time to look grave. (Aside.)

Flip. There! (Presenting the letter.)

Cor. I sha'n't touch it.

Flip. What's the matter now?

Cor. I sha'n't receive it.

Flip. Sure, you jest.

Cor. You'll find I don't. I understand myself better than to take letters, when I don't know who they are from.

Flip. I am afraid I commended your wit too soon.

Cor. 'Tis all one; I sha'n't touch it, unless I know who it comes from.

Flip. Heyday! open it, and you'll see.

Cor. Indeed I shall not.

Flip. Well, then, I must return it where I had it.

Cor. That won't serve your turn, madam; my father must have an account of this.

Flip. Sure, you are not in earnest?

Cor. You'll find I am.

Flip. So, here's fine work! This 'tis to deal with girls.

Cor. Confess who you had it from, and, perhaps, for this once, I mayn't tell my father.

Flip. Why, then, since it must out, 'twas the Colonel: but why are you so scrupulous, madam?

Cor. Because if it had come from anybody else, I would not have given a farthing for it. (Twisting it eagerly out of her hand.)

Flip. Ah! my dear little rogue! (embracing her) you frightened me out of my wits.

Cor. Let me read it, let me read it, let me read it, let me read it, I say! Um—Cupid's—um—darts—um—beauty—um—charms—um—angel—um—goddess—(kissing the letter)—um—truest lover—um—eternal constancy—um—cruel—um—racks—um—tortures—um—fifty daggers—um—bleeding heart—um—dead man. Very well, a mighty civil letter, I promise you; not one naughty word in it; I'll go lock it up in my work-box.

Flip. Well, but what does he say to you?

Cor. Not a word of news, Flippanta, 'tis all about business.

Flip. Does he not tell you he is in love with you?

Cor. Ay, but he told me that before.

Flip. How so? he never spoke to you.

Cor. He sent me word by his eyes.

Flip. Did he so? Mighty well! I thought you had been to learn that language.

Cor. Oh! but you thought wrong, Flippanta. What, because I don't go a visiting, and see the world, you think I know nothing. But you should consider, Flippanta, that the more one's alone, the more one thinks; and 'tis thinking that improves a girl. Well, Flippanta, if you'll encourage me—

Flip. Oh! by all means, an answer.

Cor. Well, since you say it, then, I'll e'en in and do it; though I protest to you, lest you should think me too forward, now, he is the only man that wears a beard I'd ink my fingers for. May be, if I marry him, in a year or two's time, I mayn't be so nice. [Aside, and exit.]

Flip. Now heaven give him joy! he is like to have a rare wife of thee. But where there's money, a man has a plaster to his sore. They have a blessed time on't, who marry for love! See, here comes an example—Araminta's dread lord.

Enter MONEYTRAP.

Mon. Ah! Flippanta, how do you do, good Flippanta? how do you do?

Flip. Thank you, sir, well, at your service.

Mon. And how does the good family, your master and your fair mistress? are they at home?

Flip. Neither of them; my master has been gone out these two hours, and my lady is just gone with your wife.

Mon. Well, I won't say I have lost my labour, however, as long as I have met with you, Flippanta; for I have wished a great while for an opportunity to talk with you a little. You won't take it amiss if I should ask you a few questions?

Flip. Provided you leave me to my liberty in my answers. What's this cot-quean going to pry into now? (Aside.)

Mon. Pr'ythee, good Flippanta, how do your master and mistress live together?

Flip. Live! like man and wife; generally out of humour, complain of one another, and, perhaps, have both reason. In short, 'tis much as 'tis at your house.

Mon. Good lack! but whose side are you generally of?

Flip. Of the right side always—my lady's. And, if you'll have me give you my opinion of these matters, sir, I do not think a husband can ever be in the right.

Mon. Ah!

Flip. Little, peeping, creeping, sneaking, stingy, covetous, cowardly, dirty, cuckoldy things.

Mon. Ah!

Flip. Hark you, sir! shall I deal plainly with you? had I got a husband I would put him in mind that he was married as well as I. (Sings.)

“For were I the thing call'd a wife,

And my fool grew too fond of his power,

He should look like an ass all his life,

For a prank that I'd play him in an hour.

Tol lol la ra tol lol,” &c.

Do you observe that, sir?

Mon. I do; and think you would be in the right on't. But, pr'ythee, why dost not give this advice to thy mistress?

Flip. For fear it should go round to your wife, sir; for you know they are play-fellows.

Mon. Oh! there's no danger of my wife; she knows I'm none of those husbands.

Flip. Are you sure she knows that, sir?

Mon. I am sure she ought to know it, Flippanta; for, really, I have but four faults in the world.

Flip. And, pray, what may they be?

Mon. Why, I am a little slovenly.

Flip. Fie!

Mon. I am sometimes out of humour.

Flip. Provoking!

Mon. I don't give her so much money as she'd have.

Flip. Insolent!

Mon. And a—perhaps, I mayn't be quite so young as I was.

Flip. The devil!

Mon. Oh! but then, consider how 'tis on her side, Flippanta. She ruins me with dressing, is always out of humour, ever wanting money, and will never be older.

Flip. That last article, I must confess, is a little hard upon you.

Mon. Ah! Flippanta, didst thou but know the daily provocations I have, thou wouldst be the first to excuse my faults. But now I think on't, thou art none of my friend, thou dost not love me at all; no, not at all.

Flip. And whither is this little reproach going to lead us, now?

Mon. You have power over your fair mistress, Flippanta.

Flip. Sir!

Mon. But what then? you hate me.

Flip. I understand you not.

Mon. There's not a moment's trouble her naughty husband gives her, but I feel it, too.

Flip. I don't know what you mean.

Mon. If she did but know what part I take in her sufferings—

Flip. Mighty obscure!

Mon. Well, I'll say no more; but—

Flip. All Hebrew!

Mon. If thou wouldst but tell her on't—

Flip. Still darker and darker!

Mon. I should not be ungrateful.

Flip. Ah! now I begin to understand you.

Mon. Flippanta, there's my purse. (Gives her his purse.)

Flip. Say no more; now you explain, indeed: you are in love?

Mon. Bitterly! and I do swear by all the gods—

Flip. Hold! spare them for another time, you stand in no need of them now. An usurer that parts with his purse gives sufficient proof of his sincerity.

Mon. I hate my wife, Flippanta.

Flip. That we'll take upon your bare word.

Mon. She's the devil, Flippanta!

Flip. You like your neighbour's better.

Mon. Oh! an angel!

Flip. What a pity it is the law don't allow changing!

Mon. If it did, Flippanta!

Flip. But since it don't, sir—keep the reins upon your passion; don't let your flame rage too high, lest my lady should be cruel, and it should dry you up to a mummy.

Mon. 'Tis impossible she can be so barbarous, to let me die. Alas! Flippanta, a very small matter would save my life.

Flip. Then you're dead; for we women never grant anything to a man who will be satisfied with a little.

Mon. Dear Flippanta, that was only my modesty; but, since you'll have it out, I am a very dragon; and so your lady will find. Now, I hope, you'll stand my friend.

Flip. Well, sir, as far as my credit goes, it shall be employed in your service.

Mon. My best Flippanta! tell her I am all her's; tell her my body's her's; tell her my soul's her's; and tell her my estate's her's. Lord have mercy upon me! how I am in love!

Flip. Poor man! but, hark! I hear my master; for heaven's sake, compose yourself a little.

Mon. Ah, dear! I am in such an emotion, I dare not be seen. [Exit.]

Flip. A rare adventurer by my troth! This will be curious news to the wives. Fortune has now put their husbands into their hands, and I think they are too sharp to neglect its favours.

Enter GRIPE.

Gripe. Oh! here's the right hand; the rest of the body can't be far off. Where's my wife, husband?

Flip. An admirable question! Why, she's gone abroad, sir.

Gripe. Abroad, abroad! abroad already? Why, she used to be in her bed three hours after this time, as late as it is. What makes her gadding so soon?

Flip. Business, I suppose.

Gripe. Business! she has a pretty head for business, truly! Oh, ho! let her change her way of living, or I'll make her change a light heart for a heavy one.

Flip. And why would you have her change her way of living. She never looked better in her life.

Gripe. Don't tell me of her looks, I have done with her looks long since. But I'll make her change her life, or—

Flip. Indeed, sir, you won't.

Gripe. Why, what shall hinder me, insolence?

Flip. That which hinders most husbands—contradiction.

Gripe. Suppose I resolve I won't be contradicted?

Flip. Suppose she resolves you shall?

Gripe. A wife's resolution is not good by law.

Flip. Nor a husband's by custom.

Gripe. I tell thee, I will not bear it.

Flip. I tell you, sir, you will bear it.

Gripe. Oons! I have borne it three years already.

Flip. By that you see 'tis but giving your mind to it.

Gripe. My mind to it! Death and the devil! My mind to it! She is, then, in thy opinion, a reasonable woman?

Flip. By my faith, I think so.

Gripe. I shall run mad! Name me an extravagance in the world she is not guilty of.

Flip. Name me an extravagance in the world she is guilty of.

Gripe. Come, then: does she not put the house in disorder?

Flip. Not that I know of, for she never comes into it but to sleep.

Gripe. Does she employ any one moment of her life in the government of her family?

Flip. She is so submissive a wife, she leaves it entirely to you.

Gripe. Admirable! Does she not spend more money in coach-hire and chair-hire, than would maintain six children?

Flip. She's too nice of your credit to be seen daggling in the streets.

Gripe. Good! Do I set eye on her sometimes in a week together?

Flip. That, sir, is because you are never stirring at the same time; you keep odd hours; you are always going to bed when she's rising, and rising just when she's coming to bed.

Gripe. Yes, truly! night into day, and day into night, that's her trade: but these are trifles; has she not lost her diamond necklace? answer me to that, trapes!

Flip. Yes; and has sent as many tears after it as if it had been her husband.

Gripe. Ah! the devil take her!—but, enough: 'tis resolved, and I will put a stop to her course of life, and so she shall know, the first time I meet with her—which, though we are man and wife, and lie under one roof, 'tis very possible may not be this fortnight. [Aside, and exit.]

Flip. Nay, thou hast a blessed time on't, that must be confessed. What a miserable devil is a husband! insupportable to himself, and a plague to everything about him. But he'd as good be still, for he'll miss of his aim. If I know her, which I think I do, she'll set his blood in such a ferment, it shall bubble out at every pore of him; whilst her's is so quiet in her veins, her pulse shall go like a pendulum. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Mrs. Amlet's House.

Enter DICK.

Dick. Where's this old woman? Eh! what the devil, nobody at home! Ah! her strong box! and the key in it! 'tis so. Now, fortune, be my friend! What the deuce, not a penny of money in cash! nor a check, or note! nor a bank-bill! (searches the box) nor a crooked stick! nor a—mum!—here's something: a diamond necklace, by all the gods! Oons! the old woman! Zest! (Puts the necklace in his pocket.)

Enter MRS. AMLET.

Pray, mother, pray to—(Runs to her and asks her blessing.)

Mrs. A. Is it possible! Dick upon his humble knee! Ah! my dear child! may heaven be good unto thee!

Dick. I am come, my dear mother, to pay my duty to you, and to ask your consent to—

Mrs. A. What a shape is there!

Dick. To ask your consent, I say, to marry a great fortune; for what are riches in this world without a blessing? and how can there be a blessing without respect and duty to parents?

Mrs. A. What a nose he has!

Dick. And, therefore, it being the duty of every good child not to dispose of himself in marriage without the—

Mrs. A. Now the Lord love thee, (kissing him) for thou art a goodly young man! Well, Dick, and how goes it with the lady? are her eyes open to thy charms? does she see what is for her own good? Is she sensible of the blessings thou hast in store for her? Eh! is all sure? Hast thou broken a piece of money with her? Speak, bird! do: don't be modest, and hide thy love from thy mother, for I am an indulgent parent.

Dick. Nothing under heaven can prevent my good fortune, but its being discovered I am your son.

Mrs. A. Then thou art still ashamed of thy natural mother, graceless! Why, I'm no harlot, sirrah!

Dick. I know you are not. Who the devil would make you one? (Aside.)

Mrs. A. No: my reputation is as good as the best of them; and, though I'm old, I'm chaste, you rascal, you!

Dick. Lord! that is not the thing we talk of, mother; but—

Mrs. A. I think, as the world goes, they may be proud of marrying their daughter into a virtuous family.

Dick. Oons! virtue is not the case.

Mrs. A. Where she may have a good example before her eyes.

Dick. Oh, lord! oh, lord! oh, lord!

Mrs. A. I am a woman that don't so much as encourage an incontinent look towards me.

Dick. I tell you—'Sdeath!—I tell you—

Mrs. A. If a man should make an uncivil motion to me, I'd spit in his face; and all this you may tell them, sirrah!

Dick. Death and furies! the woman's out of her—

Mrs. A. Don't you swear, you rascal, you! don't you swear.

Dick. Why, then, in cold blood, hear me speak to you: I tell you it's a city fortune I am about; she cares not a fig for your virtue, she'll hear of nothing but quality; she has quarrelled with one of her friends for having a better complexion, and is resolved she'll marry to take place of her.

Mrs. A. What a cherry lip is there!

Dick. Therefore, good, dear mother, now have a care, and don't discover me; for if you do, all's lost.

Mrs. A. Dear, dear! how thy fair bride will be delighted! go, get thee gone, go: go, fetch her home; go, fetch her home. I'll give her a sack-posset, and a pillow of down she shall lay her head upon. Go, fetch her home, I say.

Dick. Take care, then, of the main chance, my dear mother; remember, if you discover me—

Mrs. A. Go, fetch her home, I say.

Dick. You promise me, then—

Mrs. A. March!

Dick. But swear to me—

Mrs. A. Begone, sirrah!

Dick. Well, I'll rely upon you: but one kiss before I go. [Kisses her heartily, and runs off.]

Mrs. A. Now the Lord love thee! for thou art a comfortable young man! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Gripe's House.

Enter FLIPPANTA and CORINNA.

Cor. But, hark you! Flippanta, if you don't think he loves me dearly, don't give him my letter, after all.

Flip. Let me alone.

Cor. When he has read it, let him give it you again.

Flip. Don't trouble yourself.

Cor. But, remember, 'tis you who make me do all this now; so, if any mischief comes on't, 'tis you must answer for't.

Flip. I'll be your security.

Cor. I am young, and know nothing of the matter; but you have experience, so it is your business to conduct me safe.

Flip. Poor innocence!

Cor. But tell me, in serious sadness, Flippanta, does he love me with the very soul of him?

Flip. I have told you so a hundred times, and yet you are not satisfied.

Cor. But, methinks, I'd fain have him tell me so himself.

Flip. Have patience, and it shall be done.

Cor. Why, patience is a virtue; that we must all confess; but, I fancy, the sooner it's done the better, Flippanta.

Enter JESSAMINE.

Jess. Madam, yonder is your geography-master waiting for you. [Exit.]

Cor. Ah! how I am tired with these old fumbling fellows, Flippanta.

Flip. Well, don't let them break your heart; you shall be rid of them all ere long.

Cor. Nay, 'tis not the study I am so weary of, Flippanta, 'tis the odious thing that teaches me. Were the Colonel my master, I fancy I could take pleasure in learning everything he could shew me.

Flip. And he can shew you a great deal, I can tell you that. But, get you gone; here's somebody coming; we must not be seen together.

Cor. I will, I will, I will! Oh! the dear Colonel! [Runs off.]

Enter MRS. AMLET.

Flip. Oh, ho! Mrs. Amlet. What brings you so soon to us again, Mrs. Amlet?

Mrs. A. Ah! my dear Mrs. Flippanta, I'm in a furious fright.

Flip. Why, what's come to you?

Mrs. A. Ah! mercy on us all! madam's diamond necklace—

Flip. What of that?

Mrs. A. Are you sure you left it at my house?

Flip. Sure I left it! a very pretty question, truly!

Mrs. A. Nay, don't be angry; say nothing to madam of it, I beseech you: it will be found again, if it be heaven's good will. At least, 'tis I must bear the loss of it. 'Tis my rogue of a son has laid his bird-lime fingers on it.

Flip. Your son, Mrs. Amlet! Do you breed your children up to such tricks as these, then?

Mrs. A. What shall I say to you, Mrs. Flippanta? Can I help it? He has been a rogue from his cradle, Dick has. But he has his deserts, too. And now it comes into my head, mayhap, he may have no ill design in this neither.

Flip. No ill design, woman! He's a pretty fellow if he can steal a diamond necklace with a good one.

Mrs. A. You don't know him, Mrs. Flippanta, so well as I that bore him. Dick's a rogue, 'tis true; but—mum!

Flip. What does the woman mean?

Mrs. A. Hark you! Mrs. Flippanta, is not here a young gentlewoman in your house that wants a husband?

Flip. Why do you ask?

Mrs. A. By way of conversation only; it does not concern me; but when she marries I may chance to dance at the wedding. Remember, I tell you so, I who am but Mrs. Amlet.

Flip. You dance at her wedding! You!

Mrs. A. Yes, I, I! but don't trouble madam about her necklace; perhaps it mayn't go out of the family. Adieu, Mrs. Flippanta. [Exit.]

Flip. What—what—what does the woman mean? The necklace lost—and her son Dick—and a fortune to marry—and she shall dance at the wedding—and—she does not intend, I hope, to propose a match between her son Dick and Corinna. By my conscience, I believe she does. An old beldam!

Enter BRASS.

Brass. Well, hussy! how stand our affairs? Has miss writ us an answer yet? My master's very impatient yonder.

Flip. And why the deuce does not he come himself? What does he send such idle fellows as thee of his errands? Here I had her alone just now: he won't have such an opportunity again this month, I can tell him that.

Brass. So much the worse for him; 'tis his business. But now, my dear, let thee and I talk a little of our own: I grow most devilishly in love with thee, dost hear that?

Flip. Pho! thou art always timing things wrong; my head is full, at present, of more important things than love.

Brass. Then it's full of important things, indeed; dost want a privy-counsellor?

Flip. I want an assistant.

Brass. To do what?

Flip. Mischief.

Brass. I am thy man—touch!

Flip. But before I venture to let thee into my project, pr'ythee, tell me, whether thou findest a natural disposition to ruin a husband to oblige his wife?

Brass. Is she handsome?

Flip. Yes.

Brass. Why, then, my disposition is at her service.

Flip. She's beholden to thee.

Brass. Not she alone, neither; therefore, don't let her grow vain upon it; for I've three or four affairs of that kind going at this time.

Flip. Well, go carry this epistle from miss to my master; and when thou comest back, I'll tell thee thy business.

Brass. I'll know it before I go, if you please.

Flip. Thy master waits for an answer.

Brass. I'd rather he should wait than I.

Flip. Why, then, in short, Araminta's husband is in love with my lady.

Brass. Very well, child, we have a Rowland for her Oliver; thy lady's husband is in love with Araminta.

Flip. Who told you that, sirrah?

Brass. 'Tis a negociation I'm charged with, pert! Did not I tell thee I did business for half the town? I have managed master Gripe's little affairs for him these ten years, you slut, you!

Flip. Hark thee! Brass, the game's in our hands, if we can but play the cards.

Brass. Pique and repique, you jade you! if the wives will fall into a good intelligence.

Flip. Let them alone; I'll answer for them they don't slip the occasion. See, here they come. They little think what a piece of good news we have for them.

Enter CLARISSA, ARAMINTA, and JESSAMINE.

Clar. Jessamine! here, boy, carry up these things into my dressing-room, and break as many of them by the way as you can, be sure.

Jess. Yes, madam.

[As he is going off, he lets the china fall.]

Clar. Oh! art thou there, Brass? What news?

Brass. Madam, I only called in as I was going by. But some little propositions Mrs. Flippanta has been starting, have kept me here to offer your ladyship my humble service.

Clar. What propositions?

Brass. She'll acquaint you, madam.

Aram. Is there anything new, Flippanta?

Flip. Yes, and pretty, too.

Clar. That follows, of course; but let's have it, quick.

Flip. Why, madam, you have made a conquest.

Clar. Hussy—but of who? quick.

Flip. Of Mr. Moneytrap, that's all.

Aram. My husband!

Flip. Yes, your husband, madam: you thought fit to corrupt ours, so now we are even with you.

Aram. Sure thou art in jest, Flippanta.

Flip. Serious as my devotions.

Brass. And the cross intrigue, ladies, is what our brains have been at work about.

Aram. My dear! (To Clarissa.)

Clar. My life!

Aram. My angel! } (Hugging each other.)

Clar. My soul!

Aram. The stars have done this.

Clar. The pretty little twinklers.

Flip. And what will you do for them, now?

Clar. What grateful creatures ought; shew them we don't despise their favours.

Aram. But is not this a wager between these two blockheads?

Clar. I would not give a shilling to go the winner's halves.

Aram. Then 'tis the most fortunate thing that ever could have happened.

Clar. All your last night's ideas, Araminta, were trifles to it.

Aram. Brass, my dear, will be useful to us.

Brass. At your service, madam.

Clar. Flippanta will be necessary, my life!

Flip. She waits your commands, madam.

Aram. For my part, then, I recommend my husband to thee, Flippanta, and make it my earnest request thou won't leave him one half crown.

Flip. I'll do all I can to obey you, madam.

Brass. (To Clarissa.) If your ladyship would give me the same kind orders for your's.

Clar. Oh! if thou sparest him, Brass, I'm thy enemy till I die.

Brass. 'Tis enough, madam; I'll be sure to give you a reasonable account of him. But how do you intend we shall proceed, ladies? Must we storm the purse at once, or break ground in form, and carry it by little and little?

Clar. Storm, dear Brass, storm! ever whilst you live, storm.

Aram. Oh! by all means; must it not be so, Flippanta?

Flip. In four-and-twenty hours, two hundred pounds a-piece, that's my sentence.

Brass. Very well. But, ladies, you'll give me leave to put you in mind of some little expense in favours, 'twill be necessary you are at, to these honest gentlemen.

Aram. Favours, Brass!

Brass. Um—a—some small matters, madam, I doubt must be.

Clar. Now, that's a vile article, Araminta; for that thing your husband is so like mine—

Flip. Pooh! there's a scruple, indeed. Why, what in the name of Lucifer is it you have to do, that's so terrible?

Brass. A civil look only.

Aram. There's no great harm in that.

Flip. An obliging word.

Clar. That one may afford 'em.

Brass. A little smile, à-propos.

Aram. That's but giving one's self an air.

Flip. Receive a little letter, perhaps.

Clar. Women of quality do that from fifty odious fellows.

Brass. Suffer, may be, a squeeze by the hand.

Aram. One's so used to that, one does not feel it.

Flip. Or if a kiss would do't.

Clar. I'd die first.

Brass. Indeed, ladies, I doubt 'twill be necessary to—

Clar. Get their wretched money without paying so dear for it.

Flip. Well, just as you please for that, my ladies: but I suppose you'll play upon the square with your favour, and not pique yourselves upon being one more grateful than another.

Brass. And state a fair account of receipts and disbursements.

Aram. That I think should be, indeed.

Clar. With all my heart, and Brass shall be our book-keeper. So, get thee to work, man, as fast as thou canst; but not a word of this to thy master.

Brass. I'll observe my order, madam. [Exit.

Clar. I'll have the pleasure of telling him myself, he'll be violently delighted with it: 'tis the best man in the world, Araminta; he'll bring us rare company to-morrow, all sorts of gamesters; and thou shalt see my husband will be such a brute to be out of humour at it.

Aram. The monster! But hush, here's my dear approaching: pr'ythee, let's leave him to Flippanta.

Flip. Ay, pray do; I'll bring you a good account of him, I'll warrant you.

Clar. Despatch, then, for the faro-table's in haste. [Exeunt Clar. and Aram.

Flip. So, now have at him; here he comes: we'll try if we can pillage the usurer, as he does other folks.

Enter MONEYTRAP.

Mon. Well, my pretty Flippanta, is thy mistress come home?

Flip. Yes, sir.

Mon. And where is she, pr'ythee?

Flip. Gone abroad, sir.

Mon. How dost mean?

Flip. I mean right, sir; my lady will come home and go abroad ten times in an hour, when she is either in very good humour, or very bad.

Mon. Good lack! But I'll warrant, in general, 'tis her naughty husband that makes her house uneasy to her. But hast thou said a little something to her, chicken, for an expiring lover, eh?

Flip. Said—yes, I have said, much good may it do me.

Mon. Well! and how?

Flip. And how! And how do you think you would have me do it? and you have such a way with you one can refuse you nothing. But I have brought myself into a fine business by it.

Mon. Good lack! But I hope, Flippanta—

Flip. Yes, your hopes will do much, when I am turned out of doors.

Mon. Was she, then, terribly angry?

Flip. Oh! had you seen how she flew, when she saw where I was pointing; for you must know I went round the bush, and round the bush, before I came to the matter.

Mon. Nay, 'tis a ticklish point, that must be owned.

Flip. On my word is it: I mean where a lady's truly virtuous; for that's our case, you must know.

Mon. A very dangerous case, indeed.

Flip. But I can tell you one thing; she has an inclination to you.

Mon. Is it possible!

Flip. Yes, and I told her so at last.

Mon. Well, and what did she answer thee?

Flip. Slap—(Smacks his face.)—and bid me bring it to you for a token.

Mon. And you have lost none on't by the way, with a plague t'ye. (Aside.)

Flip. Now this, I think, looks the best in the world.

Mon. Yea, but really it feels a little oddly.

Flip. Why, you must know ladies have different ways of expressing their kindness, according to the humour they are in: if she had been in a good one, it had been a kiss; but as long as she sent you something, your affairs go well.

Mon. Why, truly, I am a little ignorant in the mysterious paths of love; so I must be guided by thee. But, pr'ythee, take her in a good humour next token she sends me.

Flip. Ah! good humour!

Mon. What's the matter?

Flip. Poor lady! If I durst tell you all—

Mon. What then?

Flip. You would not expect to see her in one a good while.

Mon. Why, I pray?

Flip. I must own I did take an unseasonable time to talk of love-matters to her.

Mon. Why, what's the matter?

Flip. Nothing.

Mon. Nay, pr'ythee, tell me?

Flip. I dare not.

Mon. You must, indeed.

Flip. Why, when women are in difficulties, how can they think of pleasure?

Mon. Why, what difficulties can she be in?

Flip. Nay, I do but guess, after all; for she has that grandeur of soul, she'd die before she'd tell.

Mon. But what dost thou suspect?

Flip. Why, what should one suspect, where a husband loves nothing but getting of money, and a wife nothing but spending on't?

Mon. So she wants that same then?

Flip. I say no such thing, I know nothing of the matter; pray make no wrong interpretation of what I say; my lady wants nothing that I know of. 'Tis true, she has had ill luck at cards of late; I believe she has not won once this month: but what of that?

Mon. Ha!

Flip. 'Tis true, I know her spirit, that she'd see her husband hanged before she'd ask him for a farthing.

Mon. Ha!

Flip. And then I know him again, he'd see her drowned before he'd give her a farthing; but that's a help to your affair, you know.

Mon. 'Tis so, indeed.

Flip. Ah! well, I'll say nothing; but if she had none of these things to fret her—

Mon. Why really, Flippanta—

Flip. I know what you are going to say now; you are going to offer your service, but 'twont do; you have a mind to play the gallant now, but it must not be; you want to be shewing your liberality, but 'twon't be allowed; you'll be pressing me to offer it, and she'll be in a rage. We shall have the devil to do.

Mon. You mistake me, Flippanta; I was only going to say—(She puts her hand before his mouth.)

Flip. Ay, I know what you were going to say, well enough; but I tell you it will never do so. If one could find out some way now—ay, let me see—

Mon. Indeed, I hope—

Flip. Pray be quiet—no—but I'm thinking—hum—she'll smoke that though—let us consider: if one could find a way to—'Tis the nicest point in the world to bring about, she'll never touch it if she knows from whence it comes.

Mon. Ay.

Flip. You shall make her—a restitution—of two hundred pounds.

Mon. Ha! a restitution!

Flip. Yes, yes; 'tis the luckiest thought in the world: madam often plays, you know, and folks who do, meet, now and then, with sharpers. Now you shall be a sharper.

Mon. A sharper!

Flip. Ay, ay, a sharper; and having cheated her of two hundred pounds, shall be troubled in mind, and send it her back again. You comprehend me?

Mon. Yes, I—I comprehend, but a—won't she suspect if it be so much?

Flip. No, no; the more the better.

Mon. Two hundred pounds!

Flip. Yes, two hundred pounds; or, let me see—so even a sum may look a little suspicious—ay, let it be two hundred and thirty; that odd thirty will make it look so natural, the devil won't find it out.

Mon. Ha!

Flip. Pounds, too, look I don't know how; guineas, I fancy, were better; ay, guineas, it shall be guineas. You are of that mind, are you not?

Mon. Um! a guinea, you know, Flippanta, is—

Flip. A thousand times genteeler; you are certainly in the right on't; it shall be as you say, two hundred and thirty guineas.

Mon. Oh! well, if it must be guineas—let's see, two hundred guineas!

Flip. And thirty; two hundred and thirty: if you mistake the sum, you spoil all. So, go put them in a purse, while it's fresh in your head, and send them to me with a penitent letter, desiring I'll do you the favour to restore them to her.

Mon. Two hundred and thirty pounds in a bag!

Flip. Guineas, I say, guineas.

Mon. Ay, guineas, that's true. But, Flippanta, if she don't know they come from me, then I give my money for nothing, you know.

Flip. Pooh! leave that to me, I'll manage the stock for you; I'll make it produce something, I'll warrant you.

Mon. Well, Flippanta, 'tis a great sum, indeed; but I'll go try whst I can do for her. You say, two hundred guineas in a purse?

Flip. And thirty, if the man's in his senses.

Mon. And thirty, 'tis true; I always forget that thirty. [Exit.]

Flip. So, get thee gone, thou art a rare fellow, i'faith. Brass! it's thee, is't not?

Enter BRASS.

Brass. It is, huswife. How go matters? I staid till thy gentleman was gone. Hast done anything towards our common purse?

Flip. I think I have; he's going to make us a restitution of two or three hundred pounds.

Brass. A restitution! good.

Flip. A new way, sirrah, to make a lady take a present without putting her to the blush.

Brass. 'Tis very well, mighty well, indeed. Pr'y-thee where's thy master? let me try if I can persuade him to be troubled in mind, too.

Flip. Not so hasty; he's gone into his closet to prepare himself for a quarrel, I have advised him to—with his wife.

Brass. What to do?

Flip. Why, to make her stay at home, now she has resolved to do it beforehand. You must know, sirrah, we intend to make a merit of our faro bank, and get a good pretence for the merry companions we intend to fill his house with.

Brass. Very nicely spun, truly; thy husband will be a happy man.

Flip. Hold your tongue, you fool you. See, here comes your master.

Brass. He's welcome.

Enter DICK.

Dick. My dear Flippanta! how many thanks have I to pay thee?

Flip. Do you like her style?

Dick. The kindest little rogue; there's nothing but she gives me leave to hope. I am the happiest man the world has in it's care.

Flip. Not so happy as you think for neither, perhaps; you have a rival, sir, I can tell you that.

Dick. A rival!

Flip. Yes, and a dangerous one, too.

Dick. Who, in the name of terror?

Flip. A devilish fellow, one Mr. Amlet.

Dick. Amlet! I know no such man.

Flip. You know the man's mother, though; you met her here, and are in her favour, I can tell you. If he worst you in your mistress, you shall e'en marry her, and disinherit him.

Dick. If I have no other rival but Mr. Amlet, I believe I sha'n't be much disturbed in my amour. But can't I see Corinna?

Flip. I don't know; she has always some of her masters with her: but I'll go see if she can spare you a moment, and bring you word. [Exit.]

Dick. I wish my old hobbling mother ha'n't been blabbing something here she should not do.

Brass. Fear nothing, all's safe on that side, yet. But how speaks young mistress's epistle? soft and tender?

Dick. As pen can write.

Brass. So you think all goes well there?

Dick. As my heart can wish.

Brass. You are sure on't?

Dick. Sure on't.

Brass. Why then, ceremony aside, (putting on his hat,) you and I must have a little talk, Mr. Amlet.

Dick. Ah! Brass, what art thou going to do? wouldst ruin me?

Brass. Look you, Dick, few words; you are in a smooth way of making your fortune; I hope all will roll on. But how do you intend matters should pass 'twixt you and me in this business.

Dick. Death and furies! What a time dost take to talk on't?

Brass. Good words, or I betray you; they have already heard of one Mr. Amlet in the house.

Dick. Here's a son of a w—. (Aside.)

Brass. In short, look smooth, and be a good prince. I am your valet, 'tis true: your footman, sometimes, which I'm enraged at; but you have always had the ascendant, I confess: when we were school-fellows, you made me carry your books, make your exercise, own your rogueries, and sometimes take a whipping for you. When we were fellow-'prentices, though I was your senior, you made me open the shop, clean my master's shoes, cut last at dinner, and eat all the crust. In our sins, too, I must own you still kept me under; you soared up to the mistress, while I was at humble fornication with the maid. Nay, in our punishments, you still made good your post; for when once upon a time I was sentenced but to be whipped, I cannot deny but you were condemned to be hanged. So, that in all times, I must confess, your inclinations have been greater and nobler than mine; however, I cannot consent that you should at once, fix fortune for life, and I dwell in my humilities for the rest of my days.

Dick. Harkye! Brass, if I do not most nobly by thee, I'm a dog.

Brass. And when?

Dick. As soon as ever I am married.

Brass. Ay, the plague take thee.

Dick. Then you mistrust me?

Brass. I do, by my faith. Look you, sir, some folks we mistrust, because we don't know them: others we mistrust, because we do know them; and for one of these reasons I desire there may be a bargain before-hand: if not, (raising his voice,) look ye, Dick Amlet—

Dick. Soft, my dear friend and companion. The dog will ruin me. (Aside.) Say, what is't will content thee?

Brass. Oh, ho!

Dick. But how canst thou be such a barbarian?

Brass. I learnt it at Algiers.

Dick. Come, make thy Turkish demand, then.

Brass. You know you gave me a bank-bill this morning to receive for you.

Dick. I did so, of fifty pounds; 'tis thine. So, now thou art satisfied; all is fixed.

Brass. It is not, indeed. There's a diamond necklace you robbed your mother of, even now.

Dick. Ah! you Jew.

Brass. No words.

Dick. My dear Brass!

Brass. I insist.

Dick. My old friend!

Brass. Dick Amlet, (raising his voice,) I insist.

Dick. Ah! the cormorant. (Aside.) Well, 'tis thine; but thou'lt never thrive with it.

Brass. When I find it begins to do me mischief, I'll give it you again. But I must have a wedding suit.

Dick. Well.

Brass. A stock of linen.

Dick. Well thou shalt have that, too. Now, thou hast everything.

Brass. Heaven forgive me, I forgot a ring of remembrance; I would not forget all these favours for the world: a sparkling diamond will be always playing in my eye, and put me in mind of them.

Dick. This unconscionable rogue! (Aside.) Well, I'll bespeak one for thee.

Brass. Brilliant.

Dick. It shall. But if the thing don't succeed after all—

Brass. I am a man of honour, and restore: and so, treaty being finished, I strike my flag of defiance, and fall into my respects again. (Taking off his hat.)

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Flip. I have made you wait a little, but I could not help it; her master is but just gone. He has been shewing her prince Eugene's march into Italy; but if you'll slip up those back stairs, you shall try if you can agree upon the journey.

Dick. My dear Flippanta!

Flip. None of your dear acknowledgments, I beseech you, but up stairs as hard as you can drive.

Dick. I'm gone.

[Exit.]

Flip. And do you follow him, jack-a-dandy, and see he is not surprised.

Brass. I thought that was your post, Mrs. Useful; but if you'll come and keep me in humour, I don't care if I share the duty with you.

Flip. No words, sirrah, but follow him; I have something else to do.

Brass. The jade's so absolute there's no contesting with her.

[Exit.]

Flip. An impudent rogue! But let me see, what have I to do now? This restitution will be here quickly, I suppose: in the meantime, I'll go know if my lady's ready for the quarrel yet. Master, yonder, is so full on't, he's ready to burst; but we'll give him vent, by-and-by, with a witness.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Gripe's House.

Enter DICK and CORINNA.

Dick. Come, you must consent, you shall consent. How can you leave me thus upon the rack? A man who loves you to that excess that I do.

Cor. Nay, that you love me, sir, that I am satisfied in, for you have sworn you do: and I'm so pleased with it, I'd fain have you do so as long as I live, so we must never marry.

Dick. Not marry, my dear! Why, what's our love good for, if we don't marry?

Cor. Ah! I'm afraid 'twill be good for little, if we do.

Dick. Why do you think so?

Cor. Because I hear my father and mother, and my uncle and aunt, and Araminta and her husband, and twenty other married folks say so from morning to night.

Dick. Oh! that's because they are bad husbands and bad wives; but in our case there will be a good husband and a good wife, and so we shall love for ever.

Cor. Why, there may be something in that, truly; and I'm always willing to hear reason, as a reasonable young woman ought to do. But are you sure, sir, though we are very good now, we shall be so when we come to be better acquainted.

Dick. I can answer for myself, at least.

Cor. I wish you could answer for me, too. You see I am a plain dealer, sir; I hope you don't like me the worse for it.

Dick. Oh! by no means, 'tis a sign of admirable morals; and I hope, since you practice it yourself, you'll approve of it in your lover. In one word, therefore, (for 'tis in vain to mince the matter,) my resolution's fixed, and the world can't stagger me. I marry or I die.

Cor. That's very fine. Indeed, sir, I have much ado to believe you: the disease of love is seldom so violent.

Dick. Madam, I have two diseases to end my miseries ; if the first don't do it, the latter shall. (Drawing his sword.) One's in my heart, t'other's in my scabbard.

Cor. Not for a diadem. (Catching hold of him.) Ah! put it up, put it up.

Dick. How absolute is your command! (Dropping his sword.) A word, you see, disarms me.

Cor. What a power I have over him! (Aside.) The wondrous deeds of love! Pray, sir, let me have no more of these rash doings, though; perhaps I mayn't be always in the saving humour. I'm sure, if I had let him stick himself, I should have been envied by all the great ladies in the town. (Aside.)

Dick. Well, madam, have I, then, your promise? You'll make me the happiest of mankind?

Cor. I don't know what to say to you; but I believe I had as good promise, for I find I shall certainly do it.

Dick. Then let us seal the contract thus. (Kisses her.)

Cor. Um—He has almost taken away my breath; he kisses purely. (Aside.)

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Flip. Come, have you agreed the matter? if not, you must end it another time, for your father's in motion; so pray kiss and part.

Cor. That's sweet and sour. (They kiss.) Adieu to ye, sir. [Exeunt Dick and Cor.]

Enter CLARISSA.

Clar. Have you told him I'm at home, Flippanta?

Flip. Yes, madam.

Clar. And that I'll see him?

Flip. Yes, that too: but here's news for you; I have just now received the restitution.

Clar. That's killing pleasure; and how much has he restored me?

Flip. Two hundred and thirty.

Clar. Wretched rogue! but retreat; your master's coming to quarrel. (Takes a seat.)

Flip. I'll be within call, if things run high. [Exit.]

Enter GRIPE.

Gripe. Oh, ho! are you there, i'faith? Madam, your humble servant; I'm very glad to see you at home, I thought I should never have had that honour again.

Clar. Good-morrow, my dear, how d'ye do? Flippanta says you are out of humour, and that you have a mind to quarrel with me: is it true? eh! I have a terrible pain in my head, I give you notice on't before-hand.

Gripe. And how the plague should it be otherwise? It's a wonder you are not dead, as I would you were, (aside) with the life you lead. Are you not ashamed? and do you not blush to—

Clar. My dear child, you crack my brain; soften the harshness of your voice; say what you would, but let it be in an agreeable tone—

Gripe. Tone, madam! don't tell me of a tone.

Clar. Oh! if you will quarrel, do it with temperance; let it be all in cool blood, even and smooth, as if you were not moved with what you said; and then I'll hear you, as if I were not moved with it neither.

Gripe. Had ever man such need of patience? Madam, madam, I must tell you, madam—

Clar. Another key, or I'll walk off.

Gripe. Don't provoke me.

Clar. Shall you be long, my dear, in your remonstrances?

Gripe. Yes, madam, and very long.

Clar. If you would quarrel, en abregée, I should have a world of obligation to you.

Gripe. What I have to say, forsooth, is not to be expressed en abregée; my complaints are too numerous.

Clar. Complaints! Of what, my dear? (Rises.) What have you in the world to disturb you?

Gripe. What have I to disturb me! I have you; death and the devil!

Clar. Ay, merciful heaven! how he swears! You should never accustom yourself to such words as these; indeed, my dear, you should not: your mouth's always full of them.

Gripe. Blood and thunder! madam—

Clar. Ah! he'll fetch the house down: do you know you make me tremble for you? Flippanta! who's there? Flippanta!

Gripe. Here's a provoking devil for you!

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Flip. What, in the name of Jove, is the matter? you raise the neighbourhood.

Clar. Why, here's your master in a most violent fuss, and no mortal soul can tell for what.

Gripe. Not tell for what!

Clar. No, my life. I have begged him to tell me his griefs, Flippanta; and then he swears, good lord! how he does swear!

Gripe. Ah! you wicked jade, ah! you wicked jade!

Clar. Do you hear him, Flippanta! Do you hear him!

Flip. Pray, sir, let's know a little what puts you in all this fury?

Clar. Pr'ythee stand near me, Flippanta; there's an odd froth about his mouth, looks as if his poor head were going wrong. I'm afraid he'll bite.

Gripe. The wicked woman, Flippanta, the wicked woman!

Clar. Can anybody wonder I shun my own house, when he treats me at this rate in it?

Flip. Come, a little moderation, sir, and try what that will produce.

Gripe. Hang her! 'tis all a pretence to justify her going abroad.

Clar. A pretence! a pretence! Do you hear how black a charge he loads me with? Charges me with a pretence. You know, my dear, I scorn pretences: whenever I go abroad, it is without pretence.

Gripe. Give me patience.

Flip. You have a great deal, sir.

Clar. And yet he's never content, Flippanta.

Gripe. What shall I do?

Clar. What a reasonable man would do; own yourself in the wrong, and be quiet. Here's Flippanta has understanding, and I have moderation; I'm willing to make her judge of our differences.

Flip. You do me a great deal of honour, madam: but I tell you beforehand, I shall be a little on master's side.

Gripe. Right; Flippanta has sense. Come, let her decide. Have I not reason to be in a passion? tell me that.

Clar. You must tell her for what, my life.

Gripe. Why, for the trade you drive, my soul.

Flip. Look you, sir, pray take things right: I know madam does fret you a little now and then, that's true; but in the fund, she is the softest, sweetest, gentlest lady breathing. Let her but live entirely to her own fancy, and she'll never say a word to you from morning to night.

Gripe. Oons! let her but stay at home, and she shall do what she will; in reason, that is.

Flip. D'ye hear that, madam? Nay, now I must be on master's side; you see how he loves you, he desires only your company: pray give him that satisfaction, or I must pronounce against you.

Clar. Well, I agree. Thou know'st I don't love to grieve him: let him be always in a good humour, and I'll be always at home.

Flip. Look you there, sir, what would you have more?

Gripe. Well, let her keep her word, and I'll have done quarrelling.

Clar. I must not, however, so far lose the merit of my consent, as to let you think I am weary of going abroad, my dear: what I do is purely to oblige you; which, that I may be able to perform, without a relapse, I'll invent what ways I can to make my prison supportable to me.

Flip. Her prison! pretty bird! her prison! Don't that word melt you, sir?

Gripe. I must confess I did not expect to find her so reasonable.

Flip. Oh! sir, soon or late, wives come into good humour: husbands must only have a little patience to wait for it.

Clar. The innocent little diversions, dear, that I shall content myself with, will be chiefly play and company.

Gripe. Oh! I'll find you employment, your time sha'n't lie upon your hands; though if you have a mind, now, for such a companion as a—let me see—Araminta, for example; why I sha'n't be against her being with you from morning till night.

Clar. You can't oblige me more, 'tis the best woman in the world.

Gripe. Is not she?

Clar. Then, my dear, to make our home pleasant, we'll have concerts of music sometimes.

Gripe. Music in my house!

Clar. Yes, my child, we must have music, or the house will be so dull, I shall get the spleen, and be going abroad again.

Flip. Nay, she has so much complaisance for you, sir, you can't dispute such things with her.

Gripe. Ay, but if I have music—

Clar. Ay, but, sir, I must have music—

Flip. Not every day, madam don't mean.

Clar. No, bless me, no; but three concerts a-week; three days more we'll play, after dinner, at cards, and so forth; and close the evening with a handsome supper and a ball.

Gripe. A ball!

Flip. What order you see 'tis she purposes to live in! A most wonderful regularity!

Clar. And as this kind of life, so soft, so smooth, so agreeable, must needs invite a vast deal of company to partake of it, 'twill be necessary to have the decency of a porter at our door, you know.

Gripe. A porter—a scrivener have a porter, madam!

Clar. Positively, a porter.

Gripe. Why, no scrivener since Adam, ever had a porter, woman!

Clar. You will therefore be renowned in story, for having the first, my life.

Gripe. Flippanta!

Flip. Hang it, sir, never dispute a trifle; if you vex her, perhaps she'll insist upon a Swiss. (Aside to Gripe.)

Gripe. But, madam—

Clar. But, sir, a porter, positively, a porter; without that, the treaty's null, and I go abroad this moment.

Flip. Come, sir; never lose so advantageous a peace for a pitiful porter.

Gripe. Why, I shall be hooted at; the boys will throw stones at my porter. Besides, where shall I have money for all this expense?

Clar. My dear, who asks you for any? Don't be in a fright, chicken.

Gripe. Don't be in a fright, madam! But where, I say—

Flip. Madam plays, sir, think on that: women that play have inexhaustible mines, and wives who receive least money from their husbands, are many times those who spend the most.

Clar. So, my dear, let what Flippanta says content you. Go, my life, trouble yourself with nothing, but let me do just as I please, and all will be well. I'm going to consider of some more things to enable me to give you the pleasure of my company at home. [Exit.]

Flip. Mirror of goodness! Pattern to all wives! Well, sure, sir, you are happiest of all husbands.

Gripe. Yes, and a miserable dog for all that, too, perhaps.

Flip. Why, what can you ask more than this matchless complaisance?

Gripe. I don't know what I can ask, and yet I'm not satisfied with what I have, neither; the devil mixes in it all, I think; complaisant or perverse, it feels just as it did.

Clar. (Calls within.) Flippanta!

Flip. Madam calls. I come, madam. Come, be merry, be merry, sir; you have cause, take my word for't. Poor devil! (Aside.) [Exit.]

Gripe. I don't know that, I don't know that: but this I do know, that an honest man who has married a jade, whether she's pleased to spend her time at home or abroad, had better have lived a bachelor.

Enter BRASS.

Brass. Oh! sir, I am mighty glad I have found you.

Gripe. Why, what's the matter, pr'ythee?

Brass. Can nobody hear us?

Gripe. No, no; speak quickly.

Brass. You ha'n't seen Araminta, since the last letter I carried her from you.

Gripe. Not I, I go prudently; I don't press things like your young firebrand lovers.

Brass. But seriously, sir, are you very much in love with her?

Gripe. As mortal man has been.

Brass. I'm sorry for't.

Gripe. Why so, dear Brass?

Brass. If you were never to see her more now? Suppose such a thing; do you think 'twould break your heart?

Gripe. Oh!

Brass. Nay, now I see you love her; would you did not!

Gripe. My dear friend.

Brass. I had rather the devil had—pooh!—flown away with you quick, than to see you so much in love, as I perceive you are, since—

Gripe. Since what?—oh!

Brass. Araminta, sir.

Gripe. Dead?

Brass. No.

Gripe. How then?

Brass. Worse.

Gripe. Out with it.

Brass. Broke.

Gripe. Broke!

Brass. She is, poor lady, in the most unfortunate situation of affairs. But I have said too much.

Gripe. No, no, 'tis very sad; but let's hear it.

Brass. Sir, she charged me, on my life, never to mention it to you, of all men living.

Gripe. Why, who shouldst thou tell it to, but to the best of her friends?

Brass. Ay, why? there it is now, it's going just as I fancied. Now will I be hanged if you are not enough in love to be engaging in this matter. But I must tell you, sir, that as much concern as I have for that most excellent, beautiful, agreeable, distressed, unfortunate lady, I'm too much your friend and servant, ever to let it be said, 'twas the means of your being ruined for a woman, by letting you know, she esteemed you more than any other man upon earth.

Gripe. Ruined! what dost thou mean?

Brass. Mean! Why, I mean that women always ruin those that love 'em, that's the rule.

Gripe. The rule!

Brass. Yes, the rule; why, would you have 'em ruin those that don't? How shall they bring that about?

Gripe. But is there a necessity, then, they should ruin somebody?

Brass. Yes, marry is there: how would you have 'em support their expense else? Why, sir, you can't conceive now, you can't conceive what Araminta's privy purse requires. Only her privy purse, sir! Why, what do you imagine now she gave me for the last letter I carried her from you? 'Tis true, 'twas from a man she liked, else, perhaps, I had my bones broken. But what do you think she gave me?

Gripe. Why, mayhap, a shilling.

Brass. A guinea, sir, a guinea. You see by that how fond she was on't, by-the-by. But, then, sir, her coach-hire, her chair-hire, her pin-money, her play-money, her china, and her charity—would consume peers; a great soul, a very great soul! but what's the end of all this?

Gripe. Ha!

Brass. Why, I'll tell you what the end is—a nunnery.

Gripe. A nunnery!

Brass. A nunnery; in short, she is at last reduced to that extremity, and attacked with such a battalion of duns, that rather than tell her husband, who you know is such a rogue, (he'd let her go if she did,) she has e'en determined to turn Papist, and bid the world adieu for life.

Gripe. Oh, terrible! a Papist?

Brass. Yes; when a handsome woman has brought herself into difficulties, the devil can't help her out of—To a nunnery, that's another rule, sir.

Gripe. But, but, but, pr'ythee, Brass, but—

Brass. But all the buts in the world, sir, won't stop her: she's a woman of a noble resolution. So, sir, your humble servant; I pity her, I pity you. Turtle and mate; but the fates will have it so: all's packed up, and I'm now going to call her a coach, for she resolves to slip off without saying a word: and the next visit she receives from her friends will be through a melancholy grate, with a veil over her face. (Going.)

Gripe. It must not be; by the powers it must not; she was made for the world, and the world was made for her. Is there no way to save her?

Brass. Save her! No; how can she be saved? Why, she owes above five hundred pounds.

Gripe. Oh!

Brass. Five hundred pounds, sir; she's like to be saved indeed; not but that I know them in this town would give me one of the five, if I would persuade her to accept of the other four; but she had forbid me mentioning it to any soul living: and I have disobeyed her only to you; and so—I'll go and call a coach.

Gripe. Hold! dost think, my poor Brass, one might not order it so, as to compound those debts for—for twelve-pence in the pound?

Brass. Sir, d'ye hear? I have already tried 'em with ten shillings, and not a rogue will prick up his ears at it. Though, after all, for three hundred pounds, all in glittering gold, I could set their chops a watering. But where's that to be had with honour? there's the thing, sir—I'll go and call a coach.

Gripe. Hold, once more; I have a note in my closet of two hundred, ay—and fifty, I'll go and give it her myself. (Going.)

Brass. You will? Very genteel, truly. Go, slap-dash, and offer a woman of her scruples money, bolt in her face! why, you might as well offer a scorpion, and she'd as soon touch it.

Gripe. Shall I carry it to her creditors, then, and treat with them?

Brass. Ay, that's a rare thought.

Gripe. Is not it, Brass?

Brass. Only one little inconvenience by the way.

Gripe. As how?

Brass. That they are your wife's creditors as well as her's; and, perhaps, it might not be altogether so well to see you clearing the debts of your neighbour's wife, and leaving those of your wife unpaid.

Gripe. Why, that's true, now.

Brass. I'm wise, you see, sir.

Gripe. Thou art; and I'm but a young lover: but what shall we do, then?

Brass. Why, I'm thinking that if you give me the note, do you see; and that I promise to give you an account of it—

Gripe. Ay, but look you, Brass—

Brass. But look you! Why, what, d'ye think I'm a pick-pocket? D'ye think I intend to run away with your note? your paltry note!

Gripe. I don't say so; I say only that in case—

Brass. Case, sir! there's no case but the case I have put you; and since you heap cases upon cases, where there is but three hundred rascally pounds in the case—I'll go and call a coach.

Gripe. Pr'ythee, don't be so testy; come, no more words, follow me to my closet, and I'll give thee the money.

Brass. A terrible effort you make indeed; you—

Gripe. Well, say no more, thou shalt be satisfied. [Exit.]

Enter DICK.

Dick. Hist! Brass! Hist!

Brass. Well, sir.

Dick. 'Tis not well, sir, 'tis very ill, sir; we shall be all blown up.

Brass. What, with pride and plenty?

Dick. No, sir, with an officious slut that will spoil all. In short, Flippanta has been telling her mistress and Araminta of my passion for the young gentlewoman; and, truly, to oblige me, supposed no ill match by-the-by, they are resolved to propose it immediately to her father.

Brass. That's the devil! we shall come to papers and parchments, jointures and settlements; relations meet on both sides; that's the devil.

Dick. I intended this very day to propose to Flippanta the carrying her off: and I'm sure the young housewife would have tucked up her coats, and have marched.

Brass. Ay, with the body and the soul of her.

Dick. Why, then, what d—d luck is this?

Brass. 'Tis your luck, not mine: I have always seen it in your ugly phiz—Plague take ye! he'll be hanged at last. Why don't you try to get her off yet?

Dick. I have no money, you dog: you know you have stripped me of every penny.

Brass. Come, I'll venture one cargo more upon you; but if ever I see one glance of your hempen fortune again, I'm off your partnership for ever. I shall never thrive with him.

Dick. An impudent rogue! but he's in possession of my estate, so I must bear with him. (Aside.)

Brass. Well, come, I'll raise a hundred pounds for your use upon my wife's jewels here. (Pulling out the necklace.) Her necklace shall pawn for't.

Dick. Remember, though that if things fail, I'm to have the necklace again; you know you agreed to that.

Brass. Yes; and if I make it good, you'll be the better for't; if not, I shall! so you see where the cause will pinch.

Dick. Why, you barbarous dog, you won't offer to—

Brass. No words now; about your business, march. Go stay for me at the next tavern; I'll go to Flippanta, and try what I can do for you.

Dick. Well, I'll go, but don't think to—Oh! plague, sir— [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Gripe's House.

Enter MONEYTRAP and FLIPPANTA.

Mon. Well, my best friend, how go matters? Has the restitution been received, eh? Was she pleased with it?

Flip. Yes, truly? that is, she was pleased to see there was so honest a man in this immoral age.

Mon. Well, but a—does she know that 'twas I that—

Flip. Why, you must know I begun to give her a little sort of a hint, and—and so—why, and so she begun to put on a sort of a severe, haughty, reserved, angry, forgiving air. But soft; here she comes, you'll see how you stand with her presently: but don't be afraid. Courage!

Mon. Hem!

Enter CLARISSA.

'Tis no small piece of good fortune, madam, to find you at home: I have often endeavoured it in vain.

Clar. 'Twas then unknown to me; for if I could often receive the visits of so good a friend at home, I should be more reasonably blamed for being so much abroad.

Mon. Madam, you make me—

Clar. You are the man of the world whose company, I think, is most to be desired. I don't compliment you, when I tell you so, I assure you.

Mon. Alas! madam, your poor humble servant.

Clar. My poor humble servant, however, (with all the esteem I have for him,) stands suspected with me for a vile trick, I doubt he has played me; which if I could prove upon him, I'm afraid I should punish him very severely.

Mon. I hope, madam, you'll believe I am not capable of—

Flip. No fine speeches, you'll spoil all. (Aside to Mon.)

Mon. Thou art a most incomparable person. (Aside to Flip.)

Flip. Nay, it goes rarely; but get you in, and I'll say a little something to my lady for you while she's warm. (Aside to Mon.)

Mon. But, Flippanta, how long dost think she may hold out?

Flip. Pooh! not a twelvemonth.

Mon. Boo!

Flip. Away! I say. [Pushing him out.]

Clar. Is he gone? What a wretch it is?

Flip. Poor mortal, his money's finely laid out, truly.

Clar. (Advancing.) I suppose there may have been much such another scene within, between Araminta and my dear: but I left him so insupportably brisk, 'tis impossible he can have parted with any money: I'm afraid Brass has not succeeded as thou hast done, Flippanta.

Flip. By my faith, but he has, and better too; he presents his humble duty to Araminta, and has sent her—this. (Shewing the note.)

Clar. A bill from my love for two hundred and fifty pounds. The monster! he would not part with ten to save his lawful wife from everlasting torment.

Flip. Never complain of his avarice, madam, as long as you have his money. But which way will you go to receive it? for I must not appear with his note.

Clar. That's true; why, send for Mrs. Amlet; that's a mighty useful woman, that Mrs. Amlet.

Flip. Marry is she; we should have been basely puzzled how to dispose of the necklace without her; 'twould have been dangerous offering it for sale.

Clar. It would so, for I know your master has been laying out for't amongst the goldsmiths. But I stay here too long; I must in and coquette it a little more with my lover; Araminta will get ground on me else.

Flip. And I'll go send for Mrs. Amlet. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

GRIPE, CORINNA, ARAMINTA and MONEYTRAP, discovered.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Mon. Mighty well, oh! mighty well, indeed.

Enter CLARISSA.

Clar. Save you, save you, good folks! you are all in rare humour, methinks.

Gripe. Why, what should we be otherwise for, madam?

Clar. Nay, I don't know, not I, my dear; but I haven't had the happiness of seeing you so since our honeymoon was over, I think.

Gripe. Why, to tell you the truth, my dear, 'tis the joy of seeing you at home; (kisses her, and leads her to a seat) you see what charms you have, you are pleased to make use of 'em.

Aram. Very gallant, truly.

Clar. Nay, and what's more, you must know he's never to be otherwise, henceforwards; we have come to an agreement about it.

Mon. Why, here's my love and I have been upon just such another treaty too.

Aram. Well, sure there's some very peaceful star rules at present. Pray heaven continue its reign.

Mon. Pray do you continue its reign, you ladies, for 'tis all in your power. (Leering at Clarissa.)

Gripe. My neighbour Moneytrap says true, at least I'll confess frankly, (ogling Araminta,) 'tis in one lady's power to make me the best-humoured man on earth.

Mon. And I'll answer for another, that has the same over me. (Ogling Clarissa.)

Clar. 'Tis mighty fine, gentlemen; mighty civil husbands, indeed.

Gripe. Nay, what I say's true, and so true, that all quarrels being now at an end, I am willing, if you please to dispense with all that fine company we talked of to-day, be content with the friendly conversation of our two good neighbours here, and spend all my toying hours alone with my sweet wife.

Mon. Why, truly, I think now, if these good women pleased, we might make up the prettiest little neighbourly company, between our two families, and set a defiance to all the impertinent people in the world.

Aram. Indeed I doubt you'd soon grow weary, if we grew fond.

Gripe. Never, never; for our wives have wit, neighbour, and that never palls.

Clar. And our husbands have generosity, Araminta, and that seldom palls.

Gripe. So, that's a wipe for me now, because I did not give her a new year's gift last time; but be good, and I'll think of some tea-cups for you next year.

Mon. And, perhaps, I mayn't forget a fan, or as good a thing—um! hussy.

Clar. Well, upon these encouragements, Araminta, we'll try how good we can be.

Gripe. Well, this goes most rarely: poor Moneytrap, he little thinks what makes his wife so easy in his company. (Aside.)

Mon. I can but pity poor neighbour Gripe.

Lard, lard! what a fool do his wife and I make of him. (Aside.)

Clar. Are not these two wretched rogues, Araminta? (Aside to Aram.)

Aram. They are indeed. (Aside to Clar.)

Enter JESSAMINE.

Jess. Sir, here's Mr. Clip, the goldsmith, desires to speak with you. [Exit.]

Gripe. 'Cod's so, perhaps some news of your necklace, my dear.

Clar. That would be news, indeed.

Gripe. Let him come in. (Rises.)

Enter MR. CLIP.

Mr. Clip, your servant, I'm glad to see you: how do you do?

Clip. At your service, sir, very well. Your servant, Madam Gripe.

Clar. Horrid fellow! (Aside.)

Gripe. Well, Mr. Clip, no news yet of my wife's necklace?

Clip. If you please to let me speak with you in the next room, I have something to say to you.

Gripe. Ay, with all my heart. Neighbour Moneytrap, be so good as to take the ladies into the next room. [Exeunt Mon. and Ladies.] Well, any news?

Clip. Lookye, sir, here's a necklace brought me to sell, at least very like that you described to me.

Gripe. Let's see't—Victoria! the very same. Ah! my dear Mr. Clip. But who brought it you? you should have seized him.

Clip. 'Twas a young fellow that I know: I can't tell whether he may be guilty, though it's like enough. But he has only left it me now, to shew a brother of our trade, and will call upon me again presently.

Gripe. Wheedle him hither, dear Mr. Clip. Here's my neighbour Moneytrap in the house; he's a justice, and will commit him presently.

Clip. 'Tis enough.

Enter BRASS.

Gripe. Oh! my friend Brass.

Brass. Hold! sir, I think that is a gentleman I'm looking for. Mr. Clip! what are you acquainted here? I have just been at your shop.

Clip. I only stepped here to shew Mr. Gripe the necklace you left.

Brass. Why, sir, do you understand jewels? (To Gripe.) But I smoke the matter, harkye! a word in your ear; you are going to play the gallant again, and make a purchase on't for Araminta. eh, eh?

Gripe. Where had you the necklace?

Brass. Don't you trouble yourself about that; it's in commission with me, and I can help you to a pennyworth on't.

Gripe. A pennyworth on't, villain? (Strikes at him.)

Brass. Villain! a-hey, a-hey? Is't you or me, Mr. Clip, he's pleased to compliment?

Clip. What do you think on't, sir?

Brass. Think on't! now the devil fetch me if I know what to think on't.

Gripe. You'll sell a pennyworth, rogue! of a thing you have stolen from me.

Brass. Stolen! Pray, sir, what wine have you drunk to-day? It has a very merry effect upon you.

Gripe. You villain! either give me an account how you stole it, or—

Brass. Oh, ho! sir, if you please, don't carry your jest too far. I don't understand hard words, I give you warning on't: if you haven't a mind to buy the necklace, you may let it alone; I know how to dispose on't. What a plague—

Gripe. Oh! you sha'n't have that trouble, sir.

Dear Mr. Clip, you may leave the necklace here. I'll call at your shop and thank you for your care.

Clip. Sir, your humble servant. (Going.)

Brass. Oh, ho! Mr. Clip, if you please, sir, this won't do. (Stopping him.) I don't understand railery in such matters.

Clip. I leave it with Mr. Gripe, do you and he dispute it. [Exit.]

Brass. Ay, but 'tis from you, by your leave, sir, that I expect it. (Going after him.)

Gripe. You expect, you rogue, to make your escape, do you? But I have other accounts besides this, to make up with you. To be sure, the dog has cheated me of two hundred and fifty pounds. Come, villain, give me an account of—

Brass. Account of!—Sir, give me an account of my necklace, or I'll make such a noise in your house, I'll raise the devil in it.

Gripe. Well said, courage.

Brass. Blood and thunder! give it me, or—

Gripe. Come, hush, be wise, and I'll make no noise of this affair.

Brass. You'll make no noise; but I'll make a noise, and a d—d noise, too. Oh! don't think to—

Gripe. I tell thee I will not hang thee.

Brass. But I tell you I will hang you, if you don't give me my necklace. I will, rot me!

Gripe. Speak softly; be wise; how came it thine? who gave it thee?

Brass. A gentleman, a friend of mine.

Gripe. What was his name?

Brass. His name! I'm in such a passion, I have forgot it.

Gripe. Ah! brazen rogue, thou hast stolen it from my wife; 'tis the same she lost six weeks ago.

Brass. This has not been in England a month.

Gripe. You are a son of a w—.

Brass. Give me my necklace.

Gripe. Give me my two hundred and fifty pound note. My bill, hang-dog! or I'll strangle thee. (They struggle.)

Brass. Murder, murder!

Enter CLARISSA, ARAMINTA, CORINNA, FLIPPANTA, and MONEYTRAP.

Flip. What's the matter? what's the matter, here?

Gripe. I'll matter him.

Clar. Who makes thee cry out thus, poor Brass?

Brass. Why, your husband, madam; he has cheated me of a diamond necklace.

Cor. Who, papa? Ah! dear me.

Clar. Pr'ythee, what's the meaning of this great emotion, my dear?

Gripe. The meaning is, that—I'm quite out of breath; this son of a w— has got your necklace, that's all.

Clar. My necklace!

Gripe. That birdlime there—stole it. But, call a constable presently. Neighbour Moneytrap, you'll commit him.

Brass. D'ye hear? d'ye hear? he's touched; see how wild he looks: how his eyes roll in his head: tie him down, or he'll do some mischief or other.

Gripe. Let me come at him.

Clar. Hold! pr'ythee, my dear, reduce things to a little temperance, and let us coolly into the secret of this disagreeable rupture.

Gripe. Well, then, without passion; why, you must know, (but I'll have him hanged,) you must know that he came to Mr. Clip, to Mr. Clip the dog did, with a necklace to sell; so Mr. Clip having notice before that, (can you deny this, sirrah?) that you had lost your's, brings it me. Look at it here, do you know it again? (Giving the necklace to Clar.) Ay, you traitor! (To Brass.)

Flip. (Clar. shews the necklace to Flippanta.) 'Tis it, faith! here's some mystery in this; we must look about us. (Aside to Clar.)

Clar. The safest way is point blank to disown the necklace. (Aside to Flip.)

Flip. Right, stick to that. (Aside to Clar.)

Gripe. Well, madam, do you know your old acquaintance, eh?

Clar. Why, truly, my dear, though (as you may all imagine) I should be very glad to recover so valuable a thing as my necklace, yet I must be just to all the world: this necklace is not mine.

Flip. No, that's not my lady's necklace.

Brass. Huzza! Mr. Justice, I demand my necklace, and satisfaction of him.

Gripe. I'll die before I part with it; I'll keep it, and have him hanged.

Clar. But be a little calm, my dear; do, my bird, and then thou'lt be able to judge rightly of things.

Gripe. Oh! good lack, oh! good lack.

Clar. No, but don't give way to fury and interest both, either of them are passions strong enough to lead a wise man out of the way. The necklace not being really mine, give it the man again, and come and drink a dish of tea.

Gripe. Oons! if you, with your addle-head, don't know your own jewels, I, with my solid one, do. And, if I part with it, may famine be my portion.

Clar. But don't swear and curse thyself at this fearful rate; don't, my dove; be temperate in your words, and just in all your actions, 'twill bring a blessing upon you and your family.

Gripe. Bring thunder and lightning upon me and my family, if I part with my necklace.

Clar. Why, you'll have the lightning burn your house about your ears, my dear, if you go on in these practices.

Mon. A most excellent woman this. (Aside.)

Gripe. I'll keep my necklace.

Brass. Will you so? then here comes one has a title to it, if I haven't; let Dick bring himself off with her as he can.

Enter MRS. AMLET.

Mrs. Amlet, you are come in very good time, you lost a necklace t'other day, and who do you think has it?

Mrs. A. Marry, that I know not, I wish I did.

Brass. Why, then, here's Mr. Gripe has it, and swears 'tis his wife's.

Gripe. And so I do, sirrah; look here, mistress, do you pretend this is your's?

Mrs. A. Not for the round world, I would not say it; I only kept it to do madam a small courtesy, that's all.

Clar. Ah! Flippanta, all will out now. (Aside to Flippanta.)

Gripe. Courtesy! what courtesy?

Mrs. A. A little money only, that madam had present need of; please to pay me that, and I demand no more.

Gripe. How, forsooth, is this true. (To Clar.)

Clar. You are in a humour at present, love, to believe anything, so I won't take the pains to contradict it.

Gripe. Are you not ashamed of these ways? Do you see how you are exposed before your best friends here? Don't you blush at it?

Clar. I do blush, my dear; but 'tis for you, that here it should appear to the world, you keep me so bare of money, I'm forced to pawn my jewels.

Gripe. Impudent huswife? (Raising his hand to strike her; Moneytrap interposes.)

Clar. Softly, chicken; you might have prevented all this, by giving me the two hundred and fifty pounds you sent to Araminta even now.

Brass. You see, sir, I delivered your note: how I have been abused to-day!

Gripe. I'm betrayed; Jades on both sides, I see that. (Aside.)

Mon. But madam, madam, is this true that I hear? Have you taken a present of two hundred and fifty pounds? Pray, what were you to return for these pounds, madam, eh?

Aram. Nothing, my dear, I only took 'em to reimburse you of about the same sum you sent to Clarissa.

Mon. Hem!

Gripe. How, gentlewoman, did you receive money from him?

Clar. Oh! my dear, 'twas only in jest; I knew you'd give it again to his wife.

Mrs. A. But amongst all this bustle, I don't hear a word of my hundred pounds. Is it madam will pay me, or master?

Gripe. I pay! the devil shall pay.

Clar. Lookye, my dear, malice apart, pay Mrs. Amlet her money, and I'll forgive you coquetting with Araminta: am I not a good wife now?

Gripe. I burst with rage, and will get rid of this noose, though I tuck myself up in another.

Mon. Nay, pray even tuck me up with you.

[Exeunt Mon. and Gripe.]

Clar. and Aram. B'ye, dearies.

Enter DICK.

Cor. Look, look, Flippanta, here's the Colonel come at last.

Dick. Ladies, I ask your pardon, I have staid so long, but—

Mrs. A. Ah! rogue's face, have I got thee, old good-for-nought? Sirrah, sirrah! do you think to amuse me with your marriages, and your great fortunes? Thou hast played me a rare prank, by my conscience. Why, you ungracious rascal, what do you think will be the end of all this? Now, heaven forgive me, but I have a great mind to hang thee for't.

Cor. She talks to him very familiarly, Flippanta.

Flip. So methinks, by my faith.

Brass. Now the rogue's star is making an end of him. (Aside.)

Dick. What shall I do with her? (Aside.)

Mrs. A. Do but look at him, my dames, he has the countenance of a cherubim, but he's a rogue in his heart.

Clar. What is the meaning of all this, Mrs. Amlet?

Mrs. A. The meaning, good lack? Why, this all-to-be-powdered rascal, here, is my son, an't please you, eh, graceless? Now I'll make you own your mother, vermin!

Clar. What, the Colonel your son?

Mrs. A. 'Tis Dick, madam, that rogue Dick, I have so often told you of, with tears trickling down my old cheeks.

Aram. The woman's mad, it can never be.

Mrs. A. Speak, rogue, am I not thy mother, eh? Did I not bring thee forth, say then?

Dick. What will you have me say? You had a mind to ruin me, and you have done it; would you do any more?

Clar. Then, sir, you are son to good Mrs. Amlet?

Aram. And have had the assurance to put upon us all this while.

Flip. And the confidence to think of marrying Corinna.

Brass. And the impudence to hire me for your servant, who am as well born as yourself.

Clar. Indeed, I think he should be corrected.

Aram. Indeed, I think he deserves to be cudgelled.

Flip. Indeed, I think he might be pumped upon.

Brass. Indeed, I think he will be hanged.

Mrs. A. Good lack-a-day! good lack-a-day! there's no need to be so smart upon him neither: if he's not a gentleman, he's a gentleman's fellow. Come hither, Dick, they sha'n't run thee down neither; cock up thy hat, Dick, and tell them, though Mrs. Amlet is thy mother, she can make thee amends, with ten thousand good pounds to buy thee some lands, and build thee a house in the midst on't.

All. How!

Clar. Ten thousand pounds, Mrs. Amlet!

[Dick drives Brass off.]

Mrs. A. (To Clar.) Yes, forsooth; though I should lose the hundred you pawned your necklace for. Tell 'em of that, Dick.

Cor. Lookye, Flippanta, I can hold no longer, and hate to see the young man abused. And so, sir, if you please, I'm your friend and servant, and what's mine is your's; and when our estates are put together, I don't doubt but we shall do as well as the best of them.

Dick. Say'st thou so, my little queen? Why then if my dear mother will give us her blessing, the parson shall give us a tack. We'll get her a score of grand-children, and a merry house we'll make her. (They kneel to Mrs. A.)

Mrs. A. Ha, ha, ha! the pretty pair, the pretty pair! rise, my chickens, rise, rise and face the proudest of them. And if madam does not deign to give her consent, a fig for her. Why, how now?

Clar. Pray, Mrs. Amlet, don't be in a passion, the girl is my husband's girl, and if you can have his consent, upon my word, you shall have mine, for anything that belongs to him.

Flip. Then all's peace again, but we have been more lucky than wise.

Aram. And I suppose for us, Clarissa, we are to go on with our dears as we used to.

Clar. Just in the same track; for this late treaty of agreement with them was so unnatural, you see it could not hold. But 'tis just as well with us as if it had. Well, 'tis a strange fate, good folks. But while you live, everything gets well out of a broil, but a husband.

Flip. From this example, let each wedded pair,
That would the solid joys of wedlock share,
Avoid the trifling follies of the town,
Where no substantial joys were ever known;
And hold, as the most certain joys of life,
An honest husband, and a virtuous wife.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.—SCENE I.—Wilmot's House.

OLD WILMOT discovered.

Old W. The day is far advanc'd. The cheerful
Pursues with vigour his repeated course: [sun
No labour lessens, nor no time decays
His strength or splendour: evermore the same,
From age to age his influence sustains
Dependent worlds, bestows both life and motion
On the dull mass, that forms their dusky orbs, Cheers them with heat, and gilds them with his brightness.

Yet man, of jarring elements compos'd,
Who posts from change to change, from the first
Of his frail being to his dissolution, [hour
Enjoys the sad prerogative above him,
To think, and to be wretched! What is life
To him that's born to die?
Or, what the wisdom, whose perfection ends
In knowing we know nothing?
Mere contradiction all! A tragic farce,
Tedious, though short; elab'rate without art;
Ridiculously sad—

Enter RANDAL.

Where hast been, Randal?

Rand. Not out of Penryn, sir; but to the strand,
To hear what news from Falmouth, since the storm
Of wind last night.

Old W. It was a dreadful one.

Rand. Some found it so. A noble ship from India,
Ent'ring the harbour, run upon a rock,
And there was lost.

Old W. What came of those on board her?

Rand. Some few are sav'd; but much the greater
'Tis thought, are perish'd. [part,

Old W. They are past the fear
Of future tempests, or a wreck on shore:
Those who escap'd, are still expos'd to both.
Where's your mistress? [Minster.

Rand. I saw her pass the High-street, t'wards the Old W. She's gone to visit Charlotte. She doth

In the soft bosom of that gentle maid, [well!

There dwells more goodness than the rigid race
Of moral pedants e'er believ'd, or taught.
With what amazing constancy and truth,
Doth she sustain the absence of our son,
Whom more than life she loves! How shun for him,
Whom we shall ne'er see more, the rich and great,
Who own her charms, and sigh to make her happy!
Since our misfortunes we have found no friend,
None who regarded our distress, but her;
And she, by what I have observ'd of late,
Is wearied, or exhausted. Curs'd condition!
To live a burden to one only friend,
And blast her youth with our prodigious woe!
Who, that had reason, soul, or sense, would bear it
A moment longer? Then, this honest wretch!
I must dismiss him. Why should I detain
A grateful, gen'rous youth, to perish with me?
His service may procure him bread elsewhere,
Though I have none to give him. Pr'ythee, Randal,
How long hast thou been with me?

Rand. Fifteen years.

I was a very child when first ye took me
To wait upon your son, my dear young master.
I oft have wish'd I'd gone to India with him,
Though you, desponding, give him o'er for lost.

(Old Wilmot wipes his eyes.)

I am to blame: this talk revives your sorrow
For his long absence.

Old W. That cannot be reviv'd
Which never died.

Rand. The whole of my intent
Was to confess your bounty, that supplied
The loss of both my parents: I was long
The object of your charitable care. [longer since

Old W. No more of that: thou'st serv'd me
Without reward; so that account is balanced,
Or, rather, I'm the debtor. I remember,
When poverty began to shew her face
Within these walls, and all my other servants,
Like pamper'd vermin from a falling house,
Retreated with the plunder they had gain'd,

And left me, too indulgent and remiss
For such ungrateful wretches, to be crush'd
Beneath the ruin they had help'd to make,
That you, more good than wise, refus'd to leave me.

Rand. May I beseech you, sir—

Old W. With my distress,
In perfect contradiction to the world,
Thy love, respect, and diligence, increas'd.
Now, all the recompense within my power,
Is to discharge thee, Randal, from my hard
Unprofitable service.

Rand. Heaven forbid!

Shall I forsake you in your worst necessity?
Believe me, sir, my honest soul abhors
The barb'rous thought!

Old W. What! canst thou feed on air?
I have not left wherewith to purchase food
For one meal more!

Rand. Rather than leave you thus,
I'll beg my bread, and live on others' bounty,
While I serve you.

Old W. Down, down, my swelling heart,
Or burst in silence! 'Tis thy cruel fate
Insults thee by his kindness. He is innocent
Of all the pain it gives thee. Go thy ways:
I will no more suppress thy youthful hopes
Of rising in the world.

Rand. 'Tis true, I'm young,
And never try'd my fortune, or my genius,
Which may, perhaps, find out some happy means,
As yet unthought of, to supply your wants.

Old W. Thou tortur'st me! I hate all obligations
Which I can ne'er return. And who art thou,
That I should stoop to take 'em from thy hand?
Care for thyself, but take no thought for me!
I will not want thee: trouble me no more!

Rand. Be not offended, sir, and I will go.
I ne'er repin'd at your commands before;
But heaven's my witness, I obey you now,
With strong reluctance, and a heavy heart!
Farewell, my worthy master! (Going.)

Old W. Farewell! Stay;
As thou art yet a stranger to the world,
Of which, alas! I've had too much experience;
I should, methinks, before we part, bestow
A little counsel on thee. Dry thy eyes:
If thou weep'st thus, I shall proceed no farther.
Dost thou aspire to greatness or to wealth?
Quit books, and the unprofitable search
Of wisdom there, and study humankind:
No science will avail thee without that;
But that obtain'd, thou need'st not any other.
This will instruct thee to conceal thy views,
And wear the face of probity and honour,
Till thou hast gain'd thy end: which must be ever
Thy own advantage, at that man's expense
Who shall be weak enough to think thee honest.

Rand. You mock me, sure!

Old W. I never was more serious.

Rand. Why should you counsel, what you scorn'd to practise? [ruin.]

Old W. Because that foolish scorn has been my
I've been an idiot, but would have thee wiser,
And treat mankind as they would treat thee, Randal,
As they deserve, and I've been treated by them:
Thou'st seen by me, and those who now despise me,
How men of fortune fall, and beggars rise;
Shun my example; treasure up my precepts;
The world's before thee—be a knave, and prosper.
What, art thou dumb?

Rand. Amazement ties my tongue!
Where are your former principles?

Old W. No matter;
Suppose I have renounc'd them: I have passions,
And love thee still; therefore, would have thee think
The world is all a scene of deep deceit:
And he, who deals with mankind on the square,
Is his own bubble, and undoes himself.
Farewell; and mark my counsel, boy. [Exit.]

Rand. Amazement!

Is this the man I thought so wise and just?
What, teach and counsel me to be a villain?
Sure, grief has made him frantic, or some fiend
Assum'd his shape. I shall suspect my senses.
High-minded he was ever, and improvident,
But pitiful and generous, to a fault.
Pleasure he lov'd, but honour was his idol.
Oh! fatal change! Oh! horrid transformation!
So a majestic temple, sunk to ruin,
Becomes the loathsome shelter and abode
Of lurking serpents, toads, and beasts of prey;
And scaly dragons hiss, and lions roar,
Where wisdom taught, and music charm'd before.
[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Charlotte's house.

Enter CHARLOTTE and MARIA.

Char. What terror and amazement must they feel
Who die by shipwreck!

Mar. 'Tis a dreadful thought!

Char. Ay, is it not, Maria? To descend,
Living, and conscious, to the watry tomb!
Alas! had we no sorrows of our own,
The frequent instances of others' woe,
Must give a gen'rous mind a world of pain.
But you forget you promis'd me to sing.
Though cheerfulness and I have long been strangers,
Harmonious sounds are still delightful to me.
There's, sure, no passion in the human soul,
But finds its food in music. I would hear
The song, compos'd by that unhappy maid,
Whose faithful lover, 'scap'd a thousand perils
From rocks and sands, and the devouring deep;
And after all, being arriv'd at home,
Passing a narrow brook, was drowned there,
And perish'd in her sight.

SONG.—MARIA.

Cease, cease, heart-easing tears!

Adieu, you flatt'ring fears!

Which seven long, tedious years

Taught me to bear.

Tears are for lighter woes;

Fear no such danger knows

As fate remorseless shews,

Endless despair!

Dear cause of all my pain,

On the wide stormy main,

Thou wast preserv'd in vain,

Though still ador'd.

Hadst thou died there unseen,

My wounded eyes had been

Sav'd from the direst scene

Maid e'er deplor'd.

Char. (Finds a letter.) What's this? A letter su-perscrib'd to me!

None could convey it here, but you, Maria.
Ungen'rous, cruel maid! to use me thus!
To join with flatt'ring men to break my peace,
And persecute me to the last retreat? [the sighs]

Mar. Why should it break your peace to hear
Of honourable love? This letter is—

Char. No matter whence: return it back unopen'd:
I have no love, no charms, but for my Wilmot,
Nor would have any.

Mar. Alas! Wilmot's dead!

Or, living, dead to you. [hope;]

Char. I'll not despair: patience shall cherish
Nor wrong his honour by unjust suspicion.
I know his truth, and will preserve my own.
But, to prevent all future importunity,
Know, thou incessant foe to my repose,
Whether he sleeps secure from mortal cares,
In the deep bosom of the boist'rous main,
Or, toss'd with tempest, still endures its rage,
No second choice shall violate my vows; [jur'd,
High heaven, which heard them, and abhors the per-
Can witness, they were made without reserve:
Never to be retracted, ne'er dissolv'd
By accident or absence, time or death.

Mar. And did your vows oblige you to support

His haughty parents, to your utter ruin?
Well may you weep to think on what you've done.

Char. I weep to think that I can do no more
For their support. What will become of them?
The hoary, helpless, miserable pair!

Mar. What I can't praise, you force me to admire,
And mourn for you, as you lament for them.
Your patience, constancy, and resignation,
Merit a better fate.

Char. So pride would tell me,
And vain self-love, but I believe them not:
And if, by wanting pleasure, I have gain'd
Humility, I'm richer for my loss.

Mar. You have the heavenly art still to improve
Your mind by all events. But here comes one,
Whose pride seems to increase with her misfortunes.
Her faded dress, unfashionably fine,
As ill conceals her poverty, as that
Strain'd complaisance, her haughty, swelling heart.
Though perishing with want, so far from asking,
She ne'er receives a favour uncompell'd;
And, while she ruins, scorns to be oblig'd:
Let me depart, I know she loves me not. [Exit.

Enter AGNES.

Char. This visit's kind.

Agnes. Few else would think it so:
Those who would once have thought themselves much honour'd
By the least favour, though 'twere but a look,
I could have shewn them, now refuse to see me.
'Tis misery enough to be reduc'd
To the low level of the common herd,
Who, born to beggary, envy all above them:
But 'tis the curse of curses to endure
The insolent contempt of those we scorn.

Char. By scorning, we provoke them to contempt,
And thus offend, and suffer in our turns:
We must have patience.

Agnes. No, I scorn them yet;
But there's no end of suff'ring: who can say
Their sorrows are complete? My wretched husband,
Tir'd with our woes, and hopeless of relief,
Grows sick of life;
And, urg'd by indignation and despair,
Would plunge into eternity at once,
By foul self-murder.

Char. Gracious heaven support him!

Agnes. His fixed love for me,
Whom he would fain persuade to share his fate,
And take the same uncertain, dreadful course,
Alone withholds his hand.

Char. And may it ever! [of life;

Agnes. I've known with him the two extremes
The highest happiness, and deepest woe,
With all the sharp and bitter aggravations
Of such a vast transition. Such a fall
In the decline of life! I have as quick,
As exquisite a sense of pain as he,
And would do anything, but die, to end it;
But there my courage fails. Death is the worst
That fate can bring, and cuts off ev'ry hope. [lot

Char. We must not choose, but strive to bear our Without reproach or guilt. By one rash act
Of desperation, we may overthrow
The merit we've been raising all our days,
And lose our whole reward. And now, methinks,
Now, more than ever, we have cause to fear,
And be upon our guard. The hand of heaven
Spreads clouds on clouds o'er our benighted heads,
And wrapp'd in darkness, doubles our distress.
I had, the night last past, repeated twice,
A strange and awful dream: I would not yield
To fearful superstition, nor despise
The admonition of a friendly power,
That wish'd my good.

Agnes. I have certain plagues enough,
Without the help of dreams, to make me wretched.

Char. I would not stake my happiness or duty
On their uncertain credit, nor on aught
But reason, and the known decrees of heaven;

Yet dreams have sometimes shewn events to come,
And may excite to vigilance and care.

My vision may be such, and sent to warn us,
(Now we are tried by multiply'd afflictions,)
To mark each motion of our swelling hearts,
Lest we attempt to extricate ourselves,
And seek deliv'rance by forbidden ways;
To keep our hopes and innocence entire,
Till we're dismiss'd to join the happy dead,
Or heaven relieves us here.

Agnes. Well, to your dream.

Char. Methought, I sat, in a dark winter's night,
On the wide summit of a barren mountain; [frame,
The sharp, bleak winds pierc'd through my shiv'ring
And storms of hail, and sleet, and driving rains,
Beat with impetuous fury on my head, [round me.
Drench'd my chill'd limbs, and pour'd a deluge
On one hand, ever-gentle Patience sat,
On whose calm bosom I reclin'd my head;
And, on the other, silent Contemplation.
At length, to my unclos'd and watchful eyes,
That long had roll'd in darkness, dawn appear'd;
And I beheld a man, an utter stranger,
But of graceful and exalted mien,
Who press'd with eager transport to embrace me.
I shunn'd his arms: but at some words he spoke,
Which I have now forgot, I turn'd again;
But he was gone—and, oh! transporting sight!
Your son, my dearest Wilmot, fill'd his place!

Agnes. If I regarded dreams, I should expect
Some fair event from your's.

Char. But what's to come,
Though more obscure, is terrible, indeed!
Methought we parted soon, and when I sought him,
You and his father (yes, you both were there,)
Strove to conceal him from me. I pursu'd you
Both with my cries, and call'd on heaven and earth
To judge my wrongs, and force you to reveal
Where you had hid my love, my life, my Wilmot!

Agnes. Unless you mean t'offend me, spare the 'Tis just as likely Wilmot should return [rest.
As we become your foes.

Char. Far be such thought
From Charlotte's breast! but when I heard you name
Self-murder, it reviv'd the frightful image
Of such a dreadful scene!

Agnes. You will persist—

Char. Excuse me: I have done. Being a dream,
I thought, at least, it could not give offence.

Agnes. You could not think so, had you thought at all.

But I take nothing ill from thee. Adieu!
I've tarried longer than I first intended,
And my poor husband mourns the while alone. [Exit.

Char. She's gone abruptly, and, I fear, displeas'd.
The least appearance of advice or caution,
Sets her impatient temper in a flame. [pride,
When grief, that well might humble, swells our
And pride, increasing, aggravates our grief,
The tempest must prevail till we are lost.
Heaven grant a fairer issue to her sorrows! [Exit.

SCENE III.—The Town and Port of Penryn.

Enter YOUNG WILMOT and EUSTACE, in Indian habits.

Young W. Welcome, my friend, to Penryn! Here
we're safe. [sea,

Eust. Then we're deliver'd twice: first from the
And then from men, who, more remorseless, prey
On shipwreck'd wretches, and who spoil and murder
Those whom fell tempests, and devouring waves,
In all their fury, spar'd.

Young W. It is a scandal,
(Though malice must acquit the better sort,)
The rude unpolish'd people here, in Cornwall,
Have long lain under, and with too much justice:
For 'tis an evil, grown almost invet'rate,
And asks a bold and skilful hand to cure.

Eust. Your treasure's safe, I hope?

Young W. 'Tis here, thank heaven!

Being in jewels, when I saw our danger,
I hid it in my bosom.

Eust. I observed you,
And wonder how you could command your thoughts
In such a time of terror and confusion.

Young W. My thoughts were then at home. Oh!
England, England!

Thou seat of plenty, liberty, and health,
With transport I behold thy verdant fields,
Thy lofty mountains rich with useful ore,
Thy num'rous herds, thy flocks, and winding streams.
After a long and tedious absence, Eustace,
With what delight we breathe our native air,
And tread the genial soil that bore us first!
'Tis said, the world is ev'ry wise man's country;
Yet, after having view'd its various nations,
I'm weak enough still to prefer my own
To all I've seen beside. You smile, my friend!
And think, perhaps, 'tis instinct more than reason.
Why, be it so: instinct preceded reason
Ev'n in the wisest men, and may sometimes
Be much the better guide. But, be it either,
I must confess, that even death itself
Appear'd to me with twice its native horrors,
When apprehended in a foreign land.
Death is, no doubt, in ev'ry place the same;
Yet nature casts a look towards home, and most
Who have it in their power, choose to expire
Where they first drew their breath.

Eust. Believe me, Wilmot,
Your grave reflections were not what I smil'd at;
I own the truth. That we're return'd to England,
Affords me all the pleasure you can feel.
Yet I must think a warmer passion moves you;
Thinking of that, I smil'd.

Young W. Oh! Eustace, Eustace!
Thou know'st, for I've confess'd to thee, I love;
But having never seen the charming maid,
Thou canst not know the fierceness of my flame.
My hopes and fears, like the tempestuous seas
That we have pass'd, now mount me to the skies,
Now hurl me down from that stupendous height,
And drive me to the centre. Did you know
How much depends on this important hour,
You would not be surpris'd to see me thus.
The sinking fortune of our ancient house,
Compell'd me, young, to leave my native country,
My weeping parents, and my lovely Charlotte,
Who rul'd, and must for ever rule, my fate.
Oh! should my Charlotte, doubtful of my truth,
Or, in despair ever to see me more,
Have given herself to some more happy lover!
Distraction's in the thought! Or, should my parents,
Griev'd for my absence, and oppress'd with want,
Have sunk beneath their burden and expir'd,
While I, too late, was flying to relieve them;
The end of all my long and weary travels,
The hope that made success itself a blessing,
Being defeated, and for ever lost;
What were the riches of the world to me?

Eust. The wretch who fears all that is possible,
Must suffer more than he, who feels the worst
A man can feel, yet lives exempt from fear.
A woman may be false, and friends are mortal;
And yet your aged parents may be living,
And your fair mistress constant.

Young W. True, they may;
I doubt, but I despair not. No, my friend!
My hopes are strong, and lively as my fears;
They tell me, Charlotte is as true as fair;
That we shall meet, never to part again;
That I shall see my parents, kiss the tears
From their pale hollow cheeks, cheer their sad hearts,
And drive that gaping phantom, meagre want,
For ever from their board; their days to come
Crown all with peace, with pleasure, and abundance;
Receive their fond embraces and their blessings,
And be a blessing to them.

Eust. 'Tis our weakness:
Blind to events, we reason in the dark,

And fondly apprehend, what none e'er found,
Or ever shall, pleasure and pain unmix'd;
And flatter, and torment ourselves by turns,
With what shall never be.

Young W. I'll go this instant
To seek my Charlotte, and explore my fate.

Eust. What, in that foreign habit?

Young W. That's a trifle,
Not worth my thoughts.

Eust. The hardships you've endur'd,
And your long stay beneath the burning zone,
Where one eternal sultry summer reigns,
Have marr'd the native hue of your complexion:
Methinks you look more like a sun-burnt Indian,
Than a Briton.

Young W. Well; 'tis no matter, Eustace!
I hope my mind's not alter'd for the worse,
And for my outside—But inform me, friend,
When I may hope to see you.

Eust. When you please:
You'll find me at the inn.

[me there,

Young W. When I have learn'd my doom, expect
Till then, farewell!

Eust. Farewell! Success attend you! [Exeunt.

ACT II.—SCENE I.—Charlotte's house.

Enter CHARLOTTE followed by a Servant.

Serv. Madam, a stranger, in a foreign habit, de-

Char. In a foreign habit! [sires to see you.

'Tis strange, and unexpected. But admit him.

[Exit Servant.

Who can this stranger be? I know no foreigner,

Enter YOUNG WILMOT.

Nor any man like this.

Young W. Ten thousand joys!

(Going to embrace her.)

Char. Sir, you are too bold. Forbear, and let me know

What business brought you here, or leave the place.

Young W. Perfidious maid! Am I forgot, or scorn'd?

Char. Can I forget a man I never knew? [heart:

Young W. My fears are true; some other has her
She's lost: my fatal absence has undone me! (Aside.)
Oh! could thy Wilmot have forgot thee, Charlotte.

Char. Ha! Wilmot! say, what do your words im-
Oh! gentle stranger, ease my swelling heart! [port?
What dost thou know of Wilmot?

Young W. This I know:

When all the winds of heaven seem'd to conspire
Against the stormy main, and dreadful peals
Of rattling thunder deafen'd ev'ry ear,
And drown'd th' affrighted mariners' loud cries;
When vivid lightning spread its sulphurous flames
Through all the dark horizon, and disclos'd
The raging seas incens'd to his destruction;
When the good ship, in which he was embark'd,
Broke, and o'erwhelm'd by the impetuous surge,
Sunk to the oozy bottom of the deep,
And left him struggling with the warring waves;
In that dread moment, in the jaws of death,
When his strength fail'd, and ev'ry hope forsook him,
And his last breath press'd towards his trembling lips,
The neighbouring rocks, that echo'd to his moan,
Return'd no sound articulate but—Charlotte.

Char. The fatal tempest, whose description strikes
The hearer with astonishment, is ceas'd;
And Wilmot is at rest. The fiercer storm
Of swelling passions, that o'erwhelms the soul,
And rages worse than the mad foaming seas
In which he perish'd, ne'er shall vex him more.

Young W. Thou seem'st to think he's dead; enjoy that thought;

Persuade yourself, that what you wish is true,
And triumph in your falsehood. Yes, he's dead!
You were his fate. The cruel winds and waves,
That cast him pale and breathless on the shore,
Spar'd him for greater woes; to know his Charlotte,
Forgetting all her vows to him and heaven,
Had cast him from her thoughts. Then, then he died;
But never can have rest. Ev'n now he wanders,

A sad, repining, discontented ghost;
The unsubstantial shadow of himself;
And pours his plaintive groans in thy deaf ears,
And stalks, unseen, before thee.

Char. 'Tis enough:

Detested falsehood now has done its worst. [mot!
And art thou dead? And wouldst thou die, my Wil-
For one thou thought unjust? 'Thou soul of truth!
What must be done? Which way shall I express Unutterable woe? Or how convince
Thy dear departed spirit of the love,
Th' eternal love, and never-failing faith
Of thy much-injur'd, lost, despairing Charlotte?

Young W. Be still, my flutt'ring heart; hope not too soon!

Perhaps I dream, and this is all illusion. (Aside.)

Char. If, as some teach, the spirit after death,
Free from the bounds and ties of sordid earth,
Can trace us to our most conceal'd retreat,
See all we act, and read our very thoughts;
To thee, oh! Wilmot, kneeling, I appeal.
If e'er I swerv'd in action, word, or thought,
Or ever wish'd to taste a joy on earth
That center'd not in thee, since last we parted,
May we ne'er meet again; but thy loud wrongs
So close the ear of mercy to my cries,
That I may never see those bright abodes
Where truth and virtue only have admission,
And thou inhabit'st now!

Young W. Assist me, heaven!

Preserve my reason, memory, and sense!
Oh! moderate my fierce tumultuous joys,
Or their excess will drive me to distraction.
Oh! Charlotte, Charlotte! lovely, virtuous maid!
Can thy firm mind, in spite of time and absence,
Remain unshaken, and support its truth;
And yet thy frailer memory retain
No image, no idea of thy lover?

Why dost thou gaze so wildly? Look on me;
Turn thy dear eyes this way; observe me well.
Have scorching climates, time, and this strange habit,
So chang'd, and so disguis'd thy faithful Wilmot,
That nothing in my voice, my face, or mien,
Remains to tell my Charlotte I am he?

(Gives him her hand.)

Why dost thou weep? Why dost thou tremble thus?
Why doth thy panting heart, and cautious touch,
Speak thee but half convinc'd? Whence are thy fears?
Why art thou silent? Canst thou doubt me still?

Char. No, Wilmot! no; I'm blind with too much light:

O'ercome with wonder, and oppress'd with joy.
This vast profusion of extreme delight,
Rising at once, and bursting from despair,
Defies the aid of words, and mocks description.
But, for one sorrow, one sad scene of anguish,
That checks the swelling torrent of my joys,
I could not bear the transport.

Young W. Let me know it:

Give me my portion of thy sorrow, Charlotte!
Let me partake thy grief, or bear it for thee.

Char. Alas, my Wilmot! these sad tears are thine;
They flow for thy misfortunes. I am pierc'd
With all the agonies of strong compassion,
With all the bitter anguish you must feel,
When you shall hear your parents—

Young W. Are no more.

Char. You apprehend me wrong.

Young W. Perhaps I do,
Perhaps you mean to say, the greedy grave
Was satisfy'd with one, and one is left
To bless my longing eyes. But which, my Charlotte?

Char. Afflict yourself no more with groundless fears:

Your parents both are living. Their distress—
The poverty to which they are reduc'd,
In spite of my weak aid, was what I mourn'd:
That poverty, in age, to them whose youth
Was crown'd with full prosperity, I fear,
Is worse much worse, than death.

Young W. My joy's complete!

My parents living, and possess'd of thee!
From this blest hour, the happiest of my life,
I'll date my rest. My anxious hopes and fears,
My weary travels, and my dangers past,
Are now rewarded all: now I rejoice
In my success, and count my riches gain.
For know, my soul's best treasure! I have wealth
Enough to glut e'en avarice itself:
No more shall cruel want, or proud contempt,
Oppress the sinking spirits, or insult
The hoary heads of those who gave me being.

Char. 'Tis now, oh! riches, I conceive your worth:
You are not base, nor can you be superfluous,
But when misplac'd in base and sordid hands.
Fly, fly! my Wilmot! leave thy happy Charlotte!
Thy filial piety, the sighs and tears
Of thy lamenting parents, call thee hence.

Young W. I have a friend, the partner of my voyage,
Who, in the storm last night, was shipwreck'd with me.

Char. Shipwreck'd last night! Oh! you immortal
What have you suffer'd! How were you preserv'd?

Young W. Let that, and all my other strange es-
And perilous adventures, be the theme [capes,
Of many a happy winter night to come.

My present purpose was t'intreat my angel,
To know this friend, this other better Wilmot,
And come with him this evening to my father's:
I'll send him to thee.

Char. I consent with pleasure. [bear my joy!

Young W. Heavens! what a night! How shall I
My parents, yours, my friends, all will be mine.
If such the early hopes, the vernal bloom,
The distant prospect of my future bliss,
Then, what the ruddy autumn? What the fruit,
The full possession of thy heavenly charms? [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Street in Penryn.

Enter RANDAL.

Rand. Poor, poor! and friendless! whither shall I wander?

And to what point direct my views and hopes?
A menial servant! No. What, shall I live
Here in this land of freedom, live distinguish'd,
And mark'd the willing slave of some proud subject!
To swell his useless train for broken fragments,
The cold remains of his superfluous board?
I would aspire to something more and better.
Turn thy eyes, then, to the prolific ocean,
Whose spacious bosom opens to thy view:
There deathless honour, and unenvy'd wealth,
Have often crown'd the brave adventurer's toils.
This is the native uncontested right,
The fair inheritance of ev'ry Briton,
That dares put in his claim. My choice is made:
A long farewell to Cornwall, and to England!
If I return—But stay, what stranger's this,
Who, as he views me, seems to mend his pace?

Enter YOUNG WILMOT.

Young W. Randal! the dear companion of my Sure, lavish fortune means to give me all [youth!
I could desire, or ask, for this blest day,
And leave me nothing to expect hereafter!

Rand. Your pardon, sir! I know but one on earth
Could properly salute me by the title
You're pleas'd to give me; and I would not think
That you are he—that you are Wilmot!

Young W. Why? [ment,

Rand. Because I could not bear the disappoint-
If I should be deceiv'd.

Young W. I am pleas'd to hear it:
Thy friendly fears better express thy thoughts
Than words could do.

Rand. Oh, Wilmot! Oh, my master!
Are you return'd?

Young W. I have not yet embrac'd
My parents; I shall see you at my father's.

Rand. No; I am discharg'd from thence; oh!
sir, such ruin— [them:

Young W. I've heard it all, and hasten to relieve

Sure, heaven hath bless'd me to that very end:
I've wealth enough; nor shalt thou want a part.

Rand. I have a part already; I am blest
In your success, and share in all your joys.

Young W. I doubt it not; but tell me, dost thou
My parents not suspecting my return, [think,
That I may visit them, and not be known?

Rand. 'Tis hard for me to judge. You are, al-
Grown so familiar to me, that I wonder [ready,
I knew you not at first: yet it may be;
For you're much alter'd, and they think you dead.

Young W. This is certain; Charlotte beheld me long,
And heard my loud reproaches and complaints,
Without rememb'ring she had ever seen me.
My mind, at ease, grows wanton: I would fain
Refine on happiness. Why may I not Indulge my curiosity, and try
If it be possible, by seeing first
My parents as a stranger, to improve
Their pleasure by surprise?

Rand. It may, indeed,
Enhance your own, to see from what despair
Your timely coming, and unhop'd success,
Have given you power to raise them.

Young W. I remember—
E'er since we learn'd together, you excell'd
In writing fairly, and could imitate
Whatever hand you saw, with great exactness.
I therefore beg you'll write, in Charlotte's name
And character, a letter to my father;
And recommend me, as a friend of her's,
To his acquaintance.

Rand. Sir, if you desire it—
And yet—

Young W. Nay, no objections! 'Twill save time,
Most precious with me now. For the deception,
If doing what my Charlotte will approve,
'Cause done for me, and with a good intent,
Deserves the name, I'll answer it myself.
If this succeeds, I purpose to defer
Discov'ring who I am till Charlotte comes,
And thou, and all who love me. Ev'ry friend
Who witnesses my happiness to-night,
Will, by partaking, multiply my joys.

Rand. You grow luxurious in imagination.
Could I deny you aught, I would not write
This letter. To say true, I ever thought
Your boundless curiosity a weakness.

Young W. What canst thou blame in this?

Rand. Your pardon, sir!
Perhaps I spoke too freely;
I'm ready t' obey your orders.

Young W. I am much thy debtor,
But I shall find a time to quit thy kindness.
Oh! Randal, but imagine to thyself
The floods of transport, the sincere delight,
That all my friends will feel, when I disclose
To my astonish'd parents my return.
And then confess, that I have well contriv'd,
By giving others joy t' exalt my own. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Old Wilmot's house.

OLD WILMOT and AGNES discovered.

Old W. Here, take this Seneca; this haughty pe-
Who, governing the master of mankind, [dant,
And awing power imperial, prates of patience;
And praises poverty, possess'd of millions:
Sell him, and buy us bread. The scantiest meal
The vilest copy of his book e'er purchas'd,
Will give us more relief in this distress,
Than all his boasted precepts. Nay, no tears;
Keep them to move compassion when you beg.

Agnes. My heart may break, but never stoop to that.

Old W. Nor would I live to see it. But despatch. [Exit Agnes.

Where must I charge this length of misery,
That gathers force each moment as it rolls,
And must at last o'erwhelm me, but on hope:
Vain, flattering, delusive, groundless hope,
That has for years deceiv'd me? Had I thought,

As I do now, as wise men ever think,
When first this hell of poverty o'ertook me,
That power to die implies a right to do it,
And should be us'd when life becomes a pain,
What plagues had I prevented! True, my wife
Is still a slave to prejudice and fear—
I would not leave my better part, the dear (Weeps.)
Faithful companion of my happier days,
To bear the weight of age and want alone.
I'll try once more.

Re-enter AGNES, and after her, YOUNG WILMOT.
Return'd, my life, so soon—

Agnes. The unexpected coming of this stranger
Prevents my going yet.

Young W. You are, I presume,
The gentleman to whom this is directed.
What wild neglect, the token of despair,
What indigence, what misery appears
In this once happy house! What discontent,
What anguish and confusion, fill the faces
Of its dejected owners! (Aside.) [come

Old W. (Having read the letter.) Sir, such wel-
As this poor house affords, you may command.
Our ever friendly neighbour, once we hop'd
T' have call'd fair Charlotte by a dearer name;
But we have done with hope—I pray excuse
This incoherence. We had once a son. (Weeps.)

Agnes. That you are come from that dear virtuous
Revives in us the mem'ry of a loss, [maid,
Which, though long since, we have not learn'd to bear. [pain

Young W. The joy to see them, and the bitter
It is to see them thus, touches my soul
With tenderness and grief, that will o'erflow.
They know me not, and yet I shall, I fear,
Defeat my purpose, and betray myself. (Aside.)

Old W. The lady calls you, here, her valu'd friend;

Enough, though nothing more should be imply'd,
To recommend you to our best esteem,
A worthless acquisition! May she find
Some means that better may express her kindness!
But she, perhaps, has purpos'd to enrich
You with herself, and end her fruitless sorrow
For one, whom death alone can justify
For leaving her so long. If it be so,
May you repair his loss, and be to Charlotte
A second, happier Wilmot! Partial nature,
Who only favours youth; as feeble age
Were not her offspring, or below her care,
Has seal'd our doom: no second hope shall spring
To dry our tears, and dissipate despair.

Agnes. The last, and most abandon'd of our kind!
By heaven and earth neglected or despis'd!
The loathsome grave, that robb'd us of our son,
And all our joys in him must be our refuge. [fiends,

Young W. Let ghosts unpardon'd, or devoted Fear without hope, and wail in such sad strains;
But grace defend the living from despair!
The darkest hours precede the rising sun,
And mercy may appear when least expected. [ed,

Old W. This I have heard a thousand times repeat-
And have, believing, been as oft deceiv'd.

Young W. Behold in me an instance of its truth.
At sea twice shipwreck'd, and as oft the prey
Of lawless pirates; by the Arabs thrice
Surpris'd, and robb'd on shore; and once reduc'd
To worse than these, the sum of all distress
That the most wretched feel on this side hell—
Even slavery itself: but here I stand,
Except one trouble that will quickly end,
The happiest of mankind.

Old W. A rare example
Of fortune's changes; apter to surprise
Or entertain, than comfort or instruct.
If you would reason from events, be just,
And count, when you escap'd, how many perish'd,
And draw your inference thence.

Agnes. Alas! who knows,
But we were render'd childless by some storm,

In which you, though preserv'd, might bear a part?

Young W. How has my curiosity betray'd me
Into superfluous pain! I faint with fondness;
And shall, if I stay longer, rush upon them;
Proclaim myself their son; kiss, and embrace them;
Till, with the excess of pleasure and surprise,
Their souls transported, their frail mansions quit,
And leave them breathless in my longing arms.
By circumstances, then, and slow degrees,
They must be let into a happiness
Too great for them to bear at once, and live:
That Charlotte will perform. I need not feign
To ask an hour for rest. (Aside.) Sir, I entreat
The favour to retire; where, for awhile,
I may repose myself. You will excuse
This freedom, and the trouble that I give you:
'Tis long since I have slept, and nature calls.

Old W. I pray, no more: believe we're only troubled,
That you should think any excuse were needful.

Young W. The weight of this, to me is some incumbrance. (Gives a casket to his mother.)
And its contents of value: if you please
To take the charge of it till I awake,
I shall not rest the worse. If I should sleep
Till I am ask'd for, as perhaps I may,
I beg that you would wake me.

Agnes. Doubt it not!
Distracted as I am with various woes,
I shall remember that. [Exit with Old W.]

Young W. Merciless grief!
What ravage has it made! how has it chang'd
Her lovely form and mind! I feel her anguish,
And dread, I know not what, from her despair.
My father, too—Oh! grant them patience, heaven,
A little longer, a few short hours more,
And all their cares, and mine, shall end for ever.

ACT III. [Exit.]

SCENE I.—A Room in Old Wilmot's house.

Enter AGNES, with the casket in her hand.

Agnes. Who should this stranger be? And then this casket;

He says it is of value, and yet trusts it,
As if a trifle, to a stranger's hand.
His confidence amazes me; perhaps
It is not what he says; I'm strongly tempted
To open it, and see. No, let it rest!
Why should I pry into the cares of others,
Who have so many sorrows of my own? [prising!]
With how much ease the spring gives way!—Sur-
My eyes are dazzled, and my ravish'd heart
Leaps at the glorious sight. How bright's the lustre,
And how immense the worth of these fair jewels!
Ay, such a treasure would expel for ever
Base poverty, and all its abject train;
Famine, the cold neglect of friends, the scorn,
Or more provoking pity of the world.
Plenty, content, and power, might take their turn,
And lofty pride bare its aspiring head
At our approach, and once more bend before us.
A pleasing dream! 'Tis past; and now I wake:
For sure it was a happiness to think,
Though, but a moment, such a treasure mine.
Nay, it was more than thought—I saw, and touch'd
The bright temptation; and I see it yet.
'Tis here—'tis mine—I have it in possession.
Must I resign it? Must I give it back?
Am I in love with misery and want?
To rob myself, and court so vast a loss?
Retain it then—But how? There is a way—
Why sinks my heart? Why does my blood run cold?
Why am I thrill'd with horror? 'Tis not choice,
But dire necessity suggests the thought.

Enter OLD WILMOT.

Old W. The mind contented, with how little pains
The wand'ring senses yield to soft repose!
He's fallen asleep already—Happy man!
What dost thou think, my Agnes, of our guest?
He seems to me a youth of great humanity:
Just ere he clos'd his eyes, that swam in tears,

He wrung my hand, and press'd it to his lips;
And with a look, that pierc'd me to the soul,
Begg'd me to comfort thee: and—dost thou hear
What art thou gazing on? Fie, 'tis not well. [me?]
This casket was delivered to you clos'd:
Why have you open'd it? Should this be known,
How mean must we appear!

Agnes. And who shall know it?

Old W. There is a kind of pride, a decent dignity,
Due to ourselves; which, spite of our misfortunes,
May be maintain'd and cherish'd to the last.
To live without reproach, and without leave
To quit the world, shews sovereign contempt,
And noble scorn of its relentless malice. [sense!]

Agnes. Shews sovereign madness, and a scorn of Pursue no farther this detested theme:
I will not die; I will not leave the world,
For all that you can urge, until compell'd.

Old W. To chase a shadow, when the setting sun
Is darting his last rays, were just as wise
As your anxiety for fleeting life,
Now the last means for its support are failing:
Were famine not as mortal as the sword,
Your warmth might be excus'd; but take thy choice:
Die how you will, you shall not die alone.

Agnes. Nor live, I hope.

Old W. There is no fear of that.

Agnes. Then, we'll live both.

Old W. Strange folly! where the means?

Agnes. There, those jewels!

Old W. Ah! Take heed!

Perhaps thou dost but try me—yet take heed!
There's nought so monstrous, but the mind of man,
In some conditions, may be brought t'approve:
Theft, sacrilege, treason, and parricide,
When flatt'ring opportunity entic'd,
And desperation drove, have been committed
By those who once would start to hear them nam'd.

Agnes. And add to these, detested suicide,
Which, by a crime much less, we may avoid.

Old W. How couldst thou form a thought so very damning?

So advantageous, so secure, and easy;
And yet so cruel, and so full of horror!

Agnes. 'Tis less impiety, less against nature,
To take another's life, than end our own. [crime:]

Old W. No matter which, the less or greater
Howe'er we may deceive ourselves or others,
We act from inclination, not by rule,
Or none could act amiss: and that all err,
None but the conscious hypocrite denies.
Oh! what is man, his excellence and strength,
When, in an hour of trial and desertion,
Reason, his noblest power, may be suborn'd
To plead the cause of vile assassination!

Agnes. You're too severe: Reason may justly
For our own preservation. [plead]

Old W. Rest contented:
Whate'er resistance I may seem to make,
I am betray'd within: my will's seduc'd,
And my whole soul's infected. The desire
Of life returns, and brings with it a train
Of appetites, that rage to be supply'd;
Whoever stands to parley with temptation,
Parleys to be o'ercome.

Agnes. Then nought remains,
But the swift execution of a deed
That is not to be thought on, or delay'd.

Old W. Gen'rous, unhappy man! Oh! what could move thee
To put thy life and fortune in the hands
Of wretches mad with anguish!

Agnes. By what means
Shall we effect his death?

Old W. Why, what a fiend!
How cruel, how remorseless and impatient
Have pride and poverty made thee!

Agnes. Barbarous man!
Whose wasteful riots ruin'd our estate,
And drove our son, ere the first down had spread

His rosy cheeks, spite of my sad presages,
Earnest entreaties, agonies, and tears,
To seek his bread 'mongst strangers, and to perish
In some remote, inhospitable land—
The loveliest youth, in person and in mind,
That ever crown'd a groaning mother's pains!
Where was thy pity, where thy patience then!
Thou cruel husband! thou unnat'ral father!
Thou most remorseless, most ungrateful man!
To waste my fortune, rob me of my son,
To drive me to despair, and then reproach me
For being what thou'st made me!

Old W. Dry thy tears:

I ought not to reproach thee. I confess
That thou hast suffer'd much: so have we both.
But chide no more; I'm wrought up to thy purpose.
The poor, ill-fated, unsuspecting victim,
Ere he reclin'd him on the fatal couch,
From which he's ne'er to rise, took off the sash
And costly dagger, that thou saw'st him wear,
And thus, unthinking, furnish'd us with arms
Against himself. Steal to the door,
And bring me word, if he be still asleep. [Exit Agnes.
Or I'm deceiv'd, or he pronounc'd himself
The happiest of mankind. Deluded wretch:
Thy thoughts are perishing, thy youthful joys,
Touch'd by the icy hand of grisly death,
Are with'ring in their bloom. But, thought ex-
He'll never know the loss, [tinguish'd,
Nor feel the bitter pangs of disappointment—
Then I was wrong in counting him a wretch:
To die well pleas'd

Is all the happiest of mankind can hope for.
To be a wretch is to survive the loss
Of every joy, and even hope itself,
As I have done. Why do I mourn him then?
For, by the anguish of my tortur'd soul,
He's to be envy'd, if compar'd with me! [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Room, with YOUNG WILMOT asleep upon a bed in the distance.

Enter OLD WILMOT and AGNES.

Agnes. The stranger sleeps at present; but so rest-
His slumbers seem, they can't continue long. [less
Here, I've secur'd his dagger.

Old W. Oh! Agnes, Agnes! if there be a hell,
'Tis just we should expect it.

Agnes. Shake off this panic, and be more yourself. [determin'd?

Old W. What's to be done? On what had we

Agnes. You're quite dismay'd. (Takes the dagger.)

Old W. Give me the fatal steel.

'Tis but a single murder,
Necessity, impatience, and despair,
The three wide mouths of that true Cerberus,
Grim poverty, demand: they shall be stopp'd.
Ambition, persecution, and revenge,
Devour their millions daily: and shall I—
But follow me, and see how little cause
You had to think there was the least remain
Of manhood, pity, mercy, or remorse,
Left in this savage breast. (Going the wrong way.)

Agnes. Where do you go?

The street is that way.

Old W. True; I had forgot.

Agnes. Quite, quite confounded!

Old W. Well, I recover. I shall find the way.

Agnes. Oh! softly, softly! The least noise un-
What are we doing? Misery and want [does us.
Are lighter ills than this. I cannot bear it!

Stop! hold thy hand!—Inconstant, wretched woman! [mot!

What! doth my heart recoil? Oh! Wilmot, Wil-
What pow'r shall I invoke to aid thee, Wilmot?

[Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Another Room.

Enter CHARLOTTE, EUSTACE, and RANDAL.

Char. What strange neglect? The doors are all
And not a living creature to be seen. [unbarr'd,

Enter OLD WILMOT and AGNES.

Sir, we are come to give and receive

A thousand greetings.—Ha! what can this mean!
Why do you look with such amazement on us?
Are these your transports for your son's return?
Where is my Wilmot? Has he not been here?
Would he defer your happiness so long,
Or could a habit so disguise your son,
That you refus'd to own him?

Agnes. Heard you that?

What prodigy of horror is disclosing,
To render murder venial!

Old W. Pr'ythee, peace:

The miserable damn'd suspend their howling,
And the swift orbs are fix'd in deep attention.

Rand. What mean these dreadful words and frantic air!

That is the dagger my young master wore.

Eust. My mind misgives me. Do not stand to gaze
On these dumb phantoms of despair and horror!
Let us search further, Randal, shew the way.

[Exeunt Randal, Eustace, and Charlotte.

Agnes. Let life forsake the earth, and light the
And death and darkness bury in oblivion [sun,
Mankind and all their deeds, that no posterity
May ever rise to hear our horrid tale,
Or view the grave of such detested parricides!

Old W. Curses and deprecations are in vain:
The sun will shine, and all things have their course,
When we, the curse and burden of the earth,
Shall be absorb'd, and mingled with its dust.
Our guilt and desolation must be told,
From age to age, to teach desponding mortals,
How far beyond the reach of human thought
Heaven, when incens'd, can punish—Die thou first.
I durst not trust thy weakness. (Stabs Agnes.)

Agnes. Ever kind,

But most in this.

Old W. I will not long survive thee. [mot,

Agnes. Do not accuse thy erring mother, Wil-
With too much rigour, when we meet above.
To give thee life for life, and blood for blood,
Is not enough. Had I ten thousand lives,
I'd give them all to speak my penitence,
Deep, and sincere, and equal to my crime.
Oh, Wilmot! oh, my son, my son! (Dies.)

Enter RANDAL and EUSTACE.

Eust. Oh! Wilmot, Wilmot!

Are these the fruits of all thy anxious cares
For thy ungrateful parents? Cruel fiends! [usurp

Old W. What whining fool art thou, who wouldst
My sovereign right of grief! Was he thy son?
Say, canst thou shew thy hands, reeking with blood,
That flow'd, through purer channels, from thy loins?
Compute the sands that bound the spacious ocean,
And swell their numbers with a single grain;
Increase the noise of thunder with thy voice;
Or, when the raging wind lays nature waste,
Assist the tempest with thy feeble breath;
But name not thy faint sorrow with the anguish
Of a curs'd wretch, who only hopes from this (Stabbing himself.)

To change the scene, but not relieve the pain.

Rand. A dreadful instance of the last remorse!

May all your woes end here!

Old W. Oh! would they end

A thousand ages hence, I then should suffer
Much less than I deserve. Yet let me say,
You'll do but justice to inform the world,
This horrid deed, that punishes itself,
Was not intended, thinking him our son;
For that we knew not, till it was too late.
Proud and impatient under our afflictions,
While heaven was labouring to make us happy,
We brought this dreadful ruin on ourselves.
Mankind may learn—but—oh!— (Dies.)

Rand. Heaven grant they may!

And may thy penitence atone thy crime!
'Tend well the hapless Charlotte, and bear hence
These bleeding victims of despair and pride;
Toll the death-bell! and follow to the grave
The wretched parents and ill-fated son. [Exeunt.

CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS;

A BURLESQUE OPERA, IN ONE ACT.—BY H. CAREY.

Scene 3.

CHARACTERS.

CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS
KING OF THE ANTIPODES
BOMBARDINIAN

ALDIBORONTIPHOSCOPHORNIO
RIGDUM-FUNNIDOS
CAPTAIN OF THE GUARDS

FADLADINIDA
TATLANTHE
LADIES

SCENE I.—An Anti-chamber in the palace.

Enter RIGDUM-FUNNIDOS and ALDIBORONTIPHOSCOPHORNIO.

Rig. Aldiborontiphoscophornio!
Where left you Chrononhotonthologos?

Aldi. Fatigued with the tremendous toils of war,
Within his tent, on downy couch succumbent,
Himself he unfatigues with gentle slumbers;
Lull'd by the cheerful trumpet's gladsome clangor,
The noise of drums, and thunder of artillery,
He sleeps supine amidst the din of war:
And yet 'tis not definitively sleep;
Rather a kind of doze, a waking slumber,
That sheds a stupefaction o'er his senses:
For now he nods and snores; anon he starts;
Then nods and snores again. If this be sleep,
Tell me, ye gods! what mortal man's awake.
What says my friend to this?

Rig. Say! I say he sleeps dog-sleep:
What a plague would you have me say?

Aldi. Oh! impious thought! Oh! curs'd in[sination!]
As if great Chrononhotonthologos,
To animals detestable and vile
Had aught the least similitude!

Rig. My dear friend, you entirely misapprehend me: I did not call the King dog by craft; I was only going to tell that the soldiers have just now received their pay, and are all as drunk as so many swabbers.

Aldi. Give orders instantly that no more money
Be issued to the troops: meantime, my friend,
Let the baths be fill'd with seas of coffee,
To stupify their souls into sobriety.

Rig. I fancy you had better banish the suttlers, and blow the Geneva casks to the devil.

Aldi. Thou counsel'st well, my Rigdam-Funni-
And reason seems to father thy advice. [dos,
But, soft!—The King in pensive contemplation

Seems to resolve on some important doubts;
His soul, too copious for his earthly fabric,
Starts forth, spontaneous, in soliloquy,
And makes his tongue the midwife of his mind.
Let us retire, lest we disturb his solitude.

(They retire.)

Enter CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS.

Chro. This god of sleep is watchful to torment
And rest is grown a stranger to my eyes: [me,
Sport not with Chrononhotonthologos,
Thou idle slumb'rer, thou detested Somnus;
For if thou dost, by all the waking pow'rs,
I'll tear thine eyeballs from their leaden sockets,
And force thee to outstare eternity. [Exit.

(Rig. and Aldi. come forward.)

Rig. The King is in a most cursed passion.
Pray who the devil is this Mr. Somnus he's so angry withal?

Aldi. The son of Chaos and of Erebus,
Incestuous pair! brother of Mars relentless,
Whose speckled robe, and wings of blackest hue,
Astonish all mankind with hideous glare;
Himself with sable plumes, to men benevolent,
Brings downy slumbers and refreshing sleep.

Rig. This gentleman may come of a very good family, for aught I know; but I would not be in his place for the world. [bending,

Aldi. But, lo! the King his footsteps this way
His cogitative faculties immers'd
In cogibundity of cogitation;
Let silence close our folding-doors of speech,
Till apt attention tell our heart the purport
Of this profound profundity of thought.

Re-enter CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS, Nobles, and Attendants.

Chro. It is resolv'd! Now, Somnus, I defy thee,
And from mankind ampute thy curs'd dominion:

These royal eyes thou never more shalt close.
Henceforth let no man sleep, on pain of death;
Instead of sleep, let pompous pageantry
Keep all mankind eternally awake:
Bid Harlequino decorate the stage
With all magnificence of decoration;
Giants and giantesses, dwarfs and pigmies,
Songs, dances, music in its amplest order,
Mimes, pantomimes, and all the mimic motion
Of scene deceptiovisive and sublime.
(The flat scene draws.)

Chrononhotonthologos is seated, and a grand Pantomime Entertainment is performed, in the midst of which enters a Captain of the guard.

Capt. To arms, to arms! great Chrononhotonthologos!

Th' Antipodean pow'rs, from realms below,
Have burst the solid entrails of the earth;
Gushing such cataracts of forces forth,
This world is too incopious to contain 'em.
Armies on armies march in form stupendous;
Not like our earthly regions, rank by rank,
But tier o'er tier, high pil'd from earth to heaven!
A blazing bullet, bigger than the sun,
Shot from a huge and monstrous culverin,
Has laid your royal citadel in ashes.

Chro. Peace, coward! were they wedg'd like golden ingots,
Or pent so close as to admit no vacuum,
One look from Chrononhotonthologos
Shall scarce them into nothing. Rigdum-Funnidos,
Bid Bombardinian draw his legions forth,
And meet us in the plains of Queerummania.
This very now, ourselves shall there conjoin him:
Meantime, bid all the priests prepare their temples
For rites of triumph. Let the singing singers,
With vocal voices, most vociferous,
In sweet vociferation, out-vociferize
Ev'n sound itself. So be it as we have order'd.
(Exeunt.)

SCENE II.—A magnificent Apartment.

Enter the QUEEN, TATLANTHE, and two Ladies.

Queen. Day's curtain's drawn, the morn begins to rise,
And waking Nature rubs her sleepy eyes:
The pretty little fleecy bleating flocks
In baas harmonious warble through the rocks:
Night gathers up her shades in sable shrouds,
And whisp'ring oziers tattle to the clouds.
What think you, ladies, if an hour we kill
At basset, ombre, piquet, or quadrille?

Tat. Your majesty was pleas'd to order tea.

Queen. My mind is alter'd; bring some ratifia.
(They are served with a dram.)

I have a famous fiddler from France:
Bid him come in. What think ye of a dance?

Enter Fiddler.

Fid. Thus to your majesty, says the suppliant
Would you a solo or sonata choose; [muse,
Or bold concerto or soft sicilinia,
Alla Francese overo in gusto Romano?
When you command, 'tis done as soon as spoke.

Queen. A civil fellow!—play us the Black Joke.
(Music plays; Queen and Ladies dance.)
So much for dancing; now let's rest awhile.
Bring in the tea-things. Does the kettle boil?

Tat. The water bubbles, and the tea-cups skip,
Through eager hope to kiss your royal lip.
(Tea brought in.)

Queen. Come, ladies, will you please to choose
Or green imperial, or Pekoe bohea? [your tea;

1 Lady. Never, no, never sure on earth was seen
So gracious, sweet, and affable a queen.

2 Lady. She is an angel.

1 Lady. She's a goddess rather.

Tat. She's angel, queen, and goddess, altogether.

Queen. Away! you flatter me.

1 Lady. We don't indeed;
Your merit does our praise by far exceed.

Queen. You make me blush; pray help me to a 1 Lady. That blush becomes you— [fan.

Tat. Would I were a man!

Queen. I'll hear no more of these fantastic airs.
(Bell rings.)

The bell rings in; come ladies, let's to pray'rs.
(They dance off.)

SCENE III.—An Anti-chamber.

Enter RIGDUM-FUNNIDOS and ALDIBORONTIPHOSOPHORNIO.

Rig. Egad! we're in the wrong box. Who the devil would have thought that Chrononhotonthogos should be at that mortal fight of Tippodeans?
Why, there's not a mother's child of them to be seen; egad! they footed it away as fast as their hands could carry them; but they have left their king behind 'em. We have him safe, that's one comfort.

Aldi. Would he were still at amplest liberty!
For, oh! my dearest Rigdum-Funnidos,
I have a riddle to unriddle to thee,
Shall make thee stare thyself into a statue:
Our Queen's in love with this Antipodean.

Rig. The devil she is? Well, I see mischief is going forward with a vengeance.

Aldi. But, lo! the conq'rer comes, all crown'd with conquest;
A solemn triumph graces his return.
Let's grasp the forelock of this apt occasion,
To greet the victor, in the flow of glory.

A grand triumph. Enter CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS in a wheelbarrow, Guards, Attendants, &c. met by Rigdum-Funnidos and Aldiborontiphosophornio.

All hail to Chrononhotonthologos!
Thrice trebly welcome to your loyal subjects.
Myself and faithful Rigdum-Funnidos,
Lost in a labyrinth of love and loyalty,
Intreat you to inspect our inmost souls,
And read in them what tongue can never utter.

Chro. Aldiborontiphosophornio,
To thee, and gentle Rigdum-Funnidos,
Our gratulations flow in streams unbounded,
Our bounty's debtor to your loyalty,
Which shall with int'rest be repaid ere long.
But where's our Queen, where's Fadladinida?
She should be foremost in this gladsome train,
To grace our triumph; but I see she slights me.
This haughty Queen shall be no longer mine;
I'll have a sweet and gentle concubine.

Rig. Now, my dear little Phosophorny, for a swinging lie to bring the Queen off, and I'll run with it to her this minute, that we may all be in a stay: say she has got the thorough-go-nimble.

(Whispers, and steals off.)

Aldi. Speak not, great Chrononhotonthologos,
In accents so injuriously severe
Of Fadladinida, your faithful Queen:
By me she sends an embassy of love,
Sweet blandishments and kind congratulations,
But cannot, oh! she cannot, come herself.

Chro. Our rage is turn'd to fear. What ails the Queen?

Aldi. A sudden diarrhoea's rapid force
So stimulates the peristaltic motion,
That she by far outdoes her late outdoing,
And all conclude her royal life in danger.

Chro. Bid the physicians of the world assemble
In consultation, solemn and sedate;
More to corroborate their sage resolves,
Call from their graves the learned men of old,
Galen, Hippocrates, and Paracelsus;
Doctors, apothecaries, surgeons, chymists,
All, all attend! and see they bring their med'cines:
Whole magazines of gallipotted nostrums,
Materializ'd in pharmaceutic order.

The man that cures our Queen shall have our empire. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A Garden.

Enter TATLANTHE and the QUEEN.

Queen. Heigho! my heart!

Tat. What ails my gracious Queen?

Queen. Oh! would to Venus I had never seen—

Tat. Seen what, my royal mistress?

Queen. Too, too much!

Tat. Did it affright you?

Queen. No, 'tis nothing such.

Tat. What was it, madam?

Queen. Really I don't know.

Tat. It must be something?

Queen. No!

Tat. Or nothing?

Queen. No!

[neither,

Tat. Then I conclude, of course, since it was Nothing and something jumbled well together.

Queen. Oh! my Tatlanthe, have you never seen—

Tat. Can I guess what, unless you tell, my Queen. The King, I mean. [Queen?

Tat. Just now return'd from war;

He rides, like Mars, in his triumphal car.

Conquest precedes, with laurels in his hand;

Behind him, Fame does on her tripos stand;

Her golden trump shrill through the air she sounds,

Which rends the earth, and thence to heaven re-

Trophies and spoils, innumerable, grace [bounds;

This triumph, which all triumphs does deface.

Haste, then, great Queen, your hero thus to meet,

Who longs to lay his laurels at your feet.

Queen. Art mad, Tatlanthe? I mean no such Your talk's distasteful. [thing.

Tat. Didn't you name the King?

Queen. I did, Tatlanthe, but it was not thine; The charming king I mean, is only mine.

Tat. Who else, who else, but such a charming fair, In Chrononhotonthologos should share?

The queen of beauty and the god of arms,

In him and you united, blend their charms.

Oh! had you seen him, how he dealt out death,

And at one stroke, robb'd thousands of their breath;

While on the slaughter'd heaps himself did rise,

In pyramids of conquest to the skies,

The gods all hail'd, and fain would have him stay,

But your bright charms have call'd him thence away.

Queen. This does my utmost indignation raise!

You are too pertly lavish in his praise.

Leave me for ever!

Tat. Oh! what shall I say? (Kneeling.)

Do not, great Queen, your anger thus display.

Oh! frown me dead! let me not live to hear

My gracious Queen and mistress so severe!

I've made some horrible mistake, no doubt;

Oh! tell me what it is.

Queen. No; find it out.

Tat. No, I will never leave you; here I'll grow,

Till you some token of forgiveness shew.

Oh! all ye pow'rs above, come down, come down!

And from her brows dispel that angry frown.

Queen. Tatlanthe, rise, you have prevail'd at last:

Offend no more, and I'll excuse what's past.

Tat. (Aside and rising.) Why, what a fool was

I, not to perceive her passion for the topsy-turvy

King! the gentleman that carries his head where his heels should be! But I must tack about, I see.

Excuse me, gracious madam! if my heart

(To the Queen.)

Bears sympathy with your's in ev'ry part.

With you alike I sorrow and rejoice;

Approve your passion, and commend your choice.

The captive King—

Queen. That's he, that's he, that's he!

I'd die ten thousand deaths to set him free.

Oh, my Tatlanthe! have you seen his face,

His air, his shape, his mien, his ev'ry grace?

In what a charming attitude he stands!

How prettily he foots it with his hands!

Well, to his arms—no, to his legs I fly,

For I must have him if I live, or die. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Bedchamber.

CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS asleep.

Rough music; viz. salt-boxes and rolling-pins, grid-irons and tongs, sow-gelders' horns, marrow-bones and cleavers, &c. &c.

Chro. (Wakes.) What heavenly sounds are these that charm my ears?

Sure, 'tis the music of the tuneful spheres!

Enter Captain of the Guards.

Capt. A messenger from Gen'ral Bombardinian Craves instant audience of your majesty.

Chro. Give him admittance.

Enter Herald.

Her. Long life to Chrononhotonthologos!

Your faithful Gen'ral Bombardinian

Sends you his tongue, transplanted in my mouth,

To pour his soul out in your royal ears. [ence,

Chro. Then use thy master's tongue with rever-

Nor waste it in thine own loquacity,

But briefly and at large declare thy message.

Her. Suspend awhile, great Chrononhotontholo-

The fate of empires, and the toils of war; [gos,

And in my tent let's quaff Falernian wine,

Till our souls mount and emulate the gods.

Two captive females, beauteous as the morn,

Submissive to your wishes, court your option.

Haste, then, great King, to bless us with your presence.

Our scouts already watch the wish'd approach,

Which shall be welcom'd by the drum's dread rattle,

The cannon's thunder, and the trumpet's blast;

While I, in front of mighty myrmidons,

Receive my King in all the pomp of war.

Chro. Tell him I come; my flying steed prepare;

Ere thou art half on horseback I'll be there.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—A Prison.

The KING of the ANTIPODES discovered asleep on a couch.

Enter the QUEEN.

Queen. Is this a place, oh! all ye gods above!

This a reception for the man I love?

See in what sweet tranquillity he sleeps,

While nature's self at his confinement weeps.

Rise, lovely monarch! see your friend appear;

No Chrononhotonthologos is here.

Command your freedom, by this sacred ring;

Then command me. What says my charming King?

(She puts the ring in his mouth, he bends the sea-crab, and makes a roaring noise.)

What can this mean? He lays his feet at mine.

Is this of love or hate his country's sign?

Ah! wretched Queen! how hapless is thy lot,

To love a man that understands thee not!

Oh! lovely Venus! goddess all divine!

And gentle Cupid, that sweet son of thine,

Assist, assist me, with your sacred art,

And teach me to obtain this stranger's heart.

VENUS descends in her chariot.

AIR.—VENUS.

See Venus does attend thee,

My dilding, my dilding;

Love's goddess will befriend thee,

Lily bright and shinee.

With pity and compassion,

My dilding, my dilding;

She sees thy tender passion,

Lily bright and shinee.

To thee I yield my pow'r divine,

Dance over the Lady Lea;

Demand whate'er thou wilt, 'tis thine,

My gay lady.

Take this magic wand in hand,
Dance, &c.
All the world's at thy command,
My gay, &c.

CUPID descends.

DUETT.—CUPID and the QUEEN.

Cupid. Are you a widow, or are you a wife?
Gillyflow'r, gentle rosemary.
Or are you a maiden, so fair and so bright?
As the dew that flies over the mulberry tree.

Queen. Would I were a widow, as I am a wife!
Gillyflow'r, &c.
But I'm, to my sorrow, a maiden as bright,
As the dew, &c.

Cupid. You shall be a widow before it is night,
Gillyflow'r, &c.
No longer a maiden, so fair and so bright,
As the dew, &c.
Two jolly young husbands your person shall share,
Gillyflow'r, &c.
And twenty fine babies all lovely and fair,
As the dew, &c.

Queen. Oh! thanks, Mr. Cupid, for this your good news,
Gillyflow'r, &c.
What woman alive would such favours refuse?
While the dew, &c.
[Venus and Cupid re-ascend; the Queen goes off, and the King of the Antipodes follows, walking on his hands.]

SCENE VII.—Bombardinian's Tent.

CHRONONHOTONTHOLOGOS and BOMBARDINIAN discovered at a table, with two Ladies.

Bomb. This honour, royal sir, so royalizes
The royalty of your most royal actions,
The dumb can only utter forth your praise;
For we, who speak, want words to tell our meaning.
Here! fill the goblet with Falernian wine; [pet
And while our monarch drinks, bid the shrill trum-
Tell all the gods, that we propine their healths.

Chro. Hold! Bombardinian, I esteem it fit,
With so much wine, to eat a little bit.

Bomb. See that the table instantly be spread
With all that art and nature can produce.
Traverse from pole to pole; sail round the globe;
Bring every eatable that can be eat:
The King shall eat, tho' all mankind be starv'd.

Cook. I am afraid his majesty will be starved before I can run round the world for a dinner; besides, where's the money?

Chro. Ah! dost thou prattle, contumacious slave?
Guards, seize the villain! broil him, fry him, stew
him;

Ourselves shall eat him, out of mere revenge.

Cook. Oh! pray, your majesty, spare my life:
there's some nice cold pork in the pantry; I'll hash
it for your majesty in a minute.

Chro. Be thou first hash'd in hell, audacious slave!
(Kills him, and turns to Bombardinian.)

Hash'd pork! Shall Chrononhotonthologos
Be fed with swine's flesh, and at second hand?
Now, by the gods! thou dost insult us, General.

Bomb. The gods can witness, that I little thought
Your majesty to other flesh than this
Had aught the least propensity.

(Points to the Ladies.)

Chro. Is this a dinner for a hungry monarch?

Bomb. Monarchs as great as Chrononhotontholo-
Have made a very hearty meal of worse. [gos

Chro. Ah! traitor! dost thou brave me to my teeth?

Take this reward, and learn to mock thy master.

(Strikes him.)

Bomb. A blow! Shall Bombardinian take a blow?

Blush, blush, thou sun! Start back, thou rapid ocean! [ble,

Hills, vales, seas, mountains, all commixing crum-
And into chaos pulverize the world;

For Bombardinian has received a blow,
And Chrononhotonthologos shall die. (Draws.)

[The Women run off, crying "Help, murder!"]

Chro. What means the traitor?

Bomb. Traitor, in thy teeth;

Thus I defy thee! (They fight, he kills Chro.)

Ah! what have I done?

Go, call a coach, and let a coach be call'd;

And let the man that calls it be the caller;

And, in his calling, let him nothing call,

But coach, coach, coach! Oh! for a coach, ye gods!
[Exit, raving.]

Re-enter BOMBARDINIAN with a Doctor.

Bomb. How fares your majesty?

Doct. My lord, he's dead.

Bomb. Ah! dead! Impossible! It cannot be!
I'd not believe it, tho' himself should swear it.

Go join his body to his soul again,

Or, by this light, thy soul shall quit thy body!

Doct. My lord, he's far beyond the power of
His soul has left his body and this world. [physic;

Bomb. Then go to t'other world, and fetch it back; (Kills him.)

And, if I find thou triflest with me there,

I'll chase thy shade through myriads of orbs,

And drive thee far beyond the verge of nature.

Ah! call'st thou, Chrononhotonthologos?

I come! your faithful Bombardinian comes!

He comes in worlds unknown to make new wars,

And gain thee empires numerous as the stars.

(Kills himself.)

Enter the QUEEN and others.

Aldi. Oh, horrid! horrible, and horriddest horror!
Our king, our general, our cook, our doctor!

All dead! stone dead! irrevocably dead!

Oh!— (A tragedy groan.)

Queen. My husband dead! Ye gods! what is't you mean,

To make a widow of a virgin Queen?

For, to my great misfortune, he, poor King!

Has left me so: isn't that a wretched thing?

Tat. Why, then, dear madam! make no farther
Were I your majesty I'd try another. [pother;

Queen. I think 'tis best to follow thy advice.

Tat. I'll fit you with a husband in a trice—

Here's Rigdum-Funnidos, a proper man;

If any one can please a queen, he can.

Rig. Ay, that he can, and please your majesty.

So, ceremonies apart, let's proceed to business.

Queen. Oh! but the mourning takes up all my care,
I'm at a loss what kind of weeds to wear.

Rig. Never talk of sorrow, madam;

One ounce of mirth is worth a pound of sorrow;

Let's bed to-night, and then we'll wed to-morrow.

I'll make thee a great man, my little Phoscophorny.
(Aside to Aldi.)

Aldi. I scorn your bounty; I'll be king or nothing.
Draw, miscreant! draw!

Rig. No, sir, I'll take the law.

(Runs behind the Queen.)

Queen. Well, gentlemen, to make the matter easy.

I'll have you both; and that, I hope, will please ye.

And now, Tatlanthe, thou art all my care:

Where shall I find thee such another pair?

Pity that you, who've serv'd so long so well,

Should die a virgin, and lead apes in hell.

Choose for yourself, dear girl, our empire round;

Your portion is twelve hundred thousand pound.

Aldi. Here! take these dead and bloody corpse

Make preparation for our wedding-day. [away;

Instead of sad solemnity, and black,

Our hearts shall swim in claret and in sack.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Inn at Madrid.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Indeed, my friend Trappanti, thou'rt in a very thin condition; thou hast neither master, meat, nor money: not but, couldst thou part with that unappeasable itch of eating, too, thou hast all the ragged virtues that were requisite to set up an ancient philosopher. Contempt and poverty, kicks, thumps, and thinking, thou hast endured with the best of them; but when fortune turns thee up to hard fasting, that is to say, positively not eating at all, I perceive thou art a downright dunce, with the same stomach, and no more philosophy than a hound upon horse-flesh. Fasting's the devil! Let me see: this, I take it, is the most frequented inn about Madrid; and if a keen guest or two should drop in now—Hark!

Host. (Within.) Take care of the gentlemen's horses there; see them well rubbed and littered.

Trap. Just alighted! If they do but stay to eat now! Impudence assist me—Ah! a couple of pretty young sparks, faith!

Enter HYPOLITA and FLORA, in men's habits; a Postboy with a portmanteau following.

Welcome to Madrid, sir; welcome, sir.

Flora. Sir, your servant.

Post. Have the horses pleased your honour?

Hyp. Very well, indeed, friend; pr'ythee, set down the portmanteau, and see that the poor creatures want nothing: they have performed well, and deserve our care.

Trap. I'll take care of that, sir; here, ostler.

Flora. And pray, madam, what do I deserve?

Hyp. Poor Flora! thou art fatigued, indeed, but I shall find a way to thank thee for't.

Flora. And now, madam, pray, what do you propose will be the end of our journey?

Hyp. Why, now I hope the end of my wishes—Don Philip, I need not tell you how far he is in my heart.

Flora. No, your sweet usage of him told me that long enough ago; but now, it seems, you think fit to confess it; and what is it you love him for, pray?

Hyp. His manner of bearing that usage.

Flora. Ah! dear pride! how we love to have it tickled! But he does not bear it, you see, for he's coming post to Madrid to marry another woman; nay, one he never saw. [gaged him.]

Hyp. An unknown face can't have very far en-

Flora. How came he to be engaged to her at all?

Hyp. Why, I engaged him.

Flora. To another!

Hyp. To my whole sex, rather than own I loved

Flora. Ah! done like a woman of courage.

Hyp. I could not bear the thoughts of parting with my power; besides, he took me at such an advantage, and pressed me so home to a surrender, I could have torn him piecemeal.

Flora. Ay, I warrant you! an insolent—agreeable puppy! But let us hear.

Hyp. I'll tell thee, Flora; you know Don Philip wants no charm that can recommend him. As a lover, in rank and fortune, I confess him my superior; 'tis the thoughts of that has been a constant thorn upon my wishes: I never saw him in the humblest posture, but still I fancied he secretly presumed his rank and fortune might command me; this always stung my pride, and made me over-act it: nay, sometimes, when his sufferings have almost drawn the tears into my eyes, I have turned the subject with some trifling talk, or hummed a spiteful tune, though I believe his heart were breaking.

Flora. But, love be praised! your proud stomach's come down for it.

Hyp. Indeed, 'tis not altogether so high as 'twas. In a word, his last letter set me at my wit's end; and when I came to myself, you may remember you thought me bewitched, for I immediately called for my boy's clothes, and so rode after him.

Flora. Why, truly, madam, as to your wits, I've not much altered my opinion of them, for I can't see what you propose by it.

Hyp. My whole design, Flora, lies in this portmanteau, and these breeches.

Flora. A notable design, no doubt; but, pray, let's hear it. [tween them.

Hyp. Why, I do propose to be twice married be—Flora. How! twice?

Hyp. By the help of the portmanteau, I intend to marry myself to Don Philip's new mistress, and then—I'll put off my breeches and marry him.

Flora. Now I begin to take ye: but, pray, what's in the portmanteau? and how came you by it?

Hyp. I hired one to steal it from his servant, at the last inn we lay at in Toledo: in it are jewels of value, presents to my bride, gold, good store, settlements, and credential letters, to certify that the bearer (which I intend to be myself) is Don Philip, only son and heir of Don Fernando de las Torres, now residing at Seville, whence we came.

Flora. A very smart undertaking, by my troth! and pray, madam, what part am I to act?

Hyp. My woman still: when I can't lie for myself, you are to do it for me, in the person of a cousin-german.

Flora. And my name is to be—

Hyp. Don Guzman, Diego, Mendez, or what you please; be your own godfather.

Flora. Egad! I begin to like it mightily; this may prove a very pleasant adventure, if we can but come off without fighting, which, by the way, I don't easily perceive we shall; for, to be sure, Don Philip will make the devil to do with us when he finds himself here before he comes hither.

Hyp. Oh! let me alone to give him satisfaction.

Flora. I am afraid it must be alone, if you do give him satisfaction; for my part, I can push no more than I can swim.

Hyp. But you can bully, upon occasion.

Flora. I can scold, when my blood's up.

Hyp. That's the same thing. Bullying in breeches, would be scolding in petticoats.

Flora. Say ye so? why, then, don look to yourself; if I don't give you as good as you bring, I'll be content to wear breeches as long as I live. Well, madam, now you have opened the plot, pray when is the play to begin?

Hyp. I hope to have it all over in less than four hours; we'll just refresh ourselves with what the house affords, and wait upon my father-in-law. How now! what would this fellow have?

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Servant, gentlemen; I have taken nice care of your nags; good cattle they are, by my troth! right and sound, I warrant 'em; they deserve care, and they have had it, and shall have it, if they stay in this house: I always stand by, sir, to see them rubbed down with my own eyes: catch me trusting an ostler, I'll give you leave to fill for me, and drink for me, too.

Flora. I have seen this fellow somewhere. (Apart to Hypolita.)

Trap. Heyday! What, no cloth laid! was ever such attendance! Hey! house, tapster, landlord! hey! (Knocks.) What was it you bespoke, gentlemen? [forgot you.

Hyp. Really, sir, I ask your pardon, I have almost Trap. Psha! dear sir, never talk of it; I live here hard by—I have a lodging—I can't call it a lodging neither—that is, I have a—sometimes I am here, and sometimes I am there; and so, here and there one makes shift, you know. Hey! will these people never come? [sir.

Hyp. You give a very good account of yourself,

Trap. Oh! nothing at all, sir. Lord, sir!—was it fish or flesh, sir?

Flora. Really, sir, we have bespoke nothing yet.

Trap. Nothing! for shame! it's a sign you are young travellers; you don't know this house, sir; why, they'll let you starve if you don't stir, and call, and that like thunder, too. Hallo! [sir?

Hyp. Ah! you eat here, sometimes, I presume,

Trap. Humph! Ay, sir, that's as it happens—I seldom eat at home, indeed. Hallo!

Enter Host.

Host. Did you call, gentlemen?

Trap. Yes, and bawl, too, sir: here, the gentlemen are almost famished, and nobody comes near them: what have you in the house now that will be ready presently?

Host. You may have what you please, sir.

Hyp. Can you get us a partridge?

Host. Sir, we have no partridges; but we'll get you what you please in a moment: we have a very good neck of mutton, sir; if you please, it shall be clapped down in a moment.

Hyp. Have you no pigeons or chickens?

Host. Truly, sir, we have no fowl in the house at present; if you please, you may have anything else in a moment.

Hyp. Then, pr'ythee, get us some young rabbits.

Host. Rabbits! Od rabbit it! rabbits are so scarce they are not to be had for money.

Flora. Have you any fish?

Host. Fish! sir, I dressed, yesterday, the finest dish that ever came upon a table; I am sorry we have none left, sir; but, if you please, you may have anything else in a moment.

Trap. Plague on thee! hast thou nothing but anything else in the house?

Host. Very good mutton, sir.

Hyp. Pr'ythee, get us a saddle, then.

Host. Don't you love the neck, sir?

Hyp. Have ye nothing in the house but the neck?

Host. Really, sir, we don't use to be so unprovided; but, at present, we have nothing else left.

Trap. Egad! it's neck or nothing here, sir. Faith! sir, I don't know but a nothing else may be very good meat, when anything else is not to be had.

Hyp. Then, pr'ythee, friend, let's have thy neck of mutton before that is gone too.

Trap. Sir, he shall lay it down this minute; I'll see it done: gentlemen, I'll wait upon ye presently; for a minute I must beg your pardon, and leave to lay the cloth myself.

Hyp. By no means, sir.

Trap. No ceremony, dear sir; indeed, I'll do it.

[Exit with Host.

Hyp. What can this familiar puppy be?

Flora. With much ado I have recollected his face. Don't you remember, madam, about two or three years ago, Don Philip had a trusty servant, called Trappanti, that used, now and then, to slip a note into your hand, as you came from church?

Hyp. Is this he that Philip turned away for saying I was as proud as a beauty, and homely enough to be good humoured?

Flora. The very same, I assure ye; only, as you see, starving has altered his air a little.

Hyp. Poor fellow! I am concerned for him: what makes him so far from Seville?

Flora. I am afraid all places are alike to him.

Hyp. I have a great mind to take him into my service; his assurance may be useful, as my case stands.

Flora. You would not tell him who you are?

Hyp. There's no occasion for it. I'll talk with him.

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Your dinner's upon the spit, gentlemen, and the cloth is laid in the best room. Are you not for a whet, sir? What wine, what wine? Hey!

Flora. We give you trouble, sir.

Trap. Not in the least, sir. Hey! (Knocks.)

Re-enter Host.

Host. D'ye call, gentlemen?

Hyp. Ay; what wine have ye?

Host. What sort you please, sir?

Flora. Sir, will you please to name it? (To Trappanti.)

Trap. Nay, pray, sir— [shall.

Hyp. No ceremony, dear sir; upon my word you

Trap. Upon my soul, you'll make me leave ye, gentlemen.

Hyp. Come, come, no words; pr'ythee, you shall.

Trap. Psha! but why this among friends, now?

Here, have ye any right Galicia?

Host. The best in Spain, I warrant it.

Trap. Let's taste it; if it be good, set us out half-a-dozen bottles for dinner.

Host. Yes, sir. [Exit.

Flora. Who says this fellow's a starving now? On my conscience, the rogue has more impudence than a lover at midnight. (Apart to Hyp.)

Hyp. Hang him! 'tis inoffensive; I'll humour him. (Apart.) Pray, sir, (for I find we are like to be better acquainted, therefore, I hope you won't take my question ill,)—

Trap. Oh! dear sir!

Hyp. What profession may you be of?

Trap. Profession, sir! I—I—Ods me! here's the wine. [Re-enter Host.] Come, fill out: hold! let me taste it first: ye blockhead, would ye have the gentleman drink before he knows whether it be good or not? (Drinks.) Yes, 'twill do; give me the bottle, I'll fill myself. Now, sir, is not that a glass of right wine? (To Hypolita.)

Hyp. Extremely good, indeed. But, sir, as to my question. [for us all.

Trap. I'm afraid, sir, that mutton won't be enough

Hyp. Oh! pray, sir, bespeak what you please.

Trap. Sir, your most humble servant. Here, master! pr'ythee, get us—Eh! ay, get us a dozen of poached eggs—a dozen, d'ye hear? just to pop down a little.

Host. Yes, sir.

Trap. Friend, let there be a little slice of bacon to every one of them.

Host. Yes, sir: a little thin slice, sir? (Going.)

Trap. No, you dog! not too thin.

Hyp. But, sir—

Trap. Odso! I had like to have forgot—here, a—Sancho, Sancho! ay, isn't your name Sancho?

Host. Diego, sir.

Trap. Oh! ay, Diego! that's true, indeed, Diego! Humph!

Hyp. I must e'en let him alone; there's no putting in a word till his mouth's full. (Apart.)

Trap. Come, here's to thee, Diego! (Drinks and fills again.) That I should forget thy name though.

Host. No great harm, sir.

Trap. Diego, eh! a very pretty name, faith! I think you are married, are you not, Diego?

Host. Ay, ay, sir.

Trap. Ah! How many children?

Host. Nine girls and a boy, sir.

Trap. Ah! Nine girls! Come, here's to thee again, Diego. Nine girls! a stirring woman, I dare say; a good housewife, eh! Diego?

Host. Pretty well, sir.

Trap. Makes all her pickles herself, I warrant ye! Does she do olives well?

Host. Will you be pleased to taste them, sir?

Trap. Taste them! humph! pr'ythee, let's have a plate, Diego.

Host. Yes, sir.

Hyp. And our dinner as soon as you please, sir; when it's ready, call us.

Host. Yes, sir. [Exit.

Hyp. But, sir, I was asking you of your profession.

Trap. Profession! really, sir, I don't use to profess much; I am a plain-dealing sort of a man; if I say I'll serve a gentleman, he may depend upon me.

Flora. Have you ever served, sir?

Trap. Not these two last campaigns.

Hyp. How so?

Trap. Some words with my superior officer; I was a little too free in speaking my mind to him.

Hyp. Don't you think of serving again, sir?

Trap. If a good post falls in my way.

Hyp. I believe I could help you. Pray, sir, when you served last, did you take pay or wages?

Trap. Pay, sir! Yes, sir, I was paid, cleared subsistence and arrears to a farthing.

Hyp. And your late commander's name was—

Trap. Don Philip de las Torres.

Hyp. Of Seville?

Trap. Of Seville.

Hyp. Sir, your most humble servant. You need not be curious; for I am sure you don't know me, though I do you, and your condition; which, I dare promise you, I'll mend upon our better acquaintance. And your first step to deserve it, is to answer me honestly to a few questions: keep your assurance still; it may do me service, I shall like you better for it: come, here's to encourage you. (Gives him money.)

Trap. Sir, my humble service to you.

Hyp. Well said.

Flora. Nay, I'll pass my word he sha'n't dwindle into modesty.

Trap. I never heard a gentleman talk better in my life. I have seen such a sort of face before, but where I don't know, nor I don't care. It's your glass, sir.

Hyp. Grammercy! here, cousin! (Drinks to Flora.) Come, now, what made Don Philip turn you out of his service? Why did you leave him?

Trap. 'Twas time, I think; his wits had left him; the man was mad.

Hyp. Mad!

Trap. Ay, stark mad—in love.

Hyp. In love! How, pray?

Trap. Very deep—up to the ears, over head, drowned by this time; he would in—I would have had him stopped when he was up to the middle.

Hyp. What was she he was in love with?

Trap. The devil!

Hyp. So! now for a very ugly likeness of my own face. (Aside.) What sort of a devil?

Trap. The damning sort—a woman!

Hyp. Had she no name?

Trap. Her Christian name was Donna Hypolita; but her proper name was Shuttlecock.

Flora. How d'ye like that? (Apart to Hyp.)

Hyp. Pretty well. (Apart.) Was she handsome?

Trap. Humph! so, so!

Flora. How d'ye like that? (Apart.)

Hyp. Humph! so, so! (Apart.) Had she wit?

Trap. Sometimes.

Hyp. Good humour?

Trap. Very seldom.

Hyp. Proud?

Trap. Ever.

Hyp. Was she honest?

Trap. Very proud.

Hyp. What! had she no good qualities?

Trap. Faith! I don't remember them.

Hyp. Ah! d'ye think she loved him? [wife.

Trap. If she did, 'twas as the cobbler loved his

Hyp. How was that?

Trap. Why, he beat her thrice a day, and told his neighbours he loved her never the worse; but he was resolved she should never know it.

Hyp. Did she use him so very ill?

Trap. Like a jade.

Flora. How d'ye do now? (Apart.)

Hyp. I don't know; methinks, I—(Apart.)—But, sure!—What! was she not handsome, say ye?

Trap. A devilish tongue!

Hyp. Was she ugly?

Flora. Ay, say that, at your peril. (Aside.)

Hyp. What was she? How did she look?

Trap. Look! Why, faith! the woman looked very well when she had a blush in her face.

Hyp. Did she often blush?

Trap. I never saw her.

Flora. How d'ye like the picture, ma'am? (Apart.)

Hyp. I am as humble as an offending lover. (Apart.)

Re-enter Host.

Host. Gentlemen, your dinner's upon table. [Exit.]

Hyp. That's well! Come, sir, at dinner I'll give you further instructions how you may serve yourself and me.

Trap. Come, sir. (To Flora.)

Flora. Nay, dear sir, no ceremony.

Trap. Sir, your very humble servant. (As they are going, Hypolita stops them.) [see me.]

Hyp. Come back; here's one I don't care should Trap. Sir, the dinner will be cold.

Hyp. Do you eat it hot, then; we are not hungry.

Trap. Sir, your humble servant again. [Exit.]

Flora. You seem concerned; who is it?

Hyp. My brother Octavio, as I live! Come this way. (They retire.)

Enter OCTAVIO and a Servant.

Oct. Jasper, run immediately to Rosara's woman, tell her I am just come to town; slip that note into her hand, and stay for an answer.

Flora. 'Tis he. (Apart to Hypolita.)

Re-enter Host, conducting DON PHILIP.

Host. Here, sir, please to walk this way.

Flora. And Don Philip, by Jupiter! (Apart.)

Don P. When my servant comes, send him to me immediately.

Host. Yes, sir.

Hyp. Nay, then, it's time for us to make ready. Allons! [Apart. Exit with Flora.]

Oct. Don Philip!

Don P. Dear Octavio!

Oct. What lucky point of the compass could blow us upon one another so?

Don P. Faith! a wind very contrary to my inclination: but the worst, I see, blows some good; I am overjoyed to see you. But what makes you so far from the army?

Oct. Oh! friend, such an unfortunate occasion, yet such a lucky discovery! such a mixture of joy and torment no poor dog upon earth was ever plagued with.

Don P. Unriddle, pray.

Oct. Don't you remember, about six months ago, I wrote you word of a dear, delicious, sprightly creature, that I had bombarded for a whole summer to no purpose?

Don P. I remember. [now capitulates.]

Oct. That same silly, stubborn, charming angel

Don P. Then she's taken.

Oct. I can't tell that; for, you must know, her perfidious father, contrary to his treaty with me, and her inclination, is going to—

Don P. Marry her to another?

Oct. Of a better estate than mine, it seems. There's her express; read it.

HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI, appear in the balcony.

Flora. Trappanti, there's your old master. (Apart.)

Trap. Ay, I know him again; but I may chance to tell him he did not know a good servant when he had him. (Apart.)

Don P. (Reads.) "My father has concluded a match for me with one I never saw, and intends, in two days, to perfect it; the gentleman is expected every hour. In the meantime, if you know any friend that has a better title to me, advise him forthwith to put in his claim: I am almost out of my senses; which you'll easily believe, when I tell you if such an one should make haste, I sha'n't have time to refuse him anything."

Hyp. How's this? (Apart.)

Don P. No name.

Oct. She never would trust it in a letter.

Flora. If this should be Don Philip's mistress! (Apart.)

Trap. Sir, you may take my word it is; I know the lady, and what the neighbours say of her (Apart.)

Don P. What will you do in this case?

Oct. That I don't yet know; I have just sent my servant to tell her I am come to town, and beg an opportunity to speak with her: I long to see her: I warrant, the poor fool will be so soft and humble, now she's in a fright. [her?]

Don P. What will you propose at your meeting?

Oct. I don't know; may be, another meeting: at least, it will come to a kind look, a kiss, good b'ye, and a sigh. Ah! if I can but persuade her to run away with me!

Don P. Consider!

Oct. Ah! so I do: what pleasure 'twould be to have her steal out of her bed in a sweet, moonshiny night! to hear her come pat, pat, pat, along in her slippers, with nothing but a thin silk night-gown loose about her! and, in this tempting dress, to have her jump into my arms, breathless with fear.

Don P. Octavio, I envy thee; thou art the happiest man in thy temper—

Oct. And thou art the most altered I ever knew: pr'ythee, what makes thee so much upon the humdrum? Well, are my sister and you come to a right understanding yet? When do you marry?

Don P. My condition, Octavio, is very much like your mistress's: she is going to marry the man she never saw, and I the woman.

Oct. Sdeath! you make me tremble. I hope 'tis not my mistress.

Don P. Thy mistress! that were an idle fear; Madrid's a wide place. Or, if it were, (she loving you,) my friendship and my honour would oblige me to desist.

Oct. That's generous, indeed! But still you amaze me. Are you quite broken off with my sister? I hope she has given you no reason to forget her?

Don P. The most severe that ever beauty printed in the heart of man, a coldness unaccountable to sense.

Oct. Psha! dissembled.

Don P. I can't think it; lovers are soon flattered into hope; but she appeared to me indifferent to so nice a point, that she has ruined me without the trouble of resolving it.

Oct. For all her usage of you, I'll be racked if she did not love you.

Don P. I rather think she hated me: however, now 'tis past, and I must endeavour to think no more of her. [lady?]

Oct. Then you are determined to marry this other

Don P. That's my business to Madrid.

Trap. Which shall be done to your hand. (Apart.)

Don P. Besides, I am now obliged by contract.

Oct. Then, (though she be my sister,) may some jealous, old, ill-natured dog revenge your quarrel to her.

Don P. Come, forget it.

[Exeunt Hypolita, Flora, and Trappanti.]

Oct. With all my heart; let's go in and drink your new mistress's health. When do you visit her?

Don P. I intended it immediately; but an unlucky accident has hindered me; one of my servants fell sick upon the road, so that I am forced to make shift with one, and he is the most negligent, sottish rogue in nature; has left the portmanteau, where all my writings and letters of concern are, behind him at the last town we lay, so that I can't properly visit the lady or her father till I am able to assure them who I am. [them.]

Oct. Why don't you go back yourself to see for Don P. I have sent my servant; for I am really tired: I was loth to appear too much concerned for them, lest the rascal should think it worth his while to run away with them.

Re-enter a Servant to OCTAVIO.

Oct. How now?

Serv. Here's an answer, sir. (Gives a letter.)

Oct. My dear friend, I beg a thousand pardons, I must leave you this minute; the kind creature has sent for me; I am a soldier, you know, and orders must be obeyed; when I come off duty, I'll immediately wait upon you. (To Don P.)

Don P. You'll find me here, or hear of me: adieu! [Exit Octavio.] Here, house! [Re-enter Host.] Pr'ythee, see if my servant be come yet.

Host. I believe he is, sir; is he not in blue?

Don P. Ay, where is the sot? [gate.]

Host. Just refreshing himself with a glass at the Don P. Pray, tell the gentleman I'd speak with him. [Exit Host.] In all the necessities of life there is not a greater plague than servants. Hey! Soto, Soto!

Enter SOTO, drunk.

Soto. Did you please to—such—call, sir?

Don P. What's the reason, blockhead, I must always wait upon you thus?

Soto. Sir, I did not know anything of it; I—I—came as soon as you se—se—se—sent for me.

Don P. And why not without sending, sir? Did you think I expected no answer to the business I sent you about?

Soto. Yes, sir, I did think you would be willing—that is—to have an account—so I staid to take a glass at the door, because I would not be out of the way—hub! [manteau?]

Don P. You are drunk, rascal! where's the port-

Soto. Sir, I am here—if you please, I'll give you the whole account how the matter is—hub!

Don P. Speak, villain! (Strikes him.)

Soto. I will, sir, as soon as I can put my words into an intelligible order; I a'n't running away, sir.

Don P. To the point, sirrah!

Soto. Not of your sword, dear sir.

Don P. Sirrah, be brief, or I'll murder you: where's the portmanteau?

Soto. Sir, as I hope to breathe, I made all the strictest search in the world, and drunk at every house upon the road, going and coming, and asked about it; and so at last, as I was coming within a mile of the town here, I found then—

Don P. What?

Soto. That it must certainly be lost.

Don P. Dog! d'ye think this must satisfy me? (Beats him.)

Soto. Lord, sir! you won't hear reason. Are you sure you haven't it about you? If I know anything of it, I wish I may be burnt. [tion.]

Don P. Villain! your life can't make me satisfac-

Soto. No, sir? that's hard—a man's life can't—for my part—I—I—

Don P. Why do I vent my rage against a sot, a clod of earth? I should accuse myself for trusting

Soto. Sir— [him.]

Don P. Be dumb!

Soto. Ahuh! Yes.

Don P. If this rascal had stolen it, sure he would not have ventured to come back again. I am confounded. Neither Don Manuel nor his daughter know me, nor any of his family. If I should not visit him till I can receive fresh letters from my father, he'll, in the meantime, think himself affronted by my neglect. What shall I do? Suppose I go and tell him my misfortune, and beg his patience till we can hear again from Seville. I must think. Hey, Soto! [Exit.]

Soto. I had rather bought a portmanteau out of my own pocket, than had such a life about it. [Exit.]

Re-enter HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Hold, sir! let me touch up your fore-top a little.

Hyp. Well, Trappanti, you know your business; and if I marry the lady, you know my promise, too.

Trap. Sir, I shall remember them both. Odso! I had like to have forgot—Here, house! a basin and washball! I've a razor about me. Hey! (Knocks.)

Hyp. What's the matter?

Trap. Sir, you are not shaved.

Hyp. Shaved!

Trap. Ever while you live, sir, go with a smooth chin to your mistress. Hey! (Knocks.)

Hyp. This puppy does so plague me with his impertinence, I shall laugh out, and discover myself. (Aside.)

Trap. Why, Diego! (Knocks.)

Hyp. Psha! pr'ythee, don't stand fooling, we're in haste.

Flora. Ay, ay; shave another time.

Trap. Nay, what you please, sir; your beard is not much, you may wear it to-day. (Taking her by the chin.)

Flora. Ay, and to-morrow, too: pray, sir, will you see the coach ready, and put in the things?

Trap. Sir, I'll see the coach ready, and put in the things. [Exit.]

Flora. Come, madam, courage! now let's do something for the honour of our sex; give a proof of our parts, and tell mankind we can contrive, fatigue, bustle, and bring about as well as the best of them.

Hyp. Well said, Flora! for the honour of our sex be it, then, and let the grave dons think themselves as wise as they please; but nature knows there goes more wit to the management of some amours, than the hardest point in politics.

Therefore, to men th' affair of state's confin'd;

Wisely to us the state of love's assign'd,

As love's the weightier business of mankind.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Don Manuel's House.

Enter ROSARA and VILETTA.

Vil. Hear reason.

Ros. Talk of Octavio, then.

Vil. How do you know but the gentleman your father designs for you, may prove as pretty a fellow as he? if you should happen to like him as well.

Ros. Do you expect Octavio should thank you for this?

Vil. The gentleman is no fool. [his love.]

Ros. He'll hate any one that is not a friend to

Vil. Hang them, say I! but can't one quench the thirst without jumping into the river? Is there no difference between cooling and drowning? If Octavio must be the man, I say, let Don Philip be the husband.

Ros. I tell you, fool, I'll have no man but a husband, and no husband but Octavio: when you find I am weary of him, I'll give you leave to talk to me of somebody else.

Vil. In vain, I see. I have done, madam: one must have time to be wise; but, in the meanwhile, what do ye resolve? Positively not to marry Don Philip.

Ros. I don't know what I shall do, till I see Octavio; when did he say he would be here?

Vil. Oh! I dare not tell you, madam.

Ros. Why?

Vil. I am bribed to the contrary.

Ros. By whom?

Vil. Octavio. He just now sent me this lovely piece of gold, not to tell you what time he would be here.

Ros. Nay, then, Viletta, here are two pieces that are twice as lovely; tell me when I shall see him.

Vil. Humph! these are lovely pieces, indeed. (Smiling.)

Ros. When, Viletta?

Vil. Have you no more of them, madam?

Ros. Psha! there, take purse and all; will that content thee?

Vil. Oh! dear madam, I should be unconscionable to desire more; but, really, I was willing to have them all first. (Courtesying.)

Ros. When will he come?

Vil. Why, the poor gentleman has been hankering about the house this quarter of an hour; but I did not observe, madam, you were willing to see him, till you had convinced me by so plain a proof.

Ros. Where's my father?

Vil. Fast asleep in the great chair.

Ros. Fetch him in, then, before he wakes.

Vil. Let him wake, his habit will protect him.

Ros. His habit!

Vil. Ay, madam, he's turned friar to come at you: if your father surprises us, I have a lie ready to back him. Hist! Octavio, you may enter.

Enter OCTAVIO, in a Friar's habit.

Oct. After a thousand frights and fears, do I live to see my dear Rosara once again, and kind?

Ros. What shall we do, Octavio? (Looking kindly on him.)

Oct. Kind creature! Do! why, do as lovers should do; what nobody can undo—let's run away this minute, tie ourselves fast in the church-knot, and defy fathers and mothers.

Ros. And fortunes, too?

Oct. Psha! we shall have it one day: they must leave their money behind them.

Ros. Suppose you first try my father's good-nature? You know he once encouraged your addresses.

Oct. First, let's be fast married; perhaps he may be good-natured when he can't help it; whip a suit of night-clothes into your pocket, and let's march off in a body together.

Ros. Ah! my father.

Oct. Dead!

Vil. To your function.

Enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. Viletta!

Vil. Sir.

Don M. Where's my daughter?

Vil. Hist! don't disturb her.

Don M. Disturb her! why, what's the matter?

Vil. She's at confession, sir.

Don M. Confession! I don't like that; a young woman ought to have no sins at all.

Vil. Ah! dear sir, there's no living without them.

Don M. I find her aversion to the marriage I have proposed her, has put her upon disobedient thoughts: there can be no confession without guilt.

Vil. Nor no pardon, sir, without confession.

Don M. Fiddle-faddle! I won't have her seem wicked: hussy! you shall confess for her; I'll have her send her sins by you; you know them, I'm sure; but I'll know what the friar has got out of her. Save you, father!

Oct. Bless you, son!

Don M. How now, what's become of father Benedict? Why is not he here?

Vil. Sir, he is not well, and so desired this gentleman, his brother here, to officiate for him.

Don M. He seems very young for a confessor.

Vil. Ay, sir; he has not been long at it.

Oct. Nor don't desire to be long in it: I hope I understand it well enough to make a fool of my old don here. (Aside.)

Don M. Well, sir, how do you find the pulse of iniquity beat there? What sort of sin has she most stomach to?

Oct. Why, truly, sir, we have all frailties, and your daughter has had most powerful temptations.

Don M. Nay, the devil has been very busy with her these two days.

Oct. She has told me a most lamentable story.

Don M. Ten to one but this lamentable story proves a most d— lie.

Oct. Indeed, son, I find, by her confession, that you are much to blame for your tyrannical government of her.

Don M. Heyday! what, has the jade been inventing sins for me, and confessing them instead of her own? Let me come—she shall be locked up till she repents them, too.

Oct. Son, forbear! this is now a corroboration of your guilt: this is inhuman.

Don M. Sir, I have done: but, pray, if you please, let's come to the point; what are these terrible cruelties that this tender lady accuses me of?

Oct. Nay, sir, mistake her not: she did not, with any malicious design, expose your faults, but as her own depended on them: her frailties were the consequence of your cruelty. [sequent.]

Don M. Let's have them both antecedent and con-

Oct. Why, she confessed her first maiden, innocent affection, had long been settled upon a young gentleman, whose love to her you once encouraged; and after their most solemn vows of mutual faith, you have most barbarously broken in upon her hopes, and to the utter ruin of her peace, contracted her to a man she never saw.

Don M. Very good; I see no harm in all this.

Oct. Methinks, the welfare of a daughter, sir, might be of weight enough to make you serious.

Don M. Serious! so I am, sir; what the devil, must I needs be melancholy because I have got her a good husband?

Oct. Her melancholy may tell you, sir, she can't think him a good one.

Don M. Sir, I understand thinking better than she, and I'll make her take my word.

Oct. What have you to object against the man

Don M. The man I like. [she likes?]

Oct. Suppose the unhappy youth she loves should throw himself distracted at your feet, and try to melt you into pity.

Don M. Ay, that's if he can.

Oct. You would not, sir, refuse to hear him.

Don M. Sir, I shall not refuse him anything; that I am sure will signify nothing.

Oct. Were you, one moment, to reflect upon the pangs which separated lovers feel, were nature dead in you, that thought might wake her.

Don M. Sir, when I am asked to do a thing I have not a mind to do, my nature sleeps like a top.

Oct. Then I must tell you, sir, this obstinacy obliges me, as a churchman, to put you in mind of your duty: and to let you know, too, you ought to pay more reverence to our order.

Don M. Sir, I am not afraid of the sin of marrying my daughter to the best advantage: and so, if you please, father, you may walk home again; when anything lies upon my conscience I'll send for you.

Oct. Nay, then, 'tis time to claim a lover's right, and to tell you, sir, the man that dares to ask Rosara from me is a villain. (Throws off his disguise.)

Vil. So! here will be fine work! (Aside.)

Don M. Octavio! the devil!

Oct. You'll find me one, unless you do me speedy justice: since not the bonds of honour, nature, nor submissive reason can oblige you, I am reduced to take a surer, shorter way, and force you to be just. I leave you, sir, to think on't. (Walks about angrily.)

Don M. Ah! here's a confessor! ah! that jade of mine! and that other jade of my jade's! here has been rare doings! Well, it sha'n't hold long; madam shall be noosed to-morrow morning. Ah! sir's in a great passion here, but it won't do; those long strides, Don, will never bring you the sooner to your mistress. Rosara! step into that closet, and fetch my spectacles off the table there. Tum, tum! (Sings.)

Vil. I don't like the old gentleman's looks. (Aside.)

Ros. This obstinacy of your's, my dear father, you shall find, runs in the family.

[Exit. Don Manuel locks her in.]

Don M. Tum, dum, dum! (Sings.)

Oct. Sir, I would advise you, as your nearest friend, to defer this marriage for three days.

Don M. Tum, tum, tum! (Sings.)

Vil. Sir, you have locked my mistress in.

Don M. Tum, dum, dum! (Sings.)

Vil. If you please to lend me the key, sir, I'll let her out.

Don M. Tum, dum, dum! (Sings.)

Oct. You might afford me, at least, as I am a gentleman, a civil answer, sir.

Don M. Why, then, in one word, sir, you shall not marry my daughter; and, as you are a gentleman, I'm sure you won't think it good manners to stay in my house, when I submissively beg of you to walk out.

Oct. You are the father of my mistress, and something, sir, too old, to answer as you ought this wrong; therefore, I'll look for reparation where I can with honour take it; and since you have obliged me to leave your house, I'll watch it carefully; I'll know who dares enter it. This, sir, be sure of, the man that offers at Rosara's love shall have one virtue, courage, at least: I'll be his proof of that, and ere he steps before me, force him to deserve her.

[Exit.]

Don M. Ah! poor fellow! he's mad now, and does not know what he would be at. But, however, 'twill be no harm to provide against him. Who waits there? [Enter a Servant.] Run you for an alguazil, and bid your fellows arm themselves; I expect mischief at my door immediately: if Octavio offers any disturbance, knock him down, and bring him before me. [Exit Servant.]

Vil. Hist! don't I hear my mistress's voice?

Ros. (Within.) Viletta!

Vil. Here! here, madam! Bless me! what's this? (Listens at the closet-door, and Rosara thrusts a billet to her through the key-hole.) Ah! a billet! to Octavio—a—hem! (Puts it into her bosom.)

Don M. How now, hussy! what are you fumbling about that door for?

Vil. Nothing, sir; I was only peeping to see if my mistress had done prayers yet.

Don M. Oh! she had as good let them alone, for she shall never come out till she has stomach enough to fall to upon the man I have provided for her. But, hark you! Mrs. Modesty, was it you, pray, that let in that able comforter for my babe of grace there?

Vil. Yes, sir, I let him in.

Don M. Did you so? Ah! then, if you please, madam, I'll let you out: go—go get a sheet of brown paper, pack up your things, and let me never see that d—d ugly face of thine as long as I live.

Vil. Bless me! sir, you are in a strange humour, that you won't know when a servant does as she should do.

Don M. Thou art strangely impudent.

Vil. Only the furthest from it in the world, sir.

Don M. Then I am strangely mistaken: didst not thou own just now thou let'st him in?

Vil. Yes; but 'twas in disguise; for I did not design you should see him, because I know you did not care my mistress should see him.

Don M. Ah! [to see him.]

Vil. And I knew, at the same time, she had a mind

Don M. Ah!

Vil. And you know, sir, that the sin of loving him had lain upon her conscience a great while; so I thought it high time she should come to a thorough confession.

Don M. Ah! [him in; that's all.]

Vil. So, upon this, sir, as you see, I—I—I let Don M. Nay, if it be so as thou say'st, he was a proper confessor, indeed.

Vil. Well, sir, and judge you now if my mistress is not beholden to me.

Don M. Oh! extremely; but you'll go to hell, my dear, for all this; though, perhaps, you'll choose that place: I think you never much cared for your husband's company; and, if I don't mistake, you sent him to heaven in the old road. Hark! what noise is that? [Noise without. Exit Viletta.]

Enter a Servant, hastily.

How now?

Serv. Oh! sir, Octavio, has set upon a couple of gentlemen, just as they were alighting out of a coach at the door; one of them, I believe, is he that is to marry my young mistress; I heard them name her name; I am afraid there will be mischief, sir: there they are all at it, helter-skelter.

Don M. Run into the hall, take down my back, breast, and head-piece; call an officer, raise the neighbours, give me my great gun, I'll shoot him out of the garret-window. [Exit.]

Enter HYPOLITA and FLORA, putting up their swords; TRAPPANTI and OCTAVIO in the servants' hands.

Hyp. Bring him along! this is such an insolence! at this rate no gentleman can walk the streets.

Flora. I suppose, sir, your business was more with our pockets than our persons: are our things safe?

Trap. Ay, sir, I secured them as soon as ever I saw his sword out; I guessed his design, and scoured off with the portmanteau.

Hyp. I'll know now who set you on, sir.

Oct. Pr'ythee, young man, don't be troublesome, but thank 'the rascal that knocked me down for your escape.

Hyp. Sir, I'd have you to know, if you had not been knocked down, I should have owed my escape to the same arm you would have owed the reward for your insolence. Pray, sir, what are you? Who knows you?

Oct. I am glad, at least, to find 'tis not Don Philip that's my rival. (Aside.)

Serv. Sir, my master knows the gentleman very well; he belongs to the army.

Hyp. Then, sir, if you'd have me use you like a gentleman, I desire your meaning of those familiar questions you asked me at the coach-side.

Oct. Faith! young gentleman, I'll be very short; I love the lady you are to marry; and if you don't quit your pretences in two hours, it will entail perpetual danger upon you and your family.

Hyp. Sir, if you please, the danger's equal; for, rot me, if I'm not as fond of cutting your throat as you can be of mine.

Oct. If I were out of these gentlemen's hands, on my word, sir, you shouldn't want an opportunity.

Hyp. Oh! sir, these gentlemen shall protect neither of us; my friend and I'll be your bail for them.

Flora. Ay, sir, we'll bail you; and, if you please, sir, bring your friend; I'm his: d—me! what, d'ye think you have boys to deal with?

Oct. Sir, I ask your pardon, and shall desire to kiss your hands, about an hour hence, at—(Whispers.)

Flora. Very well, sir; we'll meet you.

Hyp. Release the gentleman.

Serv. Sir, we dare not, without my master's order: here he is, sir.

Re-enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. How now, bully confessor? What, in limbo?

Hyp. Sir, Don Fernando de las Torres, whom I am proud to call my father, commanded me to deliver this into the hands of his most dear and worthy friend, Don Manuel Grimaldi, and at the same time, gave me assurance of a kind reception.

Don M. Sir, you are thrice welcome; let me embrace ye; I am overjoyed to see you: your friend, sir?

Hyp. Don Pedro Velada, my near relation, who has done me the honour of his company from Seville, sir, to assist at the solemnity of his friend's happiness. [to know you.]

Don M. Sir, you are welcome; I shall be proud

Flora. You do me honour, sir.

Don M. I hope you are not hurt, gentlemen?

Hyp. Not at all, sir; thanks to a little skill in the sword.

Don M. I am glad of it; however, give me leave to interrupt our business for a moment, till I have done you justice on the person that offered you this insolence at my gate.

Hyp. Your pardon, sir; I understand he is a gentleman, and beg you would not let my honour suffer, by receiving a lame reparation from the law.

Don M. A pretty mettled fellow, faith!—must not let him fight though. (Aside.) But, sir, you don't know, perhaps, how deeply this man is your enemy.

Hyp. Sir, I know more of his spleen and folly than you imagine, which, if you please to discharge him, I'll acquaint you with.

Don M. Discharge him! Pray, consider, sir—(They seem to talk.)

Re-enter VILETTA, and gives a note to Octavio.

Vil. Send your answer to me.

[Apart to Octavio, and exit.]

Oct. Now for a beam of hope in a tempest. (Aside. Reads.) "I charge you, don't hazard my ruin and your own by the madness of a quarrel: the closet-window where I am is but a step to the ground. Be at the back door of the garden exactly in the close of the evening, where you will certainly find one that may put you in the best way of getting rid of a rival." Dear kind creature! Now, if my little don's fit of honour, does but hold out to bail me, I am the happiest dog in the universe! (Aside.)

Don M. Well, sir, since I find your honour is dipped so deep in the matter—Here, release the gentleman. (Servant gives Octavio his sword.)

Flora. So, sir, you have your freedom; you may depend upon us.

Hyp. You will find us punctual. Sir, your servant.

Oct. So, now I have a very handsome occasion to put off the tilt, too. (Aside.) Gentlemen, I ask your pardon; I begin to be a little sensible of the rashness I committed; and, I confess, your manner of treating me has been so very much like men of honour, that I think myself obliged from the same principle to assure ye, that though I love Rosara equal to my life, yet no consideration shall persuade me to be a rude enemy, even to my rival; I thank you for my freedom, and am your humble servant. [Exit.]

Hyp. Your servant, sir. I think we released my brother very handsomely; but I haven't done with him. (Aside to Flora.)

Don M. What can this sudden turn of civility mean? I am afraid 'tis but a cloak to some new roguery he has in his head.

Hyp. I don't know how old it may be, but my servant here has discovered a piece of villany of his, that exceeds any other he can be capable of.

Don M. Is it possible? Why would you let him go then?

Hyp. Because I'm sure it can do me no harm, sir.

Don M. Pray, be plain, sir: what is it?

Hyp. This fellow can inform you. For, to say truth, he's much better at a lie. (Aside.)

Don M. Come hither, friend: pray, what is this business?

Hyp. Ay; what was that you overheard between Octavio and another gentleman, at the inn where we alighted?

Trap. Why, sir, as I was unbuckling my portmanteau in the yard there, I observed Octavio and another spark very familiar with your honour's name; upon which, sir, I pricked up the ears of my curiosity, and took in all their discourse.

Don M. Pray, who was that other spark, friend?

Trap. A brother-rake, sir; a d—d sly-looking

Don M. So! [fellow!]

Flora. How familiarly the rogue treats his old master. (Aside.)

Hyp. Poor Don Philip! (Aside.)

Trap. Says one of them, says he, "No, d—n him! the old rogue," meaning you, sir, "will never let you have her by fair means." "However," says Octavio, "I'll try soft words: but if those won't do"—"Bully him," says t'other.

Don M. Ah! poor dog! but that would not do neither: sir, he has tried them both to-day to no purpose.

Trap. Say you so, sir? then you'll find what I say is all of a piece. "Well, and if neither of these will do," says he, "you must e'en tilt the young prig, your rival;" meaning you, then, sir. (To Hypolita.) [greatly care for.]

Don M. Ha, ha! that, I perceive, my spark did not

Trap. No, sir; that, he found, was catching a Tartar. Sbud! my master fought like a lion, sir.

Hyp. Truly, I did not spare him.

Flora. No, faith!—after he was knocked down. (Aside.) [roguery.]

Trap. But now, sir, comes the cream of the Hyp. Pray, observe, sir.

Trap. "Well," says Sly-looks; "and if all these fail, I have a rare trick in my head, that will certainly defer the marriage for three or four days at least; and, in that time, the devil's in it if you don't find an opportunity to run away with her."

Don M. Would you so, Mr. Dog? But he'll be hanged. [nate in this discovery.]

Hyp. Oh! sir, you'll find we were mighty fortu-

Don M. Pray, sir, let's hear. What was this trick to be, friend?

Trap. Why, sir, to alarm you, that my master was an impostor, and that Sly-looks was the true Don Philip, sent by his father from Seville to marry your daughter; "upon which," says he, "the old put," meaning you again, sir, "will be so bamboozled, that—"

Don M. But, pray, sir, how did young Mr. Coxcomb conclude that the old put was to believe all this? Had they no sham proofs that they proposed to bamboozle me with, as you call it?

Trap. You shall hear, sir: (the plot was pretty well laid, too:) "I'll pretend," says he, "that the rascal, your rival," meaning you, then, sir, (to Hyp.) "has robbed me of my portmanteau, where I had put up all my jewels, money, and letters of recommendation from my father. We are neither of us known in Madrid," says he, "so that a little impudence, and a grave face, will certainly set those two dogs a snarling, while you run away with the bone." That's all, sir.

Don M. Impudent rogue!

Hyp. What think ye, sir? Was not this business pretty handsomely laid?

Flora. Faith, it might have wrought a very ridiculous consequence.

Don M. Why, truly, if we had not been fore-armed by this discovery, for aught I know, Mr. Dog might have ran away with the bone, indeed; but, if you please, sir, since these ingenious gentlemen are so pert upon the matter, we'll let them see that you and I have wit enough to do our business, and e'en clap up the wedding to-morrow morning.

Hyp. Sir, you are too obliging. But will your daughter, think ye, be prevailed with?

Don M. Sir, I'll prepare her this minute. It's a pity, methinks, we released that bully, though.

Flora. We might as well have held him a little.

Hyp. Really, sir, upon second thoughts, I wish we had: his excusing his challenge so abruptly, makes one fancy he is in hopes of carrying his point some other way. Did not you observe your daughter's woman whisper him?

Don M. Humph!

Flora. They seemed very busy, that's certain.

Hyp. I can't say about what, but it will be worth our while to be upon our guard.

Don M. I am alarmed.

Hyp. Where is your daughter at this time?

Don M. I think she's pretty safe; but I'll go make her sure.

Flora. Where's her woman?

Don M. I'll be upon her presently; she shall be searched for intelligence: you'll excuse me, gentlemen.

Hyp. Sir, the occasion presses you.

Don M. If I find all safe, I'll return immediately; and then, if you please, we'll run over some old stories of my good friend Fernando. Your servant. [Exit.]

Hyp. Sir, your most humble servant. Trappanti, thou'rt a rare fellow, thou hast an admirable face of brass, and when thou diest I'll have thy whole statue cast all in the same metal. [law.]

Flora. 'Twere pity the rogue was not bred to the Trap. So 'tis, indeed, sir. A man should not praise himself; but if I had been bred to the gown, I dare venture to say, I become a lie as well as any man that wears it, and that's a bold word.

Hyp. Nay, now thou art modest; but, sirrah, we have more work for ye; you must get in with the servants, attack the lady's woman: there, there's ammunition, rogue. (Gives him money.) Now try if you can make a breach into the secrets of the family.

Trap. Ah! sir, I warrant you. I could never yet meet with a woman that was this sort of pistol-proof. I have known a handful of these do more than a barrel of gunpowder. [Exit.]

Flora. Well, what must we do next?

Hyp. Why, now for the lady. I'll be a little brisk upon her, and then—

Flora. Victoria! [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter VILETTA, hastily; DON MANUEL and TRAPPANTI behind, observing her.

Vil. So! with much ado I have given the old don the slip; he has dangled with me through every room in the house, high and low, up stairs and down, as close to my tail as a great boy hankering after one of his mother's maids. Well, now we will see what Monsieur Octavio says. (Takes a letter from her bosom.)

Trap. Hist! there she is, and alone: when the devil has anything to do with a woman, sir, that's his time to take her: stand close. (Apart to Don M.)

Don M. Ah! he's at work already: there's a letter. (Apart.)

Trap. Leave her to me, sir; I'll read it. (Apart.)

Vil. Ah! two pistoles! Well, I'll say that for him, the man knows his business; his letters always come post paid. (While she is reading, Trappanti steals behind, and looks over her shoulder.)

"Dear Viletta,—Convey the enclosed immediately to your mistress; and, as you prize my life, use all possible means to keep the old gentleman from the closet till you are sure she is safe out of the window. Your real friend—"

Trap. (Reading.) "Octavio!"

Vil. Ah! (Shrieks.) [vant.]

Trap. Madam, your ladyship's most humble ser-

Vil. You're very impertinent, methinks, to look over other people's letters.

Trap. Why, I never read a letter in my life without looking it over. [upon this.]

Vil. I don't know any business you had to look

Trap. There's the thing—you not knowing that has put you into this passion.

Vil. You may chance to have your bones broken, Mr. Coxcomb.

Trap. Sweet honeycomb, don't be so waspish; or if I keep your counsel, d'ye see, I don't know why my bones mayn't keep their places; but if I peach, whose bones will pay for it then?

Vil. Ah! the fool says true; I had better wheedle him. (Aside.)

Trap. Don't you love money above anything in the world—except one?

Vil. I except nothing.

Trap. Very good. And pray, how many letters do you expect to be paid for when Octavio has married your mistress, and has no occasion to write to her? While they are lovers, they will always have occasion for a confidant and a go-between; but when they marry—Serviteur! good night vails; our harvest is over: what d'ye think of me now?

Vil. Why, I like what you say very well: but I don't know, my friend, to me—that same face of your's looks like the title-page to a whole volume of roguery. What is it you drive at?

Trap. Money, money, money. Don't you let your mistress marry Octavio. I'll do my best to hinder my master: let you and I lay our heads together to keep them asunder, and so make a penny of them all three.

Vil. Look you, seignior, I'll meet you half way, and confess to you, I had made a rough draught of this project myself: but say I should agree with you to go on upon it, what security can you give me for performance of articles? [in custody.]

Trap. More than bond or judgment—my person

Vil. Ah! that won't do.

Trap. No, my love! why, there's many a sweet bit in it: taste it. (Offers to kiss her; she puts him away.)

Vil. No!

Trap. Faith! you must give me one.

Vil. Indeed, my friend, you are too ugly for me; though I am not handsome myself, I love to play with those that are.

Trap. And yet, methinks, an honest fellow of my size and complexion, in a careless posture, playing the fool thus with his money. (Tosses a purse; she catches it, and he kisses her.)

Vil. Psha! Well, if I must, come, then. To see how a woman may be deceived at first sight of a man.

Trap. Nay, then, take a second thought of me, child. (Kisses her again.)

Don M. Ah! This is laying their heads together, indeed. (Aside.)

Vil. Well, now get you gone; I have a letter to give to my mistress; slip into the garden: I'll come to you presently.

Trap. Is it from Octavio?

Vil. Psha! begone, I say. (Snatches the letter.)

Trap. Hist! (Beckons Don M. who goes softly behind.)

Vil. Madam, madam! Ah!

Don M. Now, strumpet, give me the other letter, or I'll murder you. (Draws.)

Vil. Oh, lud! oh, lud! there, there!

Don M. Now we shall see what my gentleman would be at. (Reads.) "My dear angel,"—Ah! soft and impudent!—"Depend upon me at the garden-door by seven this evening. Pity my impatience, and believe you can never come too soon to the arms of your OCTAVIO." Ah! now would this rampant rogue make no more of debauching my gentlewoman, than the gentlewoman would of him, if he were to debauch her—hold! let's see, what does he say here? Um—um! (Reads to himself.)

Vil. What a stupid wench was I to believe this old fool durst do me any harm! but a fright's the devil! (Aside.)

Don M. (Reads.) Um—um! "Sure she is safe out of the window." Oh! there the mine is to be sprung, then. Now, gentlewoman, what do you think in your conscience I ought to do to ye?

Vil. What I think in my conscience you'll not do to me—make a friend of me. You see, sir, I dare be an enemy.

Don M. Nay, thou dost not want courage, I'll say that for thee: but is it possible anything can make thee honest? [wise?]

Vil. What do you suppose would make me other—

Don M. Money.

Vil. You have nicked it.

Don M. And would the same sum make thee surely one as t'other?

Vil. That I can't say neither: one must be heavier than t'other, or else the scale can't turn.

Don M. Say it be so; would that turn thee into my interest?

Vil. The very minute you turn into mine, sir; judge yourself—here stands Octavio, with a letter, and two pieces to give it to my mistress; there stand you with a hem! and four pieces—where would the letter go, d'ye think?

Don M. There needs no more; I'm convinced, and will trust thee: there's to encourage thee before-hand; (gives her money) and when thou bringest me a letter of Octavio's, I'll double the sum.

Vil. Sir, I'll do it—and will take care he shall write presently. (Aside.)

Don M. Now, as you expect I should believe you, begone, and take no notice of what I have discovered.

Vil. Oh! I am dumb, dumb, dumb, sir. [Exit.]

Don M. So! this was done like a wise general: and now I have taken the counterscarp, there may be some hopes of making the town capitulate. Rosara! (Unlocks the closet.)

Enter ROSARA.

Ros. Did you call me, sir?

Don M. Ay, child: come, be cheerful; what I have to say to you, I'm sure ought to make you so.

Ros. He has certainly made some discovery: Viletta did not cry out for nothing. What shall I do? dissemble. (Aside.)

Don M. In one word, set your heart at rest, for you shall marry Don Philip this very evening,

Ros. That's but short warning for the gentleman, as well as myself; for I don't know that we ever saw one another. How are you sure he will like me?

Don M. Oh! as for that matter, he shall see you presently; and I have made it his interest to like you: but if you are still positively resolved upon Octavio, I'll make but few words—pull off your clothes and go to him.

Ros. My clothes, sir? [with you.]

Don M. Ay, for the gentleman sha'n't have a rag

Ros. I am not in haste to be starved, sir.

Don M. Then let me see you put on your best airs, and receive Don Philip as you should do.

Ros. When do you expect Don Philip, sir?

Don M. Expect him, sir! he has been here this hour. I only staid to get you out of the sullens. He's none of your hum-drums! all life and mettle! Odzooks! he has the courage of a cock; a duel's but a dance to him: he has been at sa, sa, sa! for you already.

Ros. Well, sir, I sha'n't be afraid of his courage, since I see you are resolved he shall be the man. He shall find me a woman, sir; let him win me and wear me as soon as you please.

Don M. Ah! now thou art my own girl; hold but in this humour one quarter of an hour, and I'll toss the other bushel of doubloons into thy portion. Here, bid a—Come, I'll fetch him myself—she's in a rare cue, faith! ah! if he does but nick her now!

[Aside, and exit.]

Ros. Now I have but one card to play; if that don't hit, my hopes are crushed, indeed: if this young spark be not a downright coxcomb, I may have a trick to turn all yet. Dear fortune, give him but common sense, I'll make it impossible for him to like me. Here they come! (Walks carelessly and sings.)

Re-enter DON MANUEL, with HYPOLITA.

SONG.

Divinely fair, so heav'nly form'd!

Such native innocence she wears!

You cannot wonder that I'm charm'd,

Whene'er the lovely maid appears.

Her smiles might warm an anchorite;

Her artless glances teach him sin;

Yet in her soul such charms unite,

As might the coldest stoic win.

Hyp. Madam, I kiss your ladyship's hands: I find, by your gaiety, you are no stranger to my business; perhaps you expected I should have come in with a grave bow and a long speech; but my affair is in a little more haste; therefore, if you please, madam, we'll cut the work short, be thoroughly intimate at the first sight, and see one another's humours in a quarter of an hour, as well as if we had been weary of them this twelvemonth.

Ros. Troth! sir, I think you are very much in the right; the sooner I see you, the sooner I shall know whether I like you or not.

Hyp. Psha! as for that matter, you'll find me a very fashionable husband. I sha'n't expect my wife to be over fond of me.

Ros. But I love to be in the fashion too, sir, in taking the man I have a mind to.

Hyp. Say you so? why, then, take me as soon as you please.

Ros. I only stay for my mind, sir: as soon as ever that comes to me, upon my word I am ready to wait upon you.

Hyp. Well, madam, a quarter of an hour shall break no squares. Sir, if you'll find an occasion to leave us alone, I see we shall come to a right understanding presently.

Don M. I'll do it, sir. Well, child, speak, in thy conscience, is not he a pretty fellow?

Ros. The gentleman's very well, sir; but, methinks, he's a little too young for a husband.

Don M. Young! a fiddle! you'll find him old enough for a wife, I warrant ye! Sir, I must beg your pardon for a moment; but, if you please, in the meantime, I'll leave you my daughter, and so, pray, make the best of her. [Exit.]

Hyp. I thank ye, sir. (Stands some time mute, looks carelessly at Rosara, and smiles as in contempt.) Why, now, methinks, madam, you had as good put on a real smile, for I am doomed to be the happy man, you see.

Ros. So my father says, sir.

Hyp. I'll take his word.

Ros. A bold man!—but he'll break it.

Hyp. He won't.

Ros. He must.

Hyp. Whether he will or no?

Ros. He can't help it now.

Hyp. How so, pray?

Ros. Because he has promised you, you shall marry me ; and he has always promised me I should marry the man I could love.

Hyp. Ay—that is, he would oblige you to love the man you should marry.

Ros. The man that I marry will be sure of my love ; but for the man that marries me—mercy on him.

Hyp. No matter for that, I'll marry you.

Ros. Come, I don't believe you are so ill-natured.

Hyp. Why, dost thou not like me, child?

Ros. Um—No.

Hyp. What's the matter?

Ros. The old fault.

Hyp. What?

Ros. I don't like you.

Hyp. Is that all?

Ros. No.

Hyp. That's hard—the rest.

Ros. That you won't like.

Hyp. I'll stand it—try me.

Ros. Why, then, in short, I like another : another man, sir, has got into my head, and made such work there, you'll never be able to set me to rights as long as you live. What d'ye think of me now, sir? Won't this serve for a reason why you should not marry me?

Hyp. Um! the reason is a pretty smart sort of a reason, truly, but it won't do ; to be short with ye, madam, I have reason to believe I shall be disinherited if I don't marry you.

Ros. And what have you reason to believe you shall be if you do marry me?

Hyp. In the Spanish fashion, I suppose, jealous to a degree.

Ros. You may be in the English fashion, and something else to a degree.

Hyp. Oh! if I have not courage enough to prevent that, madam, let the world think me in the French city fashion, content to a degree. Now, here in Spain, child, we have such things as back rooms, barred windows, hard fare, poison, daggers, bolts, chains, and so forth.

Ros. Ay, sir, and there are such things as bribes, plots, shams, letters, lies, walls, ladders, keys, confidants, and so forth.

Hyp. Eh! a very complete regiment, indeed ; what a world of service might these do in a quarter of an hour, with a woman's courage at the head of 'em! Really, madam, your dress and humour have the prettiest loose French air, something so quality, that let me die, madam, I believe, in a month, I should be apt to poison ye.

Ros. So, it takes! (Aside.) And let me die, sir, I believe I should be apt to deserve it of ye.

Hyp. I shall certainly do't.

Ros. It must be in my breakfast, then; for I should certainly run away before the wedding-dinner came up.

Hyp. That's over-acted, but I'll startle her. (Aside.) Then I must tell you, madam, a Spanish husband may be provoked as well as a wife. As for your inclination, I'll keep your person honest, however; you shall be locked up, and if you don't love me, then, I'll stab ye.

Ros. With what? your words? it must be those you say after the priest, then. You'll be able to do very little else that will reach my heart, I assure ye.

Hyp. Come, come, this humour is as much affected as my own: I could no more bare the qualities you say you have, than I know you are guilty of 'em: your pretty arts, in striving to avoid, have charmed me. At my first view I wooed ye only to secure a sordid fortune, which now I, overjoyed, could part with; nay, with life, with anything, to purchase your unrivalled heart.

Ros. Now I am plunged, indeed. (Aside.) Well, sir, I own you have discovered me; and since you have obliged me to be serious, I now, from my sincerity, protest my heart's already given, from whence no power nor interest shall recall it.

Hyp. I hate my interest, and would owe no power or title but to love.

Ros. If, as you say, you think I find a charm in virtue, you'll know, too, there's a charm in constancy; you ought to scorn me, should I flatter you with hope, since now you are assured I must be false before I can be your's: if what I have said seems cold, or too neglectful of your merit, call it not ingratitude or scorn, but faith unmoved, and justice to the man I love.

Hyp. Well, madam, to let you see I am a friend to love, though love's an enemy to me, give me but a seeming proof that Octavio is the undisputed master of your heart, and I'll forego the power your father's obligations give me, and throw my hopes into his arms with you.

Ros. Sir, you confound me with this goodness. Command me to what proof you please; or if you'll trust to my sincerity, let these tears of joy convince you: here, on my knees, by all my hopes of peace, I swear.

Hyp. Hold! Swear never to make any other your husband, but Octavio.

Ros. I swear! and heaven befriend me as I keep this vow inviolate.

Hyp. Rise, madam, and now receive a secret, which I need not charge you to be careful of, since, as well your quiet as my own depends upon it. A little common prudence between us, in all probability, before night, may make us happy in our separate wishes.

Ros. What mean you, sir? sure you are some angel sent to my deliverance.

Hyp. Truly, madam, I have been often told so; but, like most angels of my kind, there is a mortal man in the world, who I have a great mind should know that I am—but a woman.

Ros. A woman!

Hyp. As arrant a woman from top to toe as ever a man ran mad for.

Ros. Are not you Don Philip?

Hyp. His shadow, madam, no more: I just run before him, nay, and after him, too. Octavio, madam, your lover, is my brother; my name Hypolita; my story you shall know at leisure.

Ros. Hypolita! nay, then, from what you have said, and what I have heard Octavio say of ye, I guess your story: but this was so extravagant a thought!

Hyp. That's true, madam; it—it—it was a little round about, indeed; I might have found a nearer way to Don Philip: but these men are such tetchy things, they can never stay one's time; always in haste, just as they please; now we are to look kind, then grave; now soft, then sincere; so you see, there is such a plague, that—I don't know—one does not care to be rid of them neither.

Ros. A very generous confession!

Hyp. Well, madam, now you know me thoroughly, I hope you'll think me as fit for a husband as another woman.

Ros. Then I must marry ye?

Hyp. Ay, and speedily too; for I expect Don Philip every moment; and if we don't look about us, he will be apt to forbid the bans.

Ros. If he comes, what shall we do?

Hyp. I am provided for him; here comes your father, he's secure. Come, put on a dumb consenting air, and leave the rest to me.

Ros. Well! this getting the better of my wise papa, won't be the least part of my satisfaction.

Re-enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. So, son! how does the battle go now? Have ye cannonaded stoutly? Does she cry quarter?

Hyp. My dear father, let me embrace you; my life's too poor to make you a return. You have given me an empire, sir, I would not change to be grand seignior.

Don M. Ah! rogue, he has done it; he has done it! he has her! Ha! is't not so, my little champion?

Hyp. Victoria, sir, the town's my own. Look here! and here, sir; thus have I been plundering this half hour; and thus, and thus, and thus, till my lips ache again. (Kisses her.)

Don M. Ah! give me the great chair; I can't bear my joy. You rampant rogue, could not ye give the poor girl a quarter of an hour's warning?

Hyp. My charmer! (Embraces her.)

Don M. Ah! my cares are over.

Hyp. Oh! I told ye, sir, hearts and towns are never too strong for a surprise.

Don M. Pr'ythee, be quiet; I hate the sight of ye. Rosara! come hither, you wicked thing, come hither, I say.

Ros. I am glad to see you so well pleased, sir.

Don M. Oh! I cannot live—I cannot live; it pours upon me like a torrent; I am as full as a bumper; it runs over at my eyes, I shall choke. Answer me two questions, and kill me outright.

Ros. Anything that will make you more pleased, sir. [gentleman?

Don M. Are you positively resolved to marry this

Ros. Sir, I am convinced 'tis the first match that can make me happy.

Don M. I am the miserablest dog alive; and I warrant you are willing to marry him to-morrow morning, if I should ask you?

Ros. Sooner, sir, if you think it necessary.

Don M. Oh! this malicious jade has a mind to destroy me all at once: ye cursed toad! how did you do to get in with her so? (To Hypolita.)

Ros. Come, sir, take heart; your joy won't be always so troublesome. [as long as I live.

Don M. You lie, hussy! I shall be plagued with it

Hyp. You must not live above two hours, then. (Aside.)

Don M. I warrant this raking rogue will get her with child, too; I shall have a young squab Spaniard upon my lap, that will so grandpapa me!—

Enter a Servant.

Well, what want you, gloomy face?

Serv. Sir, here's a gentleman desires to speak with you; he says he comes from Seville.

Don M. From Seville! ha! pr'ythee, let him go thither again. Tell him I am a little busy about being overjoyed.

Hyp. My life on't, sir, this must be the fellow that my servant told you of, employed by Octavio.

Don M. Very likely.

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Sir, sir—News, news!

Don M. Ay, this fellow has a good merry face now—I like him. Well! what dost thou say, lad? But hold, sirrah! has anybody told thee how it is Trap. Sir! [with me?

Don M. Do you know, puppy, that I am ready to cry?

Trap. Cry, sir! for what?

Don M. Joy, joy! you whelp! my cares are over; madam's to marry your master, sirrah; and I am as wet with joy as if I had been thrown into a sea of good luck. Why don't you cry, dog?

Trap. Uh! well, sir, I do; but now, if you please, let me tell you my business.

Don M. Well, what's the matter, sirrah?

Trap. Nay, no great matter, sir, only—Slylooks is come, that's all. [ha!

Don M. Slylooks! what, the bamboozler? Ha, Trap. He, sir, he.

Don M. I'm glad of it, faith—now I shall have a little diversion to moderate my joy; I'll wait on the gentleman myself: don't you be out of the say, son, I'll be with ye, presently. Oh! my jaws! this fit will carry me off. Ye dear toad, good b'ye.

[Exit, with Trappanti.

Hyp. Ha, ha, ha! the old gentleman's as merry as a fiddle; how he'll start when a string snaps in the middle of his tune! [lieve.

Ros. At least we shall make him change it, I be-

Hyp. That we shall; and here comes one that's to play upon him.

Enter FLORA, hastily.

Flora. Don Philip! where are ye? I must needs speak with ye. Begging your ladyship's pardon, madam. (Whispers to Hypolita.) Stand to your arms, the enemy's at the gate, faith. But I've just thought of a sure card to win the lady into our party. [with?

Ros. Who can this youth be, she is so familiar

Hyp. I like your advice so well, that to tell ye the truth, I have made bold to take it before you gave it me. Come, I'll introduce ye. (To Flora.)

Flora. Then the business is done.

Hyp. Madam, if your ladyship pleases. (To Ros.)

Ros. Is this gentleman your friend, sir?

Hyp. This friend, madam, is my gentlewoman, at your service.

Ros. Gentlewoman! what, are we all going into breeches, then?

Flora. That used to be my post, madam, when I wore a needle: but now I have got a sword by my side, I shall be proud to be your ladyship's humble servant.

Ros. Troth! I think it's a pity you should either of you ever part with your swords: I never saw a prettier couple of adroit cavaliers in my life. Come ladies—gentlemen, I beg your pardon. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter DON MANUEL and DON PHILIP.

Don M. Well, sir, and so you were robbed of your portmanteau, you say, at Toledo, in which were all your letters and writings relating to your marriage with my daughter, and that's the reason you are come without them?

Don P. Sir, I was not robbed of the regard I owe my father's friend: that, sir, I have brought with me, and it would have been ill manners not to have paid it at my first arrival.

Don M. Ah! how smooth the spark is. (Aside.) Well, sir, I am pretty considerably glad to see you: but I hope you'll excuse me, if in a matter of this consequence, I seem a little cautious.

Don P. Sir, I sha'n't propose any immediate progress in my affair, till you receive fresh advice from my father; in the meantime, I shall think myself obliged by the bare freedom of your house, and such entertainment as you'd at least afford a common stranger.

Don M. Impudent rogue! the freedom of my house! yes, that he may be always at hand to secure the main chance for my friend Octavio; but now I'll have a touch of the bamboozle with him. (Aside.) Lookye, sir; while I see nothing to contradict what you say you are, d'ye see, you shall find me a gentleman.

Don P. So my father told me, sir.

Don M. But then, on the other hand, d'ye see, a man's honesty is not always written in his face; and (begging your pardon,) if you should prove a d—d rogue now, d'ye see—

Don P. Sir, I can't, in reason, take anything ill that proceeds only from your caution.

Don M. Civil rascal! (Aside.) No, no, as you say, I hope you won't take it ill, neither; for how do I know, you know, but what you tell me (begging your pardon again, sir,) may be all a lie?

Don P. Another man, indeed, might say the same to you; but I shall take it kindly, sir, if you suppose me a villain no oftener than you have occasion to suspect me.

Don M. Sir, you speak like a man of honour, 'tis confessed; but (begging your pardon again, sir,) so may a rascal, too, sometimes.

Don P. But a man of honour, sir, can never speak like a rascal.

Don M. Why, then, with your honour's leave, sir, is there nobody here in Madrid that knows you?

Don P. Sir, I never saw Madrid till within these two hours, though there is a gentleman in town that knew me intimately at Seville; I met him by accident at the inn where I alighted; he's known here; if it will give you any present satisfaction, I believe I could easily produce him to vouch for me.

Don M. At the inn, say ye, did you meet this gentleman? What's his name, pray?

Don P. Octavio Cruzado.

Don M. Ha! my bully confessor; this agrees, word for word, with honest Trappanti's intelligence. (Aside.) Well, sir, and pray what does he give you for this job?

Don P. Job, sir?

Don M. Ay, that is, do you undertake it out of good fellowship? or are you to have a sort of fellow-feeling in the matter?

Don P. Sir, if you believe me to be the son of Don Fernando, I must tell ye your manner of receiving me is what you ought not to suppose can please him, or I can thank you for. If you think me an impostor, I'll ease you of the trouble of suspecting me, and leave your house till I can bring better proofs who I am.

Don M. Do so, friend; and, in the meantime, d'ye see, pray give my humble service to the politician, and tell him that to your certain knowledge, the old fellow, the old rogue, and the old put, d'ye see, knows how to bamboozle as well as himself.

Don P. Politician, and bamboozle! Pray, sir, let me understand you, that I may know how to answer you.

Don M. Come, come, don't be discouraged, friend; sometimes, you know, the strongest wits must fail; you have an admirable head, 'tis confessed, with as able a face to it as ever stuck upon two shoulders; but who the devil can help ill luck? for it happens at this time, d'ye see, that it won't do.

Don P. Won't do, sir?

Don M. Nay, if you won't understand me now, here comes an honest fellow now, that will speak you point blank to the matter.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Come hither, friend: dost thou know this gentleman?

Trap. Bless me, sir, is it you? Sir, this is my old master I lived with at Seville.

Don P. I remember thee: thy name's Trappanti; thou wert my servant when I first went to travel.

Trap. Ay, sir, and about twenty months after you came home, too.

Don P. You see, sir, this fellow knows me.

Don M. Oh! I never questioned it in the least, sir. Pr'ythee, what's this worthy gentleman's name, friend?

Trap. Sir, your honour has heard me talk of him a thousand times; his name, sir, his name's Guzman; his father, sir, old Don Guzman, is the most eminent lawyer in Seville; was the very person that drew up the settlement and articles of my master's marriage with your honour's daughter: this gentleman knows all the particulars, as well as if he had drawn 'em up himself. But, sir, I hope there's no mistake in 'em that may defer the marriage?

Don P. Confusion!

Don M. Now, sir, what sort of answer d'ye think fit to make me?

Don P. Now, sir, I'm obliged in honour not to leave your house, till I at least have seen the villain that calls himself Don Philip, that has robbed me; and would you, sir, of your honour, and your daughter. As for this rascal—

Trap. Sir, I demand protection. (Runs behind Don Manuel.)

Don M. Hold! sir, since you are so brisk, and in my own house, too, call your master, friend; you'll find we have swords within can match you.

Trap. Ay, sir, I may chance to send you one will take down your courage. [Exit.]

Don P. I ask your pardon, sir; I must confess, the villany I saw designed against my father's friend had transported me beyond good manners: but be assured, sir, use me henceforward as you please, I will detect it, though I lose my life. Nothing shall affront me now, till I have proved myself your friend, indeed, and Don Fernando's son.

Don M. Nay, lookye, sir, I will be very civil too; I won't say a word; you shall e'en squabble it out by yourselves: not but at the same time thou art, to me, the merriest fellow that ever I saw in my life.

Re-enter TRAPPANTI, with HYPOLITA and FLORA.

Hyp. Who's this that dares usurp my name, and calls himself Don Philip de las Torres?

Don P. Ha! this is a young competitor, indeed. (Aside.)

Flora. Is this the gentleman, sir?

Don M. Yes, yes, that's he. Ha, ha!

Don P. Yes, sir, I'm the man, who, but this morning, lost that name upon the road. I'm informed an impudent young rascal has picked it out of some writings in the portmanteau he robbed me of, and has brought it hither before me. D'ye know any such, sir?

Flora. The fellow really does it very well, sir. (Apart to Don M.)

Don M. Oh! to a miracle. (Apart.)

Hyp. Pr'ythee, friend, how long dost thou expect thy impudence will keep thee out of gaol? Could not the coxcomb that put thee upon this, inform thee, too, that this gentleman was a magistrate?

Don M. Well said, my little champion.

Don P. Now, in my opinion, child, that might as well put thee in mind of thy own condition; for suppose thy wit and impudence should so far succeed, as to let thee ruin this gentleman's family, by really marrying his daughter, thou canst not but know 'tis impossible thou shouldst enjoy her long: a very few days must unavoidably discover thee; in the meantime, if thou wilt spare me the trouble of exposing thee, and generously confess thy roguery, thus far I'll forgive thee; but if thou still proceedest upon his credulity to a marriage with the lady, don't flatter thyself that all her fortune shall buy off my evidence; for I'm bound in honour, as well as law, to hang thee for the robbery.

Hyp. Sir, you are extremely kind.

Flora. Very civil, egad!

Hyp. But mayn't I presume, my dear friend, this wheedle was offered as a trial of this gentleman's credulity? Ha, ha, ha!

Don M. Indeed, my friend, 'tis a very shallow one. Canst thou think I'm such a sot as to believe, that if he knew 'twere in thy power to hang him, he would not have run away at the first sight of thee?

Trap. Ay, sir, he must be a dull rogue, indeed, that would not run away from a halter. Ha, ha, ha! (All laugh.)

Don P. Sir, I ask your pardon: I begin now to be a little sensible of my folly. I perceive this gentleman has done his business with you effectually.

ally: however, sir, the duty I owe my father, obliges me not to leave your cause, though I leave your house immediately; when you see me next, you'll know Don Philip from a rascal.

Don M. Ah! 'twill be the same thing, if I know a rascal from Don Philip: but, if you please, sir, never give yourself any further trouble in this business; for what you have done, d'ye see, is so far from interrupting my daughter's marriage, that, with this gentleman's leave, I'm resolved to finish it this very hour; so that when you see your friend, the politician, you must tell him you had cursed luck, that's all. Ha, ha, ha!

Don P. Very well, sir; I may have better when I see you next.

Hyp. Lookye! sir, since your undertaking (though you designed it otherwise) has promoted my happiness, thus far I pass it by, though I question if a man, that stoops to do such base injuries, dares defend 'em with his sword. However, now, at least, you're warned; but be assured your next attempt—

Don P. Will startle you, my spark: I'm afraid you'll be a little humbler when you are hand-cuffed. Though you won't take my word against him, sir, perhaps another magistrate may my oath; which, because I see his marriage is in haste, I am obliged to make immediately: if he can out-face the law, too, I shall be content to be the coxcomb, then, you think me. [Exit.]

Don M. Ah! poor fellow! he's resolved to carry it off with a good face, however. Ha, ha!

Trap. Ay, sir, that's all he has for't, indeed.

Hyp. Trappanti, follow him, and do as I directed. (Apart to Trap.)

Trap. I warrant ye, sir. [Exit.]

Don M. Ha! my little champion, let me kiss thee; thou hast carried the day like a hero! man nor woman, nothing can stand before thee. I'll make thee monarch of my daughter, immediately.

Hyp. That's the Indies, sir.

Don M. Well said, my lad—Oh! my heart's going to dance again: pr'ythee, let's in before it gets the better of me, and give the bride an account of thy victory. [Exeunt.]

Enter OCTAVIO, with a letter.

Oct. Rosara false! distraction! Sure this letter must be but artifice, a humour, to try how far my love can bear: and yet, methinks, she can't but know the impudence of my young rival, and her father's importunity, are too pressing to allow her any time to fool away; and if she were really false, she could not take a pride in confessing it. Death! I know not what to think; the sex is all a riddle, and we are the fools that crack our brains to expound them. [Enter VILETTA.] Now, dear Viletta!

Vil. Sir, she begs your pardon; they have just sent for the priest; but they will be glad to see you about an hour hence, as soon as the wedding's

Oct. Viletta! [over.]

Vil. Sir, she says, in short, she can't possibly speak with you now, for she's just going to be married.

Oct. Death! daggers! blood! confusion! and ten thousand furies!

Vil. Heyday! what's all this for?

Oct. My brains are turned, Viletta.

Vil. Ay, by my troth, so one would think, if one could but believe you had any at all; if you have three grains, I'm sure you can't but know her compliance with this match must give her a little liberty; and can you suppose she'd desire to see you an hour hence, if she did not design to make use of it?

Oct. Don't flatter me, Viletta.

Vil. Faith, sir, (I'll be very plain,) you are, to me, the dullest person I ever saw in my life; but if you have a mind, I'll tell her you won't come.

Oct. No, don't say so, Viletta.

Vil. Then pray, sir, do as she bids you; don't stay here to spoil your own sport: you'll have the old gentleman come thundering down upon ye by-and-by, and then we shall have ye at your ten thousand furies again. Hist! here's company; good b'ye. [Exit.]

Re-enter DON PHILIP, with his sword drawn, and TRAPPANTI.

Don P. Come, sir, there's no retreating now; this you must justify.

Trap. Sir, I will, and a great deal more: but pray, sir, give me leave to recover my courage; I protest, the keen looks of that instrument have quite frightened it away. Pray put it up, sir.

Don P. Nay, to let thee see I had rather be thy friend than enemy, I'll bribe thee to be honest: discharge thy conscience like a man, and I'll engage to make these five, ten pieces.

Enter a Servant.

Trap. Sir, your business will be done effectually.

Don P. Here, friend; will ye tell your master I desire to speak with him? [Exit Servant.]

Oct. Don Philip!

Don P. Octavio! This is fortunate, indeed, the only place in the world I would have wished to have found you in.

Oct. What's the matter?

Don P. You'll see presently; but, pr'ythee, how stands your affair with your mistress?

Oct. The devil take me if I can tell ye. I don't know what to make of her; about an hour ago she was for scaling walls to come at me, and this minute—whip, she's going to marry the stranger I told you of; nay, confesses, too, it is with her own consent; and yet begs, by all means, to see me as soon as her wedding's over. Isn't it very pretty?

Re-enter a Servant.

Don P. Something gay, indeed.

Serv. Sir, my master will wait on you presently. [Exit.]

Oct. But the plague on't is, my love cannot bear this jesting. Well now, how stands your affair? Have you seen your mistress yet?

Don P. No; I can't get admittance to her.

Oct. How so?

Don P. When I came to pay my duty, here, to the old gentleman—

Oct. Here!

Don P. Ay; I found an impudent young rascal here before me, that had taken my name upon him, robbed me of my portmanteau, and, by virtue of some papers there, knew all my concerns to a tittle; he has told a plausible tale to her father, faced him down that I'm an impostor, and if I don't this minute prevent him, is going to marry the lady.

Oct. Death and hell! (Aside.) What sort of fellow was this rascal?

Don P. A little pert coxcomb; by his impudence and dress, I guess him to be some French page.

Oct. Confusion! my friend at last my rival, too. Yet hold! my rival is my friend, he owns he has not seen her yet. (Aside.)

Don P. You seem concerned.

Oct. Undone for ever, unless dear Philip's still my friend.

Don P. What's the matter?

Oct. Let me conjure ye, by all the ties of honour, friendship, and pity, never to attempt her more!

Don P. You amaze me! [dote on.]

Oct. 'Tis the same dear creature I so passionately

Don P. Is't possible? Nay, then, be easy in thy thoughts, Octavio; and now I dare confess the folly of my own: I'm not sorry thou'rt my rival here. In spite of all my weak philosophy, I must own the secret wishes of my soul are still Hypolita's. I know not why, but—I can't help thinking that my fortune still resolves, spite of her cruelty, to make me one day happy. [your's.]

Oct. Quit but Rosara, I'll engage she shall be

Don P. Not only that, but will assist you with my life to gain her: I shall easily excuse myself to my father for not marrying the mistress of my dearest friend.

Oct. Dear Philip, let me embrace ye. But how shall we manage the rascal of an impostor? Suppose you run immediately, and swear the robbery against him?

Don P. I was just going about it, but my accidental meeting with this fellow has luckily prevented me; who, you must know, has been chief engineer in the contrivance against me; but between threats, bribes, and promises, has confessed the whole roguery, and is now ready to swear it against him: so, because I understood the spark is very near his marriage, I thought this would be the best and soonest way to detect him.

Oct. That's right! the least delay might have lost all; besides, I am here to strengthen his evidence, for I can swear that you are the true Don Philip.

Don P. Right! [quite wrong.]

Trap. Sir, with humble submission, that will be

Oct. Why so?

Trap. Because, sir, the old gentleman is substantially convinced that 'tis you who have put Don Philip upon laying his pretended claim to his daughter, purely to defer the marriage, that in the meantime you might get an opportunity to run away with her; for which reason, sir, you'll find your evidence will but fly in your face, and hasten the match with your rival.

Don P. Ha! there's reason in that; all your endeavours will but confirm his jealousy of me.

Oct. What would you have me do?

Trap. Don't appear at the trial, sir.

Don P. By no means; rather wait a little in the street: be within call, and leave the management to me.

Oct. Be careful, dear Philip.

Don P. I always used to be more fortunate in serving my friend than myself.

Oct. But, harkye! here lives an alguazil at the next house; suppose I should send him to you, to secure the spark in the meantime?

Don P. Do so; we must not lose a moment.

Oct. I won't stir from the door.

Don P. You'll soon hear of me; away.

[Exit Octavio.]

Trap. So now I have divided the enemy, there can be no great danger if it should come to a battle. (Aside.) Basta! here comes our party.

Don P. Stand aside till I call for you. (Trappanti retires.)

Re-enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. Well, sir! what service have you to command me now, pray?

Don P. Now, sir, I hope my credit will stand a little fairer for you; all I beg is but your patient hearing.

Don M. Well, sir, you shall have it.—Here he comes, bring him to trial as soon as you please.

Re-enter FLORA and HYPOLITA.

Flora. So Trappanti has succeeded; he's come without the officers. (Apart to Hypolita.)

Hyp. Hearing, sir, you were below, I didn't care to disturb the family by putting the officers to the trouble of a needless search; let me see your warrant, I'm ready to obey it.

Don M. Ay, where's your officer?

Flora. I thought to have seen him march in state, with an alguazil before him.

Don P. I was afraid, sir, upon second thoughts, your business would not stay for a warrant, though 'tis possible I may provide for you, for I think this gentleman's a magistrate: in the meantime—Oh! here, I have prevailed with an alguazil to wait upon ye.

Enter an Alguazil.

Alg. Did you send for me, sir?

Don P. Ay, secure that gentleman.

Don M. Hold, hold! sir, all things in order; this gentleman is yet my guest; let me be the first acquainted with his crime, and then I shall better know how he deserves to be treated; and that we may have no hard words upon one another, if you please, sir, let me first talk with you in private. (They whisper.)

Hyp. Undone! that fool Trappanti, or that villain, I know not which, has at least mistaken or betrayed me. Ruined, past redemption! (Apart to Flora.)

Flora. Death! what d'ye mean? that hanging look were enough to confirm a suspicion; bear up, for shame! (Apart.)

Hyp. Impossible! I am dashed, confounded; if thou hast any courage left, shew it quickly; go speak, before my fears betray me. (Apart.)

Don M. If you can make this appear by any witness, sir, I confess 'twill surprise me, indeed.

Flora. Ay, sir, if you have any witnesses, we desire you'd produce 'em.

Don P. Sir, I have a witness at your service, and a substantial one. Hey! Trappanti! [Re-enter TRAPPANTI.] Now, sir, what think ye?

Hyp. Ha! the rogue winks: then there's life again. (Aside.) Is this your witness, sir?

Don P. Yes, sir; this poor fellow at last, it seems, happens to be honest enough to confess himself a rogue, and your accomplice.

Hyp. Ha, ha!

Don P. Ha, ha! You are very merry, sir.

Don M. Nay, there's a jest between ye, that's certain. But come, friend, what say you to the business? Have ye any proof to offer upon oath, that this gentleman is the true Don Philip, and consequently this other an impostor?

Don P. Speak boldly. [do speak?]

Trap. Ay, sir; but shall I come to no harm if I

Don M. Let it be the truth, and I'll protect thee.

Trap. Are you sure I shall be safe, sir?

Don M. I'll give thee my word of honour; speak boldly to the question.

Trap. Well, sir, since I must speak, then, in the first place, I desire your honour will be pleased to command the officer to secure that gentleman.

Don M. How, friend?

Don P. Secure me, rascal?

Trap. Sir, if I can't be protected, I shall never be able to speak. [friend?]

Don M. I warrant thee. What is it you say,

Trap. Sir, as I was just now crossing the street, this gentleman, with a sneer in his face, takes me by the hand, claps five pistoles in my palm, (here they are,) shuts my fist close upon 'em; "My dear friend," says he, "you must do me a piece of service:" upon which, sir, I bows me him to the ground, and desired him to open his case.

Don P. What means the rascal?

Don M. Sir, I am as much amazed as you; but pray let's hear him, that we may know his meaning.

Trap. So, sir, upon this he runs me over a long story of a sham and a flam he had just contrived, he said, to defer my master's marriage only for two days.

Don P. Confusion!

Flora. Nay, pray, sir, let's hear the evidence.

Trap. Upon the close of the matter, sir, I found at last by his eloquence, that the whole business depended upon my bearing a little false witness against my master.

Hyp. Oh, ho!

Trap. Upon this, sir, I began to demur: "Sir," says I, "this business will never hold water; don't let me undertake it, I must beg your pardon ;” gave him the negative shrug, and was for sneaking off with the fees in my pocket.

Don M. Very well!

Don P. Villain!

Flora and Hyp. Ha, ha, ha!

Trap. Upon this, sir, he catches me fast hold by the collar, whips out his poker, claps it within half an inch of my guts: “Now, dog!” says he, “you shall do it, or within two hours rot upon the dunghill you came from.”

Don P. Sir, if there be any faith in mortal man—

Don M. Nay, nay, one at a time; you shall be heard presently. Go on, friend. (To Trappanti.)

Trap. Having me at this advantage, sir, I began to think my wit would do me more service than my courage; so prudently pretended out of fear to comply with his threats, and swallow the perjury: but now, sir, being under protection and at liberty of conscience, I have honesty enough, you see, to tell you the whole truth of the matter.

Don M. Ay, this is evidence, indeed!

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Don P. Dog! Villain! Did not you confess to me that this gentleman picked you up, not three hours ago, at the same inn where I alighted? that he had owned his stealing my portmanteau at Toledo? that if he succeeded to marry the lady, you were to have a considerable sum for your pains, and these two were to share the rest of her fortune between them?

Trap. Oh, lud! oh, lud! sir, as I hope to die in my bed, these are the very words: he threatened to stab me if I wouldn’t swear against my master: I told him, at first, sir, I was not fit for his business: I was never good at a lie in my life.

Alg. Nay, sir, I saw this gentleman’s sword at his breast, out of my window.

Trap. Lookye there, sir!

Don P. D——n!

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Don M. Really, my friend, thou’rt almost turned fool in this business. If thou hadst prevailed upon this wretch to perjure himself, couldst thou think I should not have detected him? You may go, friend. [Exit Alguazil.]

Flora. Ha, ha!

Don P. Sir, you’re imposed on: defer the marriage but an hour.

Don M. Ay, and in half that time, I suppose, you are in hopes to defer it altogether.

Don P. Perdition seize me, if I have any hope or thought, but that of serving you.

Don M. Nay, now thou art a downright distracted man. Dost thou expect I should take thy bare word, when here were two honest fellows that have just proved thee in a lie to thy face?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, the priest is come.

Don M. Is he so? Then, sir, if you please, since you see you can do me no further service, I believe it may be time for you to go. Come, son, now let’s wait upon the bride, and put an end to this gentleman’s trouble altogether. [Exit.]

Hyp. Sir, I’ll wait on ye.

Don P. Confusion! I’ve undone my friend. (Walks about.)

Flora. Trappanti! rogue, this was a masterpiece. (Apart.)

Trap. Sir, I believe it won’t be mended in haste.

[Apart. Exeunt Flora and Trappanti.]

Hyp. Sir!

Don P. Ha! alone! if we’re not prevented now— (Aside.) Well, sir—

Hyp. I suppose you don’t think the favours you have designed me, are to be put up without satisfaction; therefore, I shall expect to see you early to-morrow, near the Prado, with your sword in your hand: in the meantime, sir, I’m a little more in haste to be the lady’s humble servant than your’s. (Going.) [such easy terms.]

Don P. Hold! sir, you and I can’t part upon Hyp. Sir!

Don P. You’re not so near the lady, sir, perhaps, as you imagine. (Locks the door.)

Hyp. What d’ye mean?

Don P. Speak softly.

Hyp. Ha!

Don P. Come, sir—draw!

Hyp. My ruin now has caught me; this was the very spite of fortune. (Aside.)

Don P. Come, sir, my time’s but short.

Hyp. And mine’s too precious to be lost on anything but love; besides, this is no proper place, To-morrow, sir, I shall find a better.

Don P. No, now, sir, if you please—Draw, villain, or expect such usage as I am sure Don Philip would not bear.

Hyp. A lover, sir, may bear anything to make sure of his mistress; you know it is not fear that—

Don P. No evasion, sir; either this moment confess your villany, your name, and fortune, or expect no mercy.

Hyp. Nay, then—Within there!

Don P. Move but a step, or dare to raise thy voice beyond a whisper, and this minute is thy last. (Seizes her, and holds a sword to her breast.)

Hyp. Sir! (Trembling.)

Don P. Villain! be quick, confess, or—

Hyp. Hold, sir! I own I dare not fight with you.

Don P. No, I see thou art too poor a villain; therefore, be speedy, as thou hopest I’ll spare thy life.

Hyp. Nay, then, sir—Mercy! mercy! (Throws herself at his feet.) And, since I must confess, have pity on my youth, have pity on my love!

Don P. Thy love! What art thou? Speak.

Hyp. Unless your generous compassion spares me, sure the most wretched youth that ever felt the pangs and torments of a successful passion.

Don P. Nay, then, I must forgive thee; (raises her) for I have known, too well, the misery not to pity—anything in love. Yet hold—nor flatter thy fond hopes too far: you must defer your marriage with this lady.

Hyp. Sir, on my knees.

Don P. Expect no more from me; either comply this moment, or my sword shall force thee.

Hyp. Consider, sir—

[name and family.]

Don P. Nay, then, discover quick! Tell me thy

Hyp. Hold! sir—

Don P. Speak, or thou diest.

Hyp. Sir, I will—(A noise at the door.) Ha! they are entering. Oh! for a moment’s courage! Come on, sir. (Breaks from him and draws, retiring till DON MANUEL, FLORA, TRAPPANTI, and Servants rush in and part them.)

Don M. Knock him and down! Force him out of the room there; call an officer; in the meantime, secure him in the cellar.

Don P. Hear me but one word, sir!

Don M. Stop his mouth—out with him. [They hurry him off.] Come, dear son, be pacified.

Hyp. A villain!

Flora. Why should he be concerned, now he’s secure? Such a rascal would but contaminate the sword of a man of honour.

Hyp. I am sorry, sir, such a fellow should have it in his power to disturb me; but—

Enter ROSARA.

Don M. Look! here’s my daughter in a fright to see for you.

Hyp. Then I’m composed again.

Ros. I heard fighting here! I hope you are not wounded, sir? (To Hyp.) [heal.]

Hyp. I have no wound but what the priest can

Don M. Ah! well said, my little champion!

Hyp. Oh! madam, I have such a terrible escape to tell you. (Apart to Rosara.)

Ros. Truly, I began to be afraid I should lose my little husband. (Apart.)

Hyp. Husband, quotha! Get me but once safe out of these breeches, if ever I wear 'em again—(Apart.)

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. What, in the name of roguery, can this new master of mine be? He's either a fool or bewitched, that's positive. First, he gives me fifty pieces for helping him to marry the lady; and as soon as the wedding is over, claps me twenty more into the other hand, to help him to get rid of her. Nay, not only that, but gives me a strict charge to observe his directions, in being evidence against him as an impostor, to refund all the lies I have told in his service, to sweep him clear out of my conscience, and now to swear the robbery against him! What the bottom of this can be, I must confess, 'does a little puzzle my wit. There's but one way in the world I can solve it: he must certainly have some secret reason to hang himself, that he's ashamed to own, and so was resolved first to be married, that his friends might not wonder at the occasion. But here he comes, with his noose in his hand.

Enter HYPOLITA and ROSARA.

Hyp. Trappanti, go to Don Pedro, he has business with you.

Trap. Yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Ros. Who's Don Pedro, pray?

Hyp. Flora, madam; he knows her yet by no other name. Where's your father, madam?

Ros. I saw him go towards his closet; I believe he's gone to fetch you part of my fortune; he seemed in mighty good humour.

Hyp. We must be sure to keep it up as high as we can, that he may be the more stunned when he falls.

Ros. With all my heart; methinks I am possessed with the very spirit of disobedience. Now could I, in the humour I am in, consent to any mischief that would but heartily plague my old gentleman.

Enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. Ah! my little conqueror! let me embrace thee—That ever I should live to see this day! this most triumphant day, this day of all days in my life!

Hyp. Ay, and of my life, too, sir. (Embraces.)

Don M. Ay, my cares are over. Now I've nothing to do but to think of the other world; for I've done all my business in this: got as many children as I could; and now I'm grown old, have set a young couple to work. Lookye here, children, I have brought you some baubles that will make you merry as long as you live; twelve thousand pistoles are the least value of 'em; and the rest of your fortune shall be paid in the best Barbary gold to-morrow morning.

Hyp. Ay, sir, this is speaking like a father! this is encouragement indeed!

Don M. Much good may do thy heart and soul with 'em; and heaven bless you together. I've had a great deal of care and trouble to bring it about, children; but, thank my stars, 'tis over, now—Now I may sleep with my doors open, and never have my slumbers broken with the fear of rogues and rivals.

Ros. Don't interrupt him, and see how far his humour will carry him? (Apart to Hypolita.)

Don M. But there is no joy lasting in this world; we must all die when we have done our best; sooner or later, old or young, prince or peasant, high or low, kings, lords, and—common w—s, must die! Nothing certain; we are forced to buy one comfort with the loss of another. Now I've married my child, I've lost my companion—I've parted with my girl! Her heart's gone another way now; she'll forget her old father! I shall never have her wake me more, like a cheerful lark, with her pretty songs in a morning. I shall have nobody to chat at dinner with me now, or take up a godly book and read me to sleep in an afternoon. Ah! these comforts are all gone now! (Weeps.)

Hyp. How very near the extreme of one passion is to another! Now he is tired with joy, till he is downright melancholy. (Aside.)

Ros. What's the matter, sir?

Don M. Ah! my child! now it comes to the test, methinks I don't know how to part with thee.

Ros. Oh! sir, we shall be better friends than ever.

Don M. Uh! uh! shall we? Wilt thou come and see the old man now and then? Well, heaven bless thee, give me a kiss—I must kiss thee at parting! Be a good girl, use thy husband well, make an obedient wife, and I shall die contented.

Hyp. Die, sir! Come, come, you have a great while to live. Hang these melancholy thoughts, they are the worst company in the world at a wedding. Consider, sir, we are young; if you would oblige us, let us have a little life and mirth, a jubilee to-day at least; stir your servants, call in your neighbours, let me see your whole family mad for joy, sir.

Don M. Ha! shall we be merry, then?

Hyp. Merry, sir! ah! as beggars at a feast. What, shall a dull Spanish custom tell me, when I am the happiest man in the kingdom, I sha'n't be as mad as I have a mind to? Let me see the face of nothing to-day but revels, friends, feasts, and music, sir.

Don M. Ah! thou shalt have thy humour! thou shalt have thy humour! Hey! within there! rogues! dogs! slaves! where are my rascals? Ah! my joy flows again; I can't bear it.

Enter several Servants.

Serv. Did you call, sir?

Don M. Call, sir! ay, sir; what's the reason you are not all out of your wits, sir? Don't you know that your young mistress is married, scoundrels?

1 Serv. Yes, sir, and we are all ready to be mad, as soon as your honour will please to give any distracted orders. [couragement.]

Hyp. You see, sir, they only want a little en-

Don M. Ah! there shall be nothing wanting this day, if I were sure to beg for it all my life after. Here, sirrah, cook! look into the Roman history, see what Mark Anthony had for supper, when Cleopatra first treated him with chere entiere: rogue, let me have a repast that will be six times as expensive and provoking—Go.—And, d'ye hear? One of you step to Monsieur Vendevin, the king's butler, for the same wine that his majesty reserves for his own drinking; tell him he shall have his price for it.

1 Serv. How much will you please to have, sir?

Don M. Too much, sir! I'll have everything upon the outside of enough to-day. Go you, sirrah, run to my nephew, Don Lewis, give my service, and tell him to bring all his family along with him.

Hyp. Ay, sir, this is as it should be! now it begins to look like a wedding.

Don M. Ah! we'll make all the hair in the world stand an end at our joy. [your cue.]

Hyp. Here comes Flora; now, madam, observe

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Your servant, gentlemen; I need not wish you joy, you have it, I see: Don Philip, I must needs speak with you.

Hyp. Psha! pr'ythee, don't plague me with business at such a time as this.

Flora. My business won't be deferred, sir.

Hyp. Sir!

Flora. I suppose you guess it, sir; and I must tell you, I take it ill it was not done before.

Hyp. What d'ye mean?

Flora. Your ear, sir. (They whisper.)

Don M. What's the matter now, 'tro?

Ros. The gentleman seems very free, methinks.

Don M. Troth, I don't like it.

Ros. Don't disturb 'em, sir; we shall know all presently.

Hyp. But what have you done with Don Philip? (Apart to Flora.)

Flora. I drew the servants out of the way, while he made his escape; what we do we must do quickly: come, come, put on your fighting face, and I'll be with 'em presently. (Aside.)

Hyp. (Aloud.) Sir, I have offered you very fair; if you don't think so, I have married the lady, and take your course.

Flora. Sir, our contract was a full third; a third part's my right, and I'll have it, sir.

Don M. Eh!

Hyp. Then I must tell you, sir, since you are pleased to call it your right, you shall not have it.

Flora. Not, sir?

Hyp. No, sir. Lookye! don't put on your pert airs to me; egad! I shall use you very scurvily.

Flora. Use me!—You little son of a w—, draw.

Hyp. Oh! sir, I am for you. (They fight, and Don Manuel interposes.)

Ros. Ah! help! murder! [Runs out.]

Don M. Within there! help! murder! Why, gentlemen, are ye mad? Pray put up.

Hyp. A rascal!

Don M. Friends, and quarrel! for shame.

Flora. Friends! I scorn his friendship; and since he does not know how to use a gentleman, I'll do a public piece of justice, and use him like a villain.

Don M. Better words, sir. (To Flora.)

Flora. Why, sir, d'ye take this fellow for Don Philip?

Don M. What d'ye mean, sir?

Flora. That he has cheated me as well as you; but I'll have my revenge immediately. [Exit.]

Don M. Eh! what's all this? What is it? my heart misgives me.

Hyp. Hey! who waits there? Here, you! (To a Servant.) Bid my servant run, and hire me a coach and four horses immediately.

Serv. Yes, sir.

Don M. A coach!

Enter VILETTA.

Vil. Sir, sir! bless me! What's the matter, sir? Are not you well?

Don M. Yes, yes—I am—that is—ha!

Vil. I have brought you a letter, sir.

Don M. What business can he have for a coach?

Vil. I have brought you a letter, sir, from Octavio.

Don M. To me?

Vil. No, sir, to my mistress; he charged me to deliver it immediately; for he said it concerned her life and fortune.

Don M. How! let's see it; there's what I promised thee, begone. What can this be, now? (Reads.) "The person whom your father ignorantly designs you to marry, is a known cheat, and an impostor; the true Don Philip, who is my intimate friend, will immediately appear with the corrigidore, and fresh evidence against him. I thought this advice, though from one you hate, would be well received if it came time enough to prevent your ruin." OCTAVIO." Oh! my heart! this letter was not designed to fall into my hands. I am frightened—I dare not think on't.

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, your man is not within.

Hyp. Careless rascal! to be out of the way when my life's at stake: pr'ythee, do thou go and see if thou canst get me any post-horses.

Don M. Post-horses!

Re-enter ROSARA.

Ros. Oh! dear sir, what was the matter?

Don M. Eh!

Ros. What made 'em quarrel, sir?

Don M. Child!

Ros. What was it about, sir? You look con-

Don M. Concerned! [cerned.]

Ros. I hope you are not hurt, sir. (To Hyp. who minds her not.) What's the matter with him, sir? he won't speak to me. (To Don M.)

Don M. A—speak!—a—go to him again; try what fair words will do, and see if you can pick out the meaning of all this.

Ros. Dear sir, what's the matter?

Don M. Ay, sir, pray what's the matter?

Hyp. I'm a little vexed at my servant's being out of the way, and the insolence of this other rascal. [horses, sir?]

Don M. But what occasion have you for post-

Hyp. Something happens a little cross, sir.

Don M. Pray, what is't?

Hyp. I'll tell you another time, sir.

Don M. Another time, sir; pray satisfy me now.

Hyp. Lord, sir! when you see a man's out of humour.

Don M. Sir, it may be I'm as much out of humour as you; and I must tell ye, I don't like your behaviour, and I'm resolved to be satisfied.

Hyp. Sir, what is't you'd have?

Don M. Lookye, sir—in short—I—I have received a letter.

Hyp. Well, sir.

Don M. I wish it may be well, sir.

Hyp. Bless me, sir! what's the matter with you?

Don M. Matter, sir! in troth, I'm almost afraid and ashamed to tell ye; but if you must needs know—there's the matter, sir. (Gives the letter.)

Enter DON LEWIS.

Don L. Uncle, I am your humble servant.

Don M. I am glad to see you, nephew.

Don L. I received your invitation, and am come to pay my duty: but here I met with the most surprising news.

Don M. Pray what is it?

Don L. Why, first your servant told me, my young cousin was to be married to-day to Don Philip de las Torres; and just as I was entering your doors, who should I meet but Don Philip with the corrigidore, and several witnesses to prove, it seems, that the person whom you were just going to marry my cousin to, has usurped his name, betrayed you, robbed him, and is in short a rank impostor.

Don M. Dear nephew, don't torture me: are ye sure you know Don Philip when you see him?

Don L. Know him, sir? were not we school-fellows, fellow-collegians, and fellow-travellers?

Don M. But are you sure you mayn't have forgot him neither? [forgot you, sir.]

Don L. You might as well ask me if I had not

Don M. But one question more, and I am dumb for ever: is that he?

Don L. That, sir? No, nor in the least like him. But, pray, why this concern? I hope we are not come too late to prevent the marriage?

Don M. Oh, oh, oh, oh! my poor child!

Ros. Oh! (Seems to faint.)

Don M. Ah! look to my child.

Don L. Is this the villain then, that has imposed on you?

Hyp. Sir, I'm this lady's husband; and while I'm sure that name can't be taken from me, I shall be contented with laughing at any other you or your party dare give me.

Don M. Oh!

Don L. Nay, then, within there! Such a villain ought to be made an example.

Enter Corrigidore and Officers, with DON PHILIP, OCTAVIO, FLORA, TRAPPANTI, and VILETTA.

Oh! gentlemen, we're undone! all comes too late! my poor cousin's married to the impostor.

Don P. How!

Oct. Confusion!

[your justice.

Don P. That's the person, sir, and I demand

Oct. And I.

Trap. And I.

Flora. And all of us.

Don M. Will my cares never be over?

Cor. Well, gentlemen, let me rightly understand what 'tis you charge him with, and I'll commit him immediately:—first, sir, you say these gentlemen all know you to be the true Don Philip?

Don L. That, sir, I presume my oath will prove.

Oct. Or mine.

Flora. And mine.

Trap. Ay, and mine, too, sir.

Don M. Where shall I hide this shameful head?

Flora. And for the robbery, that I can prove upon him: he confessed to me at Toledo, he stole this gentleman's portmanteau there, to carry on his design upon this lady, and agreed to give me a third part of her fortune for my assistance; which he refusing to pay as soon as the marriage was over, I thought myself obliged in honour to discover him.

Hyp. Well, gentlemen, you may insult me if you please; but I presume you'll hardly be able to prove that I'm not married to the lady, or haven't the best part of her fortune in my pocket; so do your worst: I own my ingenuity, and am proud on't.

Don M. Ingenuity! abandoned villain! But, sir, before you send him to gaol, I desire he may return the jewels I gave him as part of my daughter's portion.

Cor. That can't be, sir; since he has married the lady, her fortune's lawfully his: all we can do, is to prosecute him for robbing this gentleman.

Don M. Oh! that ever I was born.

Hyp. Return the jewels, sir! if you don't pay me the rest of her fortune to-morrow morning, you may chance to go to gaol before me.

Don M. Oh! that I were buried! Will my cares never be over?

Hyp. They are pretty near it, sir; you can't have much more to trouble you.

Cor. Come, sir, if you please; I must desire to take your deposition in writing. (Goes to the table with Flora.)

Don P. Now, sir, you see what your own rashness has brought you to.

Don M. Pray forbear, sir.

Hyp. Keep it up, madam. (Aside to Rosara.)

Ros. Oh, sir! how wretched have you made me! is this the care you have taken of me for my blind obedience to your commands? this my reward for filial duty? (To Don M.)

Don M. Ah! my poor child!

Ros. But I deserve it all, for ever listening to your barbarous proposal, when my conscience might have told me, my vows and person, in justice and honour, were the wronged Octavio's.

Don M. Oh, oh!

Oct. Can she repent her falsehood, then, at last? Is't possible? then I'm wounded too. Oh! my poor undone Rosara! (Goes to her.) Ungrateful! cruel! perjured man!

Don M. Oh! don't insult me! I deserve the worst you can say. I'm a miserable wretch, and I repent me.

Vil. So! here's the lady in tears, the lover in a rage, the old gentlemen out of his senses, most of the company distracted, and the bridegroom in a fair way to be hanged. The merriest wedding that ever I saw in my life. (Apart to Hyp.)

Cor. Well, sir, have you anything to say before I make your warrant?

Hyp. A word or two, and I obey ye, sir: gentlemen, I have reflected on the folly of my action, and foresee the disquiets I am likely to undergo, in being this lady's husband; therefore, as I own myself the author of all this seeming ruin and confusion, so I am willing (desiring, first, the officers may withdraw,) to offer something to the general quiet.

Oct. What can this mean?

[gone.

Don P. Psha! some new contrivance; let's be

Don L. Stay a moment, it can be no harm to hear him. Sir, will you oblige us?

Cor. Wait without.

[Exeunt Officers.

Vil. What's to be done now, 'trow?

Trap. Some smart thing, I warrant ye; the little gentleman hath a notable head, faith.

Flora. Nay, gentlemen, thus much I know of him: that if you can but persuade him to be honest, 'tis still in his power to make you all amends; and, in my opinion, 'tis high time he should propose it.

Don M. Ay, 'tis time he were hanged, indeed; for I know no other amends he can make us.

Hyp. Then I must tell you, sir, I owe you no reparation; the injuries which you complain of, your sordid avarice, and breach of promise here, have justly brought upon you: therefore, sir, if you are injured, you may thank yourself for it.

Don M. Nay, dear sir, I do confess my blindness, and could heartily wish your eyes or mine had dropped out of our heads before ever we saw one another.

Hyp. Well, sir, (however little you have deserved it,) yet, for your daughter's sake, if you'll oblige yourself, by signing this paper, to keep your first promise, and give her, with her full fortune, to this gentleman, I'm still content, on that condition, to disannul my own pretences, and resign her.

Don M. Sir, I don't know how to answer you: for I can never believe you'll have good nature enough to hang yourself out of the way, to make room for him?

Hyp. Then, sir, to let you see I have not only an honest meaning, but an immediate power, too, to make good my word, I first renounce all title to her fortune: these jewels, which I received from you, I give him free possession of; and now, sir, the rest of her fortune you owe him, with her person.

Don M. This is unaccountable, I must confess; but still, sir, if you disannul your pretences, how you'll persuade that gentleman, to whom I am obliged in contract to part with his—

Don P. That, sir, shall be no let; I am too well acquainted with the virtue of my friend's title, to entertain a thought that can disturb it.

Hyp. Now, sir, it only stops at you.

Don M. Well, sir, I see the paper is only conditional, and since the general welfare is concerned, I won't refuse to lend you my helping hand to it; but if you should not make your words good, sir, I hope you won't take it ill if a man should poison you.

Don P. And, sir, let me, too, warn you how you execute this promise; your flattery and dissembled penitence has deceived me once already, which makes me, I confess, a little slow in my belief; therefore, take heed, expect no second mercy! for be assured of this, I never can forgive a villain.

Hyp. If I am proved one, spare me not; I ask but this—use me as you find me.

Don P. That you may depend on,

Don M. There, sir. (Gives Hyp. the writing signed.)

Hyp. And now, Don Philip, I confess you are the only injured person here.

Don P. I know not that; do my friend right, and I shall easily forgive thee.

Hyp. His pardon, with his thanks, I am sure I shall deserve: but how shall I forgive myself? Is there in nature left a means that can repair the shameful slights, the insults, and the long disquiets you have known from love?

Don P. Let me understand thee.

Hyp. Examine well your heart, and if the fierce resentment of its wrongs has not extinguished quite the usual soft compassion there, revive at least one spark in pity of my woman's weakness.

Don P. Whither wouldst thou carry me?

Hyp. The extravagant attempt I have this day run through to meet you thus, justly may subject me to your contempt and scorn, unless the same forgiving goodness that used to overlook the failings of Hypolita, prove still my friend, and soften all with the excuse of love. (All seem amazed.) Oh! Philip, Hypolita is—your's for ever. (They advance slowly, and at last rush into one another's arms.)

Don P. It is, it is, Hypolita! And yet 'tis she! I know her by the busy pulses at my heart, which only love like mine can feel, and she alone can give. (Embraces her eagerly.)

Don M. Have I then been pleased, and plagued, and frightened out of my wits, by a woman all this while? Odsbud! she is a notable contriver! Stand clear, ho! for if I have not a fair brush at her lips; nay, if she does not give me the hearty smack too, ods-winds and thunder! she is not the good-humoured girl I take her for.

Hyp. Come, sir, I won't balk your good humour. (He kisses her.) And now I have a favour to beg of you; you remember your promise: only your blessing here, sir. (Octavio and Ros. kneel.)

Don M. Ah! I can deny thee nothing; and so, children, heaven bless ye together; and now my cares are over again.

Oct. We'll study to deserve your love, sir.

Don P. My friend successful, too! Then my joys are double: but how this generous attempt was started first, how it has been pursued, and carried with this kind surprise at last, gives me wonder equal to my joy.

Hyp. Here's one that, at more leisure, shall inform you all: she was ever a friend to your love, has had a hearty share in the fatigue, and now I am bound in honour to give her part of the garland,

Don P. How! she? [too.]

Flora. Trusty Flora, sir, at your service. I have had many a battle with my lady upon your account; but I always told her we should do her business at last.

Don M. Another metamorphosis! Brave girls, faith! Odzooks! we shall have them make campaigns, shortly.

Don P. In Seville I'll provide for thee.

Hyp. Nay, here's another accomplice, too, confederate I can't say; for honest Trappanti did not know but that I was as great a rogue as himself.

Trap. It's a folly to lie; I did not, indeed, madam. But the world cannot say I have been a rogue to your ladyship; and if you had not parted with your money—

Hyp. Thou hadst not parted with thy honesty.

Trap. Right, madam; but how should a poor naked fellow resist, when he had so many pistoles held against him? (Shews money.)

Don M. Ay, ay, well said, lad.

Vil. Eh! A tempting bait, indeed! let him offer to marry me again, if he dares. (Aside.)

Don P. Well, Trappanti, thou hast been serviceable, however, and I'll think of thee.

Oct. Nay, I am his debtor, too.

Trap. Ah! there's a very easy way, gentlemen, to reward me; and since you partly owe your happiness to my roguery, I should be very proud to owe mine only to your generosity.

Oct. As how, pray?

Trap. Why, sir, I find by my constitution, that it is as natural to be in love as a hungry, and that I haven't a jot less stomach than the best of my betters; and though I have often thought a wife but dining every day upon the same dish; yet, methinks, it's better than no dinner at all. Upon which considerations, gentlemen and ladies, I desire you'll use your interest with Madona here—to admit me into her good graces.

Don M. A pleasant rogue, faith! Odzooks! the jade shall have him. Come, hussy, he's an ingenious person.

Vil. Sir, I don't understand his stuff; when he speaks plain, I know what to say to him.

Trap. Why, then, in plain terms, let me a lease for life—Marry me.

Vil. Ay, now you say something; I was afraid, by what you said in the garden, you had only a mind to be a wicked tenant at will.

Trap. No, no, child; I have no mind to be turned out at a quarter's warning.

Vil. Well, there's my hand; and now meet me as soon as you will with a canonical lawyer, and I'll give you possession of the rest of the premises.

Don M. Odzooks! and well thought of, I'll send for one presently. Here, you, sirrah, run to father Benedick again, tell him his work don't hold here, his last marriage is dropped to pieces; but now we have got better tackle, he must come and stitch two or three fresh couple together as fast as he can.

Don P. Now, my Hypolita!

Let our example teach mankind to love;

From thine the fair their favours may improve:

Oh! never let a virtuous mind despair,

For constant hearts are love's peculiar care.

COUNT OF NARBONNE;

A TRAGEDY, IN FIVE ACTS.—BY ROBERT JEPHSON.

Act IV.—Scene 1.

CHARACTERS.

COUNT OF NARBONNE
AUSTIN

THEODORE FABIAN

RENCHILD
COUNTESS

ADELAIDE
JAQUELINE

ACT I.—SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter the COUNT of NARBONNE, speaking to an Officer; followed by FABIAN.

Count. Not to be found! Is this your faithful service?

How could she pass unseen? By hell, 'tis false! Thou hast betray'd me.

Offi. Noble sir, my duty— [ply not.

Count. Your fraud, your negligence—away! re- Find her within this hour; else, by my life, The gates of Narbonne shall be clos'd against thee. Then make the world thy country. [Exit Officer. Fabian, stay!

Misfortunes fall so thick upon my head, They will not give me time to think—to breathe.

Fab. Heav'n knows, I wish your peace; but am to learn

What grief more fresh than my young lord's decease, A sorrow but of three days past, can move you.

Count. Oh! bitter memory! gone, gone for ever! The pillar of my house, my only son!

Fab. 'Twas terrible, indeed!

Count. Ay, was it not?

And then, the manner of it! think on that. Disease, that robb'd me of two infant sons, Approaching slow, bade me prepare to lose them; I saw my lilies drooping; and, accustom'd To see them dying, bore to see them dead: But, oh! my Edmund!—Thou remember'st, Fabian, How blithe he went to seek the forest's sport?

Fab. 'Would I could not remember!

Count. That curs'd barb (My fatal gift) that dash'd him down the cliff, [gled, Seem'd proud of his gay burden. Breathless, man- They bore him back to me. Fond man! I hop'd This day his happy match with Isabel Had made our line perpetual; and, this day, The unfruitful grave receives him. Yes, 'tis fate! That dreadful denunciation 'gainst my house, No prudence can avert, nor pray'rs can soften.

Fab. Think not on that; some visionary's dream. What house, what family could e'er know peace, If such enthusiasts' ravings were believ'd, And frenzy deem'd an insight of the future?

But may I dare to ask, is it of moment To stir your anger thus, that Isabel Has left the castle?

Count. Of the deepest moment: My best hope hangs on her; some future time I may instruct thee why.—These cares unhinge me: Just now, a herald from her angry father Left me this dire election—to resign My titles, and this ample seignior, (Worthy a monarch's envy,) or to meet him, And try my right by arms. But, pr'ythee, tell (Nor let a fear to wound thy master's pride Restrain thy licens'd speech,) hast thou e'er heard My father Raymond—(cast not down thine eye)— By any indirect or bloody means, Procur'd that instrument, Alphonso's will, That made him heir to Narbonne?

Fab. My best lord, At all times would I fain withhold from you Intelligence unwelcome, but most now. At seasons such as this, a friendly tongue Should utter words like balm; but what you ask—

Count. I ask to be inform'd of. Hast thou known From childhood up to man, and canst thou fear [me I am so weak of soul, like a thin reed, To bend and stagger at each puny blast? No; when the tempest rages round my head, I give my branches wider to the air, And strike my root more deeply. To thy tale: Away with palliatives and compliments! Speak plainly.

Fab. Plainly, then, my lord, I have heard What, for the little breath I have to draw, I would not, to the black extent of rumour, Give credit to. But you command me speak.—

Count. Thy pauses torture me. Can I hear worse Than this black scroll contains? this challenge here, From Isabella's father, haughty Godfrey? In broad and unambiguous words he tells me, My father was a murderer, and forg'd Alphonso's testament.

Fab. From Palestine That tale crept hither; where, foul slander says, The good Alphonso, not, as we believe,

Died of a fever, but a venom'd draught,
Your father, his companion of the cross,
Did with his own hand mingle; his hand, too,
Assisted by some cunning practisers,
Model'd that deed, which, barring Godfrey's right,
And other claims from kindred, nam'd Count Ray-
Lord of these fair possessions. [mond

Count. Ah! I have it;

'Tis Godfrey's calumny; he has coin'd this lie;
And his late visit to the Holy Land,
No doubt, has furnish'd likelihood of proof,
To give his fiction colour.

Fab. Sure, 'tis so!

Count. He, too, has forg'd this idle prophecy,
(To shake me with false terrors,) this prediction,
Which, but to think of, us'd to freeze my veins;
"That no descendant from my father's loins,
Should live to see a grandson; nor heaven's wrath
Cease to afflict us, till Alphonso's heir
Succeeded to his just inheritance."
Hence, superstition mines my tottering state,
Loosens my vassals' faith, and turns their tears,
Which else would fall for my calamities,
To gloomy pause, and gaping reverence:
While all my woes, to their perverted sense,
Seem but the marvellous accomplishment
Of revelation, out of nature's course.

Fab. Reason must so interpret. Good, my lord,
What answer was return'd to Godfrey's challenge?

Count. Defiance.

Fab. Heaven defend you!

Count. Heaven defend me!

I hope it will, and this right arm to boot.
But, hark! I hear a noise. Perhaps my people
Have found the fugitive. Haste! bid them enter.

[Exit Fabian.]

She ey'd me with abhorrence; at the sound
Of love, of marriage, fled indignant from me.
Yet must I win her: should she meet my wish,
Godfrey would prop the right he strives to shake;
Securing thus to his fair daughter's issue,
All that now hangs on the sword's doubtful point.

Re-enter an Officer.

Now, what tidings?

Where is the lady?

Offi. We have search'd in vain
The castle round; left not an aisle or vault Unvisited.

Count. Damnation!

Offi. Near the cloister,
From whence, by the flat door's descent, a passage
Beneath the ground leads onward to the convent,
We heard the echo of a falling weight,
And sought it by the sound.

Count. Well, and what then?

Offi. The unsettled dust left us no room to doubt
The door had just been rais'd.

Count. She has escap'd,
And by confed'racy: to force that bar,
Without more aid, had baffled twice her strength.
Go on.

Offi. We enter'd; with resistance bold

Enter FABIAN and Attendants, with THEODORE.
This peasant push'd us backward from the spot.
My arm was rais'd to smite him, but respect
For something in his aspect check'd the blow.
He, chiding, parleying by turns, gave time
For whosoever had descended there
(The lady doubtless) to elude our search:
The rest himself will tell.

Count. (To Theodore.) Ah! what art thou?

Theo. It seems, thy prisoner: disengage me first
From their rude grasp, and I may tell thee more.

Count. Unhand him. I should know thee; I have seen Features like thine. Answer me, wert thou found
As these men say?

Theo. I was.

Count. And what thy purpose?

Theo. Chance brought me there.

Count. And did chance lead thee, too,
To aid a fugitive?

Theo. They saw not that.

[hands,

Count. They saw it not! How! could her delicate
Weak, soft, and yielding, to the gentlest touch,
Sustain that pond'rous mass? No; those tough arms,
Thy force, assisted; else, thou young dissembler—

Theo. She had been seiz'd, and by compulsion
Where I stand now. [brought Count. Thou dost avow it, then;

Boast it even to my face, audacious stripling!
Such insolence, and these coarse rustic weeds,
Are contradictions. Answer me, who art thou?

Theo. Less than I should be; more than what I

Count. Hence with this saucy ambiguity. [seem.
What is thy name, thy country? That mean habit,
Which should teach humbleness, speaks thy condition.

Theo. My name is Theodore; my country, France;
My habit little suited to my mind,
Less to my birth, yet fit for my condition.

Count. Oh! thou art, then, some young adventurer,
Some roving knight, a hero in disguise,
Who, scorning forms of vulgar ceremony,
No leave obtain'd, waiting no invitation,
Enters our castles, wanders o'er our halls,
To succour dames distress'd, or pilfer gold.

Theo. There is a source of reverence for thee here,
Forbids me, though provok'd, retort thy taunts.

Count. If I endure this more, I shall grow vile
Even to my hands.

Theo. Hold! let me stop thy wrath.

I see thy quivering lip, thy fiery eye,
Forerun a storm of passion. To prevent thee
From terms too harsh, perhaps, for thee to offer,
Or me to bear (poor as I seem) with honour,
I will cut short thy interrogatories,
And on this theme give thee the full extent
Of all I know, or thou canst wish to learn.

Count. Do it.

Theo. Without a view to thwart thy purpose,
(Be what it might,) was I within thy walls.
In a dim passage of the castle aisles,
Musing alone, I heard a hasty tread,
And breath drawn short, like one in fear of peril.
A lady enter'd; fair she seem'd, and young,
Guiding her timorous footsteps by a lamp;
"The lord, the tyrant of this place," she cried,
"For a detested purpose follows me;
Aid me, good youth!" then, pointing to the ground,
"That door," she added, "leads to sanctuary."
I seiz'd an iron hold, and, while I tugg'd
To heave the unwilling weight, I learn'd her title.

Count. The lady Isabel?

Theo. The same. A gleam,
Shot from their torches who pursued her track,
Prevented more; she hasten'd to the cave,
And vanish'd from my sight.

Count. And did no awe,
No fear of him she call'd this castle's lord,
Its tyrant, chill thee?

Theo. Awe, nor fear, I know not,
And trust shall never; for I know not guilt. [I;

Count. Then, thou, it seems, art master here, not Thou canst control my projects, blast my schemes,
And turn to empty air my power in Narbonne.
Nay, should my daughter choose to fly my castle,
Against my bidding, bars and bolts were vain:
This frize-clad champion, gallant Theodore!
Would lend his ready arm, and mock my caution.

Theo. Thy daughter! Oh! I were, indeed, too
Could I but live to render her a service! [blest'd,

Count. My daughter would, I hope, disdain thy service. [done,

Theo. Wherefore am I to blame? What I have
Were it to do again, again I'd do it.
And may this arm drop palsied by my side,
When its cold sinews shrink to aid affliction!

Count. Indeed!

Theo. Indeed. Frown on! Ask thy own heart,
Did innocence and beauty bend before thee,
Hunted and trembling, wouldst thou tamely pause,
Scanning pale counsel from deliberate fear,

And weigh each possibility of danger?
No; the instinctive nobleness of blood
Would start beyond the reach of such cold scruples,
And instant gratify its generous ardour. [look,

Count. I must know more of this. His phrase, his
His steady countenance, raise something here,
Bids me beware of him. (Aside.) I have no time
To bandy idle words with slaves like thee.

I doubt not thy intent was mischievous;
Booty, perhaps, or blood. Till more inquiry
Clear, or condemn him, hold him in your guard.
Give none admittance. Take him from my sight.

Theo. Secure in her integrity, my soul
Casts back thy mean suspicions, and forgives thee.

Count. Away with him! [Theodore is led out.
What means this heaviness?

My heart, that like a well-trimm'd gallant bark,
Was wont to mount the waves, and dash them off
In ineffectual foam, now seems to crack,
And let in each assailing tide to sink me.

I must not yield to this dull lethargy.
Good Fabian, hie thee to St. Nicholas';
Bid holy Austin straight repair to me. [Exit Fabian.

His sanctity, and reverend character,
His pious eloquence, made engines for me,
Might save a world of anguish to my soul,
And smooth my unwelcome purpose to Hortensia.
But how prevail with him? Ambition? No;
The world is dead in him, and gold is trash
To one who neither needs nor values it.

Interest and love shall wear the guise of conscience;
I must pretend nice scruples, which I feel not,
And make him mediate for me with the church.

Yet he reveres the Countess; and, I fear,
Will spy more sin, in doubts that wound her quiet,
Than in my stifling them. But see, she comes,
With downcast eye, and sad dejected mien.

I will not yet disclose it. [Enter the COUNTESS.]
Where's my child,

My all of comfort now, my Adelaide?

Countess. Dear as she is, I would not have her all;
For I should then be nothing. Time has been,
When, after three long days of absence from you,
You would have question'd me a thousand times,
And bid me tell each trifle of myself;
Then, satisfied at last that all were well,
At last, unwilling turn to meaner cares.

Count. This is the nature still of womankind;
If fondness be their mood, we must cast off
All grave-complexion'd thought, and turn our souls
Quite from their tenour to wild levity;
Vary with all their humours, take their hues,
As unsubstantial Iris from the sun:
Our bosoms are their passive instruments;
Vibrate their strain, or all our notes are discord.

Countess. Oh! why this new unkindness? From Never till now fell such ungentle words, [thy lips
Nor ever less was I prepar'd to meet them.

Count. Never till now was I so urg'd, beset,
Hemm'd round with perils.

Countess. Ay, but not by me.

Count. By thee, and all the world. But yesterday,
With uncontrollable and absolute sway,
I rul'd this province, was the unquestion'd lord
Of this strong castle, and its wide domains,
Stretch'd beyond sight around me; and but now,
The axe, perhaps, is sharp'ning, may hew down
My perish'd trunk, and give the soil I sprung from,
To cherish my proud kinsman Godfrey's roots.

Countess. Heaven guard thy life! His dreadful summons reach'd me.

This urg'd me hither. On my knees I beg,
(And I have mighty reasons for my prayer,)
Oh! do not meet him on this argument:
By gentler means strive to divert his claim;
Fly this detested place, this house of horror,
And leave its gloomy grandeur to your kinsman.

Count. Rise, fearful woman! What! renounce my birthright?

Go forth, like a poor, friendless, banish'd man,
To gnaw my heart in cold obscurity?

Thou weak adviser! Should I take thy counsel,
Thy tongue would first upbraid—thy spirit scorn
me. [world?

Countess. No, on my soul! Is Narbonne all the
My country is where thou art; place is little:
The sun will shine, the earth produce its fruits,
Cheerful and plenteously, where'er we wander.
In humbler walks, bless'd with my child and thee,
I'd think it Eden in some lonely vale,
Nor heave one sigh for these proud battlements.

Count. Such flowery softness suits not matron lips;
But thou hast mighty reasons for thy prayer:
They should be mighty reasons, to persuade
Their rightful lord to leave his large possessions.
A soldier challeng'd, to decline the combat! [sons?

Countess. And are not prodigies, then, mighty rea-
The owl mistakes his season, in broad day
Screaming his hideous omens; spectres glide,
Gibbering and pointing as we pass along;
While the deep earth's unorganized caves
Send forth wild sounds, and clamours terrible: [air
These towers shake round us, though the untroubled
Stagnates to lethargy: our children perish,
And new disasters blacken every hour.
Blood shed unrighteously, blood unappeas'd,
(Though we are guiltless,) cries, I fear, for vengeance. [blood?

Count. Blood shed unrighteously! have I shed
No; nature's common frailties set aside,
I'll meet my audit boldly.

Countess. Mighty Lord!
Oh! not on us, with justice too severe,
Visit the sin not ours.

Count. What can this mean?
Something thou would reveal that's terrible. [heart;

Countess. Too long, alas! it has weigh'd upon my
A thousand times I have thought to tell thee all;
But my tongue falter'd, and refus'd to wound thee.

Count. Distract me not, but speak.

Countess. I must. Your father
Was wise, brave, politic; but mad ambition,
(Heaven pardon him!) it prompts to desperate deeds,— [and ease me.

Count. I scarce can breathe. Pr'ythee, be quick,

Countess. Your absence on the Italian embassy
Left him, you know, alone to my fond care.
Long had some hidden grief, like a slow fire,
Wasted his vitals; on the bed of death,
One object seem'd to harrow up his soul,
The picture of Alphonso in the chamber:
On that his eye was set. Methinks I see him;
His ashy hue, his grisled, bristling hair,
His palms wide spread. For ever would he cry,
"That awful form—how terrible he frowns!
See how he bares his livid, leprous breast,
And points the deadly chalice!"

Count. Ah! even so! [grasp them close,

Countess. Sometimes he'd seize my hands, and
And strain them to his hollow, burning eyes;
Then falter out, "I am, I am a villain!
Mild angel, pray for me;—stir not, my child;
It comes again;—oh! do not leave my side."

At last, quite spent with mortal agonies,
His soul went forth—and heaven have mercy on him!

Count. Enough! Thy tale has almost iced my blood.
Let me not think. Hortensia, on thy duty,
Suffer no breath like this to pass thy lips:
I will not taint my noble father's honour,
By vile suspicions suck'd from nature's dregs,
And the loose ravings of distemper'd fancy.

Countess. Yet, oh! decline this challenge!

Count. That hereafter.

Meantime, prepare my daughter to receive
A husband of my choice. Should Godfrey come,
(Strife might be so prevented,) bid her try
Her beauty's power. Stand thou but neuter, fate!
Courage and art shall arm me for mankind. [Exeunt.

ACT II.—SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter FABIAN and JAQUELINE.

Fab. No, no, it cannot be. My lord's commands
Were absolute, that none should visit him.

Jaq. What need he know it?

Fab. But perchance he should?

The study of my life has been his pleasure;
Nor will I risk his favour, to indulge
Such unavailing curiosity.

Jaq. Call it not so; I have kind counsel for him;
Which, if he follow it, may serve to speed
The hour of his deliverance, and appease
The unjustly anger'd Count.

Fab. Pray be content;
I dare not do it. Have this castle's walls
Hous'd thee nine years, and art thou yet to learn
The temper of the Count? Serv'd and obey'd,
There lives not one more gracious, liberal;
Offend him, and his rage is terrible;
I'd rather play with serpents. But, fair Jaqueline,
Setting aside the comeliness and grace
Of this young rustic, which, I own, are rare,
And baits to catch all women, pr'ythee, tell,
Why are you thus solicitous to see him?

Jaq. In me, 'twere base to be indifferent:
He was my life's preserver, nay, preserv'd
A life more precious: yes, my dear young mistress!
But for his aid, the eternal sleep of death
Had clos'd the sweetest eyes that ever beam'd.
Aloof, and frighted, stood her coward train,
And saw a furious band of desperate slaves,
Inur'd to blood and rapine, bear her off.

Fab. What! when the gang of outlaw'd Thiery
Rush'd on her chariot near the wood of Zart,
Was he the unknown youth who succour'd her?
All good betide him for it.

Jaq. Yes, 'twas he. [sword,
From one tame wretch he snatch'd a half-drawn
And dealt swift vengeance on the ruffian crew.
Two at his feet stretch'd dead, the rest, amaz'd,
Fled, muttering curses, while he bore her back,
Unhurt but by her fears.

Fab. He should be worshipp'd,
Have statues rais'd to him; for, by my life,
I think there does not breathe another like her.
It makes me young to see her lovely eyes:
Such charity! such sweet benevolence!
So fair, and yet so humble! prais'd for ever,
Nay, wonder'd at, for nature's rarest gifts,
Yet lowlier than the lowest.

Jaq. Is it strange,
Fair Adelaide and I, thus bound to him,
Are anxious for his safety? What offence
(And, sure, 'twas unintended) could provoke
The rigorous Count thus to imprison him?

Fab. My lord was ever proud and choleric;
The youth, perhaps, unus'd to menaces,
Brook'd them but ill, and darted frown for frown:
This stirr'd the Count to fury. But fear nothing;
All will be well; I'll wait the meetest season,
And be his advocate.

Jaq. Meantime, repair to him;
Bid him be patient; let him want no comfort,
Kind care can minister. My lady comes.
May I assure her of your favour to him?

Fab. Assure her that the man who sav'd her life,
Is dear to Fabian as his vital blood. [Exit.

Enter ADELAIDE.

Adel. I sent thee to his prison. Quickly tell me,
What says he? does he know my sorrow for him?
Does he confound me with the unfeeling crew,
Who act my father's bidding? Can his love
Pity my grief, and bear this wrong with patience?

Jaq. I strove in vain to enter. Fabian holds him,
By the Count's charge, in strictest custody;
And, fearful to awake his master's wrath,
Though much unwilling, bars me from his presence.

Adel. Unkind old man! I would myself entreat him,
But fear my earnest look, these starting tears,
Might to the experience of his prying age
Reveal a secret, which in vain I strive
To hide from my own breast.

Jaq. Alas! dear lady,
Did not your tongue reveal it, your chang'd mien,
Once lighter than the airy wood-nymph's shade,

Now turn'd to pensive thought and melancholy—
Involuntary sighs—your cheek, unlike
Its wonted bloom, as is the red-vein'd rose
To the dim sweetness of the violet—
These had too soon betray'd you. But, take heed!
The colour of our fate too oft is ting'd,
Mournful or bright, but from our first affections.

Adel. Foul disproportion draws down shame on
But where's the crime in fair equality? [love;
Mean birth presumes a mind uncultivate,
Left to the coarseness of its native soil,
To grow like weeds, and die like them, neglected;
But he was born my equal; lineag'd high,
And titled as our great ones.

Jaq. How easy is our faith to what we wish!
His story may be feign'd.

Adel. I'll not mistrust him. [me,
Since the bless'd hour that brought him first to save
How often have I listen'd to the tale!
Gallant, generous youth!

Thy sport, misfortune, from his infant years!
Wilt thou pursue him still?

Jaq. Indeed, 'tis hard. [walls

Adel. But, oh! the pang, that these ungrateful
Should be his prison! Here, if I were aught,
His presence should have made it festival; [trance,
These gates, untouch'd, had leap'd to give him en-
And songs of joy made glad the way before him.
Instead of this, think what has been his welcome!
Dragg'd by rude hands before a furious judge,
Insulted, menac'd, like the vilest slave,
And doom'd, unheard, to ignominious bondage.

Jaq. Your father knew not of his service to you?

Adel. No; his indignant soul disdain'd to tell it.
Great spirits, conscious of their inborn worth,
Scorn by demand to force the praise they merit;
They feel a flame beyond their brightest deeds,
And leave the weak to note them, and to wonder.

Jaq. Suppress these strong emotions: the Count's
Is quick to find offence. Should he suspect [eye
This unpermitted passion, 'twould draw down
More speedy vengeance on the helpless youth,
Turning your fatal fondness to his ruin. [me!

Adel. Indeed, I want thy counsel. Yet, oh! leave
Find if my gold, my gems, can ransom him.

Had I the world, it should be his as freely. [you;

Jaq. Trust to my care. The Countess comes to seek
Her eye is this way bent. Conceal this grief;
All may be lost if you betray such weakness. [Exit.

Adel. Oh, love! thy sway makes me unnatural.
The tears, which should bedew the grave, yet green,
Of a dear brother, turning from their source,
Forget his death, and fall for Theodore.

Enter the COUNTESS.

Countess. Come near, my love! When thou art from my side,

Methinks I wander like some gloomy ghost,
Who, doom'd to tread alone a dreary round,
Remembers the lost things that made life precious,
Yet sees no end of cheerless solitude.

Adel. We have known too much of sorrow; yet,
'twere wise [vish'd,

To turn our thoughts from what mischance has ra-
And rest on what it leaves. My father's love—

Countess. Was mine, but is no more. 'Tis past,
'tis gone.

That ray, at least, I hop'd would never set, [shades:
My guide, my light, through fortune's blackest
It was my dear reserve, my secret treasure;
I stor'd it up, as misers hoard their gold,
Sure counterpoise for life's severest ills:
Vain was my hope; for love's soft sympathy,
He pays me back harsh words, unkind reproof,
And looks that stab with coldness.

Adel. Oh! most cruel!

And, were he not my father, I could rail;
Call him unworthy of thy wondrous virtues;
Blind, and unthankful for the greatest blessing [him
Heaven's ever-bounteous hand could shower upon

Countess. No, Adelaide; we must subdue such Obedience is thy duty, patience mine. [thoughts:

Just now, with stern and peremptory briefness,
He bade me seek my daughter, and dispose her
To wed, by his direction.

Adel. The saints forbid!

To wed by his direction! Wed with whom?

Countess. I know not whom. He counsels with Adel. I hope he cannot mean it. [himself.

Countess. 'Twas his order.

Adel. Oh! madam, on my knees—

Countess. What would my child? [eyes?

Why are thy hands thus rais'd? Why stream thine

Why flutters thus thy bosom? Adelaide,

Speak to me! tell me, wherefore art thou thus?

Adel. Surprise and grief—I cannot, cannot speak.

Countess. If 'tis a pain to speak, I would not urge

But can my Adelaide fear aught from me? [thee.

Am I so harsh?

Adel. Oh, no! the kindest, best!

But would you save me from the stroke of death,

If you would not behold your daughter, stretch'd

A poor pale corse, and breathless at your feet,

Oh! step between me and this cruel mandate! [step.

Countess. But this is strange! I hear your father's

He must not see you thus: retire this moment.

I'll come to you anon.

Adel. Yet, ere I go,

Oh! make the interest of my heart your own;

Nor, like a senseless, undiscerning thing,

Incapable of choice, nor worth the question,

Suffer this hasty transfer of your child:

Plead for me strongly, kneel, pray, weep for me;

And angels lend your tongue the power to move him! [Exit.

Countess. What can this mean, this ecstasy of pas-

Can such reluctance, such emotions, spring [sion?

From the mere nicety of maiden fear?

The source is in her heart; I dread to trace it.

Must, then, a parent's mild authority

Be turn'd a cruel engine, to inflict

Wounds on the gentle bosom of my child?

And am I doom'd to register each day

But by some new distraction? Edmund! Edmund!

In apprehending worse even than thy loss,

My sense, confus'd, rests on no single grief;

For that were ease to this eternal pulse, [low.

Which, throbbing here, says blacker fates must fol-

Enter the COUNT of NARBONNE and AUSTIN, meeting

Count. Welcome, thrice welcome! By our holy mother,

My house seems hallow'd, when thou enter'st it.

Tranquillity and peace dwell ever round thee;

That robe of innocent white is thy soul's emblem,

Made visible in unstain'd purity.

Once more thy hand.

Aust. My daily task has been,

So to subdue the frailties we inherit,

That my fair estimation might go forth,

Nothing for pride, but to an end more righteous:

For not the solemn trappings of our state,

Tiaras, mitres, nor the pontiff's robe,

Can give such grave authority to priesthood,

As one good deed of grace and charity. [rand.

Count. We deem none worthier. But to thy er-

Aust. I come commission'd from fair Isabel.

Count. To me, or to the Countess?

Aust. Thus, to both:

For your fair courtesy and entertainment,

She rests your thankful debtor. You, dear lady,

And her sweet friend, the gentle Adelaide,

Have such a holy place in all her thoughts,

That 'twere irreverence to waste her sense

In wordy compliment.

Countess. Alas! where is she?

Till now I scarce had power to think of her;

But 'tis the mournful privilege of grief,

To stand excus'd from kind observances,

Which else, neglected, might be deem'd offence.

Aust. She dwells in sanctuary at St. Nicholas'.

Why she took refuge there—

Count. Retire, Hortensia.

I would have private conference with Austin;

No second ear must witness.

Countess. May I not,

By this good man, solicit her return?

Count. Another time; it suits not now. Retire.

[Exit Countess.

You come commission'd from fair Isabel?

Aust. I come commission'd from a greater power,

The Judge of thee, and Isabel, and all.

The offer of your hand in marriage to her,

With your propos'd divorce from that good lady,

That honour'd, injur'd lady you sent hence,

She has disclos'd to me.

Count. Which you approve not:

So speaks the frowning prelude of your brow.

Aust. Approve not! Did I not protest against it,

With the bold fervour of enkindled zeal,

I were the pander of a love like incest,

Betrayer of my trust, my function's shame,

And thy eternal soul's worst enemy. [son;

Count. Yet let not zeal, good man, devour thy rea-

Hear first, and then determine. Well you know,

My hope of heirs has perish'd with my son;

Since now full sev'nteen years, th' unfruitful curse

Has fall'n upon Hortensia. Are these signs,

(Tremendous signs, that startle nature's order!)

Graves casting up their sleepers, earth convuls'd,

Meteors that glare, my children's timeless deaths,

Obscure to thee alone? I have found the cause.

There is no crime our holy church abhors,

Not one high heav'n more strongly interdicts,

Than that commixture, by the marriage rite,

Of blood too near, as mine is to Hortensia.

Aust. Too near of blood! Oh! specious mockery!

Where have these doubts been buried twenty years?

Why wake they now? And am I closetted

To sanction them? Take back your hasty words,

That call'd me wise or virtuous; while you offer

Such shallow fictions to insult my sense,

And strive to win me to a villain's office. [wives,

Count. The virtue of our churchmen, like our

Should be obedient meekness. Proud resistance,

Banding high looks, a port erect and bold,

Are from the canon of your order, priest.

Learn this: (for here I will be teacher, Austin:)

Our temp'ral blood must not be stirr'd thus rudely:

A front that taunts, a scanning, scornful brow,

Are silent menaces, and blows unstruck.

Aust. Not so, my lord; mine is no priestly pride:

When I put off the habit of the world,

I had lost all that made it dear to me,

And shook off, to my best, its heat and passions.

But can I hold in horror this ill deed,

And dress my brow in false, approving smiles?

No: could I carry lightning in my eye,

Or roll a voice like thunder in your ears,

So should I suit my utterance to my thoughts,

And act as fits my sacred ministry.

Count. Oh! father, did you know the conflict here,

How love and conscience are at war within me,

Most sure you would not treat my grief thus harshly.

I call the saints to witness, were I master,

To wive the perfect model of my wish,

For virtue and all female loveliness,

I would not rove to an ideal form,

But beg of heav'n another like Hortensia.

Yet we must part.

Aust. And think you to excuse

A meditated wrong to excellence,

By giving it acknowledgment and praise?

Rather pretend insensibility;

Feign that thou dost not see like other men;

So may abhorrence be exchang'd for wonder,

Or men from cursing fall to pity thee. [shake me.

Count. You strive in vain; no pow'r on earth can

I grant my present purpose seems severe;

Yet are there means to smooth severity,

Which you, and only you, can best apply. [side:

Aust. Oh, no! the means hang there, there by your

Enwring your fingers in her flowing hair,

And with that weapon drink her heart's best blood;

So shall you kill her, but not cruelly,
 Compar'd to this delib'rate, ling'ring murder. [her;
Count. Away with this perverseness! Get thee to Tell her my heart is her's; here, deep engrav'd,
 In characters indelible, shall rest
 The sense of her perfections. Why I leave her
 Is not from cloy'd or fickle appetite,
 (For infinite is still her pow'r to charm,)
 But heav'n will have it so.

Aust. Oh! name not heav'n!
 'Tis too profane abuse.

Count. Win her consent,
 (I know thy sway is boundless o'er her will,) Then join my hand to blooming Isabel.
 Thus will you do to all most worthy service;
 The curse, averted thus, shall pass from Narbonne;
 My house again may flourish; and proud Godfrey,
 Who now disputes, will ratify my title,
 Pleas'd with the rich succession to his heirs.

Aust. Has passion drown'd all sense, all memory?
 She was affianc'd to your son, young Edmund.

Count. She never lov'd my son. Our importunity
 Won her consent, but not her heart, to Edmund.

Aust. Did not that speak her soul pre-occupied?

Count. Ah! thou hast rous'd a thought: this Theo-
 Some undivulg'd and deep-felt preference? [dore!
 (Dull that I was not to perceive it sooner!)
 He is her paramour! by heav'n, she loves him!
 Her coldness to my son, her few tears for him,
 Her flight, this peasant's aiding her; all, all,
 Make it unquestionable;—but he dies.

Aust. Astonishment! What does thy frenzy mean?

Count. I thank thee, priest! thou serv'st me
 'gainst thy will.
 That slave is in my pow'r. Come, follow me.
 Thou shalt behold the minion's heart torn out;
 Then to his mistress bear the trembling present.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.—SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter ADELAIDE, followed by JAQUELINE.

Jaq. Where do you fly? Heav'n's! have you lost all sense? [feel;

Adel. Oh! would I had; for then I should not
 But I have sense enough to know I'm wretched,
 To see the full extent of misery,
 Yet not enough to teach me how to bear it.

Jaq. I did not think your gentleness of nature
 Could rise to such extremes.

Adel. Am I not tame?
 What are these tears, this wild, dishevell'd hair?
 Are these fit signs for such despair as mine?
 Women will weep for trifles, baubles, nothing;
 For very frowardness will weep as I do:
 A spirit rightly touch'd would pierce the air,
 Call down invisible legions to his aid,
 Kindle the elements. But all is calm;
 No thunder rolls, no warning voice is heard;
 To tell my frantic father this black deed,
 Will sink him down to infinite perdition.

Jaq. Rest satisfied, he cannot be so cruel
 (Rash as he is) to shed the innocent blood
 Of a defenceless, unoffending youth.

Adel. He cannot be so cruel? Earth and heav'n!
 Did I not see the dreadful preparations?
 The slaves, who tremble at my father's nod,
 Pale and confounded, dress the fatal block?
 But I will fly, fall prostrate at his feet;
 If nature is not quite extinguish'd in him, [him.
 My pray'rs, my tears, my anguish, sure, will move

Jaq. Move him, indeed! but to redoubled fury:
 He dooms him dead for loving Isabel;
 Think, will it quench the fever of his rage,
 To find he durst aspire to charm his daughter?

Adel. Did I hear right? for loving Isabel?
 I knew not that before. Does he then love her?

Jaq. Nothing I heard distinctly; wild confusion
 Runs through the castle: ev'ry busy fool,
 All ignorant alike, tells diff'rent tales.

Adel. Away, it cannot be. I know his truth.
 Oh! I despise myself, that for a moment
 (Pardon me, love!) could suffer mean suspicion

Usurp the seat of gen'rous confidence.
 Think all alike unjust, my Theodore,
 When ev'n thy Adelaide could join to wrong thee!

Jaq. Yet be advis'd—

Adel. Oh! leave me to my grief.
 To whom shall I complain? He but preserv'd
 My life a little space, to make me feel
 Th' extremes of joy and sorrow. Ere we met
 My heart was calm as the unconscious babe.

Enter FABIAN. [mands

Fab. Madam, my lord comes this way, and com-
 To clear these chambers; what he meditates
 'Tis fit indeed were private. My old age
 Has liv'd too long, to see my master's shame.

Adel. His shame, eternal shame! Oh! more than cruel!

How shall I smother it? Fabian, what means he?
 My father—him I speak of—this young stranger—

Fab. My heart is rent in pieces! Deaf to reason,
 He hears no counsel but from cruelty.

Good Austin intercedes and weeps in vain.

Jaq. There's comfort yet, if he is by his side.

Look up, dear lady! Ha! that dying paleness—

Adel. It is too much! Oh, Jaqueline!

Jaq. She faints;

Her gentle spirits could endure no more.

Ha! paler still! Fabian, thy arm; support her.

She stirs not yet.

Fab. Soft! bear her gently in. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.

Enter the COUNT of NARBONNE, followed by AUSTIN.

Aust. I do believe thee very barbarous;
 Nay, fear thy reason touch'd; for such wild thoughts,
 Such bloody purposes, could ne'er proceed
 From any sober judgment; yet thy heart
 Will sure recoil at this.

Count. Why, think so still;
 Think me both ruffian-like and lunatic;
 One proof, at least, I'll give of temperate reason—
 Not to be baited from my fix'd design
 By a monk's ban or whining intercession.

Aust. Thou canst not mean to do it?

Count. Trust thine eyes.

Thy balt! bring forth the pris'ner; bid my marshal
 Prepare an axe. The ceremony's short;
 One stroke, and all is past. Before he die,
 He shall have leave to thank your godliness
 For speeding him so soon from this bad world.

Aust. Where is the right, the law, by which you

Count. My will's the law. [doom him?

Aust. A venerable law!

The law by which the tiger tears the lamb,
 And kites devour the dove. A lord of France,
 Dress'd in a little delegated sway,
 Strikes at his sovereign's face, while he profanes
 His function's trusted for the gen'ral good.

Count. I answer not to thee.

Aust. Answer to heav'n:

When call'd to audit in that sacred court,
 Will that supremacy accept thy plea,

"I did commit foul murder, for I might?" [earth,

Count. Soar not too high; talk of the things of I'll give thee ear. Has not thy penitent,
 Young Isabel, disclos'd her passion to thee?

Aust. Never.

Count. Just now, her coldness to my son,
 You said, bespoke her heart pre-occupied.

The frail and fair make you their oracles;

Pent in your close confessionals, you sit,

Bending your rev'rend ears to am'rous secrets.

Aust. Scoffer, no more! stop thy licentious tongue!
 Turn inward to thy bosom, and reflect—

Count. That is, be fool'd. Yet will I grant his life
 On one condition.

Aust. Name it.

Count. Join my hand

To Isabel.

Aust. Not for the world.

Count. He dies.

Enter THEODORE, guarded. [first,
 Come near, thou wretch! When call'd before me

With most unwonted patience I endur'd
Thy bold avowal of the wrong thou didst me;
A wrong so great, that, but for foolish pity,
Thy life that instant should have made atonement;
But now, convicted of a greater crime,
Mercy is quench'd: therefore, prepare to die.

Theo. I was a captive long 'mongst infidels,
Whom falsely I deem'd savage, since I find
Ev'n Tunis and Algiers, those nests of ruffians,
Might teach civility to polish'd France,
If life depends but on a tyrant's frown. [not;

Count. Out with thy holy trumpery, priest! delay
Or, if he trusts in Mahomet, and scorns thee,
Away with him this instant.

Aust. Hold, I charge you!

Theo. The turban'd misbeliever makes some shew
Of justice in his deadly processes;
Nor drinks the sabre blood thus wantonly,
Where men are valued less than nobler beasts.
Of what am I accus'd?

Count. Of insolence;
Of bold, presumptuous love, that dares aspire
To mix the vileness of thy sordid lees
With the rich current of a baron's blood. [youth,

Aust. My heart is touch'd for him. Much-injur'd
Suppress awhile this swelling indignation;
Plead for thy life.

Theo. I will not meanly plead;
Nor, were my neck bow'd to his bloody block,
If love's my crime, would I disown my love.

Count. Then, by my soul, thou diest!

Theo. And let me die:
With my last breath I'll bless her. My spirit, free
From earth's encumb'ring clogs, shall soar above
Anxious, as once in life, I'll hover round her, [thee.
Teach her new courage to sustain this blow,
And guard her, tyrant! from thy cruelty,

Count. Ah! give me way!

Aust. Why, this is madaess, youth:
You but inflame the rage you should appease. [so:
Theo. He thinks me vile. 'Tis true, indeed, I seem
But though these humble weeds obscure my outside,
I have a soul disdains his contumely;
A guiltless spirit that provokes no wrong,
Nor from a monarch would endure it, offer'd:
Uninjur'd, lamb-like; but a lion, rous'd.
Know, too, injurious lord, here stands before thee
The equal of thy birth.

Count. Away, base clod!
Obey me slaves. What, all amaz'd with lies? [face
Aust. Yet hear him, Narbonne: that ingenuous
Looks not a lie. Thou saidst thou wert a captive—
Turn not away; we are not all like him.

Theo. My story's brief. My mother and myself,
(I then an infant,) in my father's absence,
Were on our frontiers seiz'd by Saracens.

Count. A likely tale! a well-devis'd imposture!
Who will believe thee?

Aust. Go on, say all.

Theo. To the fierce bashaw, Hamet,
That scourge and terror of the Christian coasts,
Were we made slaves at Tunis.

Aust. Ha! at Tunis?
Seiz'd with thy mother? Lives she, gentle youth?

Theo. Ah! no, dear saint; fate ended soon her
In pity ended! On her dying couch, [woes,
She pray'd for blessings on me.

Aust. Be thou blessed!

Oh! fail not, nature, but support this conflict!
'Tis not delusion sure. It must be he.
But one thing more; did she not tell thee, too,
Thy wretched father's name?

Theo. The lord of Clarinsal.
Why dost thou look so eagerly upon me?
If yet he lives, and thou know'st Clarinsal,
Tell him my tale.

Aust. Mysterious Providence!

Count. What's this? the old man trembles and turns pale. (Aside.)

Theo. He will not let his offspring's timeless
Walk unappeas'd; but on this cruel head [ghost

Exact full vengeance for his slaughter'd son.

Aust. Oh! Giver of all good! Eternal Lord,
Am I so bless'd, at last, to see my son?

Theo. Let me be deaf for ever, if my ears
Deceive me now! Did he not say his son? [thee,

Aust. I did, I did! let this, and this, convince
I am that Clarinsal, I am thy father. [eyes?

Count. Why works this foolish moisture to my Down, nature! what hast thou to do with vengeance? (Aside.)

Theo. Oh, sir! thus bending, let me clasp your
Now, in this precious moment, pay at once knees;
The long, long debt of a lost son's affection. [hold

Count. Destruction seize them both! Must I be-
Their transports, ne'er perhaps again to know
A son's obedience, or a father's fondness? (Aside.)

Aust. Dear boy! what miracle preserv'd thee
To give thee back to France? [thus,

Theo. No miracle,
But common chance. A warlike bark of Spain
Bore down, and seiz'd our vessel, as we rov'd
Intent on spoil (for many times, alas!

Was I compell'd to join their hated league,
And strike with infidels). My country known,
The courteous captain sent me to the shore;
Where vain were my fond hopes to find my father;
'Twas desolation all; a few poor swains
Told me, the rumour ran he had renounc'd

A hated world, and here, in Languedoc,
Devoted his remains of life to heav'n. [my pray'rs,

Aust. They told thee truth; and heav'n shall have
My soul pour'd out in endless gratitude,
For this unhop'd, immeasurable blessing. [tale;

Count. Thus far, fond man! I have listen'd to the
And think it, as it is, a gross contrivance,
A trick, devis'd to cheat my credulous reason,
And thaw me to a woman's milkiness. [guage,

Aust. And art thou so unskill'd in nature's lan-
Still to mistrust us? Could our tongues deceive,
Credit, what ne'er was feign'd, the genuine heart:
Believe these pangs, these tears of joy and anguish.

Count. Or true, or false, to me it matters not.
I see thou hast an int'rest in his life, [him
And by that link I hold thee. Wouldst thou save (Thou know'st already what my soul is set on,) Teach thy proud heart compliance with my will:

If not—but now no more. Hear all, and mark me,
Keep special guard that none, but by my order,
Pass from the castle. By my hopes of heav'n,
His head goes off who dares to disobey me!

Farewell! if he be dear to thee, remember. [Exit.

Aust. If he be dear to me! my vital blood!
Image of her my soul delighted in,
Again she lives in thee! Yes, 'twas that voice,
That kindred look, rais'd such strong instinct here,
And kindled all my bosom at thy danger.

Theo. But must we bear to be thus tamely coop'd
By such insulting, petty despotism?
I look to my ungarded side in vain;
Had I a sword—

Aust. Think not of vengeance now;
A mightier arm than thine prepares it for him.
Pass but a little space, we shall behold him
The object of our pity, not our anger.

Yes, he must suffer; my rapt soul foresees it;
Empires shall sink, the pond'rous globe of earth
Crumble to dust, the sun and stars be quench'd!
But oh! Eternal Father, of thy will,
To the last letter, all shall be accomplish'd.

Theo. So let it be! but if his pride must fall,
Ye saints, who watch o'er loveliness and virtue,
Confound not with his crimes her innocence!
Make him alone the victim; but with blessings,
Bright and distinguish'd, crown his beauteous daughter,

The charming Adelaide, my heart's first passion!
Aust. Oh! most disastrous love. My son, my son,
Thy words are poniards here. Alas! I thought
(So thought the tyrant, and for that he rag'd,)
The vows exchang'd 'tween Isabel and thee,
Thwarted the issue of his wild designs.

Theo. I knew not Isabel, beyond a moment
Pass'd in surprise and haste. [him,

Aust. Oh! had malignant fortune toil'd to blast
Thus had she snar'd him in this fatal passion!
And does young Adelaide return thy love?

Theo. Bless'd pow'rs, she does! How can you frown and hear it?

Her gen'rous soul, first touch'd by gratitude,
Soon own'd a kinder, warmer sympathy.
Soft as the fanning of a turtle's plumes,
The sweet confession met my enraptur'd ears.

Aust. What can I do? Come near, my Theo-
Dost thou believe my affection? [dore;

Theo. Can I doubt it?

Aust. Think what my bosom suffers, when I tell
It must not, cannot be. [thee,

Theo. My love for Adelaide!

Aust. Deem it delicious poison; dash it from Thy bane is in the cup. [thee:

Theo. Oh! bid me rather
Tear out my throbbing heart; I'd think it mercy,
To this unjust, this cruel interdiction.
That proud, unfeeling Narbonne, from his lips
Well might such words have fallen; but thou, my father—

Aust. And fond, as ever own'd that tender name.
Not I, my son, not I prevent this union,
To me 'tis bitterness to cross thy wish;
But nature, fate, and heav'n, all, all forbid it.
We must withdraw where heav'n alone can hear us:
Then must thou stretch thy soul's best faculties,
Call ev'ry manly principle to steel thee,
And, to confirm thy name, secure thy honour,
Make one great sacrifice of love to justice. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—A Chamber.

ADELAIDE discovered.

Adel. Woe treads on woe. Thy life, my Theodore, [stroke,
Thy threaten'd life, snatch'd from th' impending
Just gave a moment's respite to my heart;
And now a mother's grief, with pangs more keen,
Wakes ev'ry throbbing sense, and quite o'erwhelms
Her soul wrapp'd up in his, to talk thus to her! [me.
Divorce her, leave her, wed with Isabel,
And call on heav'n to sanctify the outrage!
How could my father's bosom meditate
What savage tongues would falter ev'n to speak?
But see, he comes—

Enter AUSTIN and JAQUELINE.

Oh! let me bend to thank you;
In this extreme distress, from you alone [fort.
(For my poor heart is in vain) can she hope com-

Aust. How heard she the ill tidings? I had hopes
His cooler reason would subdue the thought;
And heav'n, in pity to her gentle virtues, [them.
Might spare her knowing how he meant to wrong

Jaq. The rumour of the castle reach'd her first;
But his own lips confirm'd the barb'rous secret.
Sternly but now he enter'd her apartment, [sence!
And, stamping, frown'd her women from her pre-
After a little while they had pass'd together,
His visage flush'd with rage and mingled shame,
He burst into the chamber where we waited,
Bade us return, and give our lady aid;
Then, covering his face with both his hands,
Went forth like one half-craz'd.

Adel. Oh! good, kind father,
There is a charm in holy eloquence,
(If words can medicine a pang like this,)
Perhaps may sooth her. Sighs and trickling tears,
Are all my love can give. As I kneel by her,
She gazes on me, clasps me to her bosom,
Cries out, "My child, my child!" then, rising quick,
Severely lifts her streaming eyes to heav'n,
Laughs wildly, and half sounds my father's name;
Till, quite o'erpower'd, she sinks from my embrace,
While, like the grasp of death, convulsions shake
her. [her heart,

Aust. Remorseless man! this wound would reach
And when she falls, his last, best prop falls with her.
And see, the beauteous mourner moves this way:

Time has but little injur'd that fair fabric;
But cruelty's hard stroke, more fell than time,
Works at the base, and shakes it to the centre.

Enter the COUNTESS.

Countess. Will, then, these dreadful sounds ne'er leave my ears? [liv'd

"Our marriage was accurs'd; too long we have
In bonds forbid; think me no more thy husband;
Th' avenging bolt, for that incestuous name,
Falls on my house, and spreads the ruin wide."
These were his words.

Adel. Oh! ponder them no more!
Lo! where the blessed minister of peace,
He whose mild counsels wont to charm your care,
Is kindly come to cheer your drooping soul.
And see, the good man weeps.

Countess. What! weep for me? [core,

Aust. Ay, tears of blood from my heart's inmost
And count them drops of water from my eyes,
Could they but wash out from your memory
The deep affliction you now labour with.

Countess. Then still there is some pity left in man:
I judg'd you all by him, and so I wrong'd you.
I would have told my story to the sea,
When it roar'd wildest; bid the lioness,
Robb'd of her young, look with compassion on me;
Rather than hop'd, in any form of man,
To find one drop of human gentleness.

Aust. Most honour'd lady—

Countess. Pray you come not near me,
I'm contagion all! some wicked sin,
Prodigious, unrepented sin, has stain'd me.
Father, 'twould blast thee but to hear the crimes,
This woman, who was once the wife of Raymond,
This curs'd, forsaken woman, here has acted.

Aust. What sland'rous tongue dare thus profane your virtue?

Madam, I know you well; and, by my order,
Each day, each hour, of your unspotted life
Might give as fair a lesson to the world,
As churchmen's tongues can preach, or saints could practise. [Hortensia!

Countess. He charges me with all. Thou, poor
What guilt, prepost'rous guilt, is thine to answer!

Adel. In mercy, wound not thus your daughter's

Aust. A villain or a madman might say this. [soul.

Countess. What shall I call him? He, who was my husband;

My child, thy father; he'll disclaim thee, too.
But let him cast off all the ties of nature,
Abandon us to grief and misery,
Still will I wander with thee o'er the world:

I will not wish my reason may forsake me,
Nor sweet oblivious dullness steep my sense,
While thy soft age may want a mother's care,
A mother's tenderness, to wake and guard thee.

Adel. And if the love of your dear Adelaide,
Her rev'rence, duty, endless gratitude
For all your angel goodness, now can move you,
Oh! for my sake, (lest quite you break my heart,)
Wear but a little outside shew of comfort;
Awhile pretend it, though you feel it not,
And I will bless you for deceiving me. [thus:

Countess. I know 'tis weakness, folly, to be mov'd
And these, I hope, are my last tears for him.

Alas! I little knew, deluded wretch!
His riotous fancy glow'd with Isabel;
That not a thought of me possess'd his mind,
But coldness and aversion; how to shun me,
And turn me forth a friendless wanderer.

Aust. Lady, for your peace,
Think conscience is the deepest source of anguish:
A bosom free, like your's, has life's best sunshine;
'Tis the warm blaze in the poor herdsman's hut,
That, when the storm howls o'er his humble thatch,
Brightens his clay-built walls, and cheers his soul.

Countess. Oh! father, reason is for mod'rate sorrows, [fresh,

For wounds which time has balm'd; but mine are
All bleeding fresh, and pain beyond my patience.
Ungrateful! cruel! how have I deserv'd it?

Thou tough, tough heart, break for my ease at once!

Aust. I scarce, methinks, can weigh him with him—
Vexations strange have fall'n on him of late, [self;
And his distemper'd fancy drives him on
To rash designs, where disappointment mads him.

Countess. Ah, no! his wit is settled and most sub-
Pride and wild blood are his distemper, father. [tle;
But here I bid farewell to grief and fondness:
Let him go kneel, and sigh to Isabel:
And may he as obdurate find her heart,
As his as been to me.

Aust. Why, that's well said;
'Tis better thus, than with consuming sorrow
To feed on your own life. Give anger scope:
Time, then, at length, will blunt this killing sense;
And peace, he ne'er must know again, be your's.

Countess. I was a woman full of tenderness;
I am a woman stung by injuries.

Narbonne was once my husband—my protector;
He was—what was he not?—He is my tyrant;
The unnatural tyrant of a heart that lov'd him.

With cool, delib'rate baseness, he forsakes me;
With scorn as steadfast shall my soul repay it.

Aust. You know the imminent danger threatens
From Godfrey's fearful claim? [him,

Countess. Too well I know it;
A fearful claim indeed!

Aust. To-morrow's sun
Will see him at these gates; but trust my faith,
No violence shall reach you. The rash Count
(Lost to himself) by force detains me here.

Vain is his force: our holy sanctuary,
Whate'er betide, shall give your virtue shelter;
And peace, and piety alone, approach you.

Countess. Oh! that the friendly bosom of the
Would close on me for ever! [earth

Aust. These ill thoughts
Must not be cherish'd. That all-righteous Pow'r,
Whose hand inflicts, knows to reward our patience:
Farewell! command me ever as your servant,
And take the poor man's all, my pray'rs and bless-
ing. [Exit.

Adel. Will you not strive to rest? Alas! 'tis long,
Since you have slept. I'll lead you to your couch;
And gently touch my lute, to wake some strain,
May aid your slumbers.

Countess. My sweet comforter!
I feel not quite forlorn, when thou art near me.

Adel. Lead on my arm.

Countess. No, I will in alone,
My sense is now unapt for harmony.
But go thou to Alphonso's holy shrine;
There, with thy innocent hands devoutly rais'd,
Implore his sainted spirit to receive
Thy humble supplications, and to avert
From thy dear head the still impending wrath,
For one black deed, that threatens all thy race. [Exit.

Adel. For thee my pray'rs shall rise, not for my-
And ev'ry kindred saint will bend to hear me. [self,
But oh! my flutt'ring breast!—'Tis Theodore!
How sad and earnestly he views that paper!
It turns him pale. Beshrew the envious paper!
Why should it steal the colour from that cheek,
Which danger ne'er could blanch? He sees me not.
I'll wait; and should sad thoughts disturb his quiet,
If love has pow'r, with love's soft breath dispel them. [Exit.

Enter THEODORE, with a paper.

Theo. My importunity at last has conquer'd:
Weeping, my father gave, and bade me read it.
" 'Tis there," he cried, "the myst'ry of thy birth;
There view thy long divorce from Adelaide."
Why should I read it? Why, with rav'nous haste,
Gorge down my bane? The worst is yet conceal'd;
Then wherefore eager for my own destruction?
Inquire a secret, which, when known, must sink me?
My eye starts back from it; my heart stands still;
And ev'ry pulse and motion of my blood,
With prohibition strong as sense can utter,
Cries out "Beware!"—But does my sight deceive?
Is it not she? Up, up, you black contents:

A brighter object meets my ravish'd eyes.

Now let the present moment, love, be thine!

For ill, come when it may, must come untimely.

Re-enter ADELAIDE.

Adel. Am I not here unwish'd for?

Theo. My best angel!

Were seas between us, thou art still where I am.

I bear thy precious image ever round me,

As pious men the relics they adore.

Scarce durst I hope to be so blest to see thee,

But could not wish a joy beyond thy presence. [tune

Adel. Oh! Theodore, what wondrous turns of for-
Have giv'n thee back to a dear parent's arms?

And spite of all the horrors which surround me,

And worse, each black, eventful moment threatens,

My bosom glows with rapture at the thought

Thou wilt at last be bless'd.

Theo. But one way only

Can I be bless'd. On thee depends my fate.

Lord Raymond, harsh and haughty as he is,

And adverse to my father's rigid virtue,

When he shall hear our pure unspotted vows,

Will yield thee to my wishes; but, curs'd stars!

How shall I speak it?

Adel. What?

Theo. That holy man,
That Clarinsal, whom I am bound to honour,
Perversely bids me think of thee no more.

Adel. Alas! in what have I offended him? [them;

Theo. Not so; he owns thy virtues, and admires

But with a solemn earnestness that kills me,

He urges some mysterious, dreadful cause,

Must sunder us for ever.

Adel. Oh! then fly me,
I am not worth his frown. Begone this moment;
Leave me to weep my mournful destiny,

And find some fairer, happier maid, to bless thee.

Theo. Fairer than thee! Oh! heav'n's, the delicate hand

Of nature, in her daintiest mood, ne'er fashion'd

Beauty so rare. Love's roseate deity, [mould

Fresh from his mother's kiss, breath'd o'er thy

That soft, ambrosial hue. Fairer than thee!

'Twere blasphemy in any tongue but thine,

So to disparage thy unmatch'd perfections.

Adel. No, Theodore, I dare not hear thee longer;
Perhaps, indeed, there is some fatal cause.

Theo. There is not, cannot be. 'Tis but his pride,
Stung by resentment, 'gainst thy furious father.

Adel. Ah! no; he is too gen'rous, just, and good,
To hate me for th' offences of my father.

But find the cause. At good Alphonso's tomb

I go to offer up my orisons;

There bring me comfort, and dispel my fears;

Or teach me (oh! hard thought!) to bear our part-
ing. [Exit.

Theo. She's gone; and now, firm fortitude, support
For here I read my sentence, life or death. [me!

(Takes out the paper and reads.)

Thou art the grandson of the good Alphonso,

And Narbonne's rightful lord.—Ha! is it so?

Then has this boist'rous Raymond dar'd insult me,

Where I alone should rule: yet not by that

Am I condemn'd to lose her. Thou damn'd scroll!

I fear thou hast worse poison for my eyes.

Long were the champions, bound for Palestine,

(Thy grandsire then their chief,) by adverse winds

Detain'd in Naples; where he saw and lov'd,

And wedded, secretly, Vicenza's daughter;

For, till the holy warfare should be clos'd,

They deem'd it wise to keep the rite conceal'd.

The issue of that marriage was thy mother;

But the same hour that gave her to the world,

For ever clos'd the fair one's eyes who bare her.

Foul treason next cut short thy grandsire's thread;

Poison'd he fell—

(Theodore pauses; re-enter AUSTIN from behind.)

Aust. By Raymond's felon father;

Who, adding fraud to murder, forg'd a will,

Devising to himself and his descendants,

Thy rights, thy titles, thy inheritance.

Theo. Then I am lost.

Aust. Now think, unkind young man,
Was it for nought I warn'd thee to take heed,
And smother in its birth this dang'rous passion?
Th' Almighty arm, red for thy grandsire's murder,
Year after year has terribly been stretch'd
O'er all the land, but most this guilty race.

Theo. The murderer was guilty, not his race.

Aust. Great crimes, like this, have lengthen'd punishments.

Why speak the fates by signs and prodigies?
Why one by one falls this devoted line,
Accomplishing the dreadful prophecy,
That none should live t' enjoy the fruits of blood?
But wave this argument. Thou wilt be call'd
To prove thy right,
By combat with the Count.

Theo. In arms I'll meet him;
To-morrow, now—

Aust. And, reeking with his blood,
Offer the hand which shed it to his daughter?

Theo. Ha! [dore,

Aust. Does it shake thee?—Come, my Theo—
Let not a gust of love-sick inclination
Root, like a sweeping whirlwind, from thy soul
All the fair growth of noble thoughts and virtue,
Thy mother planted in thy early youth;
Oh! rashly tread not down the promis'd harvest,
They toil'd to rear to the full height of honour!

Theo. Would I had liv'd obscure in penury,
Rather than thus!—Distraction!—Adelaide!

Re-enter ADELAIDE.

Adel. Oh! whither shall I fly?

Theo. What means my love?
Why thus disturb'd?

Adel. The castle is beset;
The superstitious, fierce, inconstant people,
Madder than storms, with weapons caught in haste,
Menace my father's life; rage, and revile him;
Call him the heir of murd'rous usurpation;
And swear they'll own no rightful lord but Godfrey. [power

Aust. Blind wretches! I will hence, and try my
To allay the tumult. Follow me, my son! [Exit.

Adel. Go not defenceless thus; think on thy safety:
See yonder porch opes to the armoury;
There coats of mailed proof, falchions, and casques,
And all the glittering implements of war,
Stand terribly arrang'd.

Theo. Heavens! 'twas what I wish'd.
Yes, Adelaide, I go to fight for him:
Thy father shall not fall ingloriously;
But, when he sees this arm strike at his foes,
Shall own, thy Theodore deserv'd his daughter. [Exeunt.

ACT V.—SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter the COUNT of NARBONNE, FABIAN, AUSTIN, and Attendants, with Prisoners.

Count. Hence to a dungeon with those mutinous slaves;
There let them prate of prophecies and visions;
And when coarse fare and stripes bring back their
Perhaps I may relent, and turn them loose [senses,
To new offences, and fresh chastisement.

[Exeunt Officers, &c.

Fab. You bleed, my lord!

Count. A scratch—death! to be bay'd [fangs,
By mongrels! curs! They yelp'd, and shew'd their Growl'd, too, as they would bite. But was't not poor,
Unlike the generous strain of Godfrey's lineage,
To stir the rabble up in nobles' quarrels,
And bribe my hinds and vassals to assault me.

Aust. They were not stirr'd by Godfrey.

Count. Who, then, stirr'd them?
Thyself, perhaps. Was't thou? And yet I wrong thee; [and shrunk,
Thou didst preach peace; and straight they crouch'd
More tam'd by the persuasion of thy tongue,
Than losing the hot drops my steel drew from them.

Aust. I might, perhaps, have look'd for better thanks,

Than taunts to pay my service—but no matter.
My son, too, serv'd thee nobly; he bestrode thee,
And drove those peasants back, whose staves and
But for his aid, had shiver'd that stout frame: [clubs,
But both, too well accusom'd to thy transports,
Nor ask, nor hope thy courtesy.

Count. Your pardon!

I knew my life was sav'd, but not by whom;
I wish'd it not, yet thank him. I was down, [ber,
Stunn'd in the inglorious broil; and nought remem-
More than the shame of such a paltry danger.
Where is he?

Aust. Here. (Theodore advances.)

Count. (Starting.) Ha! angels shelter me!

Theo. Why starts he thus?

Count. Are miracles renew'd?
Art thou not risen from the mould'ring grave?
And in the awful majesty of death,
'Gainst nature, and the course of mortal thought,
Assum'st the likeness of a living form,
To blast my soul with horror?

Theo. Does he rave?

Or means he thus to mock me?

Count. Answer me!

Speak, some of you, who have the power to speak;
Is it not he?

Fab. Who, good my lord?

Count. Alphonso.

His form, his arms, his air, his very frown.
Lord of these confines, speak—declare thy plea—

Theo. Dost thou not know me, then? [sure.

Count. Ha! Theodore?

This sameness, not resemblance, is past faith.
All statues, pictures, or the likeness kept
By memory, of the good Alphonso living,
Are faint and shadowy traces to this image!

Fab. Hear me, my lord, so shall the wonder cease.
The very arms he wears, were once Alphonso's.
He found them in the stores, and brac'd them on,
To assist you in your danger.

Count. 'Tis most strange.

I strive, but cannot conquer this amazement:
I try to take them off; yet still my eyes
Again are drawn, as if by magic, on him.

Aust. Hear you, my son? (Apart to Theo.)

Theo. Yes, and it wakes within me
Sensations new till now.

Aust. To-morrow's light [pleas'd you
Will shew him wonders greater. (Apart.) Sir, it
(Wherefore you best can tell,) to make us here
Your prisoners; but the alarm of danger
Threw wide your gates, and freed us. We return'd
To give you safeguard. May we now depart?

Count. Ay, to the confines of the furthest earth;
For here thy sight unhinges Raymond's soul.
Be hid, where air or light may never find thee;
And bury, too, that phantom. [Exit, with Attend.

Theo. Insolence!

Too proud to think our kindness! yet, what horror
Shook all his frame, when thus I stood before him!

Aust. The statue of thy grandsire
(The very figure as thou stood'st before him, Arm'd just as thou art), seem'd to move and live;
That breathing marble, which the people's love
Rear'd near his tomb, within our convent's walls.
Anon I'll lead thee to it.

Theo. Let me hence,

To shake these trappings off.

Aust. Wear them, and mark me.

Ere night, thy kinsman, Godfrey, will be master
Of all thy story:—

He is brave and just, [reason
And will support thy claim. Should proof and Fail with the usurper, thou must try thy sword
(And heaven will strike for thee) in combat with him.
The conscious flash of this thy grandsire's mail,
Worse than the horrors of the fabled Gorgon,
That curdled blood to stone, will shrink his sinews,
And cast the wither'd boaster at thy feet. [blood:

Theo. Grant it, ye powers! but not to shed his
The father of my Adelaide, that name—

Aust. Is dearer far than mine; my words are air;
My counsels pass unmark'd. But come, my son!
To-night my cell must house thee. Let me shew
The humble mansion of thy lonely father, [thee
Proud once, and prosperous; where I've wept, and
And lost in cold oblivion of the world, [pray'd,
Twice nine long years; thy mother and thyself,
And God, were all my thoughts.

Theo. Ay, to the convent!

For there my love, my Adelaide, expects me.

[Aside. Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment in the Castle.

Enter the COUNT of NARBONNE, and FABIAN.

Count. By hell, this legend of Alphonso's death
Hourly gains ground.

Fab. They talk of nought besides;
And their craz'd notions are so full of wonder,
There's scarce a common passage of the times,
But straight their folly makes it ominous. [source,

Count. Fame, that, like water, widens from its
Thus often swells, and spreads a shallow falsehood.
At first a twilight tale of village terror,
The hair of boors and beldams bristled at it;
(Such bloodless fancies wake to nought but fear:)
Then, heard with grave derision by the wise,
And, from contempt, unsearch'd and unrefuted,
It pass'd upon the laziness of faith,
Like many a lie, gross, and impossible.

Fab. A lie believ'd, may, in the end, my lord,
Prove fatal as a written gospel truth.
Therefore—

Count. Take heed; and ere the lightning strike,
Fly from the sulphurous clouds. I am not dull;
For, bright as ruddy meteors through the sky,
The thought flames here, shall light me to my safety.
Fabian, away! Send hither to me straight,
Renchild and Thybalt. [Exit Fabian.] They are young and fearless.

Thy flight, ungrateful Isabel, compels me [ness;
To this rude course. I would have all with kind-
Nor stain the snow-white flower of my true-love
With spots of violence. But it must be so.
This lordly priest, this Clarinsal, or Austin,
Like a true churchman, by his calling tainted,
Prates conscience; and in craft abets Earl Godfrey,
That Isabel may wed his upstart son.
Let Rome dart all her lightnings at my head,
Till her grey pontiff singe in his own fires:
Spite of their rage, I'll force the sanctuary,
And bear her off this night beyond their power;
My bride, if she consents; if not, my hostage.

Enter two Officers.

Come hither, sirs. Take twenty of your fellows;
Post ten at the great gate of Nicholas;
The rest, by two's, guard every avenue
Leads from the convent to the plain or castle.
Charge them (and as their lives shall answer it,)
That none but of my train pass out, or enter.

1 Offi. We will, my lord, about it instantly.

Count. Temper your zeal, and know your orders
Take care they spill no blood: no violence, [first.
More than resisting who would force a passage:
The holy drones may buzz, but have no stings.
I mean to take a bauble from the church,
A reverend thief stole from me. Near the altar
(That place commands the centre of the aisle,)
Keep you your watch. If you espy a woman,
(There can be only she,) speed to me straight;
You'll find my station near Alphonso's porch.
Be swift as winds, and meet me presently. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Inside of a Convent.

ADELAIDE veiled, rising from before the statue of Alphonso.

Adel. Alas! 'tis mockery to pray as I do. [wings,
Thoughts fit for heaven, should rise on seraph's
Unclogg'd with aught of earth; but mine hang here;
Beginning, ending all in Theodore.
Why comes he not? 'Tis torture for th' unblest'd,
To suffer such suspense as my heart aches with.

What can it be—this secret, dreadful cause,
This shaft unseen, that's wing'd against our love?
Perhaps—I know not what. At yonder shrine
Bending, I'll seal my irrevocable vow:
Hear, and record it, choirs of saints and angels!
If I am doom'd to sigh for him in vain,
No second flame shall ever enter here;
But, faithful to thy fond, thy first impression,
Turn thou, my breast, to every sense of joy,
Cold as the pale-ey'd marbles which surround me.
(She withdraws.)

Enter AUSTIN and THEODORE.

Aust. Look round, my son! This consecrated place
Contains the untimely ashes of thy grandsire.
With all the impious mockery of grief, [him.
Here were they laid by the dire hand which sped
There stands his statue; were a glass before thee,
So would it give thee back thy outward self.

Theo. And may the power which fashion'd thus my outside,
With all his nobler ornaments of virtue
Sustain my soul! till generous emulation
Raise me, by deeds, to equal his renown,
And—

Aust. To avenge him. Not by treachery,
But, casting off all thoughts of idle love,
Of love ill-match'd, unhappy, ominous—
To keep the memory of his wrongs; do justice
To his great name, and prove the blood you spring from.

Theo. Oh! were the bold possessor of my rights
A legion arm'd, the terrors of his sword
Resistless as the flash that strikes from heaven,
Undaunted would I meet him. His proud crest
Should feel the dint of no unpractis'd edge.
But, while my arm assails her father's life,
The unnatural wound returns to my own breast,
And conquest loses Adelaide for ever. [lost her.

Aust. The barbarous deed of Raymond's father
Theo. Pierce not my soul thus. Can you love
And coldly tell me, [your son,
Without one tear unmov'd thus, I must lose her?
But where, where is she? (Looking out.) Heavenly innocence!

See, the dear saint kneels at the altars' foot;
See, her white hands with fervent clasps are rais'd;
Perhaps for me. Have you a heart, my father,
And bid me bear to lose her? Hold me not—
I come, I fly, my life, my all! to join thee. [Exit.]

Aust. Return, return, rash boy!—Pernicious chance!

One glance from her will quite destroy my work,
And leave me but my sorrow for my labour. [Exit.]

Enter the COUNT of NARBONNE.

Count. Am I turn'd coward, that my tottering knees
Knock as I tread the pavement? 'Tis the place;
The sombrous horror of these long-drawn aisles.
My footsteps are beat back by nought but echo,
Struck from the caverns of the vaulted dead;
Yet now it seem'd as if a host pursued me, [like.
The breath that makes my words, sounds thunder-
Sure 'twas a deep-fetch'd groan. No—hark, again!
Then 'tis the language of the tombs; and see!—

(Pointing to the statue of Alphonso.)

Like their great monarch, he stands rais'd above
Who's there? [them.

Enter two Officers.

1 Offi. My lord, where are you?

Count. Here—speak, man! [cheeks
Why do you shake thus? Death! your bloodless
Send fear into me. You, sir, what's the matter?

2 Offi. We have found the lady.

Count. My good fellows, where?

1 Offi. Here, from this spot, you may yourself
Her face is towards the altar. [behold her;

Count. (Looking out.) Blasts upon me!
Wither my eyes for ever!—Ay, 'tis she;
Austin with Theodore; he joins their hands:—

Destruction seize them ! Oh ! dull, tardy fool !
My love and my ambition both defeated !
A marriage in my sight ! Come forth, come forth !
(Draws a dagger.)

Arise, grim vengeance, and wash out my shame !
Ill-fated girl ! a bloody Hymen waits thee ! [Exit.]

1 Offi. His face is black with rage—his eyes flash
I do not like this service. [fire;]

2 Offi. No, nor I.

1 Offi. Heard you that shriek ?—It thunders. By my soul,

I feel as if my blood were froze within me.

Speak to me. See, he comes. (Officers retire.)

Re-enter the COUNT of NARBONNE, with a bloody dagger.

Count. The deed is done.

Hark ! the deep thunder rolls. I hail the sign ;
It tells me, in loud greetings, I'm reveng'd.

Re-enter THEODORE, with his sword drawn.

Theo. Where, where's the assassin ?

Count. Boy, the avenger's here.

Behold, this dagger smokes with her heart's blood !
That thou stand'st there to brave me, thank that mail,

Or, traitor, thou hadst felt me. But 'tis done.

Theo. Oh ! monstrous, monstrous !

Count. Triumph now o'er Narbonne ;

Boast, how a stripling and a monk deceiv'd
The easy Count ; but, if thou lov'st thy bride,
Take that, and use it nobly. (Drops the dagger.)

Theo. 'Gainst thy heart,
Barbarian, would I use it : but look there ;
There are ten thousand daggers.

Aust. (Without.) Ring out the alarm ;
Fly all ; bring aid, if possible, to save her.

Re-enter ADELAIDE, wounded, and supported by AUSTIN. Some of the Count's Attendants enter with lighted torches.

Count. Ha ! lightning shiver me !

Adel. My lord ! my father !

Oh ! bear me to his feet.

Aust. Thou man of blood,

Past utterance lost, see what thy rage has done !

Count. Ruin ! despair ! my child ! my Adelaide !
Art thou the innocent victim of my fury ?

Adel. I am, indeed. I know not my offence ;
Yet sure 'twas great, when my life answers it.
Will you forgive me now ?

Count. Oh ! misery ;

Had I unnumber'd lives, I'd give them all,
To lengthen thine an hour. What frenzy seiz'd me ?
That veil, the glimmering light, my rage, deceiv'd
Unnatural wound ! detested parricide ! [me.]
Good youth, in pity strike this monster dead !

Adel. Listen not to his ravings. (To Theo.)

Alas ! my Theodore,
I struggle for a little gasp of breath ;
Draw it with pain ; and sure, in this last moment,
You will observe me.

Live, I charge you :

Forget me not, but love my memory.

If I was ever dear to thee, my father,

(Those tears declare I was,) will you not hear me,
And grant one wish to your expiring child ?
